A great number and variety of ſmall earthen figures, ſhaped like mummies, with the head of Iſis, or Oſiris, ſome adorned with heiroglyphics, others plain.

Several buſtos and groups of figures in earthen ware.

A veſſel of white porous earth, which is ſaid to have a particular quality; for if you fill it with water, and lay ſeeds of ſmall ſallet in the furrows of the outſide, they will grow, and be fit for uſe in a few days.

At the upper end of the table are ſeveral more figures in metal of Oſiris, Iſis, Harpocrates, Egyptian prieſts, &c.

An Egyptian god repreſented by the figure of a bull.

Several ſmall amulets with loops to them, which the Egyptians wore about their perſons, as charms, or preſervatives againſt bad fortune, unforeſeen accidents, ſickneſs, &c.

The head of Anubis, or Cynocephalus, a dog which in Egypt they worſhipped.

Figures of a cat, a monkey, &c. ſcarabs, beetles of various ſizes made of marble, agate, cornelian, &c.

Some ſmall oblong pieces of enamelled earth, notched, as is in general conjectured, to mark the riſing and falling of the water of the Nile. Alſo a cylinder, and ſome pebbles curiouſly marked with hieroglyphics and figures, and ſome Phœnician ſeals.

Antiquitates Hetruſcæ. The four repoſitories under this title contain Hetruſcan antiquities.

The firſt are ſome bronzes; as a figure of Mars, the god of war; a Deus Averruncus, the god who preſided over the common ſewers; a head of Proſerpine, &c.

A great number of veſſels of different forms, made of a kind of fine pale red earth; ſome of them plain, but elegantly varniſhed; others painted with figures, letters, and various ornaments. Theſe veſſels conſiſt of amphoras, or vaſes with two handles, and covers to them very curiouſly painted and ornamented.

Jars with triangular mouths, intended to pour water on the hands of the prieſts, or for libations in their ſacrifices.

Many pateras, diſhes, of various ſhapes and ſizes; ſome of them have pedeſtals.

Cups for containing the great variety of precious ointments that were formerly in uſe.

Some pateras very large, and ornamented with figures and Hetruſcan letters.

Some urns of plain alabaſter, and others very large, but ornamented with the ſame kind of figures and inſcriptions as the large pateras abovementioned. The letters do not agree with any alphabet now in uſe, or known.

Antiquitates Romanæ. The next ſix partitions are filled with Roman antiquities, and conſiſt of ſeveral ancient figures, buſtos and baſſo relievos of various kinds, and other curious articles.

Firſt the copy of an antique piece of ſculpture, made to perpetuate the memory of a ſlave that diſcovered a dangerous conſpiracy againſt Rome, whilſt grinding his knife.

Some wreſtlers in ſtucco.

Lucina the goddeſs of childbirth, Æſculapius the god of phyſic, ſome veſtals and ſacrificing veſſels in marble, and many marble heads, particularly of the emperor Adrian, Hercules, Plato the Philoſopher, Juno, and others.

The bronze figures of Venus, Cupid, Hercules, Mars, &c. &c. Likewiſe the heads of Juno, Diana, Apollo, Mercury, Minotaurus, Faunus, &c.

Uncommon maſks, various votaries or oblations, models of circuſes, the places where they exhibited their public games; and ſeveral pieces of ſtones, bricks, and earthen pipes, dug out of the ruins of the ancient Roman buildings, aqueducts, &c.

Sacrificing Inſtruments. Under this head are a variety of odd fancied metal lamps; ſome like animals; others, monſters as have not their likeneſs in nature.

A ſacri-

A ſacrificing knife, ſimpulums, chalices, ladles, and other inſtruments of braſs, uſed by the prieſts in their ſacrifices.

A great number of Roman pateras, and diſhes, various in form and ſize.

Lacrymatories. Theſe were ſmall glaſs, or earthen bottles, chiefly in the form of Phials. At the Roman funerals, the friends of the deceaſed uſed to fill them with their tears, and depoſit them with the aſhes.

A number of earthen ſepulchral lamps of various forms.

Several ſquare urns, with covers and inſcriptions on them. And others of a more ordinary kind of Roman and Britiſh urns, wherein the ancients after having burnt the bodies of the deceaſed, depoſited their aſhes, burying them with the lamps, lacrymatories, &c. already deſcribed.

Antiquitates variæ. T. Hollis, armr. dono dedit. Under this title are preſerved a collection of antiquities of various kinds, which T. Hollis, eſq; gave to the Muſeum.

The firſt are an alabaſter round urn with a cover, and another of the ſame kind, but ſquare: theſe were for the purpoſe of depoſiting aſhes.

Several bronze figures of Egyptian idols, prieſts, &c.

A Typhon, Hercules, Mercury, Silenus, &c. and ſome more Hetruſcan veſſels.

Several figures of Roman gods, heroes, generals and ſoldiers.

Some marble buſtos of Janus, Bifrons, Hercules, Balbinus Lucina and Diana.

Some large earthen jars, which the ancients uſed for philtration of liquids.

American idols. Theſe are made of earth, and either burnt or hardened in the ſun.

Next is a Japoneſe pagod, a model of a temple with an idol in it.

Several kinds of Indian pots and a variety of other articles by them applied to domeſtic uſes.

A neſt of baſkets made of the bark of a tree, and edged with porcupines quills, died of various colours; and ſome large baſons and ewers, of a pale green jaſper with black ſpots.

On the ſides of the room are hung up in frames ſeveral pieces of ſtucco ceilings, &c. ſome of them brought from Nero's bath at Rome, others from Pompeii.

A Bacchus of alabaſter, and two earthen diſhes of Raphael's painting.

The ſword of ſtate of Hugh Lupus, firſt earl of Cheſter; and ſome baſtinadoes, which are inſtruments of puniſhment uſed by the Turks to beat the ſoles of the feet of offenders.

Some calumets of peace, large tobacco-pipes, which the Indians of North America uſe as a token of friendſhip.

Some whiſks made of an Indian cow's tail, and bruſhes of fibrous roots and feathers.

A variety of muſical inſtruments from the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies; ſome of which are wind inſtruments, others have ſtrings: likewiſe drums of ſeveral kinds from China and America, but more particularly ſome from Lapland.

A great variety of ancient mathematical inſtruments.

On the table of Roman antiquities are ſeveral heads and buſtos, of which the head of Mercury, with a chain fixed to it, deſerves notice.

Some pieces of bricks and tiles with figures and letters ſtamped on them.

Here are likewiſe ſome figures of animals, and heads of canes or ſticks; and the ſpecimens of the Roman fibulas, a kind of buckle or claſp, uſed by them to faſten their upper garments.

Alſo a variety of keys of different ſorts, particularly the ring key, which for greater ſecurity was worn on the finger; and ſome bracelets and other ornaments, &c. of metal.

Various kinds of meaſures for oil, pulſe, &c.

Some corn brought from the ruins of Herculaneum.

Some Turkiſh taliſmans, or charms, with arabic inſcriptions, being generally a ſentence of the Alcoran.

Some tahbahs or ſeals, (inſcribed with Arabic words) which the Turks uſe inſtead of ſigning their names.

Some taliſmans and abraxas, a kind of ſpells or charms. Many of them are marked with the conſtellations; others have the figures of angels, &c.

A ſnuff-box made of the lava of Mount Veſuvius.

A ring ſet with a tranſparent agate.

Two pieces of ſerpentine ſtone for the lid and bottom of a ſnuff-box, and ſome pieces of metallic cryſtal from mount Ætna.

Among ſome bronze figures brought hither with the Cotton library, is one particularly worthy of remark, the naked body being covered with a rough ſubſtance, and upon the whole bears a great reſemblance to the porcupine man, who ſome years ago ſhewed himſelf to the Royal Society.

Some thread, corn, hinges, and other matters, brought from the ruins of Herculaneum.

Letheuillier, dono dedit. We find here ſome Egyptian idols of a ſmall ſize; among them is a figure of Harpocrates, adorned with all the ſymbols he is ever repreſented with.

Over the repoſitories in this room, are a great variety of modern and ancient articles, brought from the ſeveral diſtant parts of the world; particularly a large calabaſh (a kind of American vegetable) in the form of a globe.

Some Indian ſhields made of hides of the rhinoceros, or elephant.

Many ſpecimens of hats of all ſizes, and various materials.

Fans from Japan, China, Tonquin and other places; one of them is a remarkable large ſize, and made of the ſingle leaf of a taliput tree.

Here are ſome drums, targets, and a great number of inſtruments of war.

A variety of American houſhold utenſils, made of vegetables, chiefly gourds; and ſome ſnow ſhoes and ſledges uſed in the northern nations of Europe.

Collectio Sloaniana. This room contains a collection of minerals and foſſils.

Silices. Achates. Sardi. In the cabinet under theſe theſe titles are many ſpecimens of flints, agates, and cornelians.

At the top are ſome large pieces of chryſtal, brought from the Hartz-foreſt in Germany, and other mines.

Iaſpides. Jaſper, a low-prized precious ſtone. Heliotropium, the blood ſtone. Ophites, the ſerpentine marble. The Nephritic ſtone. Many ſorts of florid jaſpers, diſtinguiſhed by a great variety of colours: ſome have, by the hand of nature, delineated on them repreſentations of rivers, trees, landſcapes, ruins of buildings, &c.

Apyri. Sulphura. In this repoſitory are many ſpecimens of ſtones that reſiſt fire, and of the different kinds of Sulphers, or inflammable minerals. Apyri, opake rough ſtones. Lapis, Ollaris, a ſoft ſtone. Mica, the glimmer. Talc, a ſhining ſtone. Amianthus, an opake browniſh ſtone. Aſbeſtos, the cotton-ſtone. Ambers of various kinds. Bitumens, jets, and coals, and the Aſphaltus, or Jews pitch. Sulphurs, or brimſtones.

Mineralia. Metallica. In this repoſitory is to be ſeen a large collection of ores, from almoſt all the known mines in the world.

Here we find alſo many ſpecimens of the different kinds of jaſper.

Likewiſe a rough Egyptian pebble, broke into two parts; on each piece is a perfect reſemblance of the head of Chaucer, as he is uſually painted, entirely the work of nature.

Various pieces of Lapis Lazuli, or azure ſtone.

Next to theſe are a great number of ſpecimens of precious ſtones of all kinds, opake and tranſparent, rough and poliſhed, ſome looſe, others ſet.

Here are a great variety of pearls, particularly one of a purple colour, and another in the form of a bunch of grapes.

Among the models of diamonds, is that of Pitt's brilliant, which was ſold to the king of France for 120,000l. The preſent king wears it in his hat inſtead of a button; its weight is $136\frac{3}{4}$ carats.

A model of a fine roſe diamond, weighing $139\frac{1}{2}$ carats, being $2\frac{3}{4}$ carats more than Pitt's brilliant juſt above-mentioned; but, not having ſo fine a luſtre, is not ſo valuable. This diamond formerly belonged to Charles the Bold, the laſt duke of Burgundy; and is at preſent in the poſſeſſion of the emperor of Germany.

Among a great variety of chryſtals, manufactured into vaſes, cups, boxes, &c. are ſome beads and balls of Chryſtal. Likewiſe ſome bright glittering ſtones, and ſome pieces of coral, finely cut in various ſhapes.

In this table is a great deal of amber manufactured, particularly a fine cabinet, a curious crab, ſome bells, bottles, handles for inſtruments, &c. and ſome pieces of amber, in the ſubſtance of which inſects are incloſed.

Here is a peſtle, mortar, and plate of Egyptian porphyry.

In this room is the collection of Guſtavus Brander, eſq; it is very curious and conſiſts chiefly of ſuch ſpecimens as are to be ſeen in the Sloanian collection.

In the cabinet between the windows are a great variety of incruſtations and petrifactions, as ſhells, corals, and other things.

In the two large tables are a very curious collection of foſſil ſhells, figured foſſils, natural and ſimple foſſils, and particularly of minerals.

Collectio Sloaniana. This room contains a fine collection of foſſil ſhells, figured foſſils, recent ſhells, and ſome other articles. This is not the leaſt curious part of the Muſeum; and the recent ſhells here preſerved particularly claim the attention of the ladies; many of them are very ſcarce and valuable, others remarkably beautiful.

Among the contents of the repoſitories, or cabinets round the room, are,

Salactites. Theſe are a kind of ſtones formed by droppings of water, which being impregnated with certain ſtony particles, by degrees petrify, and grow to the hardneſs of a ſpar, and conſiſt of ſeveral coats.

The Ludus Helmontii or waxen veins, as they are often called. This ſtone conſiſts of ſeveral pebbles bedded in a maſs of pure earth, which is grown to the hardneſs of a ſtone.

Under this title are depoſited a human ſcull and a ſword, both of which are compleatly covered over and incruſted with the ſame ſtony ſubſtance to a conſiderable thickneſs, yet without loſing their form. They were found in the Tyber at Rome

Siliquaſtræ, many ſpecimens of the palates of various kinds of fiſh,—petrified crabs.

Zoolithi, petrified parts of land animals. Among other ſpecimens are the grinders of an elephant, &c.

Calculi, ſtones or balls found in the ſtomach or other parts of the inteſtines of animals.

Under this head are depoſited the Bezoars; they are found in the inteſtines of an Indian goat, and have been deemed of great uſe in medicine.

Under this title likewiſe are the ſeveral ſpecimens of ſtones extracted from human bodies, the larger from the urine bladder, the ſmall from the gall bladder, and the others were formed in the kidneys.

The contents of the next room are no leſs curious and worthy of notice than the foregoing.

Vegetabilia. Fructus. Ligna. Under theſe titles are comprehended a great variety of foreign fruits, different kinds of aromatic and other curious woods, many ſorts of gum, barks, and a numerous train of other vegetable productions.

Here are four tables of ſea productions, chiefly of the coral kind, diſpoſed of their ſeveral claſſes in the form of landſcapes. On each of theſe tables there is a ſhort account of the contents.

Neſts of inſects.

Here are depoſited ſeveral waſps neſts, a large hornet's neſt, many neſts of ſpiders, ſome humble bees cells, and ants neſts of various kinds. Here is a curious ſpider's neſt brought from the Weſt-Indies to which the inſect has with great natural ſkill and ingenuity contrived a valve or trap-door to ſecure the entrance, thereby defending its progeny from the attack of ſome enemy of the ſpecies.

Neſts of birds. It is impoſſible to attempt noticing all the neſts that are here preſerved. The hanging neſts, from the Indies, claim our firſt regard; they hang by a ſlender filament to a ſmall twig of a tree, and are by that means put out of the reach of any enemy of the quadruped or reptile kind. The neſts of the various ſorts of humming birds are pretty, particularly one, on which a very beautiful bird is ſitting. The king fiſher's neſt, and that of the tom tit, are not unworthy of remark. Here is a neſt from the Eaſt Indies, about the ſize of a gooſe's egg, and in ſubſtance not unlike iſinglaſs: it is made by a ſmall Indian ſwallow of a delicate taſte. There is only one kind of neſt more to be mentioned, and we have done with this title; it is brought from the Indies, covered with leaves, which the birds are ſaid to ſew together with their beaks, whence they have the name of taylor birds.

Eggs, are very numerous. Among others, here are ſpecimens of the eggs of the oſtrich, the caſſoware, owls and eagles of various kinds, penguins, cormorants, maccaws, ſome parrots eggs, thoſe of the China pheaſant, king fiſher, miſcle birds, and ſome remarkable blue eggs from Virginia. There are alſo a ſmall egg contained within another, very curious; ſome that have irregular furrowed ſurfaces, and an egg on which is neatly and whimſically rivetted a ſmall horſhoe. Beſides theſe eggs of birds, are ſome ſpecimens of thoſe of crocodiles, guianas, lizards, turtles, and tortoiſes.

Star-fiſh. Some of the ſpecimens are very large, the number of their points or rays being various. The reticulated ſtar-fiſh, called Meduſa's head, is very curious.

A variety of crabs of different kinds, colours, and countries; ſome lobſters, ſea-locuſts, prawns, ſhrimps, the black crab from Jamaica, and others from the Eaſt-Indies, finely variegated in colour; but what really moſt demands regard, is an extraordinary large claw of a lobſter.

A number of large ſea-ſhells, as helmets, buccina, &c. In the upper end of this repoſitory is a log of wood, with a great number of barnacles ſticking to it.

Under this title is to be ſeen the ſoldier, or hermit-crab from Jamaica.

Over the repoſitories are diſpoſed, in order, a great number of ſea productions, of the coral kind, as ſea-fans, ſea-willows, &c. and ſome large ſhells, as conchs, buccina, &c. together with a few of that kind called Pinna Marina, which are a very large ſpecies of muſcle.

Here are three ſmall tables. The firſt contains ſome ſhells finely poliſhed and carved in emboſſed work.

Some cameos cut in ſhells, and many more in onyxes, ſardonyxes, cryſtals, hyacinths, and other precious ſtones.

A variety of intaglios, in jaſpers, &c.

Several rings ſet with cameos, others with intaglios of the ſtones abovementioned; and many antique rings and ſeals, and ſome beads made of carved fruit-ſtones.

In the ſecond of the ſmall tables are preſerved ſeveral very curious models.

A ſmall half-length of Sir Thomas Greſham, neatly carved in wood in relievo.

Many impreſſions taken in glaſs paſte from antique ſeals.

A number of impreſſions taken in ſulphur, from the ſeals, gems, and carved ſtones of the king of France's cabinet.

The third ſmall table is entirely filled with the remainder of the impreſſions from the king of France's cabinet.

The firſt of the large tables contains a great number of inſects of various kinds; thoſe that firſt occur, are ſuch as have moveable cruſtaceous ſhields to guard their wings.

Beetles. The elephant-beetle, the rhinoceros-beetle, the Cervus Volans, or ſtag-beetle; the unicorn-beetle, wood-beetles, tortoiſe-beetles, capricorn-beetles, the great ſweet-ſmelling capricorn or muſk-beetle, water-beetles, the large and long black beetle, mill-beetles, crickets, locuſts, balm crickets, or harveſt flies, boat-flies, a water inſect, water ſcorpions. Cochineal, is a ſmall fly that feeds and breeds on the leaf of an Indian fig.

In the other great table, where the inſects are continued, are

A kind of ſmall fly not unlike the gnat, and the ephemeron, whoſe whole extent of life is but a few hours.

Dragon-flies, or adder flies.

Butter-flies. They are divided into ſeven claſſes, each of which contain a great variety of ſpecies.

A very great number of ſpecimens, curious and beautiful, are here preſerved. The moſt remarkable among them are, a fine green fly, the mother of pearl, the owl and the peacock from the Eaſt Indies, and a remarkable fine purple fly from the Weſt Indies.

Moths, divided into ſeven claſſes. Some of them fill the remainder of this table, the reſt being in the inſect table in the next room.

Collectio Sloaniana. The inſects contained in the great table, are Waſps, bees, ants, horſe-flies, gad-flies, or breeze-flies, gnats, inſects without wings.

Wood-lice, or millepedes. Theſe inſects are divided into ſeven ſpecies, ſome rare.

Scorpions of different ſorts.

Gally-worms.

Several ſpecimens of the centipes from America and elſewhere.

Aurelias, or chryſaliſes of ſeveral ſpecies of inſects.

A miſcellaneous collection of worms.

Some neſts of inſects, as ſpiders, beetles, locuſts, &c.

Coccoons of ſilk-worms. Under this title is a ribbon made of ſpiders web, and ſome ſilk of the ſame.

Tortoiſes and turtles of the ſmaller ſizes.

Parts of birds; they conſiſt of heads, beaks, talons, legs, quills, &c. Particularly to be noticed are ſome heads of the rhinoceros bird. The beak of a toucan, or Brazil pye. The beak of of a ſpoonbill, or platea, of Holland. Some quills quills of the condor of South America, a bird of ſuch a prodigious ſize and ſtrength as to be able to carry a ſheep through the air in its talons.

Parts of fiſh, conſiſting of jaws, palates, teeth, back-bones, fins, &c. of various kinds of fiſh.

On the ſhelves round this room are a great number and variety of articles, preſerved in ſpirits, from the animal and vegetable kingdoms. The firſt title that preſents itſelf to our view, is Quadrupeds. Among theſe are the Armadillo, called by the natives of Brazil Tatu, a little animal covered over with hard ſcales, like a ſort of armour. The Sloth, called Haii by the natives of Brazil; it is ſaid this animal is a whole day in walking a few yards. The Yerbua, a kind of beautiful field-mouſe. Several kinds of monkeys. The flying ſquirrel frequent in Virginia. A hedge-hog, and the opoſſum, an animal, which in caſe of danger, protects its young in a cavity under its belly.

Under this title are a great number of fœtus's of different animals, and ſome unnatural productions, among which is the cyclops pig, having only one eye, and that in the middle of the forehead.

Birds. We find here a great number and variety of Engliſh and foreign birds, brought from all countries, and preſerved in ſpirits. Among theſe are the king fiſher, the wheat ear, the croſsbill; ſeveral ſpecimens of humming birds; ſome birds of the titmouſe kind, as the blackcap, the blue titmouſe or nun, and the blue American titmouſe. Among the ſpecimens are a great number of others no leſs curious, and ſome unnatural productions, as a goſling with three legs, &c. &c.

Reptilia. Amphibia. Serpentia. In theſe three repoſitories are many amphibious animals in ſpirits, among them are frogs, toads, ſome young crocodiles, allegators, guanas, cameleons, ſalamanders, the flying lizard, and other kinds of lizards.

The ſerpents conſiſt of ſnakes, ſlow-worms, vipers, adders, rattle-ſnakes, aſps, hooded ſnakes, coach-whip ſnakes, ſome amphiſbænæ, a kind of ſerpent whoſe head can ſcarcely be diſtinguiſhed from the tail; they are brought from South America.

Fiſh of many kinds in ſpirits, and among others the hippocampus, or ſea-horſe; the flying fiſh, the remora, pearl oyſters, the John Doree, the ſea polipus, barnacles, and many others.

Inſects. Many kinds of caterpillars, beetles, locuſts, centipes, ſcorpions, ſpiders, and worms from human bodies.

Vegetables. Theſe conſiſt chiefly of foreign fruits preſerved in ſpirits, and ſome of our own produce, but of an uncommon form. There are alſo under this title a collection of oils, balſams, and other chemical preparations, extracted from vegetables, chiefly the growth of the Eaſt-Indies.

In different parts of this room on the wainſcot over the repoſitories, &c. are ſome dried animals, and ſtuffed ſkins of others, particularly ſome large bats, turtles and tortoiſes, ſharks jaws, more heads and beaks of birds, a very large ſtuffed ſnake's ſkin from Surinam in the Weſt Indies, the ſkin of a ſcaly lizard, ſome lizards, guanas, and the ſkin of an ant bear; a flamingo, a young wild boar, a porcupine, armadillos, an oron outon, or wild man of the mountains; the head of a ſea horſe, jaws of fiſh, and ſome crocodiles.

Here are a great variety of horns of different animals, particularly the foſſil horns of mouſe-deer, horns of elks, the rhinoceros, rein-deer, antelope, and chamoiſe. Sir Hans Sloane's famous horned owl, ſtuffed. Some birds ſtuffed, placed in glaſs frames; particularly a bird of paradiſe, ſome humming birds, manakeens, ſome of the titmouſe kind, a Virginia nightingale, and a tropic bird: and ſome portraits of ſeveral kinds of birds taken from the life.

In a large cabinet are depoſited a great many dried fiſh, brought from various parts of the world; among other ſpecimens are a ſmall ſaw-fiſh, the head of a ſword fiſh, ſome flying fiſh, a dolphin, a ſturgeon, a young ſhark, a porcupine fiſh, a torpedo, or cramp-fiſh, &c.

Over this cabinet is a ſtuffed emeu, or caſſowary, a balearic crane, or crown-bird, an eagle, and a vulture.

The ſkeleton of a very young whale, ſome horns of the unicorn-fiſh, the head and paws of the walroſs, uſually called the ſea-lion, and the ſnouts of the ſaw and ſword-fiſh.

We now enter upon the laſt room of this department, which is filled with productions of art, diſpoſed in ſeveral cabinets.

In the firſt cabinent is a variety of little articles manufactured in glaſs, of different ſhapes, coloured, painted, and ſpun glaſs; ſome cups, diſhes, and other matters, made of paper machiè, reſembling china ware; and other enamelled and curiouſly manufactured bagatelles.

In the next we muſt remark ſome articles in great eſteem among many Roman Catholics, as relics, beads, &c. and ſome models of ſacred buildings.

We now come to the utenſils and ornaments of the Indian inhabitants of the great continent of North America, as feather crowns, necklaces, knives, and ſome curious contrivances for combs, bruſhes, &c. an Indian ſcalp, and ſome wampum: theſe are a ſort of ſhells uſed as money among the Indians. Here is alſo ſome Caſſada bread, or Caſſavi; this is made of the root of a plant called yucca, manioc, or manihot.

In another cabinet are European productions of art, as ſome ſmall cabinets, figures in bronze, and ſeveral ivory anatomical repreſentations of ſkulls, eyes, ears, &c. and ſome fine work of turnery and carving.

We next ſee ſome Japan idols, very ſmall, many cut out of almonds, and even grains of of rice; Eaſt India money, ſome Chineſe figures of their gods, men, and beaſts, made after their fancy, and dreſſed in their faſhions, part of them in bronze, the reſt chiefly in rice-paſte, called congee.

The model of a palanquin, a kind of chair of ſtate, in which the grandees of the Eaſt are carried on mens ſhoulders; cards, dice, and other bagatelles; forks, chopſticks, backſcratchers, ſteelyards, weights, and beads for caſting up their accompts, called ſchwampam.

Some

Some China paper, womens ſhoes, pendants made of beetles, inks of all colours, rulers, ſmall japanned veſſels, &c.

In the laſt of the cabinets are various ſpecimens of curious earthen ware, ſome porcellain cups before they are burnt, ſome other cups, which they ſay the Chineſe made of Engliſh gravel which happened to be carried over in one of our ſhips; and ſeveral ſorts of plain, painted, and gilt China ware of various ſhapes.

Under glaſs bells are ſome very curious pieces of work in ivory, particularly one made by the late queen of Denmark. The flower-pots in ivory are very fine.

Some models of Chineſe grottos; a model of captain Gilbert, made in China of the fine earth. The root of the tea-plant.

Here are alſo ſome pieces of ſculpture, as king William and king George the firſt, cut in walnut-ſhells and in ivory; the head of Baker, who wrote the Chronicle; alſo an impreſſion of Oliver Cromwell's ſeal; paintings at large, in miniature and enamel; as a man that had an excreſcence, or wen, in form of a head growing out of his left breaſt.

A woman who had two horny ſubſtances grew out of the back part of her head; one of the horns is kept in ſome of the cabinets in this room.

Thomas Briton, the muſical ſmall-coal man. A black whale, and a buffalo.

Several drawings in miniature, compoſed of very ſmall writing, particularly two heads, one of queen Anne, the other of prince George of Denmark. Alſo the head of the duke of Glouceſter, done in the ſame manner.

Inſects and reptiles.

A plantation of cochineal, with the people gathering and drying it.

Several flowers and plants.

In our way to the next department, we are led down the back ſtairs, where are two canoes, the one brought from America, the other from Greenland, differing both in form and materials; the firſt is very ingeniouſly covered with the bark of a kind of birch tree, which is fixed to ſmall ribs on the inſide; the whole boat is remarkably light, inſomuch that two men may eaſily carry it many miles from one lake or river to another. The other is entirely covered with ſeals ſkins, at a diſtance bearing ſome reſemblance to parchment; the upper part of it is, as it were, decked with the ſame materials, there being only a ſmall hole left open in the middle for the man to ſit in and manage his paddle.

On the wainſcot going down theſe ſtairs, is a large piece of painting repreſenting ſeveral kinds of dead game.

The laſt department to be mentioned is that of printed books.

Croſſing the hall, in the way from the back ſtairs, the firſt room we enter is appropriated for modern works of the preſs; part of it is filled with books ſent in by the Stationer's company, and other preſents given to the Muſeum in the reign of his late majeſty; the remaining part of the preſſes are prepared for the reception of ſuch as may be had in the reign of his preſent majeſty.

Major Edwards's Library. This is a good collection of Engliſh, French, and Italian books, but chiefly the laſt. It is joined to the Cotton library, and depoſited in this room.

Bilbliotheca Sloaniana. I. In this room are preſerved part of Sir Hans Sloane's, library conſiſting of books of phyſic, pharmacy, anatomy, ſurgery, chemiſtry, &c.

Bibliotheca Sloaniana. II. Another part of Sir Hans's library, containing natural hiſtory, herbaria, hortus ſiccus. Here are many drawings, perhaps the fineſt that are to be ſeen in the world; particularly a book, containing ſome drawings of Monſ. Robert, painter to Louis XIV. of France: they conſiſt of a great number of vegetables, curious animals, ſhells, and other natural productions. Sir Hans Sloane paid this artiſt five guineas for doing each leaf. We muſt alſo notice a great many drawings, elegantly coloured from nature by Madam Marian; they conſiſt of a great variety of plants, with the inſects that fed on them, and ſome other things.

Bibliotheca Sloaniana. III. Here are many books on philological ſubjects, grammars, lexicoons, critics treatiſes on rhetoric, geography, ſome travels, journals, and miſcellanies.

Bibliotheca Sloaniana. IV. In this part of Sir Hans Sloane's collection, are hiſtories of all nations, ancient and modern; ſome treatiſes on chronology, prints, globes, and large maps of different countries.

Bibliotheca Sloaniana. V. This room contains treatiſes on the arts and ſciences, ſyſtems of phyloſophy, ethics, aſtronomy, commerce, philoſophical tranſactions.

Bibliotheca Sloaniana. VI. The remaining part of Sir Hans Sloane's collection, being books of divinity and law.

Bibliotheca Regia. I. In this next room is depoſited part of the royal library, given by his late majeſty. It conſiſts of the books collected in the reigns of Henry VII. Henry VIII. Edward VI. queen Mary, and queen Elizabeth. Here are alſo ſeveral other collections, as the libraries of archbiſhop Cranmer, More, Arundel, and Lumley. In this place are preſerved the firſt books printed in England and France; ſome are upon vellum, others on paper.

Bibliotheca Regia. II. In this laſt room of the library is depoſited the remaining part of the books given by his late majeſty. They were collected in the reign of James the firſt, Charles the firſt and Charles the ſecond.

If any ingenious perſon has either a mind to improve himſelf in the ſeveral ſciences or languages by reading, or is prompted by curioſity to peruſe ſome of the valuable books of this department, by applying to the truſtees, he may have an order to attend the reading room for a time, where there is a particular officer appointed to provide ſuch books as may be wanted.

The laſt room we have to mention contains ſome ſea compaſſes, improved by doctor Knight, ſuch as are now uſed in the royal navy, and ſeveral magnets, and apparatuſes, ſerving to ſhew the magnetical powers in philoſophical uſes.

On

On the ſeventh of June doctor Archibald Cameron, convicted of joining the pretender in the late invaſion, and ſuſpected of being concerned in an attempt to renew the rebellion in Scotland the beginning of this year, was executed at Tyburn.

On his arrival at the place of execution, he looked on the officers and ſpectators with an undaunted and compoſed countenance; and as ſoon as he was unlooſed from the ſledge, he ſtarted up, and with an heroic deportment, ſtepped up into the cart, by the help of the executioner, whence, looking round with unconcern on all the awful apparatus of death, he ſmiled; and ſeeing the clergyman that attended him coming up the ſteps, he ſtepped forward to meet him, and endeavoured with his fettered hands to help him up, ſaying, ſo "—are you come? this is a glorious day to me! "it is my new birth day; there are more witneſſes "at this birth than were at my firſt." The clergy- "man aſked him how he did; to which he anſwer- "ed, thank God, I am very well, but a little fa- "tigued with my journey; but, bleſſed be God, I "am now come to the end of it." Some perſon aſking the clergyman whether he would be long about his office, the doctor, who over-heard him, ſaid, he required but very little time, for it was but diſagreeable being there, and he was as impatient to be gone as they were. The clergyman then aſked the gentleman who had ſpoke if he was the ſheriff, and on his being anſwered in the affirmative, he told him doctor Cameron's buſineſs there would be chiefly with him; that he had ſomething to communicate to him, if he would take the trouble to come near; which he very readily complied with, and endeavoured to bring his horſe cloſe to the cart: but finding him a little unruly, and that he could not hear what the doctor ſaid by reaſon of the noiſe of the multitude, he beckoned with his hand for ſilence, but to no purpoſe; whereupon he very obligingly alighted, and came up the ſteps, and with great civility and attention liſtened to the doctor who ſpoke as follows:

"Sir, you ſee a fellow ſubject juſt going to "pay his laſt debt. I the more chearfully reſign "my life, as it is taken from me for doing my "duty according to my conſcience. I freely "forgive all my enemies, and thoſe who are "inſtrumental in taking away my life. I thank "God I die in charity with all mankind.

"As to my religion, I die a ſteadfaſt, though "unworthy, member of that church in which "I have always lived, the church of England; "in whoſe communion I hope (through the me- "rits of my bleſſed Saviour) for forgiveneſs of "my ſins, for which I am heartily ſorry.

"The cuſtom of delivering ſomething in "writing on ſuch occaſions as this I ſhould "willingly have complied with, had it not "been put out of my power, being denied the "uſe of pen, ink, and paper, except in the "preſence of ſome of my keepers. But what I "intend my country ſhould be informed of with "regard to my dying ſentiments, I have, by the "means of a blunt pencil, endeavoured to ſet "down on ſome ſlips of paper, as I came by them, "in as legible characters as I was able; and "theſe I have left in the hands of my wife, "charging her, on her duty to her dying huſ- "band, to tranſmit, with all convenient ſpeed, "a faithful tranſcript of them to you, and I am "confident ſhe will honourably diſcharge the "truſt."

He then told the ſheriff he would no longer preſume upon his patience; but the ſheriff, with looks that beſpoke a great deal of concern, and with much good-nature, begged he would take as much time as he pleaſed, for they would wait till he was ready. The doctor thanked him; and then turning to the clergyman, ſaid, "I have now "done with this world and am ready to leave it." He joined heartily in prayer and then repeated ſome ejaculations out of the pſalms; after which he embraced the clergyman, and took leave.

As the clergyman was going down from the cart, he had like to have miſſed the ſteps, which the doctor obſerving, called out to him with a chearful tone of voice, "ſaying, take care how "you go, I think you don't know this way ſo "well as I do."

He was then turned off, and after hanging about twenty minutes, was cut down, his heart taken out and burnt, but his body not quartered; and on the Sunday following it was interred in the large vault in the Savoy chapel.

When this gentleman was under examination before a committee of the privy-council, he denied his being the perſon deſcribed in the bill of attainder; but at his trial he owned it, and behaved with decency and compoſure; pleading the acts of kindneſs and humanity, which he had performed through the courſe of the rebellion, particularly his having ſaved the whole town of Aronche near Glaſgow from deſtruction, and his behaviour before it broke out, (which he ſaid would have been atteſted by general Wade, and colonel Hopſon if they had been living) as inducements to ſpare his life. He heard his ſentence without any alteration of countenance, except that his lips cloſed together, and his mouth began to fill, and he made three or four very low reverences to the bench, when he retired. His behaviour in the Tower was ſuch as became his unhappy circumſtances, manly and ſedate, and his death was regretted even by thoſe who abhorred his principles.

The citizens being highly ſatisfied with the conduct of Sir Criſpe Gaſcoigne during his mayoralty, it was moved in the court of common-council that the thanks of that court ſhould be preſented him, which being unanimouſly agreed to, the ſame was preſented as follows:

Reſolved, "that the thanks of this court be "given to the right honourable Sir Criſpe Gaſ- "coigne, knt. late Lord-mayor, for his diligent "attendance to, and faithful diſcharge of, the "duties of that high office: for his ſteady per- "ſeverance in the cauſe of juſtice, his generous "protection of the diſtreſſed, and his remark- "able humanity: for the many generous in- "ſtances of his benevolence, and great regard to "his fellow citizens, and for ſupporting the dig- "nity of chief magiſtrate with the utmoſt ſplen-

" dor and magnificence: for giving at all times " eaſy acceſs to his perſon; and for determining, " on every occaſion, with the greateſt candour, " ability, and integrity."

About this time a great commotion aroſe among the people, occaſioned by an affair of a very public nature. The lords had, with great diſpatch, and without any great oppoſition, paſſed a bill " to permit perſons profeſſing the jewiſh " religion, to be naturalized by parliament, " &c." and ſent it down to the commons. Here the bill was ſtrongly oppoſed; but the miniſtry, being determined it ſhould go, backed their friends in the houſe with a petition from ſeveral merchants and traders in London for it; under a ſuppoſition, " that the paſſing of this bill into " a law might encourage perſons of wealth and " ſubſtance to remove with their effects from fo- " reign parts into this kingdom, and increaſe the " commerce and credit of this nation." The miniſtry, however, had not the ſame intereſt with the citizens, who, conceiving a quite different opinion of the effects of ſuch a bill, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, on the very ſame day, preſented a petition againſt it; in which they expreſſed their apprehenſions, " that " ſhould the ſaid bill paſs into a law, the ſame " would tend greatly to the diſhonour of the " chriſtian religion, endanger our conſtitution, " and be highly prejudicial to the intereſt and " trade in general, and to London in particu- " lar." The next day another ſet of London merchants and tradeſmen, following the example of the corporation, petitioned the ſaid houſe in behalf of themſelves and all other merchants and traders in Great-Britain; alledging, " that ſhould " the ſaid bill paſs into a law, it would greatly " affect our trade and commerce with foreign na- " tions; and particularly with Spain and Portugal, " and would alſo be attended with many other " bad effects to the kingdom:", and praying, that they might have leave, by themſelves or council, to be heard againſt the ſaid bill.

Immediately after this another petition was preſented from a number of ſubſcribing merchants, traders, manufacturers, ſhipwrights, and commanders of ſhips, in favour of the bill, as an encouragement to perſons of wealth and ſubſtance to remove with their effects from foreign parts into this kingdom, which might be employed in foreign trade and commerce, in ſhipping, and the exportation of our woollen and other manufactures. The bill was then read a third time; and ſome of the laſt petitioners againſt it were called in, and heard; but, after very warm debates on both ſides, it paſſed without any amendment.

On the twenty-ſeventh of November Edward Ironſide, eſq; (who ſucceeded Sir Criſpe Gaſcoigne, knt. in the high office of Lord-mayor of London) died in his mayoralty, after having enjoyed that office only a few weeks, and gave place for the election of Thomas Rawlinſon, eſq; who was elected Lord mayor the day following.

The Lord-mayors who have died in their mayoralty, from its firſt inſtitution in the year 1189, when the title of Lord-mayor was firſt conferred on Henry Fitz-Alwin, who continued in that high office twenty-three years, are as follow: After the death of Henry Fitz-Alwin, no ſucceeding Lord-mayor died in his mayoralty till Jacob Alderman, eſq; in the year 1216; nor after that, till William Brown, eſq; in the year 1513, which was 297 years from the death of Jacob Alderman, eſq; Sir William Bowyer died in 1543, Sir Cuthbert Buck, in 1593, and Sir Thomas Skinner in 1596; ſince which period no Lord-mayor died in his mayoralty till 1740, which is 144 years from the death of Sir Thomas Skinner, when Humphry Parſons died in his mayoralty, it being the ſecond time of his election into that office: and ſince him have died Sir Robert Godſchall, Sir Samuel Pennant, Thomas Winterbottom, eſq; and Edward Ironſide, eſq; where it is worthy of obſervation, that from the firſt inſtitution of this office in 1189, to 1740, which is 551 years, there died only ſix Lord-mayors in their mayoralty; and from the year 1740 to 1753, there have died five.

Complaints having been repeatedly made by the citizens of London, obliged to ſerve divers offices in this corporation, that the oaths of office were of that nature and tenure as could not be taken by conſcientious people, the common-council, on the 20th of December, ordered the ancient oaths of office, taken by the conſtables, inqueſtmen, and ſcavengers, to be laid aſide, and ſuch others preſcribed as were in the power of every conſcientious perſon to diſcharge. At the ſame time a bill was paſſed for raiſing 2443l. on the inhabitants of the city, for the ſupport of the London workhouſe. A motion was likewiſe made at the ſame court to conſider of the utility of a bridge over the river Thames, between that from Fiſh-ſtreet-hill and the Borough, and Weſtminſter-bridge. They divided on the motion, but it was at length carried in the affirmative by 76 againſt 69. A motion was then made for appointing a committee to conſider of the beſt plan, ſituation, &c. of ſuch a bridge; but that was deferred to another court.

An act of parliament paſſed this ſeſſions for the relief of conſtables labouring under great difficulties by loſs of time and expence in attending upon, and conveying offenders to jail: in which it was enacted, " that when offenders have not " money ſufficient to defray the expences of con- " veying them to jail, juſtices of the peace ſhall " grant a warrant on the treaſurer of the county " for the payment of the charges of ſuch con- " veyance." And it was farther enacted, " that " the charges of trouble and attendance ſhall be " allowed, by order of the court, to poor per- " ſons bound to give evidence againſt felons. The " ſum of ſixpence, and no more, to be paid to " the officer as his fee for making out the order " on the treaſurer of the county for the money. " But in Middleſex, the overſeers of the poor of " the pariſh where the offender ſhall be appre- " hended, are to pay all charges for conveying " him to jail, and for poor perſons bound to give " evidence."

At a court of common council held the 22d of February 1754, a motion was made to repeal the the reſolution of the twentieth of December, relating to the building of a new bridge from London to Southwark. After ſome debates, and a diviſion made, there appeared a majority of two for the queſtion. On which a committee was immediately appointed to carry the ſame into execution. This committee met on the twenty-fifth of March, and after reſolving to take into conſideration the ſtate of London-bridge, they gave orders for accounts of the revenue, the then ſtate of its foundation, the annual expence of repairs, and the produce of the rents of the houſes on the ſaid bridge for ten years paſt, to be laid before them. And in July following Mr. Dance, the city ſurveyor, reported the foundation of London-bridge to be very good. A motion was then made to pull down the houſes on that bridge; and the ſurveyor was ordered to prepare a plan of a commodious footway on each ſide of the ſaid bridge, and a carriage way ſufficient for four carriages to go a-breaſt.

At another court of common-council held the twenty-ſixth of September following, the committee made their report, and gave it as their opinion, that the only proper place for building a new bridge over the Thames, was from the end of Fleet-ditch to the oppoſite ſhore: that Mr. Dance had prepared a plan to build the ſame of ſtone, which would coſt 185,950l. excluſive of purchaſes, &c. That it would be proper to pull down the houſes, and widen the ways on London-bridge; which might be rendered more ſafe, commodious and ornamental, at the charge of 30,000l. That the neat rent of the houſes out upon leaſe, and neceſſary to be taken down, let yearly for 430l. 17s. And the houſes of tenants at will (the land-tax to be deducted) amounted to 397l. 9s. per annum. So that the bridge-houſe eſtate would looſe thereby about 828l. 6s. per annum, beſides the tythes, church rates, poors rates and land tax, payable by the inhabitants of ſuch houſes to be pulled down, which amounted to the ſum of 484l. 19s. 10d. per annum.

On the thirtieth of April the election for city repreſentatives in parliament began at Guildhall. The candidates were Sir John Barnard, Sir Robert Ladbroke, Sir Richard Glynn, Sir William Calvert, Mr. alderman Bethel, and Mr. alderman Beckford. Theſe being ſeparately put in nomination at the common-hall, the majority of hands appeared in favour of Sir John Barnard, Sir Richard Glynn, Slingſby Bethel, and William Beckford, eſqrs. But a poll was demanded on behalf of Sir Robert Ladbroke and Sir William Calvert. The poll began the ſame day, and continued for ſix days after; at the cloſe of which the ſheriffs, in the preſence of the Lord-mayor, declared the election had fallen on Sir John Barnard, Slingſby Bethel, eſq; Sir Robert Ladbroke, and William Beckford, eſq; who were accordingly declared duly elected. Immediately after which Sir John Barnard addreſſed himſelf to the livery as follows:

"The honour you have done me in chuſing me "ſix times one of your repreſentative in parlia- "ment, calls for my ſincere and hearty thanks; "the rather, as I look upon the preſent election "to be the laſt favour which I can expect. I have "not of late preſumed to offer my ſervice, "knowing my inability of giving that attendance "in parliament, which this honourable city has a "right to require fron its members; but the "continuance of your polling for me is a proof "of your kindneſs in overlooking my failings, "and of your affectionate regard for me. The "impreſſion which this has made upon my heart "can never be effaced, of which I beg leave to "aſſure you, and of my beſt endeavours to pro- "mote the good of this city in particular, and "the nation in general."

The conteſt on this election was the greateſt that had been ever known: the whole body of diſſenters and the intereſt of the miniſtry uniting to ſupport Sir William Calvert in oppoſition to the-antiminiſterial livery, whoſe diſlike of their late favourite Sir William aroſe from his attachment to the advocates for naturalizing the Jews.

The number of Liverymen that voted at this election were 5931; and the number of voices that ſtood on the poll each day were as follows:

On the election for ſheriffs this year George Streatfield and Alexander Sheafe, eſqs. were choſen by a conſiderable majority, but being called upon to give bond to ſerve the office, they declined it, and gave anſwer to the court of alderman, by their attornies to the following effect: that being proteſtant diſſenters, they had not, within a year of the election, taken the ſacrament, according to the rites of the church of England, and therefore dared not to take upon them that office, in defiance of the act 13 Car. II. Stat. 2. Cap. I. In conſequence of this a common hall was ſummoned to chooſe other two; who chooſing Allan Evans, a proteſtant diſſenter, he likewiſe pleaded the ſame excuſe. The court of common-council therefore, on the twenty-ſixth of September, ordered that actions ſhould be brought againſt all thoſe gentlemen for the penalties incurred by their refuſing to ſerve the office of ſheriff; and a committee was appointed to ſee the ſaid proſecution executed.

A cauſe was tried this term in the court of King's-bench, Guild-hall, on an action brought by Mr. Richard Holland, a leather-ſeller in Newgate-ſtreet, againſt the collectors of toll in Smithfield, during the time of Bartholomew-fair, when Mr. Holland's witneſſes were examined; but no perſon appearing on the other ſide a verdict was given in favour of Mr. Holland, on fifteen iſſues, with coſts of ſuit. By which determination all the citizens of London are exempted from paying toll at the ſaid fair for the future.

When

When Mr. Holland firſt attempted to vindicate theſe rights, it gave ſuch an alarm to ſeveral of his fellow citizens reſiding in London, that they were determined to oppoſe the oppreſſive meaſures of the farmers of the ſeveral markets in this city, in exacting tolls from them, which annually amount to a very conſiderable ſum.

The oppoſition was firſt made in Newgate-market, by one Mr. Ralph Twyford, by trade a butcher, and a freeman of the city; but for ſome years had declined that buſineſs, and carried on that of ſelling dead victuals by commiſſion, which were ſent up to him from different counties by common carriers, and were brought to his houſe in Newgate-market by porters in packs, hampers and baſkets, the rent of which houſe was 30l. per annum.

The toll demanded by the farmers, of the houſekeepers who ſold ſuch goods by commiſſion, was four pence for every pack of victuals, and one penny for every hamper, baſket, or ped. The manner of collecting this money was very uncertain, ſometimes they would demand a ſum in groſs, and to aſcertain it would form ſuch a number of packs hampers and peds, to make it up the ſum demanded; whereas the people of whom theſe demands were made might have, nay, often had, more or leſs; of ſome they took no more than four-pence a pack, of others ſix-pence, of others what they would be pleaſed to give them, and of others nothing at all.

Theſe exactions naturally led the people to reflect on their ſituation: firſt, they were freemen of London: ſecondly, they were houſekeepers, and paid large rents: and, thirdly, as freemen and houſekeepers they had, (agreeable to the method Mr. Holland was then taking) an indiſpenſable right to ſell their commodities free, and exempt from any kind of toll whatſoever, and therefore they determined to pay no toll for the future.

The conſequence of this determination and refuſal to pay, produced no leſs than twelve actions at law, to be brought by the farmers againſt the houſekeepers in this market, who all came to a reſolution to defend themſelves in their rights and privileges.

In order to their defence they had recourſe to an act of parliament made the twenty-ſecond of Charles II. intitled, An act for the rebuilding of the city of London, uniting of pariſhes and rebuilding of the cathedral and parochial churches within the ſaid city. In which is the following clauſe: "that for ever hereafter, the Lord-mayor and "commonalty, and citizens of London, may and "ſhall have a market to be kept three or four "days in the week, as to them ſhall ſeem con-"venient, upon the ground now ſet out by the "aſſent of the dean and chapter of the cathedral "church of St. Paul's, London, for a market-"place within Newgate, and that the ſaid dean "and chapter ſhall make and give one or more "leaſe or leaſes of the ſaid ground to the ſaid "mayor and commonalty, and citizens, and alſo "of the wall of the ſaid church-yard abutting "ſeverally upon Pater-noſter-row and the Old-"change, for the term of forty-years, reſerving "the yearly rent of four pounds for the ground "of the ſaid market-place, and two-pence for "every ſuperficial foot of the ground or ſoil of "the ſaid wall, as it is now ſet out by the ſur-"veyors of the city and of the dean and chapter, "and ſo from forty years to forty years for ever, "at the like yearly rent, and one year's rent af-"ter the rates aforeſaid, to be paid by way of "fine for each of the ſaid grounds reſpectively, "upon the making every new leaſe thereof, "which ſaid leaſe and leaſes ſhall be good and "effectual in the law as againſt the ſaid dean and "chapter and their ſucceſſors, and all perſons "claiming by, from, or under them, and that "no houſe, ſhed, or other building, ſhall ſtand "or hereafter be erected and fixed upon the ſaid "market-place, other than the market-houſe al-"ready built, without the conſent of the ſaid "dean and chapter, any thing in this or any "other act to the contrary notwithſtanding."

In purſuance of this act, the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, from time to time, have granted leaſes of the ſaid market to the Lord-mayor, commonalty and citizens of London. An abſtract of the laſt leaſe is as follows:

"Indenture, dated April 6, 1749, between "the right reverend father in God Joſeph lord "biſhop of Briſtol, dean of the cathedral church "of St. Paul in London, and the chapter of the "ſame church, of the one part, and the mayor, "commonalty, and the citizens of London, of "the other part; in conſequence of the ſurrender "of a former leaſe of indenture dated the ſixth of "April, 1709, and of or in the pieces or parcels "of ground therein after-mentioned, granted by "the worſhipful Henry Godolphin, doctor in "divinity, then dean of the ſaid cathedral and "the then chapter, unto the ſaid mayor, &c. all "that and thoſe piece or parcel, pieces or par-"cels of ground adjoining together, as the ſame "is and are deſigned, marked, admeaſured and "ſet out for the holding and keeping a market, "ſituate, lying and being between Warwick-lane "and Ivy lane, in the pariſh of St. Faith the "Virgin, in London, containing in the whole by "admeaſurement 23797 ſuperficial feet of aſſize; "and alſo all the pieces or parcels of ground "which are allotted, marked, ſet out and de-"ſigned for paſſages, ways and avenues into, out, "and from the ſaid market, as is and are therein "after-mentioned; which ſaid market-place a-"butteth eaſt unto and upon other ground of the "ſaid dean, &c. now or late in the occupation of "Sir John Oſborn, bart. or his under-tenants, in, "upon, and through which, is a way or paſſage "of ten feet broad, admeaſured, marked and "ſet out, to lead from the ſaid market-place into "Ivy-lane aforeſaid, containing by admeaſure-"ment 960 ſuperficial feet; and the ſaid ground "deſigned for the ſaid market abutteth weſt unto "and upon other ground of the ſaid dean, &c. "then or late in the ſeveral tenures of Jon Am-"herſt, in, upon, and through which, is another "paſſage or way of eighteen feet broad, marked, "admeaſured and ſet out, to lead from the ſaid "market-place into Warwick-lane aforeſaid, con-"taining by admeaſurement 1422 ſuperficial feet;

" —north unto and upon other ground of, &c. " then or late in the occupation of the ſaid Sir " John Oſborn, in, upon, and through which, " part of another way or paſſage of eighteen feet " broad, is marked, admeaſured and ſet out, to " lead from the ſaid market into Newgate-ſtreet, " containing, &c. 711 ſuperficial feet; ſouth " upon other ground of, &c. in the tenure, &c. " of William Watſon, eſq; and Daniel Shetter- " den, eſq; in, upon, and through which, is " another way or paſſage of ten feet broad, " marked, admeaſured, and ſet out, to lead from " the ſaid market-place in Pater-noſter-row, con- " taining by admeaſurement 710 ſuperficial feet; " except and reſerved out of this preſent leaſe " and demiſe unto the ſaid dean, &c. and their " ſucceſſors, tenants or aſſigns, free liberty to " build over the ſaid two ways or paſſages of ten " feet broad, leading into Ivy-lane and into Pa- " ter-noſter row, at both ends of either of the " ſaid ways or paſſages, ſixteen feet deep, or " thereabouts, from the firſt ſtory above ground " as high as the adjacent houſes, and to be laid " unto and uſed with any of the next adjoining " houſes or tenements, to hold for forty years, at " the yearly rent of four pounds."

The preſent farmers obtained an under-leaſe, from the city, of this market, upon paying a fine and a certain annual rent, and therefore inſiſted they were entitled to all the ground to the upright of all the houſes which environ the market; and that no perſons whatſoever occupying the buſineſs of a butcher, or ſelling meat, have any right even to put out hooks or rails at the fronts of thoſe houſes, in order to hang their meat on them, without paying toll.

As the act of the twenty-ſecond of Charles II. directs that the mayor, commonalty, and citizens, of London, ſhall have a market as therein is deſcribed, ſurely the houſekeepers, as citizens, and all other citizens of London, have a right to the free uſe of this market. In this act there is no notice of toll; and however the farmers of this and other markets, claiming under the mayor and commonalty of the city of London, may have ſet up ſuch kind of demands, it was certainly intended to affect ſuch perſons only (non-freemen) who bring into the market various commodities out of the country to ſell, and are provided by the farmers with ſtalls, ſtandings, boards, truſſels, ſcales, weights, &c. but as to the houſekeepers, they furniſh themſelves with all thoſe kinds of neceſſaries, abſtracted from the farmers.

Whereupon it was thought neceſſary to have a proper ſurvey taken, by two able ſurveyors, who performed it in the moſt accurate manner, in which it is demonſtrable that the 23,797 ſuperficial feet, granted by the dean and chapter of St. Pauls to the city of London, by the leaſe above-mentioned, comprehended the whole of the ground, as the ſame was deſigned, marked, admeaſured and ſet out for the holding and keeping a market, excluſive and leaving a way or paſſage of eight feet eight inches, to the fronts of all the houſes round the market. It is very probable, and I do not doubt, but the predeceſſors of the preſent farmers claimed the ſame right; but how abſurd is it to conceive ſuch a number of perſons ſhould rent houſes of ſuch large rents, and ſhould have no entrance to them without paying rent alſo to the farmers for the ground they ſtep upon to go into and out of their houſes. To conclude, one of the cauſes was tried by a ſpecial jury, in the court of common-pleas, Guildhall, in July, 1754, and the plaintiffs in that, (as in Mr. Holland's caſe) were nonſuited, and the people have ever ſince continued free and unmoleſted.

The following is the memorable certificate obtained by Mr. Holland in the mayoralty of Sir William Calvert; by which the antient franchiſes of the citizens of London are aſſerted and maintained.

" To all whom theſe preſents ſhall come, we, " Sir William Calvert, knt. Lord-mayor of the " city of London, and the aldermen of the ſaid " city, ſend greeting. Know ye, that among " other the liberties, free-cuſtoms and privileges, " by the charters of the late kings Henry II. " Henry III. Edward III. and other kings of " England, to the citizens of the city aforeſaid " granted, and by the authority of divers par- " liaments ratified, approved, and confirmed, it " appeareth, that all the citizens of London, and " their goods, are, and ought to be, quit and " free from all tolls, leſtage, paſſage, package, " pontage, pavage, and murage, through the " whole realm of England, and the ports of the " ſea, and through the whole dominions of the " ſame, as well on this ſide, as beyond the ſeas; " and that if any man ſhall take any toll or " cuſtom of the citizens of London, the ci- " zens of London may take of the borough or " town where any toll or other cuſtom ſhall be " ſo taken, as much as the ſaid citizens have given " for toll, and are thereby indemnified: and that " if any man within the realm of England, or " in any of the dominions of the ſaid kings, on " this ſide, or beyond the ſeas, or in any of the " ports of the ſea, on this ſide, or beyond the " ſeas, ſhall take any toll, or other cuſtom, of " the citizens of London, the ſheriffs of the ſaid " city of London for default of juſtice upon that " behalf, their goods may take at London: and " alſo that the ſaid citizens, through the whole " realm and dominions aforeſaid, freely, and " without any let of the ſaid kings, or their of- " ficers or miniſters, as well by ſea as by land, " concerning their goods and merchandizes, in " any place or port, may traffic, and do their " buſineſs as to them ſhall ſeem good, quit of all " cuſtom, toll or pavage, and alſo may abide " in any place within the ſaid realm for doing " their ſaid buſineſs, as in time paſt they have " been accuſtomed to do. And further it is for- " bidden, upon forfeiture, that none ſhall pre- " ſume from henceforth to moleſt, or otherwiſe " diſquiet or vex the ſaid citizens, contrary to " the liberties to them, as aforeſaid, granted. " Wherefore we pray and friendly intreat you, on " the behalf of Richard Holland, who is a free- " man and citizen of this city, that you will not " in any wiſe moleſt him in his perſon, nor in his

Act of parliament for removing the Borough market. Another for eſtabliſhing Ratcliff-ferry. Great fire at the Hermitage. Mr. Trueman, being a diſſenter, forbids the livery to elect him ſheriff. City militia ordered to be ready. Petition to parliament for building Black-friars-bridge. A general faſt. Fire at Black-friars. Invaſion threatened. City addreſs on the occaſion. War declared againſt France. Conteſt on the choice of Lord-mayor. Temporary-bridge burnt. A new one erected. Sir John Barnard reſigns his gown. Great rejoicings on the taking of Louiſbourg. City addreſs on the prince of Wales coming of age.

AT a court of common-council held the 15th of January 1755, the committee appointed to enquire whether the conſtruction of a new bridge might any wiſe prejudice the navigation, preſented a report, ſetting forth, that it would greatly obſtruct the ſame, and be very prejudicial to the commerce of the city of London. On which a motion was made, that the court ſhould agree to the ſame report; but that being oppoſed, a debate aroſe which continued near three hours, and the queſtion being put for agreeing to the ſaid report, it was carried in the negative, 132 to 106, of whom ten aldermen were for the report, and ſix againſt it; on which the Lord-mayor declared a majority of 26 againſt agreeing with the report.

On the twenty-third of the ſame month a proclamation was iſſued promiſing a bounty of 30s. for all able ſeamen, not more than 50, nor under 20, who ſhould enter as volunteers on board the royal navy, before the 20th day of February; and alſo a bounty of twenty ſhillings a man for each ordinary ſea-man who ſhould enter within the ſaid time, to be paid by the clerks of the cheque, at the third muſter, at whatever port ſuch ſeamen ſhould enter themſelves. And on the ſeventeenth of February another proclamation was iſſued for recalling and prohibiting ſeamen from ſerving foreign princes; for giving a further encouragement of three pounds for every able, and forty ſhillings to every ordinary ſeaman, who ſhould enter themſelves on board his majeſty's ſhips of war; and for granting rewards for diſcovering ſuch ſeamen as ſhould conceal themſelves.

On the twentieth of February a terrible fire broke out at Mr. Thompſon's an embroiderer, in Bury-ſtreet, St. James's, which ſoon conſumed that houſe, and damaged two others adjoining. The flames were ſo rapid, that Mr. Swan, a lodger, was obliged to ſave himſelf by jumping out of the dining room window; three ſiſters jumped out of another room in their ſhifts. Mr. Forbes, a lodger, threw himſelf out of a two pair of ſtairs window; and Mr. Thompſon's maid, and miſs Swan's maid and her huſband all periſhed in the flames.

An act of parliament was paſſed on the twentieth of March to prevent the holding of any market in the high-ſtreet of the Borough of Southwark. And another for eſtabliſhing a ferry acroſs the Thames from the Narrow-ſtreet, in Limehouſe pariſh, to the eaſt end of Rotherhithe.

On the fifth day of May a fire broke out in a hay-loft over the ſtables at Walker's wharf near the Hermitage brew-houſe, which in a ſhort time conſumed ſeveral warehouſes of hemp, flax, &c. to the damage of 20,000l.

At a court of common-council held the 12th of June, 410l. per annum was allowed the comptroller of the bridge-houſe, in lieu of his cuſtomary annual bills. And a motion being made to alter and render more commodious the jail of Newgate, the ſame was referred to a committee of ſix aldermen and twelve commoners.

At the time of electing ſheriffs, Mr. Trueman, apprehenſive that he ſhould be put up at the common-hall, did, by letter, read to the livery previous to the naming thoſe on the liſt, forbid them to chuſe him, as being a proteſtant diſſenter, he was, by act of parliament, diſqualified for that office.

On the 27th of Auguſt one Barlow, a bookſeller in Star-alley, Fenchurch-ſtreet, ſhot his child of two years old, which died inſtantly, and then himſelf in at the mouth, but the ball glancing ſideways did not kill him. The father was committed to the compter, where, after a few days, he died of his wound. His friends took away his body and buried it; of which the Lord-mayor being informed, ordered it to be dug up, and put in a hole made for that purpoſe in the croſs-road at the upper end of Moor-fields, and a ſtake drove through the body. It appeared by a paper left behind him, that being hard preſſed by his creditors who refuſed to give him time, he took this deſperate method to put an end to his troubles.

On the nineteenth of September the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London waited on his majeſty to congratulate him on his ſafe return from Germany to his Britiſh dominions; when William Moreton, eſq; the recorder, made their compliments in the following addreſs:

" Moſt gracious Sovereign,

" We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal " ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and com- " mons of the city of London, in common- " council aſſembled, humbly beg leave to addreſs " your majeſty with our moſt ſincere and joyful " congratulations, on your majeſty's ſafe and " happy return to your Britiſh dominions.

" Permit us, royal Sir, with hearts full of gra- " titude, to expreſs our ſincere acknowledg- " ments of your majeſty's paternal care and " vigilant regard for the true intereſt and proſpe- " rity of your people, by the vigorous meaſures " taken by your majeſty to protect our commerce " and colonies from the encroachments of the " French.

" And we do humbly aſſure your majeſty, that " we will, to the utmoſt of our power on this, " and every other occaſion chearfully contribute " towards the ſupport of your majeſty's ſacred " perſon and government, and the defence of the " juſt rights and poſſeſſions of your crown againſt " all attempts whatſoever."

To which addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to return this moſt gracious anſwer:

" I thank you for this very dutiful and affec- " tionate addreſs. The ſupport of the rights of " my crown, and the preſervation of my do- " minions in America, are ſo eſſential to the trade " and commerce of my people, that the city of " London may depend, that I will continue to " take ſuch meaſures as may beſt tend to theſe " great and important ends. The aſſurances you " give me of your zeal and aſſiſtance are very " pleaſing to me; and the city of London may " rely upon the continuance of my favour and " protection."

It being apprehended, by the motions of the French, that an invaſion was intended, the ſecretary of war ſent an order, on the fifteenth of November, to the court of aldermen, for the militia of the city of London to hold themſelves in readineſs to march. On which a court of lieutenancy was immediately ſummoned to carry the ſaid order into execution, who, on the twentieth, gave orders for the militia to be exerciſed in the Artillery-ground, by four companies every day, till they had gone through the ſix regiments.

Information being received of a moſt dreadful earthquake that happened at Liſbon, on the firſt of Nov. by which the greateſt part of the public edifices, and houſes of that ſuperb capital were deſtroyed, and upwards of 100,000 perſons buried in the ruins, his majeſty was pleaſed to ſend a meſſage to the houſe of commons, requeſting their aſſiſtance for the remaining part of the inhabitants of that great city, who laboured under the moſt direful afflictions. In conſequence of which, the houſe unanimouſly reſolved to enable his majeſty, to give what aſſiſtance he ſhould think fit, and that ſuch expences as ſhould be incurred by his majeſty, in relieving the miſery to which the people of Portugal muſt be reduced, by this deplorable calamity, ſhould be made good out of the next aids.

At a court of common-council, held the eighteenth of December, the petition for a new bridge, prepared by the committee, was agreed to by a majority of one hundred againſt ſixty-ſix; and Mr. Sheriff Whitebread was ordered to preſent the ſame to the houſe of commons, which being done on the thirteenth of January, an act of parliament was ſoon after paſſed for that purpoſe.

The act provides, that the mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled, ſhall have power and authority to direct, order, and build the ſaid bridge, and to maintain, preſerve, and ſupport the ſame, when built; for which purpoſe, they are to appoint a committee, from time to time, to manage and tranſact ſuch affairs as they may find neceſſary, who are to have ſuch powers and authorities as ſhall be delegated to them, from time to time, by the ſaid mayor, &c. in common-council aſſembled, or ſuch general powers as are granted by the act. But no perſon concerned in building, or dealing in any materials for building, ſhall be eligible, or capable of acting as a member of any ſuch committee, nor any other perſon, during the time he ſhall poſſeſs any office, or place of profit under the act, or under the mayor and commonalty of London. The ſaid mayor, &c. in common-council aſſembled, are impowered to deſign, and lay out, in what manner the ſaid intended bridge ſhall be erected, and the ways, ſtreets, and paſſages, to and from the ſame, made, widened, enlarged, or improved, and to do all matters and things, for carrying on and effecting the purpoſes of the act. The ſaid bridge is to be ſo conſtructed, as that there ſhall remain a free and open paſſage for the water, thro' the arches, or paſſages under the ſame, of ſeven hundred and fifty feet, at leaſt, within the preſent banks of the river, that the navigation thereof may receive no prejudice. No buildings, but the proper gates and toll-houſes, to be built upon the ſaid bridge, and any perſons damaging, or deſtroying, maliciouſly, or hindering or interrupting the building of the bridge, ſhall be adjudged guilty of felony, and ſuffer as a felon. The ſaid mayor, &c. are empowered to make, widen, and enlarge ſuch ſtreets, ways, and paſſages, as they ſhall think neceſſary, on each ſide the river, to and from the ſaid bridge, and to agree with the owners and occupiers cupiers of ſuch lands, tenements, or hereditaments, as they ſhall judge proper to be purchaſed, removed, or pulled down for that purpoſe, for the purchaſe thereof; and, upon the payment of ſuch ſums, as ſhall be agreed upon, this act ſhall be as ſufficient an indemnification againſt the heirs, executors, adminiſtrators, or aſſigns, of any of the ſaid owners, as if the ſame had been ſold by deed or feoffment, bargain and ſale, or other aſſurance in the law whatſoever: and it ſhall and may be lawful for all bodies politic, corporate or collegiate, corporations aggregate or ſole, truſtees and feoffees in truſt, guardians and committees for lunatics and ideots, executors, guardians and adminiſtrators, not only for and on behalf of themſelves, their heirs, &c. but alſo their ceſtuique truſts, whether iſſue, or infants unborn, &c. &c. or other perſons whatſoever, and for all femes covert, to ſell and convey ſuch lands, &c. to the ſaid mayor, &c. and all ſuch perſons ſo conveying, ſhall be indemnified for what they ſhall do, by virtue of this act, notwithſtanding any omiſſions or miſtakes as to matter of form. Perſons refuſing to treat with the ſaid mayor, &c. for the ſale of ſuch eſtates, lands, &c. a jury is to be called, and impannelled by the ſheriffs, and proper witneſſes ſummoned, which jury is to enquire into the value of ſuch lands, &c. and of the eſtate and intereſt of every perſon therein, and ſhall aſſeſs and award the ſums payable to every ſuch perſon, for the purchaſe thereof, and ſuch verdict and the judgment of the mayor, &c. (if in the city) or of the juſtices, (if in Surry) ſhall be binding and concluſive againſt all perſons, bodies politic and corporate, claiming right to, or in the ſaid lands, &c. Upon the payment of the ſums ſo awarded, legal conveyances, &c. are to be made to the ſaid mayor, &c. of ſuch lands, &c. If the perſons are not to be found who have a right to ſuch purchaſe-money ſo awarded, or there be any other impediment or doubt with regard to the payment of it, it is to be lodged in the bank of England, for the uſe of the parties intereſted therein, to be paid them at ſuch times as the mayor, &c. ſhall order and direct. The ſaid verdicts and judgments ſhall be good and effectual evidence in all courts of law, being duly recorded in the court of mayor and aldermen, or general quarter ſeſſions of the peace for the county of Surry, where all perſons may have recourſe to them gratis, and take copies, paying for every copy ſuch conſideration as the act preſcribes. On the payment or entry of ſuch verdicts, judgments, &c. all the eſtate, truſt, &c. in ſuch eſtates, &c. ſhall veſt in the ſaid mayor, &c, and they ſhall be deemed in law, to be in actual poſſeſſion thereof fully and effectually. Perſons having any claim or demand on ſuch lands, &c. ſold as above, not entering their claim with the town-clerk of the city, or the clerk of the peace for Surry, who are to keep books for that purpoſe, within five years, from the enrollment of ſuch bargain and ſale, ſhall forfeit their right and intereſt in the ſaid lands, &c. for ever. Tenants at will, and leſſees for a year, to deliver up poſſeſſion immediately of ſuch lands, tenements, &c. on the payment or tender of ſix months rent, or on twelve months notice. Perſons who have mortgages on any of the ſaid lands, &c. not being in poſſeſſion thereof by virtue of ſuch mortgages, to aſſign over their mortgages to the mayor, &c. on the tender of the principal money and intereſt due, together with ſix months intereſt of the ſaid principal money. The mayor, &c. are authorized to treat with the waterman's company about a recompence to be made to that company in lieu of their Sunday's ferry from Black-friars to the oppoſite ſhore. Fines not exceeding ten pounds to be levied by diſtreſs and ſale of goods, on ſuch ſheriffs, deputy-ſheriffs, bailiffs, agents, jurymen, &c. as reſpectively make default in the premiſes. They are empowered to fill up the channel of Bridewell-dock, between the Thames and Fleet-bridge, and to take away the bridge croſs the ſaid channel, making ſufficient drains and ſewers, and from time to time cleanſing the ſame, to carry the ſoil, &c. into the Thames. When the bridge is finiſhed and made paſſable, no coachman or driver ſhall ſtand or ply, nor any drayman, carman, carter, or driver of any carriage whatſoever, ſhall wilfully ſtand or remain with his carriage on the ſaid bridge, or within 100 yards on either ſide thereof. Nor is any filth, dung, or rubbiſh, to be put thereon: perſons offending to forfeit a ſum not exceeding twenty ſhillings, nor leſs than two ſhillings and ſixpence, to the informers and apprehenders of ſuch perſons, or be committed to hard labour on default of payment, for ſuch time as the magiſtrate ſhall think proper, not exceeding three days. A proper number of lamps are to be fixed on the bridge, and to burn from ſun-ſetting to ſun-riſing throughout the year, and a number of watchmen appointed for the ſafety of the paſſengers. For the erecting, repairing, and preſerving the bridge, for widening the ſtreets, purchaſing ground, houſes, &c. lighting and watching it, the mayor, &c. are empowered to appoint a toll, not exceeding the following rates, viz. For every coach, chariot, berlin, chaiſe, chair, or calaſh, drawn by ſix or more horſes, 2s. With four horſes, 1s. 6d. leſs than four horſes, 1s. For every waggon, wain, car, cart, or carriage, drawn by four or more horſes, or other beaſts, 1s. and by leſs than four, 6d. For every horſe, mule, or aſs, laden or unladen, and not drawing, 1d. For every foot paſſenger on Sunday 1d. and every other day one halfpenny. Power is given to appoint receivers and other collectors of the ſaid toll, and regulations made for the better management of them. The whole of the bridge to be deemed to be in the pariſh of St. Anne, Black-friars. The mayor, &c. are empowered to raiſe, upon the credit of the tolls, any ſum, not exceeding 30,000l. a year, until 160,000l. be raiſed in the whole, to be applied to the purpoſes of the act. Perſons ſued for doing any thing in purſuance of this act, may plead the general iſſue, and it is declared to be a public act, and is to be deemed ſuch by all judges, juſtices, and others, in all courts and places, without pleading the ſame.

In conſequence of the dreadful calamity which happened at Liſbon, the following proclamation was publiſhed on the twentieth of December:

" Whereas

" Whereas the manifold ſins and wickedneſs " of theſe kingdoms have moſt juſtly deſerved " heavy and ſevere puniſhments from the hand " of heaven; and the almighty, out of his great " mercy, hath not only been our defence in " times of danger, but hath protected and pre- " ſerved us from imminent deſtruction, eſpecially " at this time, when ſome neighbouring coun- " tries, in alliance and friendſhip with us, have " been viſited with a moſt dreadful and extenſive " earthquake, which hath alſo, in ſome degree, " been felt in ſeveral parts of our dominions: " and whereas the preſent ſituation of public af- " fairs (as to the iſſue of them) is of the high- " eſt importance to the peace and ſafety of theſe " kingdoms, to our commerce and liberty, and, " above all, to the moſt valuable bleſſing of the " proteſtant religion: we, from the deepeſt ſenſe " of this our ſtate, and of the miſeries which " our people would ſuffer if a like viſitation " ſhould be ſhewed forth upon theſe kingdoms, " and placing our whole truſt and confidence in " the mercy of almighty God, have reſolved, " that a general and public faſt be obſerved, " that both we and our people may humble our- " ſelves before almighty God, and in a moſt de- " vout and ſolemn manner, ſend up our prayers " and ſupplications to the divine majeſty, to avert " all thoſe judgments which we moſt juſtly have " deſerved, to continue his mercies, and to per- " petuate the enjoyment of the proteſtant reli- " gion among us, and ſafety and proſperity to our " kingdoms and dominons, and to implore his " protection and bleſſing upon our fleets and ar- " mies; and we have therefore thought fit, by " the advice of our privy council, to iſſue this " our proclamation, hereby appointing and com- " manding, that ſuch general and public faſt be " obſerved throughout that part of our kingdom " of Great Britain called England, the domi- " nion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon " Tweed, on Friday the ſixth day of February " next enſuing." Which faſt was kept with a becoming decency by all ranks of people, except the quakers, who, in London, kept their ſhops open; otherwiſe the churches and meeting houſes were thronged, and there was, in appearance, an entire ceſſation from buſineſs throughout the whole city and ſuburbs.

On the nineteenth of February 1756 a dread- ful fire broke out in the houſe of Mr. Howell, a timber-merchant at Black-friars-ſtairs; which burnt with ſuch violence that it deſtroyed Mr. Howell's, and two more timber-yards, the New- caſtle glaſs warehouſe, and about thirteen more houſes: ſome lighters loaded with deals likewiſe took fire, and their moorings being burnt, they fell down with the tide through London-bridge. One of them ſtopping at the bridge would have ſet fire to it had it not with great difficulty been pre- vented by ſome watermen. The others ſet fire to a ſhip from Maryland, and to another which run aſhore at Rotherhithe to prevent being en- tirely burnt.

On the twenty-eighth of February, four thief- takers (Macdaniel, Berry, Salmon, and Egan) received ſentence, each to ſtand twice on the pil- lory, two at a time, to be impriſoned ſeven years in Newgate, to find ſecurity of 1000l. each for their good behaviour for ſeven years, and to pay a fine. Their crime was enticing two young lads to commit a robbery, and then proſecuting them for the ſake of the reward. On the fifth of February Berry and Macdaniel ſtood in the pillory oppoſite Hatton Garden, and were ſeverely pelted by the populace. The latter received a terrible wound in his forehead with a ſtone, and Berry, who was weak before, was ſcarce able to ſurvive it. And on the eighth Egan and Salmon ſtood in the pillory in Smithfield, the former of whom in leſs than twenty minutes received a mortal wound of which he died, and the other was miſerably bruiſed. The populace were ſo exaſperated againſt theſe miſcreants, that the peace officers in vain endeavoured to reſtrain their fury. Berry and Salmon died in Newgate, and Macdaniel, after a courſe of years was ſent abroad.

A bill being at this time depending in the houſe for laying a duty on plate, to the farther exten- ſion of the exciſe laws, the common-council, on the eighteenth of March, prepared a petition againſt it, and ordered Mr. Sheriff Whitebread to preſent the ſame. And the committee who drew up the ſaid petition was likewiſe ordered to prepare inſtructions to be delivered to the repre- ſentatives to oppoſe the ſaid bill, which ſubjected every poſſeſſor of ſilver plate to the information of his ſervants or diſſolute perſons. The follow- ing is a copy of the inſtructions:

" Whereas a bill is now depending in parlia- " ment, by which owners, uſers and keepers of " ſilver plate, are ſubjected to the laws of exciſe; " we therefore take this opportunity of expreſſing " our univerſal diſapprobation of every extenſion " of laws, which tend to deprive the ſubjects of " Great-Britain of their invaluable right, a trial " by jury.

" And this bill appears to ſubject all perſons " (although not engaged in trade) to penalties " arbitrarily levied by exciſe laws.

" And we moreover recommend to you the " oppoſing the bill, as tending to the ruin of " many thouſands of the moſt ſkilful artificers " and manufacturers, or to compel them to carry " their art and induſtry to foreign countries, " leaving their families a burden to their " own.

" We apprehend a further conſequence of paſ- " ſing this bill, will be the exportation of bullion " unwrought, and the nation may be left without " the only commodity, to which they can have " recourſe in the moſt preſſing diſtreſs.

" We conceive that this bill will alſo lay an " unequal burden upon the middle and lower " rank of ſubjects, from which the rich and " opulent, (who are beſt able to contribute) are " partially exempted."

Notwithſtanding theſe endeavours to oppoſe a bill ſo apparently detrimental to the liberty of the ſubject, yet it received the royal aſſent on the fifteenth of April. By this act five ſhillings is to be paid for every hundred ounces as far as 4000, and all perſons within the diſtrict of the chief office of exciſe in London are to enter their plate at that office, and all other perſons at the next office to where they live, and at the ſame time to pay the duty, and to pay every year within thirty days after the commencement of the year. The firſt entry to be made within forty days after the fifth of July, under the penalty of twenty pounds, half to the informer; to be determined in London before the commiſſioners of exciſe, or in any court of record, with liberty of appeal from the commiſſioners of exciſe to thoſe of appeal, and all other places in England, by two juſtices of the peace, with appeal to the quarter ſeſſions. The forfeitures to be levied by diſtreſs of goods; but if no goods are found, then the perſon to be committed to jail till the money is paid. No notice or entry is neceſſary for any new acquiſition of plate within the year. Perſons receiving plate in pawn, without uſing it are not liable to pay the duty, but the owners thereof are. Church plate not to pay the duty; nor the ſtock in trade of any goldſmith or manufacturer of plate, except for what ſhall be uſed by them or their families. No oath to be taken at the entry of any plate, nor officer authorized to enter any houſe to ſearch for plate.

His majeſty having informed the parliament of his receiving advice, that the French were preparing in divers ports to invade England, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council waited on his majeſty on the ſixth of April, with the following addreſs:

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" Your majeſty having been graciouſly pleaſed " to acquaint your two houſes of parliament, " that a deſign hath been formed by the French " court to make an hoſtile invaſion upon Great-" Britain or Ireland; we your majeſty's moſt du-" tiful and loyal ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, alder-" men, and commons, of the city of London, " in common-council aſſembled, beg leave to " expreſs our abhorrence of ſo unjuſt and deſ-" perate an enterprize, projected in revenge for " your royal and gracious protection of the trade " and commerce of your people, and the neceſſary " defence of the undoubted rights and poſſeſſions " of your crown.

" With gratitude and unfeigned loyalty, we " moſt humbly aſſure your majeſty, that the ci-" tizens of your faithful city, united in duty and " affection to your ſacred perſon and government, " will exert their utmoſt power, and hazard their " lives and fortunes, to ſupport and defend your " majeſty, and the proteſtant ſucceſſion in your " royal family; not doubting, but the zeal and " loyalty of your majeſty's ſubjects, conducted " by your known wiſdom and courage, with the " aſſiſtance of the divine providence, you will " be able to defeat all the deſigns of your ene-" mies:"

To which addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following moſt gracious anſwer:

" I thank you for this very loyal and dutiful " addreſs, I have the firmeſt reliance on the af-" fectionate aſſurance you give me, of exerting " yourſelves to the utmoſt in ſupport of my go-" vernment; and the city of London may al-" ways depend upon my favour, countenance, " and protection; and my conſtant care to defend " the rights and poſſeſſions of my crown, and " promote the trade and commerce of this " kingdom."

An act of parliament paſſed this ſeſſions for repairing London-bridge. By which the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of London, in common-council aſſembled, were empowered to purchaſe and remove the buildings on, and contiguous to, the bridge, in order to enlarge the paſſage over, and the avenues leading to and from the ſaid bridge; and to widen or enlarge one or more arches of the ſaid bridge; and to deſign how the paſſage might be rendered more ſafe and commodious, and the bridge preſerved and kept in repair. It directed that there ſhould be a baluſtrade on each ſide of the bridge, and a paſſage of thirty-one feet open for carriages, and ſeven feet on each ſide for foot paſſengers; with lamps to be kept lighted from ſun-ſetting to ſun-riſing, and a number of able-bodied watchmen to patrole the ſame by night: and that the expence of the ſaid lamps and watch ſhould be defrayed out of the bridge eſtate. It was further enacted, that the tythes, poors rates, land-tax, and cuſtomary payments due from the houſes, &c. pulled down, ſhould be charged upon the bridge-houſe lands. There were likewiſe an additional toll eſtabliſhed, to be paid by carriages and horſes paſſing over the bridge; and a toll to be paid by loaded veſſels paſſing under the bridge: which tolls were to continue till the principal and intereſt of the money borrowed for the purpoſes of the ſaid act ſhould be repaid.

At the ſame time another act paſſed for building a new bridge from Black-friars to the oppoſite ſhore. By this act the commiſſioners were empowered to purchaſe houſes and lands, &c. and to levy any toll not exceeding the following rates. For every coach, chariot, berlin, chaiſe, chair, or calaſh, drawn by ſix or more horſes, two ſhillings. With four horſes one ſhilling and ſixpence; leſs than four one ſhilling. For every waggon, wain, cart, or carriage, drawn by four or more horſes, or other beaſts, one ſhillling, and by leſs than four, ſix-pence. For every horſe, mule, or aſs, laden or unladen, and not drawing, one penny; for every foot paſſenger on Sunday one penny; and every other day one halfpenny.

On the 18th of May his majeſty's declaration of war was declared in the uſual places and with the accuſtomed ceremonies. Which declaration, after reciting the various hoſtilities committed by the French in the Weſt Indies and North America, concludes thus: " We have therefore thought proper " to declare war, and we do hereby declare war " againſt the French king, who hath ſo unjuſtly " begun it, relying on the help of almighty God " in our juſt undertaking, and being aſſured of " the hearty concurrence and aſſiſtance of our " ſubjects in ſupport of ſo good a cauſe; hereby " willing and requiring our captain-general of " our forces, our commiſſioners for executing the " office of our high-admiral of Great-Britain,

" our lieutenants of our ſeveral counties, gover-

" in the proſecution of this war, againſt the " French king, his vaſſals and ſubjects, and to " oppoſe their attempts; willing and requiring
" all our ſubjects to take notice of the ſame,
" whom we henceforth ſtrictly forbid to hold any
" correſpondence or communication with the ſaid

" tize all other perſons, of what nation ſoever,
" not to tranſport or carry any ſoldiers, arms,

The national diſcontent at the meaſures of the miniſtry, which did not promiſe any great ſucceſs in the war lately proclaimed, and diſhonoured the ancient and approved valour, courage, and loyalty of the national forces, by calling in foreign troops to protect and defend us from the French invaders, was greatly increaſed by the loſs of Minorca: on which occaſion the citizens of London thought it their duty to addreſs his majeſty on the then ſituation of affairs; and, on the twentieth of Auguſt, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council waited on his majeſty with the following addreſs:

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" We, your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal
" ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com-
" mons, of the city of London, in common-
" council aſſembled, humbly beg leave to ap" proach your ſacred perſon, and with hearts
" full of gratitude for your majeſty's paternal " care of the true intereſts of your people, to " expreſs our ſorrow and apprehenſions for the " diſquietudes which our late loſſes and diſap-
" pointments muſt create in your majeſty's royal " mind.

" The loſs of the important fortreſs of St.
" Philip, and the iſland of Minorca, (poſſeſſions
" of the utmoſt conſequence to the commerce
" and naval ſtrength of Great Britain) without " any attempt, by timely and effectual ſuccours,
" to prevent or defeat an attack, after ſuch early
" notice of the enemy's intentions, and when
" your majeſty's navy was ſo evidently ſuperior
" to theirs, will, we fear, be an indelible reproach
" on the honour of the Britiſh nation.

" Nor can we help expreſſing our apprehen-
" ſions for the great danger of your majeſty's
" poſſeſſions in America, by the miſmanagements
" and delays, which have attended the defence of " thoſe invaluable colonies, the object of the pre-
" ſent war, and the principal ſource of the wealth
" and ſtrength of theſe kingdoms.

" Permit us, at the ſame time, royal Sir, to " lament the want of a conſtitutional and well-
" regulated militia, the moſt natural and certain
" defence, under divine providence, of your ma-
" jeſty's ſacred perſon and government againſt all
" invaders whatſoever, as thereby your majeſty's
" fleets and armies may be more ſecurely employ" ed abroad, to the annoyance of your majeſty's
" enemies; your faithful and loyal ſubjects being " ready and willing, whenever called upon by " your majeſty, to ſhed the laſt drop of their " blood in your ſervice.

" As your majeſty's reign has ever been diſtin-
" guiſhed by a love of liberty and juſtice, we can-
" not doubt of your majeſty's directing the au" thors of our late loſſes and diſappointments to
" be enquired into and puniſhed, that your ma-
" jeſty's known intentions of protecting and de" fending your ſubjects in their rights and poſſeſ-
" ſions may be faithfully and vigorouſly carried
" into execution, and that the large ſupplies, ſo
" neceſſarily called for, and ſo chearfully granted,
" may be religiouſly applied to the defence of
" theſe kingdoms and colonies, and their com" merce, and to the diſtreſſing our inveterate and
" perfidious enemies, as the only ſure means of " obtaining a laſting and honourable peace.

" And we do, with the utmoſt ſincerity of " heart, aſſure your majeſty, that your loyal city
" of London will, at all times, readily and chear-
" fully contribute to whatever may be neceſſary
" for the defence of your majeſty, and your illuſ-
" trious family, and towards the attainment of
" theſe great and deſirable ends."

To which addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to return this moſt gracious anſwer:

" I thank you for theſe profeſſions of your duty
" to me. My concern for the loſs of my iſland
" of Minorca is great and ſincere. My utmoſt
" care and vigilance have been, and ſhall be,
" executed to maintain the honour of the nation,
" and the commerce of my ſubjects. The events
" of war are uncertain; but nothing ſhall be " wanting on my part towards carrying it on with " vigour, in order to a ſafe and honourable
" peace, and for recovering and ſecuring, by
" the bleſſing of God, the poſſeſſions and rights
" of my crown.

" I will not fail to do you juſtice upon any " perſons who ſhall have been wanting in their " duty to me, and their country; to enforce
" obedience and diſcipline in my fleets and ar" mies; and to ſupport the authority and reſpect
" due to my government."

The city of Briſtol likewiſe preſented an addreſs to his majeſty on the ſame occaſion, as did moſt counties in England: ſome of them recommending a ſtrict enquiry to their members, and others requeſting theſe to preſent their addreſs to his majeſty for the ſame purpoſe.

On the twenty-ninth of September came on at Guildhall the election for Lord-mayor; when all the aldermen below the chair, who had ſerved the office of ſheriff, was ſeverally put in nomination, and the ſheriffs declared the majority of hands to be for Sir Charles Aſgill and Sir Richard Glynn; but a poll was demanded and granted for Marſhe Dickenſon, eſq; againſt Sir Richard Glynn. At the cloſe of the poll, which laſted ſeven days, there were and Marſhe Dickenſon, eſq; being returned with Sir Charles Aſgil, the fomer was choſen. The objection made by the citizens to alderman Dickenſon was, that, as a member of the houſe of commons, he had, by miniſterial influence, been prevailed upon to vote to addreſs his majeſty for the importation of lawleſs mercenaries.

At a court of common-council held at Guildhall the 28th of October, it was unanimouſly agreed to inſtruct the repreſentatives in parliament for the city of London, on the then unhappy and dangerous ſituation of public affairs; when twelve aldermen and twenty-four commoners were choſen for that purpoſe: and the following inſtructions being agreed to, a copy thereof was delivered to each of their repreſentatives:

To the right hon. Slingſby Bethel, eſq; Lord-mayor, Sir John Barnard, knt. Sir Robert Ladbroke, knt. and William Beckford, eſq; repreſentatives in parliament for the city of London:

" We, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled, juſtly alarmed at the critical and unhappy ſituation of theſe kingdoms, do moſt earneſtly call upon you, our repreſentatives, to exert your utmoſt ability towards procuring a ſtrict and impartial parliamentary enquiry into the cauſes of theſe national calamities.

" An almoſt total neglect of our important fortreſſes in the Mediterranean, of ſuch ineſtimable conſequence to the trade and power of theſe kingdoms, and the permitted abſence of their principal officers many months after the commencement of hoſtilities, the actual loſs of Minorca, and apparent danger of Gibraltar, are circumſtances which fill us with amazement and concern; but when we reflect on the great preparations for an embarkation of troops and artillery, and the equipment of a powerful fleet publickly known to be carried on at Toulon, whoſe neighbourhood to Minorca was ſufficiently alarming, we cannot impute theſe fatal events to neglect alone, and therefore conjure you to enquire, why a reſpectable fleet was not immediately ſent from hence, and why at laſt ſo ſmall a ſquadron was ordered upon this important ſervice, without any frigate, fire-ſhip, hoſpital-ſhip, tranſport or troops beyond their ordinary compliment, and this at a time when our naval force was confeſſedly ſuperior to the enemy's.

" The cruelties ſuffered, and loſſes ſuſtained by our fellow ſubjects in North-America have long called for redreſs, whilſt the miſmanagements in the attempts for their ſupport, and the untimely and unequal ſuccours ſent to their relief, have only ſerved to render the Britiſh name contemptible. We therefore require you to uſe your utmoſt endeavours for detecting all thoſe, who by treachery or miſconduct have contributed to thoſe great diſtreſſes, his majeſty having been graciouſly pleaſed to aſſure us, that he willn ot fail to do juſtice upon any perſons, who ſhall have been wanting in their duty to him and their country.

" To theſe intereſting enquiries we have but too much reaſon to add our preſſing requeſt, that you uſe your earlieſt endeavours to eſtabliſh a well regulated and conſtitutional militia as the moſt honourable defence of the crown, and the moſt conſiſtent with the rights of a free people. And this we are more anxious to recommend to your particular care and attention, as every apprehenſion of danger has furniſhed reaſon for encreaſing the number of our regular forces, and for the introduction of foreign mercenaries; the expence of which is inſupportable. We therefore truſt that you will purſue this meaſure before you conſent to the grant of ſupplies, experience having convinced us, that your laudable endeavours afterwards may prove fruitleſs.

" The inſult offered to our laws by a claim of exception which theſe foreigners are ſaid to have made, demands that you ſtrictly enquire whether the ordinary courſe of juſtice has been interrupted or ſuſpended on their account, or whether any perſon in authority under his majeſty has given countenance to ſuch claim, which, if you ſhould diſcover, we confide in your reſolution and integrity, that nothing will be wanting on your part, to bring to juſtice the adviſers and inſtruments of ſuch a violation of the bill of rights as the only means of quieting the minds of his majeſty's loyal Britiſh ſubjects; and at all events we recommend it to you, to oppoſe the continuance of any foreign troops within the kingdom, a circumſtance which muſt ever be conſidered as a reproach to the loyalty, courage, and ability of this nation.

" We alſo hope that you will endeavour to limit the number of placemen and penſioners, of late ſo remarkably increaſed, and at a proper ſeaſon to reſtore triennial parliaments, as we conceive it the only means to obtain a free repreſentative of the people.

" The immenſe ſums ſo chearfully paid, when almoſt every meaſure reflects national diſgrace, call upon you ſtrictly to enquire into their application, and we truſt that you will carefully watch and endeavour to prevent all unnatural connections on the continent, in order to preſerve the independency of theſe kingdoms.

" By

" By rendering theſe neceſſary ſervices to your " king and country, you will give his majeſty " the ſtrongeſt teſtimony of your duty and af- " fection, and moſt effectually ſecure to his go- " vernment obedience and reſpect.

" At the ſame time we deſire you, thus pub- " lickly to accept our moſt grateful acknowledg- " ments of your paſt conduct in parliament, and " to enjoin you at all times to hold ſacred and in- " violable the act made for eſtabliſhing his ma- " jeſty's right to the crown of theſe realms, and " ſecuring the rights and liberties of the ſubject; " and that you oppoſe every meaſure tending to " weaken that compact, which under the divine " providence will ever prove the beſt ſecurity to " his majeſty's ſacred perſon, and the ſucceſſion " in his illuſtrious houſe."

On the 27th of November a terrible fire broke out at No. 1. in Staple's-inn, Holborn, which entirely conſumed the chambers of Mr. Ward, and thoſe belonging to three other gentlemen. It was with the greateſt difficulty that Mr. Ward, his wife, and ſeveral others ſaved their lives; but Mrs. Ward's ſiſter, (a young lady who came out of the country upon a viſit but the night before) two of Mr. Ward's children, and their nurſe, periſhed in the flames.

On the 27th of December at a court-martial appointed for that purpoſe on board his majeſty's ſhip the St. George, in Portſmouth harbour, came on the trial of admiral Byng on a charge of cowardice and neglect of duty in preventing the French fleet attacking the iſland of Minorca. And after a trial which continued till the 28th of January, the court gave it as their opinion, that admiral Byng did not do his utmoſt to engage the enemy, and that he had fallen under part of the twelfth article of war; and therefore they adjudged and ſentenced him to be ſhot to death. At the ſame time, however, they unanimouſly recommended him to mercy.

Notwithſtanding the recommendation of the court-martial to his majeſty's mercy, an order was ſent down for the execution of the ſentence on the 28th of February; but ſtrong application being made in his behalf, was reſpited a further time, in conſequence of an order from his majeſty, who was pleaſed to declare that the ſentence ſhould yet be carried into execution if it did not appear to be unjuſt. Which ſentence being afterwards declared to be clearly legal, the admiral was ſhot to death in purſuance thereof, on board the Monarque at Portſmouth, on Monday the fourteenth of March, 1757.

On the morning of his execution, orders being given for all the men of war at Spithead to ſend their boats with the captains and all officers of each ſhip, accompanied by a party of marines under arms, to attend the execution, they, in purſuance of that order rowed from Spithead, and made the harbour a little after eleven o'clock with the utmoſt difficulty and danger, it blowing a very hard gale of wind. Notwithſtanding which and the ſea ran very high, there was a prodigious number of other boats round the ſhips on the outſide of the men of war's boats, which kept off all others. Mr. Byng, accompanied by a clergyman who attended him during his confinement, and two gentlemen his relations, walked out of the great cabbin to the quarter-deck, where he ſuffered a few minutes before twelve o'clock. He was dreſſed in a light coat, white waiſtcoat and white ſtockings, and a large white wig, and had in each hand a white handkerchief. He threw his hat on the deck, kneeled on a cuſhion, tied one handkerchief over his eyes, and dropped the other as a ſignal, on which a volley from ſix marines was fired, five of whoſe bullets went through him, and he was dead in an inſtant. It was not more than two minutes from his coming out of the cabbin till he fell motionleſs on his left ſide. He died with great reſolution and compoſure, not ſhewing the leaſt ſign of timidity. Juſt before he ſuffered, he delivered a paper to the marſhal of the high court of admiralty, the contents of which were as follow:

" A few minutes will now deliver me from the " violent perſecutions, and fruſtrate the further " malice of my enemies. Nor need I envy them " a life ſubject to the ſenſations my injuries and " the injuſtice done me muſt create. Perſuaded " I am, juſtice will be done to my reputation " hereafter. The manner and cauſe of raiſing " and keeping up the popular clamour and pre- " judice againſt me, will be ſeen through, I ſhall " be conſidered, as I now perceive myſelf, a " victim deſtined to divert the indignation and " reſentment of an injured and deluded people " from the proper objects. My enemies them- " ſelves muſt now think me innocent. Happy " for me, at this my laſt moment, that I know " my own innocence, and am conſcious that no " part of my country's misfortunes can be owing " to me. I heartily wiſh the ſhedding my blood " may contribute to the happineſs and ſervice of " my country; but cannot reſign my juſt claim " to a faithful diſcharge of my duty according " to the beſt of my judgment, and the utmoſt " exertion of my ability for his majeſty's honour, " and my country's ſervice. I am ſorry that my " endeavours were not attended with more ſuc- " ceſs, and that the armament under my com- " mand proved too weak to ſucceed in an ex- " pedition of ſuch moment. Truth has pre- " vailed over calumny and falſhood; and juſtice " has wiped off the ignominious ſtain of my " ſuppoſed want of perſonal courage or diſaffec- " tion. But who can be preſumptuouſly ſure of " his own judgment? If my crime is an error in " judgment, or differing in opinion from my " judges; and if yet, the error in judgment " ſhould be on their ſide, God forgive them, as " I do; and may the diſtreſs of their minds, and " uneaſineſs of their conſciences, which injuſtice " to me they have repreſented, be relieved and " ſubſide, as my reſentment has done. The ſu- " preme judge ſees all hearts and motives; " and to him I muſt ſubmit the juſtneſs of my " cauſe. J. Byng."

On board his majeſty's ſhip Monarque, in Portſmouth Harbour, March 14th, 1757.

The inſtability of the ſtate at this time produced a change very diſagreeable to the nation. Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge, in whoſe abilities and integrity every one placed confidence, had ſcarce made their appearance upon the political ſtage, before they were diſmiſſed from their places in the miniſtry. This, however, was not any diſgrace in the eyes of the public: on the contrary there was no corporation of any conſequence but haſted to ſhew their diſlike of their diſmiſſion, and to approve of their conduct during the ſhort time they had been permitted to be at the head of the miniſtry. The city of London led the way. And at a court of common-council held the fifteenth of April, Mr. deputy Hodges roſe up, and ſpoke as follows:

" Hiſtory, the key of knowledge, and experi" ence, the touchſtone of truth, have convinced
" us, that this country owes the preſervation of " its moſt excellent conſtitution to the frequent
" jealouſies, fears and apprehenſions of the peo" ple. Whenever the face of public affairs has " borne a diſagreeable or dangerous aſpect;
" whenever the people have been injured by the " conduct of thoſe who have undertaken the di-
" rection and management of their public affairs,
" they have always by a vigorous and timely
" oppoſition, impeded the impending danger;
" and when they have been proſperous and flou-
" riſhing, when thoſe in power have done, or " attempted any material ſervice to their country,
" the people have been always equally ready to " acknowledge and reward. Inſtances of this " kind are ſo freequent in our hiſtory, that it is " needleſs to deſcend to particulars, and it would " be taking up your time unneceſſarily to enter " into a defence of this conduct: as applications
" to puniſh, when neceſſary, are intended to de-
" ter, ſo thanks and rewards do conduce to excite
" and create emulation; both abſolutely neceſ-
" ſary to ſupport the principal ends and deſign
" of government, the happineſs of ſociety; and
" in all caſes of this ſort, it has been cuſtomary
" for this corporation, as the metropolis to ſet
" the example. Not long ſince, too late to be
" forgot, this country was on the brink of ruin,
" brought ſo by the miſtakes or deſigns of thoſe
" who had undertaken the direction of national " affairs: on this melancholy occaſion this court
" did preſent an addreſs of condolence to the " king; his majeſty received them with candour,
" and, with the affection of a parent, regarded
" their complaints; a change of men ſoon fol" lowed; and with them ſuch a change of mea-
" ſures, as revived the ſinking ſpirits of the peo-
" ple, and raiſed a ſinking land. Our country,
" Britannia, almoſt expiring, raiſed her dying
" head, ſaw virtue and integrity (who had long
" deſerted her) offer their aſſiſtance in the per-
" ſons of Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge, chearfully
" accepted their friendly aid, at once forgot
" paſt misfortunes, though very great, and ſuf-
" fered them to be buried in future hopes; the " conſequence of which was, public ſpirit and
" œconomy ventured once more to appear in
" our aſſemblies; commerce put on a new gar-
" ment, foreign mercenaries retired from our " country, and the ſons of freedom began to fur-
" biſh their own arms; placemen, penſioners,
" jobbers, and agents, the corrupt ſons of bad
" adminiſtration, hung down their heads, ſnarled
" and retired into corners; and every aſpect fore-
" told better times. But ſee the uncertainty of " human events! we had no ſooner pleaſed our-
" ſelves with the ray of proſperity, but Bri-
" tannia's props are taken away, and, every one
" fears the danger of a relapſe, by having loſt
" thoſe who ſo well adminiſtered, and underſtood
" her conſtitution. The appointing and removal
" of miniſters, being the act of ſacred power
" and ſovereign authority, duty, as well as diſ-
" cretion, requires I ſhould be ſilent on that
" head; but as a ſubject of Britain, I can la-
" ment the loſs of ſuch patriots and protectors;
" as an Engliſhman, I have a right to acknowledge
" and thank. We have all that right. Wiſdom
" as well as policy dictate the exerciſe of it on the " preſent occaſion. I therefore beg leave to " move that the freedom of this city be preſented
" in golden boxes, to the right honourable Wil" liam Pitt, and the right hon. Henry Bilſon
" Legge, gentlemen who have ſo glorioufly led
" the van, in our late excellent but ſhort admi-
" niſtration. It has been cuſtomary for this court
" to give the freedom of the city to thoſe who " have eminently ſerved, and we ſhall ſurely do it
" to theſe gentlemen who have ſaved their coun" try: if we cannot appoint men, or promote " their continuance, we can and ought to ſanc-
" tify their meaſures, when ſo evidently tending
" to the good of our country. The queſtion I
" ſhall propoſe, and which I hope will meet with
" the unanimous concurrence of this court, is,
" that the freedom of this city be preſented to
" the right honourable William Pitt, late one of " his majeſty's principle ſecretaries of ſtate, and " to the right honourable Henry Bilſon Legge,
" late chancellor and under-treaſurer of his ma-
" jeſty's exchequer, in teſtimony of the grateful
" ſenſe which the citizens of London entertain
" of their loyal and diſintereſted conduct during " their truly honourable, though ſhort admini-
" ſtration: their beginning a ſcheme of public
" œconomy and at the ſame time leſſening the " extent of miniſterial influence, by a reduction
" of the number of uſeleſs placemen; their no-
" ble efforts to ſtem the general torrent of cor" ruption, and to receive, by their example, the " almoſt extinguiſhed love of virtue and our " country; their zeal to promote a ſtrict and im-
" partial enquiry into the real cauſes of our great
" loſſes and diſgrace in America and the Medi" terranean; and laſtly, their vigilant attention
" to ſupport the glory and independance of " Great-Britain, the honour and true intereſt of " the crown, and the juſt rights and liberties of " the ſubject, thereby moſt effectually ſecuring
" the affections of a free people to his majeſty
" and his illuſtrious family."

A motion was then made, that a copy of the freedom of this city, be delivered by the chamberlain to each of thoſe gentlemen, in a gold box of the value of 100 guineas, which motion being unanimouſly agreed to, the ſame were preſented ſented by Sir Thomas Harriſon, the chamberlain, on the twenty-fourth of May. And at a court of common-council held the fifteenth of June Sir Thomas acquainted the court that he had waited on the right honourable William Pitt and Henry Bilſon Legge, eſqs; agreeable to their reſolution on the fifteenth of April, and that he had received from thoſe gentlemen the following anſwers, which they have given him in writing:

The anſwer of the right hon. William Pitt.

" Give me leave, Sir, to requeſt the favour of " you, to preſent, in the moſt expreſſive terms, " to the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common- " council of the city of London, the high ſenſe " I have of the diſtinguiſhed honour they have " been pleaſed to do me, in conferring on me the " freedom of their city.

" I have ever been zealouſly devoted to the " ſupport of the liberty, trade, and proſperity of " that great and reſpectable body; and I am now " proud and happy to have ſuch cauſe to add the " ſentiments of trueſt gratitude for ſo generous " a mark of their favour; and for ſo unmerited " an approbation of my inſufficient endeavours " to carry into effect the moſt gracious intentions, " and paternal care of his majeſty, for the pre- " ſervation and happineſs of his people."

The anſwer of the right hon. Henry Bilſon Legge, eſq;

" Give me leave, Sir, to beg the favour of " you to return my ſincereſt thanks to the Lord- " mayor, aldermen and common-council, of the " city of London, for having admitted me to " the freedom of their corporation.

" So eminent a mark of diſtinction, derived " from the moſt reſpectable city in Europe, and " to which ſo few have ever received the honour " of admiſſion, cannot but fill my heart with the " higheſt ſenſe of gratitude and regard: and " though it far exceeds the bare merit of mean- " ing well, which is all I have to plead, muſt " prove a ſtrong incentive to thoſe, whom his " majeſty ſhall hereafter think fit to employ, to " extert with equal zeal, much greater abilities " in the ſervice of their country.

" I hope every part of my future conduct, " conſiſtently with that which I have hitherto " endeavoured to hold, will ſhew my firm attach- " ment to the rights and privileges of my fellow- " ſubjects, as well as to his majeſty and his illuſ- " trious family, upon whoſe eſtabliſhment the " maintainance of thoſe rights and privileges does " ſo effectually depend."

On the thirteenth of July a violent ſtorm of rain happened at London, which ſo ſuddenly filled the ſhores, that five men employed in cleaning the main ſhore at Fleet-ditch, were forced down by the ruſh of water, one of whom periſhed notwithſtanding the utmoſt endeavours to ſave him.

On the the 28th of September William Nelſon, eſq; aldermen of Alderſgate-ward, and Francis Goſling eſq; alderman of Farringdon without, were ſworn ſheriffs of the city of London. And the next day came on at Guildhall the election of Lord-mayor for the year enſuing, when Sir Charles Aſgil, knt. alderman of Candlewick-ward, being the alderman next the chair, was choſen without oppoſition.

On the ſeventh of October, about ten o'clock in the morning, an uncommon darkneſs was obſerved in London and its neighbourhood, which occaſioned terrible apprehenſions in many weak people, who conſidered it as the effect of a comet which at that time appeared every evening, and which had been predicted to produce fatal conſequences.

On the 12th of February 1758, a petition of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled, was preſented to the houſe by the ſheriffs of London; in which petition they alledged, that the office of bailiff and conſervator of the river Thames, and waters of Medway, had been, time out of mind, veſted in the mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the ſaid city, to be exerciſed by the mayor or his ſufficient deputies; and reciting the proviſions of an act, paſſed in the ninth of queen Ann, for the better preſervation and improvement of the fiſhery within the river of Thames, and for regulating and governing the company of fiſhermen of the ſaid river; and alledging, that the ſaid company had ceaſed to act ever ſince the year 1727 and that the body of fiſhermen were then under no government or regulation; in conſequence whereof frequent abuſes were committed, to the prejudice of the fiſhery within the ſaid river, which abuſes could not be prevented or redreſſed without the aid of parliament; and therefore praying, that leave might be given to bring in a bill for the more effectual preſervation and improvement of the fry and ſpawn of fiſh in the ſaid river of Thames and waters of Medway, and for the better regulating the fiſhery thereof, and more ſpeedy puniſhing of offenders, in ſuch manner as to the houſe ſhould ſeem meet.

In conſequence of this petition a bill was ſoon after brought in and paſſed; the purport of which was, " that the court of Lord-mayor and alder- " men of London ſhall have full power, and they " are thereby required, on or before September " 29, 1757, to make, and ſet down in writing " ſuch reaſonable rules and ordinances for the go- " vernment and regulating all perſons who ſhall " fiſh or drudge in the river of Thames, and " waters of Medway, (within the juriſdiction of " the mayor of London, as conſervator of the " ſaid river and waters) as common fiſhermen or " drudgermen, or otherwiſe; and for declaring " in what manner they ſhall demean themſelves " in fiſhing, and with what manner of nets " and engines, and at what times and ſeaſons " they ſhall uſe fiſhing; and for aſcertaining the " aſſize of the ſeveral fiſh to be taken; and for " the preſervation of the ſpawn and fry of fiſh " within the juriſdiction aforeſaid; and for oblig- " ing every common fiſherman or drudgerman, " or other ſuch perſon who ſhall fiſh with a boat, " &c. to have his chriſtian name and ſurname, " and the name of the place in which he dwelleth, " painted in large and legible characters, in ſome " convenient place of his boat, &c. where any one

" one may ſee and read the ſame; and for pre-
" venting the ſame from being changed or de-
" faced; and to annex reaſonable penalties and
" forfeitures for the breach of ſuch rules, not " exceeding five pounds for any one offence;
" and from time to time to alter and amend ſuch
" rules, &c. and make new ones touching the " matters aforeſaid; ſo as the ſame be allowed
" and approved of by the lord-chancellor, lord-
" keeper, or commiſſioners of the great ſeal, the " two lord chief juſtices, and the lord chief ba" ron, or any two of them, &c. which rules and
" ordinances are required to be printed and
" made public within thirty days after being " allowed."

On the eleventh of April between the hours of ten and eleven at night, the temporary wooden bridge, built for the convenience of carriages and paſſengers, whilſt London-bridge was widening and repairing, was entirely conſumed by fire.—See page 33.

On the ſeventeenth of July Sir John Barnard, knt. father of the city, and alderman of Bridge ward without, deſired the court of aldermen would permit him to reſign his gown, on account of his age and bad ſtate of health; to which, after much reluctance, and many importunities uſed by the aldermen preſent to the contrary, the court conſented. And on the twenty-fifth it was unanimouſly reſolved by the common-council, (who had many years before erected his ſtatue under the piazza within the Royal Exchange, in gratitude for the many ſervices he had done this city) " That Sir John Barnard, knt. ſo juſtly and " emphatically ſtiled the father of this city, hav" ing lately (to the great and laſting regret of " this court) thought proper to reſign the office
" of alderman, the thanks of this court be given " him for having ſo long and ſo faithfully de" voted himſelf to the ſervice of his fellow-citi" zens, for the honour and influence which this " city has, upon many occaſions, derived from
" the dignity of his character, and the wiſdom,
" ſteadineſs, and integrity of his conduct: for " his firm adherence to the conſtitution both in " church and ſtate, his noble ſtruggles for liberty,
" and his diſintereſted and invariable purſuit of " the true glory and proſperity of his king and " country, uninfluenced by power, unawed by " clamour, and unbiaſſed by the prejudice of
" party."

Sir Robert Ladbroke, at the ſaid court, declared his aſſent to take upon him the office of father of the city, and the aldermanſhip of Bridge ward without. And a motion was made by the ſaid gentleman, that the thanks of the court of aldermen ſhould be given to Sir John Barnard; and the ſame, being agreed to, was expreſſed in the following terms:

" It is unanimouſly agreed and ordered, that
" the thanks of this court be given to Sir John
" Barnard, knt. late one of the aldermen, and " father of the city, for his conſtant attendance
" and ſalutary counſels in this court, his wiſe,
" vigilant, and impartial adminiſtration of juſtice,
" his unwearied zeal for the honour, ſafety and
" proſperity of his fellow-citizens, his inviolable
" attachment to the laws and liberties of his " country, and for the noble example he has ſet
" of a long and uninterrupted courſe of virtue
" in private as well public life."

Both theſe acknowledgments were afterwards tranſmitted to Sir John by the town-clerk.

On the twenty-ſixth of Auguſt the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London waited on his majeſty at Kenſington, when Sir William Moreton, the recorder, pronounced their addreſs to his majeſty on the conqueſt of Louiſbourg and the reduction of the iſlands of Cape Breton and St. John, in the following manner:

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" Amidſt the joyful acclamations of your faith-
" ful people, permit us, your majeſty's moſt duti-
" ful and loyal ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, alder-
" men, and commons, of the city of London, in
" common-council aſſembled, humbly to congra" tulate your majeſty on the ſucceſs of your " arms, in the conqueſt of the important for-
" treſs of Louiſbourg, the reduction of the " iſlands of Cape-Breton and St. John, and the " blow there given to a conſiderable part of the " French navy.

" An event ſo truly glorious to your majeſty,
" important to the colonies, trade, and naviga-
" tion of Great-Britain, and ſo fatal to the com" mercial views and naval power of France, af-
" fords a reaſonable proſpect of the recovery of " all our rights and poſſeſſions in America, ſo
" unjuſtly invaded; and in a great meaſure an-
" ſwers the hopes we had formed when we beheld
" the French power weakened on the coaſt of " Africa, their ſhips deſtroyed in their ports at " home, and the terror thereby ſpread over all
" their coaſts.

" May theſe valuable acquiſitions, ſo gloriouſly
" obtained, ever continue a part of the Britiſh
" empire, as an effectual check to the perfidy
" and ambition of a nation whoſe repeated inſults
" and uſurpations obliged your majeſty to enter " into this juſt and neceſſary war: and may theſe
" inſtances of the wiſdom of your majeſty's
" councils, of the conduct and reſolution of " your commanders, and of the intrepidity of " your fleets and armies, convince the world of " the innate ſtrength and reſources of your king-
" doms, and diſpoſe your majeſty's enemies to " yield to a ſafe and honourable peace.

" In all events we ſhall moſt chearfully con" tribute, to the utmoſt of our power, towards
" ſupporting your majeſty in the vigorous pro-
" ſecution of meaſures ſo nobly deſigned, and ſo
" wiſely directed. And it ſhall be our moſt fer-
" vent prayer, that your majeſty may long, very " long, enjoy the fruits of your auſpicious go-
" vernment, in returns of loyalty and affection
" from a grateful people; and that the crown of " theſe realms may flouriſh, with equal luſtre, on
" the heads of your auguſt deſcendants to lateſt
" poſterity."

View of the TEMPORARY BRIDGE of London
on Fire in the Night of April 11th. 1758.

To which addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to return this moſt gracious anſwer:

" I receive this moſt dutiful and loyal addreſs " as a freſh mark of your conſtant affection to " me and my government; and I return you my " hearty thanks for it. The ſteady affections of " my people, united in a hearty zeal for the " honour of my crown, will, I doubt not, ena- " ble me to carry on, with vigour and ſucceſs, " a war which was neceſſarily undertaken, to de- " fend the religion, liberties, and valuable poſ- " ſeſſions of my kingdoms againſt the unjuſt at- " tempts of my enemies. The city of London " may always depend upon my protection and fa- " vour, and upon my conſtant care for the extent " of their trade and navigation."

On the twenty-eighth the colours taken at Louiſbourg were preſented to his majeſty at Kenſington, who was graciouſly pleaſed to order the ſame to be depoſited in the cathedral church of St. Paul. Accordingly on the ſixth of September, proper detachments of horſe and foot grenadiers were ordered to parade at Kenſington at ten o'clock in the morning for that purpoſe. The form of the cavalcade was as follows:

A ſerjeant and twelve horſe-grenadiers.
A field officer and officers in proportion.
A detachment of eighty horſe-grenadier guards.
Eighty of the life-guards, with officers in proportion, with their ſtandard, kettle-drums and trumpets.
A ſerjeant and twelve grenadiers of the foot-guards.
Eleven ſerjeants of the foot-guards carrying the eleven French colours.
And the march was cloſed by the four companies of grenadiers of the foot-guards.

In this manner they proceeded from Kenſington through Hyde-park, and through the Stable-yard, St. James's, into Pall-mall, and ſo on to the weſt gate of St. Pauls, where the colours were received by the dean and chapter, attended by the choir; about which time the guns of the Tower, and in St. James's Park were fired.

Theſe colours were put up near the weſt-door of the cathedral, as a laſting memorial of the ſucceſs of his majeſty's arms, in the reduction of the important fortreſs of Louiſbourg, and the iſlands of Cape Breton and St. John. The greateſt rejoicings were made on the above occaſion within the cities of London and Weſtminſter.

On the ſixteenth of September the cannon and mortars taken at Cherbourg paſſed by his majeſty at Kenſington, from whence they proceeded, and came through the city in grand proceſſion, guarded by a company of matroſſes, with drums beating and fifes playing all the way to the Tower, where they arrived about four o'clock in the afternoon. There were twenty-three carriages, drawn by 229 horſes, with a poſtillion and driver to each carriage, in the following manner: the firſt drawn by fifteen grey horſes, with the Engliſh colours and the French underneath; ſeven ditto drawn by thirteen horſes each; nine ditto by nine horſes each; three ditto by ſeven horſes each; one ditto by five horſes; then two mortars by nine horſes each. Theſe pieces were finely ornamented with the arms of France, and other hieroglyphics, ſuch as trophies, &c. finiſhed in a maſterly manner.

At a court of common-council held the 12th of December, the apothecaries were permitted to employ foreigners as journeymen to the end of the war, and for twelve months after.

On the eighth of January 1759, his royal highneſs George prince of Wales being arrived at the age of twenty-one years, the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, waited on his majeſty with the following moſt dutiful addreſs on the occaſion:

" May it pleaſe your majeſty,

" We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal " ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com- " mons of the city of London, in common- " council aſſembled, humbly beg leave to con- " gratulate your majeſty on the ſatisfaction of " ſeeing your royal grandſon, the prince of " Wales, that great object of your majeſty's pa- " ternal care and ſollicitude, arrived at his age of " twenty-one years, mature in all the accompliſh- " ments that can add luſtre to his high dignity, or " command the love and veneration of mankind.

" Long may his royal highneſs enjoy the bene- " fit of your majeſty's ſalutary precepts and ex- " ample, and continue to make your majeſty the " ampleſt returns of filial duty and reſpect. May " his royal highneſs live to emulate the virtues " that have endeared your majeſty's ſacred perſon " and government to a free people; and may " there never be wanting one of your majeſty's " illuſtrious race to perpetuate the bleſſings we " derive from your auſpicious reign.

" Permit us, moſt gracious ſovereign, to em- " brace this opportunity of aſſuring your majeſty, " that no hoſtile threats can intimidate people " animated by the love of liberty, and inſpired " with a ſenſe of duty and affection to your " majeſty; who, confiding in the divine pro- " vidence, and the experienced wiſdom and " vigour of your majeſty's councils, are reſolved " to employ their utmoſt efforts towards enabling " your majeſty to repel the inſults, and defeat " the attempts of the ancient enemies of your " majeſty's crown and kingdom."

To which addreſs his majeſty was graciouſly pleaſed to return the following anſwer:

" The cordial expreſſions of your conſtant at- " tachment to my perſon and family are very " agreeable to me; and I return you my hearty " thanks for this freſh mark of your zeal and af- " fection.

" I have the firmeſt confidence in the fidelity " and ſpirit of my people; and I truſt I ſhall be " well enabled, under the divine providence, to " defeat and fruſtrate the moſt daring attempts " of the ancient enemy of my crown."

The next day they complimented his royal highneſs, and his auguſt mother on the ſame joyful occaſion.

At a court of common-council held the nineteenth of July, the committee appointed to carry the act of parliament into execution for building a bridge croſs the river Thames from Black friars, delivered to the court a repreſentation in writing, under the hands of ſix aldermen and twenty commoners; the ſubſtance of which was as follows:

1. That it is the opinion of this committee, that the intended bridge ſhould be of ſtone.

2. That from the evidence given to parliament, upon the application for an act to build the ſaid bridge, it is the opinion of this committee, that an elegant, ſubſtantial and convenient ſtone bridge may be erected for a ſum not exceeding 120,000l.

3. That, from eſtimates laid before us, it is the opinion of this committee that proper avenues to the ſaid bridge may be purchaſed and compleated for a ſum not exceeding 24,000l.

4. That it is the opinion of this committee, that a ſum not exceeding 144,000l. ſhould be forthwith contracted for, and raiſed within the ſpace of eight years, by ſuch inſtallments as this committee ſhall think proper in each year, not exceeding thirty thouſand pounds in any one year: the money ſo to be contracted for to be paid into the chamber of London.

5. That it is the opinion of this committee, that the perſons contracting to advance the ſaid money ſhould be intitled to an intereſt of four pounds per cent. per annum, by way of annuities, to be computed from the time of the firſt payment in each year, upon the whole ſum by them reſpectively advanced within the year; but ſhould incur ſuch forfeiture as this committee ſhall ſee fit, in caſe of neglect to make good any of the ſtipulated payments: the ſaid annuities to be paid half-yearly by the chamberlain, but to be redeemable at the expiration of the firſt ten years, upon ſix months notice, and payment of the money advanced.

6. That it is the opinion of this committee, that the chamberlain ſhould be authorized and directed to affix this city's ſeal to ſuch inſtruments as the committee ſhall think fit to give, purſuant to the ſaid act, for ſecuring the payment of the ſaid annuities, redeemable as aforeſaid, and which ſhall be tranſacted and paid for in manner beforementioned.

7. That it is the opinion of this committee, that the chamberlain ſhould be authorized and directed to pay and apply the monies ſo to be paid in, for the purpoſes of the ſaid act, in ſuch a manner as this committee ſhall, from time to time, think fit and order.

8. That it is the opinion of this committee, that the chamberlain ſhould be authorized and directed to lay out and apply the ſheriff's fines, appropriated by order of the court of common-council, for the purpoſes of the ſaid act, either in the public funds, in order to carry intereſt, or to payment of the ſaid annuities or otherwiſe, as this committee ſhall, from time to time think fit and order. And it was ordered, that the court of common council be moved purſuant to the five laſt reſolutions.

In conſequence of which, at another court appointed for that purpoſe, the ſaid affairs of the new bridge were conſidered and ſtrongly debated. They divided three different times; and there being, on each diviſion, a majority of forty, and upwards, they were agreed to.

CHAPTER XLVI.

Subſcription opened at Guildhall for the ſupply of landmen. Death of princeſs Caroline. Rejoicings on the taking of Quebec. City addreſs on the occaſion. Great fire in Sweeting's-alley. Another in Covent-garden. Improvements in the city of London by act of parliament. Remarkable high wind. Earl Ferrers tried before the houſe of lords at Weſtminſter-hall, for the murder of his ſteward. His execution. Firſt pile drove for the new bridge at Black-friars. City addreſs on the conqueſt of Canada. Death of king George II. Acceſſion of king George III. City right to tolls in markets. Election of members for the city of London. Freedom preſented to Arthur Onſlow, eſq; and the duke of York. Addreſs to his majeſty on the conqueſt of Belliſle.

THE power of the enemy in Germany being very ſtrong, and continual recruits wanted to ſupply the great draughts of men neceſſary to be made from England to defeat their deſigns, the Lord-mayor called a common-council, and acquainted them, that he had ſummoned that court to deliberate on a propoſition of great conſequence to the ſervice of their king and country, and hoped that the reſult would be ſuch as ſhould do honour to the city, by proving the ſincerity of their profeſſions to his majeſty. Whereupon the court, among other conſiderations, reſolved and ordered, that voluntary ſubſcriptions ſhould be received in the chamber of London, to be appropriated as bounty-money to ſuch perſons as ſhould enter into his majeſty's ſervice, and that the city ſubſcribe 1000l. for that purpoſe; and a committee of twelve aldermen and twenty-four four commoners was appointed to attend at Guildhall, to diſpoſe of the ſaid bounty-money to perſons applying for the ſame; and that one alderman and two commoners be a quorum to tranſact buſineſs: and, as a further encouragement, every perſon, ſo entering, ſhall be entitled to the freedom of this city at the expiration of three years, or ſooner, if the war ſhould end: and the town clerk was ordered by the court to wait upon the right honourable Mr. Pitt with the ſaid reſolutions, and deſire him to inform his majeſty of the ſame. Some of the committee were ordered to wait upon lord Ligonier, to deſire him to ſend proper officers to Guildhall to receive ſuch perſons as ſhould be enliſted.

Agreeable to the above order the town clerk waited on Mr. Pitt, who the next day ſent the following letter.

To the right honourable the Lord-mayor of the city of London.

" My lord, Whitehall Aug. 15 1759,

" Having, in conſequence of the deſire of the " court of common-council, had the honour to " lay before the king their reſolutions of yeſter- " day, for offering certain bounties and encou- " ragements to ſuch able bodied men as ſhall en- " liſt themſelves at the Guildhall of London, to " ſerve in his majeſty's land forces, upon the " terms contained in his majeſty's order in coun- " cil; I am commanded by the king to acquaint " your lordſhip, (of which you will be pleaſed to " make the proper communication) that his ma- " jeſty thanks the city of London for this freſh " teſtimony of their zeal and affection for his " royal perſon and government. I am farther " commanded by the king to expreſs his majeſty's " moſt entire ſatisfaction in this ſignal proof of " the unſhaken reſolution of the city of London " to ſupport a juſt and neceſſary war, undertaken " in defence of the rights and honour of his " crown, and for the ſecurity of the colonies, " the trade and navigation of Great-Britain."

" I am, with great truth and reſpect,
" My Lord,
" Your lordſhip's moſt obedient humble ſervant,
" W. PITT."

A ſubſcription was immediately opened at Guildhall which met with ſuch univerſal encouragement, that they were ſoon enabled to carry this laudable ſcheme into execution: for, by giving five guineas to each perſon who ſhould voluntarily offer himſelf for his majeſty's ſervice, and a promiſe that he ſhould be admitted a freeman of London without fee or reward, upon producing a teſtimonial of his good behaviour from a general officer, great numbers immediately offered and enliſted.

The city of Weſtminſter ſoon after adopted the ſame ſcheme; when, on the nineteenth of September, a great number of the nobility, &c. met at the St. Alban's tavern, ſubſcribed 4726l. immediately, and appointed a committee to carry the ſaid ſubſcription, to pay bounties to perſons who ſhould enliſt into the land ſervice, into effectual execution. By an account afterwards publiſhed, it appeared that the Guildhall ſubſcription mounted to 7039l. 7s. with which money were enliſted 1235 men for his majeſty's land-ſervice.

On the fourth of September died her royal highneſs princeſs Elizabeth Caroline, ſecond daughter to the late prince of Wales; and on the fourteenth her royal highneſſes's obſequies were interred with the uſual ſolemnities in the royal vault in king Henry the VIIth's chapel at Weſtminſter.

On the twenty-eighth, George Errington and Paul Vaillant, eſqrs. were ſworn in at Guildhall ſheriffs of London and Middleſex for the year enſuing. And the next day Sir Thomas Chitty, knt. alderman of Tower-ward, was elected Lord-mayor of London.

Among the various conqueſts obtained over the French, this year records the taking of Quebec: on the receipt of which news the Park and Tower guns were fired, flags every where diſplayed from the ſteeples of churches, and the greateſt illuminations made throughout the city and ſuburbs, that were ever known. And on the twentieth of October, the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, waited on his majeſty with the following congratulatory addreſs on the occaſion:

" May it pleaſe your majeſty,

" To accept the moſt humble but warmeſt " congratulations of your majeſty's dutiful and " loyal ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and " commons, of the city of London, in common- " council aſſembled, upon the rapid and unin- " terrupted ſeries of victories and ſucceſſes, " which, under the divine bleſſing, have attended " your majeſty's arms by ſea and land, within " the compaſs of this diſtinguiſhed and ever me- " morable year.

" The reduction of Fort du Queſne on the " Ohio; of the iſland of Goree in Africa; and " of Guadaloupe, with its dependencies, in the " Weſt-Indies; the repulſe and defeat of the " whole French army, by a handful of infantry, " in the plains of Minden; the taking of Nia- " gara, Ticonderoga, and Crown-Point; the na- " val victory off cape Lagos; the advantages " gained over the French nation in the Eaſt-In- " dies; and, above all, the conqueſt of Quebec, " (the capital of the French empire in North- " America) in a manner ſo glorious to your ma- " jeſty's arms, againſt every advantage of ſitua- " tion and ſuperior numbers; are ſuch events as " will for ever render your majeſty's auſpicious " reign the favourite æra in the hiſtory of Great- " Britain.

" But, whilſt we reflect with ſurprize and gra- " titude upon this laſt and moſt important con- " queſt, permit us, gracious ſovereign, to expreſs " our great regard for the immenſe (though al- " moſt only) loſs which has attended it, in the " death of that gallant general James Wolfe, " whoſe abilities formed, whoſe courage attempt- " ed, and whoſe conduct happily effected, the " glorious

" glorious enterprize in which he fell, leaving to " future times an heroic example of military ſkill, " diſcipline, and fortitude.

" Meaſures of ſuch national concern, ſo inva- " riably purſued, and acquiſitions of ſo much " conſequence to the power and trade of Great- " Britain, are the nobleſt proofs of your majeſty's " paternal affection and regard for the true in- " tereſt of your kingdoms, and reflect honour " upon thoſe whom your majeſty has been pleaſed " to admit into your council, or to intruſt with " the conduct of your fleets and armies.

" Theſe will ever command the lives and for- " tunes of a free and grateful people, in defence " of your majeſty's ſacred perſon and royal fami- " ly, againſt the attempts of all your enemies. " And we humbly truſt that almighty God will " bleſs your majeſty's ſalutary intentions with a " continuance of ſucceſs, and thereby, in time, " lead to a ſafe and honourable peace."

To which addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following moſt gracious anſwer.

" I receive, with particular ſatisfaction, this " moſt dutiful and loyal addreſs, as an additional " mark of your affection to my perſon, and of " your ſignal zeal for the honour of my govern- " ment in this juſt and neceſſary war. Our ſuc- " ceſſes are, under the bleſſing of God, the na- " tural and happy fruit of union amongſt my " people, and of ability and valour in my fleets " and armies. I have an entire confidence in this " truly national ſpirit; and the city of London " may depend on my tender care for the rights, " trade, colonies, and navigation of my faithful " ſubjects."

On the tenth of November, about five o'clock in the morning, a dreadful fire broke out at Hamlin's coffee-houſe in Sweeting's-alley, near the Royal Exchange, which conſumed that and another coffee-houſe adjoining. The flames ſpread themſelves with ſuch rapidity into Cornhill, that thirteen capital houſes were entirely deſtroyed, and ſeveral others very conſiderably damaged. And on the twenty-third of December, about four in the morning, another fire broke out at a cabinet-maker's in King-ſtreet, Covent-garden, which entirely conſumed that houſe, and two others in front. A large workſhop backwards took fire, and the flames ſoon reached ſeveral houſes in Hart-ſtreet, which were burnt down; as were likewiſe all the houſes on the right hand ſide of the way in Roſe-ſtreet, through to Long Acre. About fifty houſes were entirely conſumed, beſides many others greatly damaged. One fireman and a brewer's ſervant loſt their lives by the fall of a houſe, and ſeveral others had their legs and arms broke. The damage was computed at more than ſeventy thouſand pounds.

The building of the new bridge being finally determined, and all preparations made for its execution, the more diſcerning part of the city foreſaw, that unleſs proper meaſures ſhould be taken to make the city of London more airy and commodious for trade before the bridge ſhould be finiſhed, the genteel part of its inhabitants might be invited into the new buildings on the Surry ſide; by which the eſtates in the city would be greatly prejudiced. To prevent this, and for the farther emolument of the city, the common-council, on the twenty-ſecond of January 1760, reſolved that an application ſhould be made to parliament for a bill to empower the city to make ſuch alterations in regard to the avenues leading into it, as ſhould be thought neceſſary, and might tend to its advantage. Accordingly a petition was preſented on the twenty-fourth, praying that leave might be given to bring in a bill to widen and enlarge ſeveral old ſtreets, lanes, &c. and to open ſeveral new ſtreets and ways, and for determining, in a ſummary way, all diſputes ariſing about the rebuilding of houſes, in which ſeveral perſons had an intermixed property. In conſequence of this petition an act of parliament was ſoon after paſſed, by which the citizens were empowered to make the following openings, improvements and enlargements in the reſpective wards of the city of London.

Openings.

In Alderſgate-ward. A paſſage 20 feet wide, from the eaſt ſide of Alderſgate-ſtreet (oppoſite to Little-britain) to the weſt of Noble-ſtreet, oppoſite to Oat-lane; and from thence through Wood-ſtreet, oppoſite to Love-lane.

Aldgate-ward. A paſſage 50 feet wide, from the maſon's ſhop, facing Crutched-friars, in a direct line to the Minories. A paſſage, 25 feet wide, through Northumberland-alley, into Crutched-friars.

Biſhopſgate ward. A paſſage, 25 feet wide, through Angel-court, in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, into Little St. Helen's. A paſſage, 20 feet wide, from Broad-ſtreet, through Union-court into Biſhopſgate-ſtreet.

Coleman-ſtreet-ward. A paſſage, 50 feet wide, from Token-houſe-yard to London-wall.

Farringdon-ward without. A paſſage, 30 feet wide, in the middle part of Snow-hill, to Fleet-market. A paſſage, 25 feet wide, from Butcher-hall-lane into Little-britain.

Farringdon-ward within. A paſſage through Cock-alley on the ſouth-ſide of Ludgate-hill, and oppoſite to the Old-bailey, 40 feet wide, into Black-friars.

Improvements and enlargements.

In Aldgate-ward. The houſes on the eaſt-ſide of Billiter-lane to be pulled down, to enlarge the paſſage to thirty feet. The houſes at the eaſt-end of Leadenhall-ſtreet to be pulled down, to make the paſſage there 35 feet-wide. Part of the houſes on the eaſt-ſide of Poor-jury-lane, beginning with a houſe on the north-ſide of the Horſe and Trumpet, and extending ſouthward to Gould-ſquare, to range in a line with that end of the lane next to Aldgate; the paſſage of which is to be made 35 feet wide, by letting back all the houſes from the gate to the Horſe and Trumpet.

Broad-ſtreet-ward. The houſe at the weſt end of the buildings between Cornhill and Threadneedle-ſtreet, oppoſite to the ſouth end of Princes-

Princes-ſtreet, to be pulled down, and the ground laid into the ſtreet. The houſes to be pulled down on the ſouth ſide of Threadneedle-ſtreet, extending from the houſe before-mentioned eaſtward to that part of the ſtreet which is oppoſite to the bank gates; and the paſſage there enlarged to 35 feet in width.

Coleman-ſtreet-ward. One houſe on the north eaſt corner of the Old-Jury, and another houſe at the ſouth weſt corner of Coleman-ſtreet, to be pulled down, and the ground laid into the ſtreet.

Cordwainer's ward. The houſe at the north eaſt corner of Trinity-lane, near the Dog-tavern, to be pulled down, and laid into the ſtreet.

Cornhill-ward. The houſe at the weſt end of the buildings, between Cornhill and Lombard-ſtreet, to be taken down, and the ground laid into the ſteet.

Cripplegate-ward within. The houſes which project forward at the weſt end of Silver ſtreet, from the end of Monkwell-ſtreet, quite through into Alderſgate-ſtreet, to be pulled down, to make a ſtreet forty feet wide. The houſe at the corner of Aldermanbury, formerly the Baptiſt-head tavern, facing Milk-ſtreet, to be taken down, and the ground laid into the ſtreet.

Farringdon-ward within. The tin ſhop and the trunk-makers, at the ſouth weſt corner of Cheapſide, leading into St. Paul's-church-yard, to be pulled down and the ground laid into the ſtreet, Such part of the houſes in Creed lane, to be taken down as are neceſſary to widen the paſſage to thirty feet.

Farringdon-ward without. All the houſes in the middle row between the paved-alley adjoining to St. Sepulchre's-church, and Gilt-ſpur-ſtreet, from the north end quite through to the ſouth end, facing Hart-ſtreet, to be taken down, and the ground laid into the ſtreet. All the houſes in the middle row between the Great and Little Old-bailey, from the north end facing Hart-ſtreet, to the Baptiſt-head at the ſouth end; as likewiſe the ſhops or ſheds under St. Dunſtan's-church, in Fleet-ſtreet, to be pulled down, and the ground laid into the ſtreet.

Langbourn-ward. Such part of the houſes at the end of Mark-lane, next to Fenchurch-ſtreet, and ſuch part of thoſe at the eaſt end of Lombard-ſtreet, to be pulled down, as will make the paſſage in each place 30 feet wide.

Portſoken-ward. The houſe at the north eaſt corner of Houndſditch, adjoining to the church-yard, to be pulled down, and the ground laid into the ſtreet.

Tower-ward, Such part of the houſes on St. Dunſtan's-hill, adjoining to the George alehouſe, and oppoſite to the chain, and ſuch part of the warehouſes oppoſite to the end of St. Dunſtan's church, to be pulled down as will make the paſſage 30 feet wide.

The houſe on the north weſt corner of Great Tower-ſtreet, and alſo the houſe on the ſouth eaſt corner of Little Tower-ſtreet, to be pulled down to make a convenient paſſage. The houſe in Mark-lane which adjoins to Allhallows-ſtaining, and projects 12 feet before the other houſes, to be pulled down, to make it range in a line with the other houſes, and enlarge the paſſage.

Vintry-ward. The houſes on the north ſide of Thames-ſtreet, which reach from Elbow-lane to College-hill, and alſo thoſe on the ſouth ſide of the ſaid ſtreet, which reach from Vintners-hall to Bull-wharf-lane, to be pulled down, in order to make the ſtreet 40 feet wide. The houſe at the corner of Tower-Royal, facing College-hill, to be pulled down, and the ground laid into the ſtreet.

Walbrook-ward. The houſe at the north eaſt corner of Buckleſbury, which projects before the other buildings, to be pulled down.

Biſhopſgate-ward. The two houſes between New Broad-ſtreet, and New Broad ſtreet buildings, which project ſo far into the ſtreet, to be pulled down.

On the fifteenth of February a moſt terrible hurricane aroſe, which did incredible damage both at land and on the river, but more particularly the latter. A ſtack of chimnies fell on a houſe in Groſvenor-ſquare, and demoliſhed the bed and furniture of two rooms. A houſe in Hanover-ſtreet had the gable end blown off: and one of the pinnacles of a houſe adjoining to the houſe of commons was blown down, and broke through the roof of the room over the ſpeaker's chamber. On the roof of the admiralty upwards of twenty-ſeven feet of the lead was rolled up by the force of the wind like a ſcroll. The mall in St. James's Park was covered with branches of trees; and a great number of chimnies, fences, &c. were blown down in Weſtminſter, by which many people loſt their lives.

On the ſixteenth of April came on before the houſe of lords at Weſtminſter-hall, the trial of Laurence earl Ferrers, for the murder of Mr. Johnſon, * his ſteward, by ſhooting him with a piſtol, the balls from which entered one ſide of his

* This murder was committed at his lordſhip's ſeat in Leiceſterſhire. Mr. Johnſon lived about nine hours after he was ſhot; in which time he gave the following account: That his lordſhip had ſent all the ſervants out of the way but one, when he called him up to deliver in his accounts; that when he entered the room, he obſerved that his lordſhip turned the key upon him, and, when he preſented his papers, he expreſſed ſome diſcontent, and bid him fall upon his knees. Mr. Johnſon expoſtulated with him, deſiring to know in what he had offended; that he doubted not, upon examination, he would find his accounts exact, and, as they had always been, to his ſatifaction; he beſeeched his lordſhip to give him leave to explain them. His anſwer was, that he did not doubt his accounts, but he had been a tyrant, and he was determined to puniſh him, and inſiſted on his falling on his knees to make his peace with his God, for he never ſhould riſe again till he roſe at the reſurrection. Mr. Johnſon then fell upon one knee, and beſought him to conſider his age and his ſervices; that he had been thirty years a faithful ſervant in the family, and that he could never be charged with wrong to any man. His lordſhip made anſwer, that he muſt either be a rogue to him, or to others, and, pulling a piſtol out of his pocket, and cocking it, bid him inſtantly fall on both knees, and pray to God, for now was the laſt moment he had to live. He then obeyed, and his lordſhip diſcharged the piſtol full at his body. He dropped, and his lordſhip raiſing him up, aſked, "how he "felt himſelf now;" to which he replied, "like a man "who has but a few moments to live." Then ſaid he, make good uſe of your time; and, taking him in his arms, placed his belly, and came out at the other. Lord keeper Henley was appointed lord high ſteward of England on this occaſion. The priſoner, in his own coach, attended by the major of the Tower (where he was confined) and ſome other gentlemen, and guarded by a party of the foot-guards and warders of the Tower, arrived about eleven o'clock at Weſtminſter-hall, and was immediately followed by the lord high ſteward in his ſtate coach, drawn by ſix horſes, and followed by the twelve judges and maſters in chancery. All the crown evidence, and part of his lordſhip's, were that day examined; and the next day the evidence being cloſed, earl Ferrers was unanimouſly found guilty of felony and murder. In conſequence of which, the day following, being the eighteenth,† the lord high ſteward pronounced ſentence on the earl as follows: "That his lordſhip be carried back to the priſon of the Tower from whence he came, and from thence to the place of execution, on Monday next, and there be hanged by the neck till he was dead; after which his body was to be delivered to Surgeons-hall to be diſſected and anatomized." At this part of the ſentence his lordſhip cried out, "God forbid!" but ſoon recollecting himſelf, added, "God's will be done!" Afterwards the lord high ſteward took notice that by the act of parliament, the lords, his judges, had a power of reſpiting, and therefore, that he might have more time to prepare himſelf, they poſtponed his ſentence to the fifth of May. On the ſecond of which the ſheriffs received a writ for the execution of this unhappy nobleman, under the great ſeal of Great Britain, and a writ was alſo ſent to the lieutenant of the Tower, for the delivery of his lordſhip's body to the ſaid ſheriffs.

On the morning of his execution, about nine o'clock, the ſheriffs, attended by their under ſheriffs, &c. went to the outward gate of the Tower, of which earl Ferrers being informed, ſent to deſire of them the permiſſion of going in his own landau, inſtead of a mourning coach provided by his friends. The ſheriffs having given a receipt for his body, the ſolemn proceſſion moved on thus:

A large body of conſtables.
A party of horſe-grenadiers and another of foot.
Mr. ſheriff Errington, with his deputy, in his chariot.
His lordſhip in his landau, accompanied by Mr. ſheriff Vaillant, and the reverend Mr. Humphreys, chaplain of the Tower, eſcorted by two other parties of horſe-grenadiers and foot.
Mr. ſheriff Vaillant's chariot, with his under ſheriff.
A mourning coach and ſix, with ſome of his lordſhip's friends.
A hearſe and ſix, provided to carry his lordſhip's body from the place of execution to Surgeons-hall.

The proceſſion was ſlow and ſolemn, taking up two hours and three quarters, through an innumerable concourſe of ſpectators, who behaved with the utmoſt decency, and were, in general, impreſſed with an awful melancholy ſilence. His lordſhip behaved with eaſe and compoſure during the whole time of his paſſage from the Tower to Tyburn. He told Mr. ſheriff Vaillant, as they ſat in the landau, that his dreſs (light cloaths embroidered with ſilver) might ſeem odd; but that he had his reaſons for wearing them that day; which, however, he did not mention. After taking notice of the innumerable multitude that crowded round him every foot of the way, he added, that he ſuppoſed they came to ſee a lord hanged. He had applied in vain to the king, by letter, that he might ſuffer in the Tower, where Eſſex, queen Elizabeth's favourite, was beheaded: he made this application with the more confidence, as he had the honour, he ſaid, to quarter part of his majeſty's arms, and to be allied to him. To die at the place for executing common felons he thought hard: and obſerved, that the apparatus of death, and the being made a ſpectacle to ſuch multitudes, was worſe than death itſelf. Mr. Humphreys had never ſeen him till that morning; and that gentleman ſignifying to him that ſome account of his religious ſentiments would be expected, he made anſwer, That he did not think himſelf accountable for theſe to the public. That he had always adored one God, the maker of the world; and for any peculiar notions of his own, he had never propagated them, or endeavoured to make proſelytes; that he thought it wrong to diſturb any national form of religion, as lord Bolingbroke had done by the publication of his writings. He added, that the multitude of ſects, and the many diſputes about religion, had almoſt baniſhed morality. [Did ever theſe hurt the morals of any ſincere enquirer after truth?] His ſhooting Mr. Johnſon, againſt whom he declared that he had no malice, he aſcribed to his not knowing what he did, which diſorder was placed him in a chair. The only ſervant in the houſe, his lordſhip ſent for a ſurgeon; and, when the ſurgeon came, he took him to the room where the ſteward was, and bid him take care of him; but, at the ſame time, with the ſevereſt menaces, threatened, that if ever he ſaid a ſyllable about the wound, he would, with the other piſtol, which he pulled out and ſhewed him, ſerve him juſt as he had ſerved old Johnſon. The ſurgeon, with great preſence of mind, anſwered, there would be no occaſion to ſay any thing, for the man would be well in four and twenty hours. But when he was got out of his reach, he then applied to a neighbouring juſtice of peace, told him of the caſe, and deſired that his lordſhip might be ſecured, which was accordingly done. He was firſt confined in his own houſe, from whence he endeavoured to make his eſcape; but on the man's dying he was committed to the county priſon, and from thence to the Tower.

† Between nine and ten o'clock this morning, as earl Ferrers was going from the Tower to Weſtminſter to receive ſentence, a dreadful fire broke out at an oil-ſhop in Thames-ſtreet, occaſioned by a ſervant intruſted with the care of ſome combuſtible matter, which he had inadvertently left on the fire, to gratify his curioſity with the ſight of the noble priſoner. The flames communicated themſelves with ſuch rapidity, that in a ſhort time ſeven houſes with warehouſes, &c. were entirely conſumed; and St. Magnus's church received very conſiderable damage. The valuable goods which were deſtroyed in the different warehouſes in Thames-ſtreet, amounted to at leaſt forty thouſand pounds. Several firemen were greatly wounded, and one blown up with gunpowder.

occaſioned, he ſaid, by many croſſes and vexations he had met with at that particular time. As he approached Tyburn, he expreſſed a deſire to ſee a perſon (whether male or female is not mentioned) who waited there in a coach, and for whom he ſaid he had a very ſincere regard; but, being told that parting with this perſon might give him too great a ſhock, he declined it, and delivered to the ſheriff a bank note in a pocket book, with a ring, and a purſe with ſome guineas, to be given this perſon.

Being arrived at the place of execution, he alighted and aſcended the ſcaffold with the ſame compoſure he had hitherto ſhewn, where, after a ſhort ſtay, he was aſked by the clergyman to join in prayer with him, which he declined; but, kneeling on black cuſhions, readily joined with him in the Lord's prayer, which he ſaid he had always admired. After it was over, he added, with energy, "O Lord, forgive me all my er-" rors; pardon all my ſins." He then roſe, and preſented his watch to Mr. ſheriff Vaillant, thanked him and the reſt of the gentlemen for their civilities, and ſignified his deſire to be buried at Breden, or Stanton, in Leiceſterſhire. Then the executioner's man came to tye his lordſhip's hands; and his lordſhip miſtaking him for the executioner, gave him his purſe with five guineas, which the executioner demanded of his man, and he refuſed to deliver it. This incident would have retarded the execution, and greatly diſcompoſed his lordſhip, had not the ſheriff immediately interpoſed, and commanded them to proceed in their buſineſs, and end the diſpute. They then put on his white cap, took off his neckcloth, and put on the halter, which was a common one. He then ſtepped upon the little ſtage in the middle of the ſcaffold, and it was explained to him in what manner it would ſink. His cap being pulled over his eyes, Mr. ſheriff Vaillant gave the ſignal for removing the board by ſtamping with his foot.

His lordſhip was turned off about two minutes before twelve, and ſeemed to die very eaſy; but his hands very ſoon turned remarkably black. After he was turned off the hearſe and mourning coach drew up to the ſcaffold, and a ſhell, covered with black, was taken out of the hearſe: his lordſhip's body, after hanging one hour and five minutes, was cut down; and the ſhell, being raiſed up on end, the body was dropped into it, and carried in a hearſe, attended by the two ſheriffs, to Surgeons-hall.

From the time of his aſcending the ſcaffold to his execution was not more than eight minutes, during which his countenance never changed, nor did his tongue faulter.

His lordſhip wore his own light brown curled hair, light coloured cloaths, black ſilk breeches, white ſilk ſtockings, and ſtone ſhoe and knee buckles. The gallows was covered with black bays, as was alſo the ſcaffold, which was erected under it and railed round.

A great number of perſons were admitted to ſee the diſſected body at Surgeons-hall, for three days. On the coffin was the following inſcription: "Laurence earl Ferrers ſuffered May the "5th, 1760." His lordſhip's remains were afterwards delivered to his friends, and interred in Leiceſterſhire.

On the ſeventh of June the firſt pile of the new bridge from Black-friars to the oppoſite ſhore in Surry, was drove in the middle of the Thames. And on the ninth the foundation was laid for a new chapel at the end of Portland-ſtreet, Marybone.

At the court of common-council held the eighteenth, the committee of the city lands were empowered to put in execution the act of parliament paſſed the laſt ſeſſions, for widening and improving the ſeveral ſtreets, &c. in the city; and at the ſame time directed an opening to be made as ſoon as poſſible from the eaſt end of Crutched-friars into the minories. The ſaid committee ſold Aldgate for 177l. 10s. Cripplegate for 91l. and Ludgate for 148l. to be pulled down and taken away by the purchaſer within a certain time. The ſtatue of queen Elizabeth, which ſtood on the weſt ſide of Ludgate, was purchaſed by alderman Goſling, and ſet up againſt the eaſt end of St. Dunſtan's church, in Fleet-ſtreet.

On the twenty-ninth of September came on at Guildhall the election of Lord-mayor for the year enſuing, when the majority of hands appeared in favour of Sir Matthew Blackiſton, knight. alderman of Biſhopſgate-ward and Sir Samuel Fludyer, bart. alderman of Cheap-ward, who being returned to the court of aldermen, the former was declared duly elected. And at the court of common-council held the fourteenth of October, it was agreed to petition the parliament for leave to take down Greſham college, and to build a ſtreet through the ſame into Broad-ſtreet, to be called Greſham-ſtreet.

On the eighteenth of October the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled, waited on his majeſty with an addreſs of congratulation on the conqueſt of Canada; and being introduced to his majeſty by Mr. Secretary Pitt. the recorder, in their name ſpoke as follows:

"Moſt gracious Sovereign,

"Permit us, your ever dutiful and loyal ſub-" jects the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons " of the city of London, in common-council aſ-" ſembled, humbly to congratulate your majeſty " upon the late ſignal ſucceſſes with which it hath " pleaſed the divine providence to bleſs your " majeſty's arms by ſea and land.

"The conqueſt of Canada, ſo heroically begun " at Quebec, ſo nobly ſeconded by the defeat and " diſperſion of the enemy's fleet upon the coaſt " of Britany, and ſo happily compleated without " the effuſion of human blood at Montreal; at " the ſame time that it reflects the higheſt honour " upon the wiſdom and vigour of your majeſty's " councils, upon the conduct, fortitude, and ac-" tivity of your commanders, and upon the bra-" very and diſcipline of your fleets and armies, " is an event of the utmoſt importance to the " trade and manufactures of theſe kingdoms, as " it is the only effectual means of ſecuring your " majeſty's induſtrious ſubjects in North America, " againſt the continual encroachments and unparallelled

" rallelled barbarities of a reſtleſs and inſidious " enemy, ever more dangerous in peace than " war.

" Deeply ſenſible of your majeſty's paternal " goodneſs, in thus graciouſly protecting the moſt " diſtant of your faithful ſubjects, your majeſty's " grateful citizens of London, will ever chear- " fully exert thoſe means, for which (under the " divine favour) they eſteem themſelves indebt- " ed to preſerve this valuable acquiſition, and " effectually to proſecute the various and exten- " ſive ſervices of this juſt and neceſſary war, and " to dictate to the aggreſſors the terms of a ſafe " and honourable peace.

" To this deſirable end, may the God of ar- " mies crown the juſtice of your majeſty's cauſe " with repeated and deciſive victories; and " when your majeſty ſhall have long enjoyed the " glorious fruits of all your care and labours, " may the empire of Great Britain continue in " your majeſty's illuſtrious race, in full ſplendor " and ſecurity, till time ſhall be no more."

To which addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following moſt gracious anſwer:

" I have the higheſt ſatisfaction in this freſh " and ſignal proof of your affection to me, and " to my government, for which I return you my " hearty thanks. The ſame union amongſt my " people, and the ſame ability and valour in my " fleets and armies, will, I truſt, under the bleſ- " ſing of God, enable me, in the end, to termi- " nate this neceſſary and expenſive war, by an " honourable, advantageous, and laſting peace. " The city of London may depend on my con- " ſtant care for their proſperity, and for the ex- " tenſion of the trade, manufactures, and navi- " gation of my faithful ſubjects."

On the twenty-fifth of October, between the hours of ſeven and eight in the morning, his moſt gracious majeſty king George the ſecond was ſeized, at his palace at Kenſington, with a violent diſorder, and fell down ſpeechleſs; ſoon after which he expired, notwithſtanding all poſſible means were uſed for his recovery. He that morning roſe at his uſual hour without any apparent ſigns of indiſpoſition: he called his page, drank his chocolate, and enquired about the wind, as if anxious for the arrival of the mails. He opened his window, and looked out of it; and ſeeing it a fine day, ſaid he would walk in the gardens. This paſſed while the page attended him at breakfaſt; but on leaving the room he heard a deep ſigh, which was immediately followed by a noiſe like the falling of a billet of wood from the fire; and returning haſtily, found the king dropped down from his ſeat, as if in attempting to ring the bell, who ſaid faintly, " Call " Amelia, and then expired. Thus died one of the moſt magnanimous monarchs that ever adorned the Britiſh throne, in the ſeventy-ſeventh year of his age, and 34th of his reign.

The next day his majeſty's grandſon, George prince of Wales, was proclaimed by the title of king George III. The proclamation was firſt made before Saville-houſe, where the officers of ſtate, nobility, and privy-counſellors were preſent, with the officers of arms, all being on foot: after which the officers of arms being mounted on horſeback, the like was done at Charing-croſs; whithin Temple-bar; at the end of Wood-ſtreet in Cheapſide; and laſtly, at the Royal-exchange, with the uſual ſolemnities. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, the duke of Leeds and lord Falmouth attended the proceſſion. The guns were fired at the park and Tower on this occaſion; and the evening concluded with ringing of bells, &c.

On the twenty-eighth the right honourable the Lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London waited on his majeſty at Saville-houſe, and being introduced to his majeſty by his grace the duke of Devonſhire, lord-chamberlain of the houſhold, Sir William Moreton, the recorder, made their compliments of congratulation and condolence in the following addreſs:

" Moſt gracious Sovereign,

" Your majeſty's truly dutiful and loyal ſub- " jects, the Lord-mayor and aldermen of the city " of London, beg leave to approach your royal " perſon and congratulate your majeſty upon " your happy acceſſion to the imperial crown of " theſe realms; and, at the ſame time, to con- " dole the loſs of our late moſt gracious ſove- " reign, whoſe glorious reign and princely vir- " tues muſt ever make his memory dear to a " grateful people.

" It is our peculiar happineſs, that your ma- " jeſty's heart is truly Engliſh, and that you have " diſcovered in your earlieſt years, the warmeſt " attention to the laws and conſtitution of theſe " kingdoms; laws ſo excellently formed, that as " they give liberty to the people, they give power " to the prince; and are a mutual ſupport of the " prerogatives of the crown, and the rights of " the ſubject.

" Your majeſty is now in poſſeſſion of the " united hearts of all your people, at a time when " the honour and credit of the nation are (by the " courage and activity of your majeſty's fleets " and armies) in the higheſt extent; a time " when we have happily no diviſions at home to " obſtruct thoſe meaſures, which have carried " terror to our enemies abroad.

" As your majeſty's reign is ſo happily begun " with the univerſal approbation and joy of the " whole nation, permit us, great Sir, to expreſs " the high ſenſe we have of your majeſty's vir- " tues, by the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of our unal- " terable zeal for your majeſty's ſacred perſon and " government; being convinced, that your ma- " jeſty has the true intereſt of this nation entirely " at heart, and that your power will be ever ex- " erted in protecting the trade, rights, and liber- " ties of your ſubjects. May your majeſty reign " long in the hearts of your people; and may " the crown of theſe kingdoms ever deſcend to " one of your majeſty's illuſtrious family to lateſt " poſterity."

To which addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to return this moſt gracious anſwer:

" I have

" I have great ſatisfaction in the early marks " you have given me of your zeal and affection " for me and for my government. And I return " you my hearty thanks. You may rely on my " tender concern for the rights, trade, and ma- " nufactures of the city of London."

And on the thirtieth the court of common-council waited on his majeſty with their addreſs on the ſame occaſion.

The next day, about noon, the firſt ſtone of the new bridge at Black-friars was laid in the north abutment, by the right honourable the Lord-mayor (attended by ſeveral aldermen and commoners of the committee) by the ſtriking the ſame with a mallet, the officers laying thereon, at the ſame time, the city ſword and mace. Several pieces of gold, ſilver, and copper coins of his late majeſty were placed under the ſtone, together with the following latin inſcription in large plates of pure tin.

On the laſt day of October, in the year 1760, and in the beginning of the moſt auſpicious reign of GEORGE the Third,
Sir THOMAS CHITTY, Knight, Lord Mayor, laid the FIRST Stone of this Bridge,
Undertaken by the Common-Council of London, (in the height of an extenſive War) for the public accommodation, and ornament of the city,
ROBERT MYLNE being the Architect.
And that there may remain to poſterity
a monument of this city's affection to the man who, by the ſtrength of his genius, the ſteadineſs of his mind, and a kind of happy contagion of his probity and ſpirit, (under the divine favour and fortunate auſpices of GEORGE the ſecond) recovered, augmented, and ſecured,
The Britiſh Empire
in Aſia, Africa, and America,
And reſtored the ancient reputation and influence of his country
amongſt the nations of Europe,
The Citizens of London have unanimouſly voted this Bridge to be inſcribed with the name of WILLIAM PITT.

The right of the city to take toll for proviſions expoſed to ſale before houſes in the markets, was tried in the court of King's-bench, Guild-hall, by a jury of non-freemen, between the citizens of the city of London, plaintiffs, and Edward Smith and Ralph Twyford, ſaleſmen in Newgate-market, defendants: and between the ſaid plaintiffs and John Cope, a ſaleſman, defendant, for the ſale of proviſions expoſed to ſale in White-hart-ſtreet, an avenue or paſſage leading to Newgate-market. In each of theſe cauſes the jury gave a verdict for the city: by which the citizens have eſtabliſhed their right to the tolls, for all the avenues leading to, and to the tolls in the markets.

At a court of common-council held the eighteenth of February 1761, a motion was made and agreed to, that the freedom of this city be preſented to Sir John Phillips, bart. and George Cooke, eſq; one of the knights for the ſhire of Middeſex, in teſtimony of the grateful ſenſe which the citizens of London entertain of the many benefits received from their readineſs and aſſiduity, to aſſiſt and ſupport ſuch of their reſolutions, as required the aid and authority of parliament. The court, however, looking on this with ſome ſurprize, unanimouſly agreed, that, for the future, no perſon ſhall have the freedom preſented to him, unleſs the motion for the ſame ſhall be mentioned at one court, previous to the putting the queſtion for granting the ſame.

In the afternoon of the twenty-ſixth a fire broke out at the mill belonging to his majeſty, at the Red-houſe, Deptford, which conſumed the ſame, together with a large quantity of flour. The damage was computed at about 2000l. It was occaſioned by the violence of the wind, which drove the mill with ſuch velocity that it could not be ſtopped.

On the ſecond of March the flow of the tide was ſo ſmall, that the ſterlings of London-bridge were not covered at high water. A circumſtance never known before.

On the twenty-ſixth came on at Guildhall the election for members to repreſent this city in the enſuing parliament, when, after holding up of hands, the ſheriffs declared the election was fallen on Sir Robert Ladbroke, Sir Richard Glynn, William Beckford, eſq; and the honourable Thomas Harley, eſq; But a poll being demanded on the behalf of Sir Samuel Fludyer, the ſame was immediately begun and continued till the ſecond of April, when, on caſting up the books, the numbers appeared

For Sir Robert Ladbroke, knt.	4306
Sir Richard Glynn, bart.	3285
William Beckford, eſq;	3663
Hon. Thomas Harley, eſq;	3983
Sir Samuel Fludyer, bart.	3193

And on the fourth the four firſt were returned duly elected.

About ten o'clock at night, on the twenty-fourth, a fire broke out in a ſtable-yard behind Swallow-ſtreet, Golden-ſquare, and deſtroyed fourteen houſes, two of which were new and of great value. The fire was ſo fierce, that a box of writings, which was in an iron cheſt, though incloſed in ſand near a foot thick, was entirely conſumed, and a quantity of caſh in the ſame box was melted. And

On the ſecond of May another fire broke out at a biſcuit maker's, near Pelican-ſtairs, in Lower Shadwell, and burnt almoſt to Wapping-wall; by which thirty-four houſes were deſtroyed. Eight barges and lighters were burnt, and three were ſunk. The whole damage was computed at fifty thouſand pounds.

At a court of common-council held the fifth of May, it was unanimouſly reſolved, "That "the freedom of this city, in a gold box, value "100l. ſhould be preſented to the right honourable Arthur Onſlow, eſq; ſpeaker of the houſe "of commons in five ſucceſſive parliaments, as "a grateful and laſting teſtimony of the reſpective love and veneration which the citizens of "London entertain for his perſon and diſtinguiſhed virtue; for the many eminent qualifications "he diſplayed, the unwearied and diſintereſted "labours he beſtowed, and the impartial and "judicious conduct he maintained, in the execution of that arduous and important office, dur"ing a courſe of thirty-three years: and for that "exemplary zeal, which, upon all occaſions, he "exerted with ſo much dignity and ſucceſs, in "ſupport of the rights, privileges, and conſtitu"tional independencies of the commons of Great "Britain."

The following is the anſwer which the right honourable Arthur Onſlow gave in writing, when attended upon by the chamberlain with the freedom of this city.

"Mr. Chamberlain,

"I receive, with the trueſt ſenſe of gratitude, "this great mark of reſpect the city of London "is pleaſed to ſhew towards me in their gift of "the freedom, and which I can only impute to "the high regard the citizens of London bear to "the houſe of commons, and as a teſtimony for "their eſteem for thoſe who faithfully perform "their duty to the public there.

"The expreſſions of good will and kindneſs "to me, which are uſed in confering this honour "upon me, however little deſerving I may think "myſelf of them, do indeed affect me extremely, "as an argument of the favourable opinion the "city of London entertains of my ſincere and "dutiful endeavours to ſupport, upon all proper "occaſions, the rights, privileges and conſtitu"tional independence of the commons of Great "Britain.

"I beg my Lord-mayor, aldermen, and the "whole of the common-council, will accept my "reſpectful and humbleſt thanks upon this occa"ſion, and be aſſured of my conſtant and warmeſt "wiſhes that this great metropolis may ever "flouriſh in all proſperity and dignity—in a "dignity that becomes the metropolis of a great "kingdom, and of which the city of London is "ſo conſiderable and reſpectable a part."

And at another court of common-council held the 5th of June, it was unanimouſly agreed, "That the freedom of the city be humbly pre"ſented to his royal highneſs Edward Auguſtus, "duke of York and Albany, one of the rear-"admirals of the blue ſquadron of his majeſty's "fleet, in a gold box of 150 guineas value, in "teſtimony of the dutiful affection of this court "for their illuſtrious ſovereign, whoſe peculiar "glory it is to reign over a free, happy, and "united people, and as a pledge of the grateful "reſpect they bear his royal highneſs for his early "entrance into the naval ſervice of his king and "country, the nobleſt and moſt effectual bul"wark of the wealth, reputation and indepen"dence of this commercial nation."

On the ſeventeenth the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council waited on his majeſty at St. James's with the following congratulatory addreſs on the conqueſt of Belliſle:

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"With reverential awe and gratitude to the "ſupreme giver of all victory, we, your ma"jeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the "Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, of your "city of London, in common-council aſſembled, "humbly approach your royal preſence, to ex"preſs our joy and exultation on the entire re"duction of the important iſland of Belliſle, by "the conduct, intrepidity, and perſeverance of "your majeſty's land and naval forces: a con"queſt, which after more than one fruitleſs at"tempt in former times, ſeems to have been re"ſerved by divine providence to grace the auſpi"cious beginnings of your majeſty's reign, and "confirms our hopes of a long continuance of "wiſe, ſteady, and ſucceſsful meaſures.

"A blow ſo humiliating to the pride and power "of France, cannot but impreſs that haughty "nation with a due ſenſe of the ſuperiority of a "patriot king ruling over a free, brave, and "united people; and will, we truſt, convince "them of the danger of delaying to accept ſuch "terms of peace as your majeſty's equity, wiſ"dom, and moderation, ſhall think fit to pre"ſcribe.

"What therefore have we more to wiſh, but "that your majeſty may long, very long, con"tinue the guardian and protector of the religi"ous, civil, and commercial rights of Great-"Britain, and her colonies; and that your ma"jeſty's wiſdom may ever be ſeconded by "equally faithful and ſpirited councils; and "your commands executed with no leſs ardour, "emulation and ſucceſs.

"On our part, permit us humbly to aſſure "your majeſty, that your faithful citizens of "London will, with unwearied zeal and chearful"neſs, contribute to ſupport a vigorous proſecu"tion of this juſt and neceſſary war; until your majeſty,

" majeſty, having ſufficiently vindicated the ho-
" nour of your crown, and ſecured the trade,
" navigation, and poſſeſſions of your ſubjects,
" ſhall enjoy the bleſſing and glory of giving
" repoſe to Europe, of wholly attending to, and " promoting the virtue and happineſs of your " people, and of cultivating all the ſofter arts of
" peace."

To which his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following moſt gracious anſwer:

" I return you my hearty thanks for this freſh
" mark of your affection to my perſon, and of " your conſtant zeal for the luſtre of my arms,
" and for the glory of my reign. Your repeated
" aſſurances of chearful and ſteady ſupport in the " proſecution of this neceſſary war, are moſt
" highly pleaſing to me, and cannot fail to pro" mote the deſirable object of peace, on juſt,
" honourable, and advantageous conditions. The " city of London may always depend on my " unwearied endeavours for the ſecurity and
" extenſion of their trade, navigation and com-
" merce."

On the twenty-third Sir Robert Ladbroke, with many other gentlemen of the committee for building Black-friars-bridge, went on board the caiſſoon, and laid the firſt ſtone of the firſt pier. And

On the twenty-ninth was opened the road from Iſlington to the Dog-houſe-bar, in Old-ſtreet, by the name of the City-road, which is undoubtedly the fineſt about London. It was made in conſequence of an act of parliament paſſed in the firſt year of his preſent majeſty king George III. in which it was enacted, " that a new road ſhould be opened from the north eaſt ſide of Goſwell-ſtreet-road, next Iſlington, and near to the road called the New-road, over and along part of a meadow-ground late belonging to Mrs. Mary Walker, croſs the New-river, and then over and along the other part of the ſaid meadow, and over and along divers other meadows, &c. to Old-ſtreet road, oppoſite to the Doghouſe-bar; and alſo that the truſtees for putting the ſaid act in execution ſhould be impowered to open, repair, widen, and keep in repair, the preſent road, at and from the Doghouſe-bar, over and along certain grounds belonging to the reverend doctor Chriſtopher Wilſon, one of the prebendaries of the cathedral church of St. Paul, London, lord of the manor of Finſbury, in right of his prebend, and to the mayor, aldermen, and commons, of the city of London, as leſſees thereof; and to Bibye Lake, eſq; under a leaſe from the ſaid city; and to John Witton, tenant of the ſaid Bibye Lake; and from thence to the end of Chiſwell-ſtreet, by the Artillery-ground."

And it was further enacted, " that the new part of the ſaid road ſhall be forty-feet wide at the leaſt: and that part of the road leading at and from the Doghouſe-bar, to the end of Chiſwell-ſtreet by the Artillery-ground, ſhall not exceed 50 feet in width. That the ſaid truſtees ſhall and may erect gates or turnpikes acroſs or on the ſides of any part or parts of the ſaid road, and alſo a toll-houſe or toll-houſes, in or upon, or adjoining to, the ſame: and the following tolls ſhall be demanded and taken; that is to ſay,

For every horſe, mare, gelding, mule, or aſs, drawing or not drawing, one penny.

For every drove of oxen, or neat cattle, five-pence per ſcore; and ſo in proportion for any greater or leſſer number.

For every drove of calves, hogs, ſheep, or lambs, two-pence half-penny per ſcore; and ſo in proportion for any greater or leſſer number.

With a penalty of twenty-ſhillings to ſuffer any perſon to paſs with a horſe, carriage, &c. through a private way.

That none of the ſaid tolls ſhall be taken at any of the gates or turnpikes for any horſe, &c. drawing any waggon or other carriage, which ſhall be uſed and employed in the carriage of any materials for repairing the ſaid road, or in the carriage of any lime, chalk, dung, mould, ſoil, or compoſt, of any nature or kind whatſoever, for manuring of any garden or other land or ground; or in the carriage of any hay, ſtraw, or corn in the ſtraw, not ſold or diſpoſed of, but to be laid up in barns, &c. of the owners thereof; or for any implements of, or employed in, huſbandry, or for manuring of land in the ſeveral pariſhes in which the ſaid road, hereby intended to be made and repaired, does lie; or for any horſe, or other cattle, going to, or returning from, paſture or water; or for any poſt-horſe, or vehicle carrying the mail or public packet; or for horſes, carts, or waggons, travelling with vagrants ſent by paſſes. Nor of any perſon going to, or returning from, any election of a knight or knights of the ſhire to ſerve in parliament for the county of Middleſex, on the day or days of ſuch election.

Provided always, that no perſon ſhall be liable to pay toll more than once the ſame day, to be computed from twelve o'clock at night, to twelve o'clock in the ſucceeding night, with the ſame horſe or other cattle, and ſhall produce a note or ticket that the toll was paid at any of the ſaid gates or turnpikes.

But whereas ſeveral waggons, carts, drays, or other carriages, may probably paſs the ſaid road many times in the ſame day, and it is but reaſonable that the horſes, or other cattle, drawing ſuch carriages, laden, and ſo paſſing as aforeſaid, ſhould pay more than once in the ſame day; it was farther enacted and provided, that all horſes or other cattle, drawing ſuch waggons, carts, drays, or other carriages, that ſhall paſs through any gate or turnpike to be erected by virtue of this act, laden as aforeſaid, more than twice in the ſame day, ſhall, at the third time, pay the ſeveral and reſpective tolls directed to be paid at the firſt time for paſſing through any of the ſaid gates or turnpikes."

It was further enacted, " that no part of the lands to be purchaſed by the authority of this act, and made uſe of for making or widening any part of the ſaid road, ſhall be made uſe of for the erecting of any buildings whatſoever, other than of ſuch toll-houſes and watch-houſes as may be erected by order of the ſaid truſtees; and that no building ſhall be erected on any new foundation, tion, by any proprietors or occupiers of lands, adjacent to the new intended part of the ſaid road, betwixt the Fountain at Peerleſs Pool, and that end of Goſwell-ſtreet road, near Iſlington, within forty feet of the ſame; and that no part of the ſaid road ſhall be paved.

And if any ſuch buildings, within forty feet as aforeſaid, ſhall be hereafter erected, or any part of ſuch road ſhall be paved, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, the ſame ſhall be deemed a common nuiſance.

And further, that no gate or turnpike ſhall be erected, or any toll taken or received, on either ſide of the Old-ſtreet road, where the ſaid new road opens into the ſame, by virtue or in purſuance of any powers granted to the truſtees of the Old-ſtreet road, by any act or acts of parliament made for repairing the ſame; unleſs it ſhall appear, by certificate under the hands of ſeven of the ſaid truſtees, and verified by the oath of their treaſurer, to be made before one or more juſtice or juſtices of the peace for the county of Middleſex, that the tolls of the ſaid Old-ſtreet truſt, collected at the gates as they now ſtand, are diminiſhed above 120l. a year, ſince the making of the ſaid new road, ſuch diminution to be computed from the monies collected on the ſaid Old-ſtreet road, from the firſt day of January to the thirty-firſt day of December 1760, both inclusive.

And further, that no gate or turnpike ſhall be erected, or any toll taken or received, where the ſaid new road opens into that part of Goſwell-ſtreet road, next Iſlington, or within ſixty yards thereof, by virtue or in purſuance of any powers granted to the truſtees of the Iſlington turnpike.

That the ſaid truſtees ſhall have full power to cauſe lamps to be erected upon the ſaid road, and to appoint a number of fit and able bodied men to watch and guard the ſaid road in the nighttime. And that the expences of erecting, lighting and maintaining ſuch lamps, and the allowances to be made to ſuch watchmen, and all other charges incident to the ſaid reſpective ſervices, ſhall be paid and defrayed out of the money to be raiſed by virtue of this act."

And it was further enacted, "that if any perſon ſhall hale or draw, in, upon, and along, any part of the ſaid road, any tree or trees, piece or pieces of timber, or any ſtone or ſtones, (mill ſtones excepted) otherwiſe than on wheel carriages, every ſuch perſon for every ſuch offence ſhall forfeit the ſum of forty ſhillings."

CHAPTER XLVII.

Marriage and coronation of his preſent majeſty king George III. City inſtructions to their members. Their majeſties dine at Guildhall. Declaration of war againſt Spain. Cock-lane ghoſt. City addreſs on the conqueſt of Martinico. Birth of his royal highneſs the prince of Wales. Remarkable ſtorm of thunder and lightning. Negociations of peace. Fire in Newgate. Conqueſt of the Havanna. Great flood. Articles of peace ſigned. Ceſſation of arms proclaimed. High tide. Riot in Covent-garden playhouſe. Peace proclaimed. City addreſs on the occaſion. Fire at Shadwell. Remarkable great darkneſs. Violent ſtorm of wind and rain. Burning of the North-briton, No. 45. Conſequences thereon.

A treaty of marriage having been concluded between his majeſty king George III. and her moſt ſerene highneſs the princeſs Charlotta of Mecklenbourg, the ſame was completed on the eighteenth of September, 1761. At nine in the evening, her highneſs, preceded by 120 ladies in extreme rich dreſſes, was handed to the chapel royal by the duke of York, attended by ſix dukes daughters as her bride maids, and her train ſupported by the daughters of ſix earls, where the nuptials were ſolemnized by his grace the archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the preſence of the royal family and the principal part of the nobility.

And on the fourteenth the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council waited on their majeſties with the following congratulatory addreſſes on the above joyous occaſion.

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty.

The humble addreſs of the Lord-mayor, alder-
" men and commons of the city of London, in
" common-council aſſembled.

" Be pleaſed, moſt gracious ſovereign, to ac" cept the cordial and reſpectful congratulations
" of your majeſty's ever dutiful and loyal ſub-
" jects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com-
" mons of the city of London, in common-
" council aſſembled, on the ſolemnization of your
" majeſty's moſt auſpicious nuptials.

" Warmly intereſted from every motive of " gratitude as well as duty in whatever can affect " your royal mind, we enjoy the higheſt ſatisfac-
" tion in the completion of our wiſhes, by your " majeſties happy union with a princeſs of the " moſt exalted merit; a princeſs, who, by her
" deſcent from an illuſtrious lineage (repectable
" for their firm and conſtant zeal for the proteſ-
" tant religion, and dear to us for their particu" lar attachment to your majeſty's royal houſe)
" and above all, by her own moſt eminent vir-
" tues, and amiable endowments, was moſt wor-
" thy to engage your majeſty's eſteem and af" fection, and to ſhare the honours of the Britiſh
" crown.

" We adore the divine goodneſs, that, as in " all your majeſty's other conduct, ſo more particularly

" ticularly in a choice of the higheſt importance " to your majeſty and to your kingdoms, hath " ſo viſibly guided and inſpired your royal breaſt. " A choice, which we thankfully acknowledge " the ſtrongeſt and moſt acceptable proof of " your majeſty's paternal attention to improve " the happineſs and ſecurity of your people, and " to render the ſame ſtable and permanent to " poſterity.

" May the ſame providence long preſerve your " majeſty, and your royal conſort, to enjoy the " fruits of this bleſſed marriage, in an uninter- " rupted courſe of conjugal felicity, and in a " numerous offspring, reſembling their illuſtrious " parents in every public, as well as private " virtue. And may the imperial crown of theſe " realms be worn with undiminiſhed luſtre by " their deſcendants, till time ſhall be no more."

" I thank you moſt heartily for your dutiful and " affectionate addreſs. This freſh mark of your " attachment to my perſon, and particularly the " warm ſentiments of joy and ſatisfaction which " you expreſs on the happy choice I have made " of a queen for a conſort, are moſt pleaſing to " me. The city of London may always depend " on my unceaſing care for their welfare and " proſperity."

The humble addreſs of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, &c. to her majeſty.

" Moſt gracious queen,

" We, his majeſty's ever dutiful and loyal ſub- " jects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com- " mons, of the city of London, in common- " council aſſembled, humbly beg leave to ex- " preſs, in your royal preſence, the exceeding " great joy we feel at your majeſty's ſafe arrival, " ſo ardently wiſhed for, and ſo impatiently ex- " pected; and at the ſame time to congratulate " your majeſty's moſt happy nuptials with a mo- " narch, whoſe early wiſdom, fortitude, and " piety, add luſtre to the diadem he wears, and " render him the darling, as well as father, of his " people.

" We do, with that honeſt warmth and ſince- " rity which characterize the Britiſh nation, hum- " bly aſſure your majeſty, that as the many vir- " tues and amiable endowments, which your ma- " jeſty poſſeſſes in ſo eminent a degree, cannot " fail to bleſs our beloved ſovereign with every " domeſtic happineſs; ſo will they ever endear " your majeſty to a people, not more diſtinguiſh- " ed for their love of liberty, and their country, " than for their inviolable loyalty and gratitude " to thoſe princes, from whom they derive pro- " tection and proſperity.

" Long may your majeſty live to ſhare the fe- " licity you are formed to inſpire. And may your " majeſty prove the happy mother of a race of " princes, to tranſmit the glories of this diſtin- " guiſhed reign to the lateſt of our poſterity."

Her majeſty's moſt gracious anſwer.

" I thank you for your kind congratulations " ſo full of duty to the king, and affection to " me. My warmeſt wiſhes will ever attend this " great city."

Addreſſes on the ſame occaſion were preſented by the univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge.

On the twenty-ſecond his majeſty's coronation was performed in the abbey-church at Weſtminſter, with the uſual ſolemnities. Their majeſties and the princeſs dowager went in the morning through the park from St. James's in chairs, and their attendants in coaches, to Weſtminſter hall, from thence they walked about twelve o'clock in grand proceſſion to the abbey. After the ceremony, which laſted ſix hours, they returned to the hall, where they dined moſt magnificently, in the preſence of numberleſs ſpectators richly dreſſed. All the way of the proceſſion was lined with crowded ſcaffolds, and the abbey alſo was as full and ſplendid as poſſible. On the queen's entrance into the hall, three thouſand wax tapers were all lighted in leſs than five minutes. The royal ſtandard was hoiſted at the Tower, the ſhips in the river diſplayed their flags, the ſtreets were univerſally illuminated, and there was an entire ſtagnation of all ſorts of buſineſs.

A little before the proceſſion began, proceeded that of her royal highneſs the princeſs dowager of Wales, from the houſe of lords, acroſs Old Palace yard, on a platform erected for that purpoſe, to the ſouth-croſs of Weſtminſter-abbey. She was led by the hand by his royal highneſs prince William Henry, dreſſed in white and ſilver. Her train, which was of ſilk, was but ſhort, and her hair flowed down her ſhoulders in hanging curls.

The reſt of the princes and princeſſes, her highneſſes's children, followed in this order:

His royal highneſs prince Henry-Frederick, alſo in white and ſilver, handing his ſiſter the princeſs Louiſa-Anne, dreſſed in a ſlip with hanging ſleeves. Then

His royal highneſs prince Frederick-William, in the ſame dreſs, handing his youngeſt ſiſter the princeſs Caroline-Matilda, dreſſed alſo in a ſlip with hanging ſleeves.

The other perſons who made up the remainder of this proceſſion were thoſe who had not a right to walk with their majeſties.

The proceſſion was cloſed by the three Mahometan ambaſſadors, in the proper dreſſes of their country, having their turbans of fine muſlin on their heads, and long gowns of flowered and laced ſilk; their ſabres were crimſon, and in each of them were encloſed a dagger and a poniard.

The great diamond in his majeſty's crown fell out in returning from the abbey to Weſtminſter-hall, but was immediately found and reſtored.

On the twenty-eighth alderman Naſh and alderman Cartwright were ſworn in at Guildhall ſheriffs of London and Middleſex. And the next day Sir Samuel Fludyer, bart. was choſe Lord-mayor of London for the year enſuing.

The nation being greatly diſcontented at the meaſures of the court, and more particularly at the reſignation of the right honourable Mr. Pitt, whoſe conduct in adminiſtration they highly eſteemed, the court of common-council, on the twenty-ſecond of October, made a motion to inſtruct their members, or to repreſent to them the then critical conjuncture; which motion being unanimouſly agreed to, the ſame was preſented as follows:

The repreſentation of the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled, to Sir Robert Ladbroke knt. Sir Richard Glynn, knt. and bart. William Beckford, eſq; and the hon. Thomas Harley, eſq; this city's repreſentatives in parliament.

" We, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and com-
" mons of the city of London, in common-coun" cil aſſembled, think it at this time our duty, as " it is our natural and undoubted right, to lay " before you, this city's repreſentatives in the
" the great council of the nation, ſoon to be aſ-
" ſembled in parliament, what we deſire and ex" pect from you, in diſcharge of the great truſt
" and confidence we and our fellow-ſubjects have
" repoſed in you.

" That you take the earlieſt opportunity to
" uſe your utmoſt endeavours to obtain the repeal
" or amendment of the late act, intituled, An " act for the relief of inſolvent debtors; in reſ-
" pect to the inconveniences ariſing from the " compulſive clauſe, by which a door has been " opened to the greateſt frauds and perjuries;
" and, if continued, muſt become the deſtruc-
" tion of all private credit, ſo eſſential to the " ſupport of a trading people.

" That you concur in and promote all neceſ-
" ſary meaſures for eſtabliſhing good œconomy
" in the diſtribution of the national treaſure;
" and for that purpoſe that you endeavour to have
" a committee appointed, in order to enquire
" into any abuſes which may have ariſen in the " application of it, and to prevent any frauds or " illicit practices in the management thereof.

" That you entertain juſt ſentiments of the " importance of the conqueſts made this war by
" the Britiſh arms, at the expence of ſo much
" blood and treaſure; and that you will, to the " utmoſt of your power and abilities, oppoſe all " attempts for giving up ſuch places as may tend
" to leſſen our preſent ſecurity, or, by reſtoring
" the naval power of France, render us ſubject
" to freſh hoſtilities from that natural enemy;
" particularly that the ſole and excluſive right of " our acquiſitions in North America, and the " fiſheries, be preſerved to us.

" As the preſent happy extinction of parties,
" the harmony and unanimity of all his majeſty's
" ſubjects, their zeal and affection to their na" tive king, and the great increaſe of commerce
" are moſt convincing proofs to us of this na" tion's ability ſtill to carry on, and vigorouſly
" proſecute, the juſt and neceſſary war—it is our
" deſire that you concur in giving his majeſty
" ſuch ſupplies, as ſhall enable him to purſue all
" thoſe meaſures which may promote the true in-
" tereſt of his kingdoms, and place him above
" the menaces of any power that may pretend to " give laws, or preſcribe limits, to the policy and " intereſts of this nation. But, as it is apparent " that our enemies flatter themſelves with the " hopes of exhauſting our ſtrength by the im-
" menſe expence in which we are at preſent en" gaged, we therefore require you, in the fur" ther proſecution of this war, to ſupport ſuch
" meaſures as may fruſtrate thoſe expectations:
" yet to act with the utmoſt vigour in the re" duction of their remaining colonies, ſo as to " obtain a ſafe and honourable peace."

At the ſame time another motion was made, that the thanks of the court be given to the right hon. Mr. Pitt, for the many and important ſervices rendered to his king and country. And a third, that the committee in their thanks to Mr. Pitt, do lament his reſignation, &c. Theſe motions being unanimouſly agreed to, the town-clerk preſented their reſolutions to Mr. Pitt, who was pleaſed to return the following anſwer:

" Mr. Pitt requeſts of Sir James Hodges, that " he will be ſo good to repreſent him, in the
" moſt reſpectful manner, to the Lord-mayor,
" aldermen, and commons of the city of London,
" in common-council aſſembled, and expreſs his " high ſenſe of the ſignal honour they have been
" pleaſed to confer on him, by their condeſ-
" cending and favourable reſolution of the twen" ty-ſecond of October; an honour which he " receives with true reverence and gratitude, not " without confuſion at his own ſmall deſervings,
" while he views with exultation the univerſal
" public ſpirit diſperſed through an united peo" ple; and the matchleſs intrepidity of the " Britiſh ſailors and ſoldiers, conducted by offi" cers, juſtly famed through all the quarters of " the world: To this concurrence of national " virtue, graciouſly protected by the throne, all
" the national proſperities (under the favour of " heaven) have been owing; and it will ever be " remembered to the glory of the city of Lon" don, that through the whole courſe of this ar" duous war, the great ſeat of commerce has
" generouſly ſet the illuſtrious example of ſteady
" zeal for the dignity of the crown, and of un-
" ſhaken firmneſs and magnanimity."

Sir Samuel Fludyer, the Lord-mayor elect, having invited their majeſties to dine at Guild-hall on the approaching Lord-mayor's day, they were graciouſly pleaſed to accept of the ſame. And on the ninth of November, being the day on which the Lord-mayor entered into his office, the ceremonial on the occaſion was conducted in the following order:

The aldermen, ſheriffs, and other officers, having met at the Manſion-houſe about ten in the forenoon, Sir Samuel Fludyer, bart. Lord-mayor elect, in the uſual manner, and with the uſual attendants, proceeded to Weſtminſter, where his lordſhip was ſworn in before the barons of the exchequer.

While that ceremony was performing, their majeſties, majeſties, with the royal family, honoured the city with their preſence. The manner in which this viſit was paid was as follows:

His royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, in his coach drawn by ſix horſes, preceded and followed by guards.

Her royal highneſs the princeſs Amelia, in the ſame manner.

His royal highneſs the duke of York, in a new and ſuperb ſtate coach, in the ſame manner.

Their royal highneſſes prince William, prince Henry, and prince Frederick, in one coach, in the ſame manner.

Their royal highneſſes the princeſs dowager of Wales, the princeſs Auguſta, and the princeſs Caroline, in one coach, preceded by twelve footmen in black caps, with guards, and a grand retinue.

Their majeſties in their ſtate coach, preceded by the earl of Harcourt in his chariot, and the dukes of Rutland and Devonſhire in another chariot, the grenadier-guards and the yeomen of the guards, followed by a corps of the horſe-guards, paſſed on to St. Paul's church-yard, at the eaſt end of which the following ſpeech was addreſſed, with all humility, to the king's moſt excellent majeſty, by the ſenior ſcholar of the grammar-ſchool in Chriſt's-hoſpital.

" Moſt auguſt and gracious ſovereign,

" From the condeſcenſion and goodneſs, which " your majeſty diſplays towards even the meaneſt " of your ſubjects, we are emboldened to hope " you will accept the tribute of obedience and " duty which we, poor orphans, are permitted to " preſent you.

" Educated and ſupported by the munificence " of a charity, founded, enlarged, and protected " by your royal predeceſſors, with the warmeſt " gratitude we acknowledge our inexpreſſible " obligations to its bounty, and the diſtinguiſhed " happineſs we have hitherto enjoyed under the " conſtant patronage of former princes. May this " ever be our boaſt and our glory! Nor can we " think we ſhall prefer our prayer in vain, whilſt " with earneſt but humble ſupplications, we im- " plore the patronage and protection of your ma- " jeſty.

" To our ardent petition for your princely fa- " vours, may we preſume, dread ſovereign, to " add our moſt reſpectable congratulations on " your auſpicious marriage with your royal con- " ſort. Strangers to the diſquietude, which often " dwells within the circle of a crown, long may " your majeſties experience the heart-felt ſatis- " faction of domeſtic life; in the uninterrupted " poſſeſſion of every endearment of the moſt ten- " der union, every bleſſing of conjugal affection, " every comfort of parental felicity. And may " a race of princes, your illuſtrious iſſue and de- " ſcendants, formed by the example, and inherit- " ing the virtues of their great and good proge- " nitors, continue to ſway the Britiſh ſcepter to " the lateſt poſterity."

As ſoon as he had finiſhed, the boys in a grand chorus chanted God ſave the king, Amen. After which, the ſenior ſcholar delivered two copies of he ſpeech to the king and queen, who received them moſt graciouſly.

From thence they went to the houſe of Mr. Barclay, oppoſite to Bow-church, which, on this occaſion, was decorated in a very ſumptuous manner; the rooms, balcony, &c. being hung with crimſon damaſk; and from this houſe they ſaw the proceſſion of the Lord-mayor, &c.

A great number of grand equipages, belonging to the nobility and gentry, the judges, foreign ambaſſadors, ladies, &c. mingled in the proceſſion of the royal family, by which means it was made extenſive and brilliant.

At the cloſe of the proceſſion, earl Temple and the right honourable William Pitt, eſq; coming in one chariot, were honoured with the moſt hearty acclamations of people of all ranks.

The ſhow on the water was very brilliant.

The Lord-mayor, aldermen, &c. returned in the order they went.

The ſtate coach was drawn by ſix beautiful iron grey horſes, richly capariſoned and adorned with ribbons; and all the companies made a grand appearance.

The armourers and braziers, the ſkinners and the fiſhmongers companies, particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves on this occaſion. The former were marked by an archer riding erect in his car, having his bow in his left hand, and his quiver and arrows hanging behind his left ſhoulder; and a man in complete armour. The ſkinners were diſtinguiſhed by ſeven of their company being dreſſed in fur, having their ſkins painted in the form of Indian princes. The fiſhmongers pageants conſiſted of a ſtatue of St. Peter finely gilt, a dolphin, two mermaids, and two ſea-horſes, which had a very pleaſing effect.

The proceſſion being ended, the royal family were conducted by the ſheriffs to Guildhall, at the entrance of which they were received by the Lord-mayor, who, kneeling, preſented the city ſword to the king, which being returned, it was carried before his majeſty by his lordſhip to the council-chamber, where the compliments of the city were made, and where his majeſty conferred the honour of knighthood on Nathaniel Naſh and John Cartwright, eſqrs. the two ſheriffs, and on Thomas Fludyer, eſq; brother to the Lord-mayor. From thence, in like manner, the royal family proceeded to the huſtings, where a moſt magnificent and ſumptuous entertainment was provided. Their majeſties were attended, as they paſſed from St. James's to the city, with the loudeſt acclamations of joy. Scaffoldings were built at many of the houſes in the city, and the concourſe of people who were aſſembled was almoſt incredible. Four regiments of the London militia lined the ſtreets from Temple-bar to Ludgate, and were of ſingular ſervice in preventing the greateſt multitude that perhaps was ever beheld from incommoding the walk of the liverymen in the return of the Lord-mayor's proceſſion.

The entertainment was elegant, ſumptuous, and well conducted. His majeſty and all the royal family expreſſed their entire approbation of it; and the nobility and foreign miniſters acknowledged it was beyond any thing they had ever ſeen.

In

In the evening, the ball was opened by his royal highneſs the duke of York and the lady-mayoreſs; and minuets were danced by ſome others of the royal family, the nobility, &c. till one o'clock.

Their majeſties returned to St. James's about one o'clock, and the reſt of the royal family followed them as faſt as their coaches could be brought up; the Lord-mayor, with the ſword of ſtate carried before him, the ſheriffs, and gentlemen of the committee, conducting them to the hall-gate.

Mr. Pitt, at his departure, was ſaluted with the acclamations of the people, which continued to ſurround his chariot all the way to his houſe. The reſt of the company did not ſeparate till afthree, and the whole was concluded with the utmoſt regularity and decorum.

The ſtreets through which their majeſties paſſed in their return to St. James's, were illuminated in the moſt brilliant manner; but an accident had like to have happened by the breaking of the glaſſes of their coach, in paſſing under St. James's gate-way.

At a court of common-council held the 18th of November, a motion was made and agreed to, that his majeſty's ſtatue be erected in the Royal Exchange, among thoſe of his predeceſſors; and that the pictures of his majeſty, and his royal conſort, be put up in the Guildhall of the city. And another motion was made and agreed to, that fit and able perſons be employed to make the ſaid ſtatue, and to draw the ſaid pictures; and that an humble application be made to their majeſties that they would be pleaſed to do the city the honour to ſit for their pictures. And a committee being appointed, they, on the twenty-third, waited on their majeſties, ſeparately, for that purpoſe; and at the ſame time Sir Samuel Fludyer, the Lord-mayor, in obedience to his inſtructions, took occaſion to expreſs the deep and grateful ſenſe which the common-council held of their majeſties gracious condeſcenſion, in honouring their late entertainment with their royal preſence. Their majeſties were pleaſed to receive the committee in a very gracious manner, to expreſs their entire ſatisfaction at the late entertainment, and to aſſure the committee that both the pictures ſhould be ſent to the city; which was accordingly ſoon after done, and placed over the huſtings in Guildhall. And the ſtatue of his majeſty was fixed in a nich by the ſide of his grandfather in the Royal Exchange, where it now ſtands.

On the fourth of January 1762, war was declared againſt Spain in the uſual places, and with the accuſtomed ceremonies.

On the ſeventh a terrible fire broke out in a granary at St. Saviour's dock, which, in a ſhort time, conſumed that, and eight houſes, beſides greatly damaging ſeveral others. And on the twelfth there was a violent ſtorm of wind, attended with rain, which did very conſiderable damage to the ſhipping and craft in the river. Some houſes, and many chimnies were blown down, by which ſeveral lives were loſt. The river Thames roſe ſo high, that the gardens at Millbank, Weſtminſter, were laid under water.

About this time the town was greatly alarmed by the impoſture of the Cock-lane ghoſt, which was managed by a girl about twelve years old (under the direction of her parents) ſo artfully, that it drew in ſeveral clergymen and other people of ſenſe and reputation, to believe, and to countenance the deception. The particulars of this myſterious affair were as follow.

On the thirteenth of February, between the hours of eleven and twelve at night, a gentleman was ſent for to the houſe of one Parſons, officiating pariſh-clerk of St. Sepulchre's, in Cock-lane, near Weſt-Smithfield, to be witneſs to the noiſes, and other extroardinary circumſtances, attending the ſuppoſed preſence of a ſpirit, that for two years paſt had been heard in the night, to the great terror of the family. To throw ſome light on this ſtrange affair, we ſhall begin with a narrative publiſhed at that time, the ſubſtance of which was as follows:

That in 1759, one Mr. K— employed an agent to carry a letter to a young gentlewoman of a reputable family in Norfolk, and to bring her up to London in a poſt chaiſe, if ſhe ſhould be willing willing to come: that ſhe did come; but Mr. K— being at Greenwich, ſhe followed him there directly, and was received by him, after a journey of one hundred miles performed in one day, with much tenderneſs. After ſome ſhort ſtay at Greenwich, where it was thought neceſſary that ſhe ſhould make a will in his favour, ſhe was removed to a lodging near the Manſion-houſe; from thence to lodgings behind St. Sepulchre's-church; and, laſtly, to a houſe in Bartlet-court, in the pariſh of Clerkenwell: here, in 1760, ſhe was taken ill of the ſmall-pox, and, on or before the 31ſt of January, her ſiſter who lived reputably in Pall-Mall, was firſt made acquainted with her illneſs and place of reſidence, and, being overjoyed to hear of her, went immediately to ſee her, and found her in a fair way of doing well: next day ſhe ſent to her, and received a favourable account of her; but, on the morning following, word was brought that her ſiſter was dead. She died on February the ſecond 1760, and was buried, in two or three days after, at the church of St. John, Clerkenwell, her ſiſter attending the funeral, who was ſurpriſed at not ſeeing a plate on the coffin, and expreſſed that ſurprize to Mr. Brown after the funeral was over; lamenting, at the ſame time that ſhe had not been permitted to ſee her ſiſter's corpſe, the coffin being ſcrewed down before ſhe came. She added, that K— had married one of her ſiſters, and had ruined the other, who was buried by the name of ——, as appears by the pariſh regiſter. By the will already mentioned K— availed himſelf of her fortune, to the prejudice of her brother and ſiſters, who all lived in perfect harmony till this unhappy affair happened. Such is the account given by Mr. Brown, of Amen corner. A worthy clergymen, however, who attended her ſeveral times, and who adminiſtered to her the laſt comforts of his function, declares, that the ſmall pox, with which ſhe was ſeized, was of the confluent ſort, and that the gentlemen of the faculty, who attended her, had pronounced her irrecoverable ſome days before her death.

It was, however, the ghoſt of this perſon that Parſons declared had taken poſſeſſion of his girl, a child about twelve years old, who lay with the deceaſed in the abſence of her ſuppoſed huſband when he was in the country at a wedding about two years ago, and then it was that the knocking was firſt heard, to the great terror of this child; ſhe frequently crying out that ſhe might not be taken away. Soon after this woman died, whoſe apparition was now ſuppoſed to appear to this ſame child: and, in anſwer to the queſtion put to her one night, what was the occaſion of the firſt knocking, &c. before ſhe died? anſwered that it was the ſpirit of her ſiſter, the firſt wife of Mr. K—, who was huſband to them both.

Having now ſufficiently prepared the reader, we ſhall proceed in our narrative. The gentleman, already ſaid to have been ſent for, attended, and found the child in bed, and the ſpirit being at hand, ſeveral queſtions were put to it by the father, as ſhall be related hereafter. The gentleman, not caring to pronounce too haſtily upon what appeared to him extraordinary, got ſome friends together, among whom were two or three clergymen, about twenty other perſons, and two negroes, and ſat up another night.

They firſt thoroughly examined the bed, bedcloaths, &c. and, being ſatisfied there was no viſible appearance of a deceit, the child, with its ſiſter, was put into bed, which was found to ſhake extremely by the gentleman who had placed himſelf at the foot of it.

Among others, the following queſtions were aſked: Whether her diſturbance was occaſioned by any ill treatment from Mr. K—? Yes.—Whether ſhe was brought to an untimely end by poiſon? Yes.—In what was the poiſon adminiſtered, in beer or purl? Purl.—How long before her death? Three hours?—Is the perſon called Carrots able to give information about the poiſon? Yes.—Whether ſhe was K—'s wife's ſiſter? Yes.—Whether ſhe was married to K—? No.—Whether any other perſon than K— were concerned in the poiſoning? No.—Whether ſhe could viſibly appear to any one? Yes.—Whether ſhe would do ſo? Yes.—Whether ſhe could go out of that houſe? Yes.—Whether ſhe would follow the child every where? Yes.—Whether ſhe was pleaſed in being aſked queſtions? Yes.—Whether it eaſed her mind? Yes.—[Here a myſterious noiſe, compared to the fluttering of wings round the room, was heard]—How long before her death had ſhe told Carrors (her ſervant) that ſhe was poiſoned? One hour.—Here Carrots, who was admitted to be one of the company that night, aſſerted that the deceaſed had not told her ſo, ſhe being at that time ſpeechleſs]—How long did Carrots live with her? Three or four days.—[Carrots atteſted the truth of this.]—Whether if the accuſed ſhould be taken up he would confeſs? Yes.—Whether ſhe ſhould be at eaſe in her mind if the man was hanged? Yes.—How long would it be before he would be executed? Three years.—How many clergymen were in the room? Three.—How many negroes? Two.—Whether ſhe could diſtinguiſh the perſon of any one in the room? Yes.—Whether the colour of a watch held up by one of the clergy, was white, yellow, blue, or black? Anſwered black.—[The watch was in a black ſhagreen caſe]—At what time ſhe would depart in the morning? At four o'clock. Accordingly at this hour the noiſe removed to the Wheatſheaf, a public houſe, at the diſtance of a few doors, in the bed-chamber of my landlord and landlady, to the great affright and terror of them both. Such is the manner of interrogating the ſpirit; the anſwer is given by knocking or ſcratching. An affirmative was one knock; a negative, two. Diſpleaſure was expreſſed by ſcratching.

On the night of the firſt of February many gentlemen, eminent for their rank and character, were, by the invitation of the reverend Mr. Aldrich of Clerkenwell, aſſembled at his houſe, for the examination of the noiſes ſuppoſed to be made by a departed ſpirit for the detection of ſome enormous crime.

About ten at night the gentlemen met in the chamber in which the girl, ſuppoſed to be diſturbed by a ſpirit, had, with proper caution, been put to bed by ſeveral ladies. They ſat rather more than an hour, and, hearing nothing, went down ſtairs, when they interrogated the father of the girl, who denied, in the ſtrongeſt terms, any knowledge or belief of fraud.

The ſuppoſed ſpirit had before publickly promiſed, by an affirmative knock, that it would attend one of the gentlemen into the vault under the church of St. John, Clerkenwell, where the body was depoſited, and give a token of her preſence there by a knock upon her coffin: it was therefore determined to make this trial of the exiſtence or veracity of the ſuppoſed ſpirit.

While they were enquiring and deliberating, they were ſummoned into the girl's chamber by ſome ladies, who were near her bed, and who had heard knocks and ſcratches. When the gentlemen entered, the girl declared that ſhe felt the ſpirit like a mouſe upon her back, and was required to hold her hands out of bed. From that time, though the ſpirit was very ſolemnly required to manifeſt its exiſtence, by appearance, by impreſſion on the hand or body of any preſent, by ſcratches, knocks, or any other agency, no evidence of any preternatural power was exhibited.

The ſpirit was then very ſeriouſly advertized, that the perſon to whom the promiſe was made, of ſtriking the coffin, was then about to viſit the vault, and that the performance of the promiſe was then claimed. The company, at one o'clock, went into the church, and the gentleman, to whom the promiſe was made, went, with one more, into the vault. The ſpirit was ſolemnly required to perform its promiſe; but nothing more than ſilence enſued: the perſon ſuppoſed to be accuſed by the ſpirit then went down, with ſeveral others; but no effect was perceived. Upon their return they examined the girl, but could draw no confeſſion from her. Between two and three ſhe deſired, and was permitted, to go home with her father.

It was therefore the opinion of the whole aſſembly, that the child had ſome art of making or counterfeiting particular noiſes, and that there was no agency of any higher cauſe.

This myſterious affair, however, was afterwards diſcovered to be no more than a wicked contrivance to be revenged on Mr. K—, for ſuing for a ſmall ſum of money he had lent, and could not otherwiſe recover, from one of the parties concerned. Mr. K— being ſufficiently ſupported by evidence of the premiſes, indicted William Parſons and Elizabeth his wife, the parents of the girl that acted the chief part in this affair, and alſo the reverend Mr. Moor, and a reputable tradeſman, for a conſpiracy, in the affair of the Cock-lane ghoſt, to injure his character: and their trials came on before lord chief juſtice Mansfield in the court of King's-bench at Guildhall, by a ſpecial jury, on the tenth and twelfth of July, when, after a trial of twelve hours, the conſpirators were found guilty, and puniſhed. The clergyman and another were brought to the bar and ſeverely reprimanded, and, having compromiſed the affair with the proſecutor, for a ſum of money, they were diſmiſſed. Parſons was pilloried three times in one month, and impriſoned two years; his wife was impriſoned one year: and Mary Frazier ſent to Bridewell for ſix months.

On the ninth of February, the banks of the Thames were ſo overflowed that many full caſks and other merchandize were ſwept away from the keys and wharfs, and the priſon-yard of the borough compter was ſome inches under water. And on the tenth of March the tide roſe ſo high, that it flowed into Weſtminſter-hall as far as the ſtairs leading up to the houſe of commons.

The great ſucceſs of his majeſty's operations by ſea being farther crowned in the conqueſt of Martinico (the moſt conſiderable of the French ſugar-iſlands) the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, on the ſeventh of April, waited on his majeſty with the following congratulatory addreſs on the occaſion:

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty.

The humble addreſs of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, of the city of London, on the conqueſt of the iſland of Martinico, preſented April 7.

" May it pleaſe your majeſty,

" Graciouſly to accept the humble congratu-
" lations of your ever dutiful and loyal ſubjects,
" the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, of " your city of London, in common-council aſ-
" ſembled, upon the glorious and important
" conqueſt of the ſtrong, fertile, and opulent
" iſland of Martinico, and the conſequential ſur-
" render of the iſland of St. Lucia; acquiſitions
" doubly valuable, as they conſiderably diminiſh
" the naval and commercial ſtrength of France,
" and proportionably extend and ſecure the com" merce and navigation of Great Britain and her " colonies.

" The amazing rapidity of this conqueſt re" flects a luſtreupon our former triumphs, as " well as the higheſt honour upon the royal wiſ-
" dom that planned and directed, the ſkill, unan-
" imity, and activity, that conducted, and the " heroic valour of the fleet and army that effect-
" ed it with ſo little loſs, and leaves your majeſty
" at full liberty to turn your victorious arms to
" other places, where the enemies of your ma-
" jeſty and your kingdoms are no leſs vulnera" ble, and will moſt ſenſibly feel the neceſſity of " diſſolving their late dangerous compact, and
" of ſubmitting to terms of peace adequate to " our ſucceſſes, and the expences of this juſt and
" neceſſary war; your majeſty, undazzled by
" the ſplendor of repeated victories, having no
" other view than to vindicate the honour of " your crown, and to eſtabliſh and ſecure the juſt
" rights and poſſeſſions of your ſubjects.

" In ſo laudable a purſuit, ſo becoming the " father of his people, your majeſty may firmly
" rely on the ſtrongeſt and moſt chearful efforts
" of the grateful citizens of London, united in " duty and affection to your majeſty's ſacred per-
" ſon and government, and in zeal for the glory
" and proſperity of their country."

" I

" I thank you for your loyal and affectionate " congratulations upon our late important ſuc- " ceſs. Too much praiſe cannot be given to the " bravery and conduct of my fleet and army. " You ſay truly that I am not dazzled by the " ſplendor of repeated victories: the permanent " proſperity of my people, as a free and com- " mercial nation, has always been the object of " my ambition: what conduces moſt to that end, " I ſhall ever count my greateſt glory."

The city of London having laboured under great inconveniences for want of a proper ſupply of wholeſome fiſh at a moderate price, an act of parliament was paſſed this ſeſſions for better ſupplying the cities of London and Weſtminſter with fiſh, to reduce the exorbitant price thereof, and to encourage and protect fiſhermen. The particulars of which act were as follow:

That any perſon, though no fiſhermonger, may buy, at any market, ſea-coaſt, or river, &c. any fiſh in ſeaſon, and ſizeable, paying the accuſtomed dues at the place of purchaſe, and may ſell the ſame again in any fiſh or fleſh market, paying the uſual market dues, Covent-garden market and the precincts thereof excepted.

Such fiſh ſhall not be reſold by the firſt purchaſer, before the ſame ſhall be brought to London or Weſtminſter, or to where conſigned, under penalty of twenty pounds, and ſhall be conveyed to the places conſigned, without being liable to be ſtopped, and expoſed to ſale on the way.

Carriages employed in this ſervice ſhall carry fiſh only, and ſhall be marked on the outſide, Fiſh Machine Only; and ſhall be entered at the office for licenſing hackney-coaches, paying one ſhilling for the regiſtering: and numbered, on penalty of forty ſhillings, and ſhall not be liable to be deemed common ſtage-waggons, &c.

They ſhall be permitted to travel with four horſes in pairs, or with one horſe, or three horſes in length, though with narrow wheels, and ſhall pay the like toll as poſt-chaiſes, &c. drawn by a like number of horſes; and ſhall be allowed to travel on Sundays and holidays; as ſhall alſo the returned horſes of ſuch carriages; and neither carriage nor horſes, if returning empty, ſhall be liable to pay toll; and if any game, or other thing beſides fiſh, and the neceſſary implements of the carriage, be put therein for conveyance, the perſon putting in the ſame ſhall forfeit five pounds, and if the driver ſhall take up, or ſuffer any paſſenger, game, or other thing, to be carried therein, he ſhall forfeit forty ſhillings, and on non-payment ſhall be committed and kept to hard labour for any time not exceeding one month.

If bulk ſhall be broke of any fiſh carriage conſigned for the London markets, &c. before being brought within the bills of mortality, or ſale made of the fiſh before they are expoſed in the ſaid markets, the offender forfeits ten pounds.

The fiſh, after being ſo brought up, ſhall be forthwith ſorted, and expoſed to ſale in ſome public market the next morning, Sundays excepted; and until ſuch fiſh is ſo expoſed, no part thereof ſhall be ſold by retail, on penalty of ten pounds, but mackarel brought up by ſuch carriages, may be ſold on Sundays.

All contracts made for fiſh, except for ſalmon and lobſters, are vacated after May 1, 1762, and the parties diſcharged from the penalties of their contracts; and perſons contracting after the ſaid time for buying up fiſh, other than ſalmon and lobſters, before the ſame ſhall be firſt brought to market, and duly expoſed to ſale there, ſhall forfeit fifty pounds, and the contract is declared void.

And after May 1, 1762, no contract for Britiſh ſalmon and lobſters ſhall be in force longer than one year; and the like ſhall take place with reſpect to any parole contracts.

After May 1, 1762, no perſon ſhall employ, or be employed, in buying at the markets of London and Weſtminſter, &c. any fiſh brought thither for ſale, to be afterwards divided among fiſhmongers, or others, to be ſold; nor ſhall any perſon buy, in the ſaid markets, any fiſh but what ſhall be for his own ſale or uſe, on penalty of twenty pounds.

No ſaleſman or other perſon ſhall refuſe to ſell, or enter into an agreement not to ſell, to or for any particular perſon's uſe, any fiſh expoſed to ſale, at a public market, on penalty of twenty pounds.

And all fiſh of the reſpective ſorts hereafter ſpecified, brought after May 1, 1762, for ſale to the London markets, ſhall be openly ſold at the firſt hand, and in no greater number or quantity in a lot than is hereafter preſcribed; and and every lot ſhall conſiſt of one ſort of fiſh only, viz.

All freſh ſalmon, ſturgeon, large freſh cod, ſkait, turbot, bret, brill, pearl, kingſton, ling, and dorys, by the ſingle fiſh: all half freſh cod, not exceeding two in any one lot: all quarter freſh cod, not exceeding four in any one lot: all mullets, cole-fiſh, ſalmon-trout, and other trouts, not exceeding two in any one lot; all ſmall cod, not exceeding twenty-four in any one lot, in Billingſgate market, or within 150 yards of Billingſgate dock; and in any other market within the weekly bills of mortality, not exceeding eight in any one lot.

Small pike, Billingſgate, ſix in a lot; other markets four.

Large haddock, Billingſgate, four; other markets two.

Small haddock, Billingſgate, twenty-four; other markets eight.

Carp, gurnet, tench, and ſea baſs, Billingſgate, ſix; other markets four.

Thornbacks, Billingſgate, two; other markets one.

Large ſoals, Billingſgate, four pair; other markets two pair.

Small ſoals, Billingſgate, eight pair; other markets four pair.

Mackarel, whitings, whiting-pouts, plaice, dabbs, herrings, pilchards, garb-fiſh, flounders, and maids, Billingſgate, ſixty; other markets thirty.

Smelts, Billingſgate, fifty-two; other markets twenty-ſix.

Eels,

Eels, Billingſgate, twenty pounds; other markets ten pounds, unleſs any ſingle fiſh ſhall exceed that weight.

Large lobſters and crabs, Billingſgate, twenty; other markets, ten.

Small lobſters and crabs, Billingſgate, 40; other markets ten.

None of the ſaid ſeveral ſpecies of fiſh ſhall be bought or ſold at the firſt hand, in the ſaid markets, in a greater number or quantity in a lot than is preſcribed above, nor more than one ſort of fiſh in a lot ſhall be ſold, or offered for ſale, on penalty of five pounds.

But a ſmaller number of any of the ſaid fiſh than a lot conſiſts of, if it contains more than one; and alſo a leſſer weight of eels than makes one lot, may be ſold or expoſed to ſale in the ſaid markets.

No fiſh ſhall be ſold again, or expoſed to ſale the ſame day, in the ſame market where it was before ſold, on penalty of ten pounds, but the buyer may ſell the ſame, whilſt ſound and wholeſome, in any other place.

Before any fiſh, to be ſold at the firſt hand in any of the ſaid markets, be expoſed to ſale, an account of the ſorts, and quantity of each, in large legible characters, ſhall be put up at the fiſh-ſtand (the number of flounders, plaice, dabbs, excepted; and alſo of mackarel, maids, herrings, and pilchards;) and if any other fiſh of the ſorts mentioned in the act be brought for ſale, before the market of the day is over, they ſhall likewiſe be added to the account, before they are expoſed to ſale; and the ſaid accounts ſhall be kept up, undefaced, till all the fiſh be ſold, or the market be over, on penalty of five pounds. Or if any perſon, before ſuch time, ſhall wilfully take down, deface or alter, the accounts ſo put up, or cauſe the ſame to be done, he ſhall forfeit forty ſhillings.

No fiſherman, &c. after the arrival of his veſſel from fiſhing, ſhall deſtroy, or caſt away, any of the fiſh, not being unwholeſome, periſhed, or unmarketable, remaining unſold after market is over, on penalty of being committed and kept to hard labour for any time not exceeding two months, nor leſs than one week.

The proviſions in this act touching the ſale or buying of fiſh within the bills of mortality, and penalties for non-obſervance thereof, ſhall extend to the pariſh of St. Mary-le-bone in Middleſex.

The prohibitory clauſes in this act againſt contracts ſhall not extend to thoſe made, or to be made, with regard to ſalt or dried fiſh, oyſters, carp, or tench.

No information ſhall be received by a juſtice againſt any perſon for being concerned in any contract for buying up fiſh to be ſold again contrary to this act; but the penalty for entering into ſuch contract, ſhall be recoverable only, with double coſts, in one of the courts of Weſtminſter; one moiety to go to Greenwich hoſpital, and the other to the proſecutor.

The queen being happily delivered of a prince on the twelfth of Auguſt, the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, waited on his majeſty, on the fourteenth, with their compliments of congratulation, in the following addreſs:

" Moſt gracious Sovereign,

" We, your majeſty's ever dutiful and loyal " ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com- " mons of your city of London, in common- " council aſſembled, humbly beg leave to em- " brace this earlieſt opportunity of congratulat- " ing your majeſty upon the ſafe and happy de- " livery of the queen, and the auſpicious birth " of a prince.

" So important an event, and upon a day ever " ſacred to the liberty of theſe kingdoms, fills " us with the moſt grateful ſentiments of the " divine goodneſs, that has thus early crowned " your majeſty's domeſtic happineſs, and opened " to your people the agreeable proſpect of per- " manence and ſtability to the bleſſings they de- " rive from the wiſdom and ſteadineſs of your " majeſty's victorious reign.

" May the ſame gracious providence ſoon re- " ſtore your majeſty's moſt amiable and beloved " conſort, and give perfect health and length of " days to the royal infant.

" Long, very long, may your majeſty live, " the guardian and protector, the ornament and " delight of Great-Britain; and, by your inſtruc- " tions and example, form the mind of your royal " ſon, to the government of a free, brave, and " generous people: and, in the fulneſs of time, " may that ſon ſucceed to the virtues as well as to " the throne of his royal father; and preſerve, " for a long ſucceſſion of years, the glory, hap- " pineſs, and proſperity of his country."

To which addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following moſt gracious anſwer:

" I receive with the greateſt pleaſure, theſe " very affectionate expreſſions of your duty and " attachment to me and to my family; and thank " you for your congratulations upon an event ſo " intereſting to me, and to the future welfare of " my people, with which my own happineſs, " upon this and every other occaſion, is inſepa- " rably connected. The city of London may " always depend upon my conſtant favour and " protection."

Soon after her majeſty's delivery, the waggons with the treaſure of the Hermione (a ſpaniſh regiſter ſhip taken by the Engliſh, and whoſe cargo conſiſted of near twelve millions of money) entered St. James's-Street; on which his majeſty and the nobility went to the windows over the palace-gate to ſee them, and joined their acclamations on two ſuch joyful occaſions: from whence the proceſſion proceeded to the Tower in the following order.

A company of light-horſe attended with kettle drums, French horns, trumpets, and hautboys.

A covered waggon decorated with an Engliſh jack, and a Spaniſh flag underneath, hanging behind the waggon.

Two more covered waggons.

Seven

Seven waggons uncovered.

One covered waggon, decorated with an Engliſh jack, and a Spaniſh flag underneath.

Another covered waggon, decorated with an Engliſh pendant, and a Spaniſh one underneath.

Several waggons uncovered.

And laſtly, a covered waggon, decorated with an Engliſh jack, and a Spaniſh flag.

In the whole twenty waggons.

The proceſſion was concluded with an officer on horſeback, carrying an Engliſh enſign, attended by another holding a drawn cutlaſs.

The eſcort to each waggon conſiſted of four marines, with their bayonets fixed. And the whole cavalcade was ſaluted by the populace with the greateſt acclamations of joy.

About ten o'clock at night on the twenty-fourth, a moſt dreadful ſtorm of thunder and lightning began at London, which greatly alarmed the inhabitants: about eleven it was accompanied by a heavy rain, which, with ſome intermiſſion, continued till near four the next morning. The flaſhes of lightning were particularly pale and very frequent. At times there were ſix or ſeven of them ſucceſſively, almoſt without intermiſſion. They caſt ſuch a light, that objects in the adjacent parts of this metropolis were plainly diſtinguiſhed two and three miles diſtance.

Negociations of peace with France being abſolutely determined on by the court, and miniſters appointed on the part of each nation to tranſact the affairs in debate at London and Paris, the French king nominated the duke de Nivernois to reſide at London for that purpoſe, and the court of London appointed his grace the duke of Bedford to go to Paris to treat of peace, of which reſolution the miniſtry thought proper to inform the Lord-mayor of London by the following ſpecial letter, dated the thirtieth of Auguſt:

" To the right hon. the Lord-mayor.

" My Lord,

" I have the earl of Egremont's directions to " acquaint your lordſhip, that, in conſequence of " his moſt chriſtian majeſty's nomination of the " duke de Nivernois to come here to treat of a " peace, the king has been pleaſed to name the " duke of Bedford to go to Paris for the ſame " purpoſe; and his grace's appointment will be " declared on Wedneſday next the firſt of Sep- " tember. My lord Egremont thinks it may be " of uſe to make this public in the city as ſoon " as poſſible.

" I am with the greateſt reſpect,
" My Lord, your lordſhip's moſt obedient " humble Servant, R. Wood."

About two o'clock in the morning on the eighth of September, a fire broke out at the back of a ſtair-caſe in the preſs-yard, Newgate, which in a few hours conſumed all the apartments in that place, greatly damaged the chapel, and the back part of a houſe belonging to a ſtocking-trimmer, in Phœnix-court, Newgate-ſtreet. There were two unfortunate priſoners in the rooms which were burnt, who periſhed in the flames: the one was captain Ogle, who had been tried for murder, but being found a lunatic was ordered to remain in priſon; the other unhappy perſon was one Thomas Smith, who had been confined on ſuſpicion of ſtealing corn, and left a wife and three children; the former of whom, the night preceeding the accident, carried him his whole effects, amounting, in money and bank bills, to between five and ſix hundred pounds. He was heard to call out for help, and ſeen to put his arm through the iron grate, which was ſo exceſſive hot, that it ſet his ſhirt on fire, at which time it was imagined he threw his pocket-book out with the notes in it, which were ſaved. In a few minutes after the floor fell in, and they were both buried in the ruins; for it burnt ſo violently, and the flames ſpread ſo faſt, that none of the people could get to their aſſiſtance. The fury of the flames was greatly abated by ſix, but continued burning till two in the afternoon, when a party wall fell down, but happily did no damage. Though the confuſion was ſo great, not one priſoner eſcaped, nor were any hurt, except the two unfortunate perſons abovementioned.

On the ſixteenth another fire broke out at a carpenter's in Great Pultney-ſtreet, by Carnaby-market, occaſioned by a woman lodger reading in bed, which, in a ſhort time, entirely conſumed that houſe, and greatly damaged two others adjoining. The greateſt part of the houſe was in flames before the lodgers knew of their danger; two of whom, a man and his wife, were burnt in their bed; and ſeveral, to eſcape the flames, threw themſelves out of the windows, but received ſo much hurt, that they were obliged to be carried to the hoſpital; among the latter a poor woman died as ſhe was carrying there.

On the twenty-ninth of September came on at Guildhall the election of a Lord-mayor for the year enſuing, when alderman Beckford and alderman Bridgen were returned to the court of aldermen; and upon their ſcrutiny, there were eighteen votes for Mr. Beckford, and one for Mr. Bridgen; in conſequence of which the former was declared duly elected. Mr. Beckford, it was imagined, would have fined rather than have ſerved; but the livery having elected him, he was determined, he ſaid, to ſerve the office to the beſt of his abilities, let the conſequence to himſelf be what it might.

On the fourth of October, the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of London waited on his majeſty with the following addreſs of congratulation on the conqueſt of the Havannah:

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty.

The humble addreſs of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled.

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" We your majeſty's ever dutiful and loyal " ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com-

" mons of your city of London, in common-
" council aſſembled, humbly beg leave to con" gratulate your majeſty upon the late ſignal
" ſucceſs with which it hath pleaſed the Al-
" mighty to bleſs your majeſty's arms, in the re" duction of the Havannah and its dependencies
" (moſt properly ſtiled the key of the Spaniſh
" Weſt-Indies, and long deemed impregnable)
" under a capitulation that does honour to the " ſpirit and humanity of the Britiſh nation.

" It is with the higheſt pleaſure we reflect " upon the value and importance of this con-
" queſt, attended with the acquiſition of im-
" menſe riches, and an irreparable blow to the " trade and naval power of Spain. A conqueſt
" that gives additional luſtre to an already glori-
" ous and ſucceſsful war; and which cannot but
" ſtrike terror into an enemy, not only unpro-
" voked, but inſenſible to the repeated inſtances
" of your majeſty's good-will, friendſhip, and " moderation; and convince him, that there is " no attempt, how arduous ſoever, but what,
" planned and directed by the wiſdom of your
" majeſty's councils, may, under the divine pro-
" vidence, be effected by the harmony, activity,
" and abilities, of ſuch commanders, and the " valour, zeal, and emulation of your fleets and
" armies, regardleſs of any fatigues or dangers,
" wherever the glory of their king and country
" is concerned.

" May the poſſeſſion of this very valuable
" conqueſt, together with other happy conſe-
" quences of your majeſty's meaſures, thus wiſely
" and vigorouſly purſued, prove the means of " effectually defeating the ambitious views of " your majeſty's enemies, and of for ever diſ-
" ſolving the late alarming compact of the houſe
" of Bourbon, calculated to deſtroy the com" merce of your ſubjects, and replete with dan" ger to the exiſtence of your majeſty's ancient " and natural ally, and to the independence of " the reſt of the powers of Europe.

" And we beg leave humbly to aſſure your
" majeſty, that your faithful citizens of London,
" animated with the warmeſt ſenſe of duty to " your majeſty and their country, will, with
" unwearied chearfulneſs, contribute their utmoſt
" efforts to ſtrengthen your majeſty's hands, until " your enemies, moved by their own repeated
" loſſes and diſtreſſes, ſhall be diſpoſed to liſten
" to ſuch terms of accommodation as your royal
" wiſdom ſhall think adequate to our glorious
" ſucceſſes; and ſuch as may effectually ſecure
" the trade and navigation of your ſubjects, and
" prevent the calamities of a future war."

On the twenty-ſeventh of this month it appeared that, by the rains which fell for ſome days paſt, a high tide in the river Thames, and a ſtrong gale of wind at north, the rivers within twenty-miles of London were ſo raiſed, that the like had never been known in the memory of man; and the damage that was ſuſtained, more eſpecially on the river Lee, was almoſt incredible. In leſs than five hours the water roſe twelve feet in perpendicular height. About Stratford, Weſtham, Plaiſtow, Waltham-abbey, and along the marſhes, they were very fatal to the inhabitants. Moſt of their cattle in the fields were carried off; likewiſe ſtacks of hay and wood, with the loſs of all the hogs that were in their ſtyes and yards, together with all the horſes that were in the ſtables.

In ſome parts of Stratford the flood reached their chamber windows, and the face of the waters was covered with the bodies of the beaſts that periſhed. From the neareſt computation that could be made, not leſs than 5000 hogs periſhed in this flood, together with all the horſes and other cattle that were in the meadows, whoſe numbers were very conſiderable. The flood extended itſelf over all the cauſeways, and ſeveral people were loſt in the high roads; a woman and horſe, and a gentleman in a poſt chaiſe, with the horſes and poſt-boy, all periſhed in the water; and three of the paſſengers in the Bury-machine, with two of the horſes, were alſo drowned. The china works beyond Bow-bridge were overflowed in ſuch a manner that the current ruſhed through the great arch like the tide through the arches of London-bridge. The callico-grounds in the neighbourhood of Bow and Stratford were all overflowed, and great quantities of linen carried off. The houſes from Bow-bridge to Stratford were all under water, and the inhabitants were compelled to take refuge by getting out of their windows. This powerful innundation was productive of the like diſmal conſequences in moſt other parts of the kingdom.

On the eighth of November the right honourable the Lord-mayor received the following letter from the ſecretary of ſtate's-office, which was ſent to him in conſequence of the preliminary articles of peace having been ſigned by the duke of Bedford:

To the right honourable the Lord-mayor.

" My Lord, Cleaveland-row Nov. 8, 1762.

" I am directed by my lord Egremont to ac-
" quaint your lordſhip, that one of his majeſty's
" meſſengers has this moment brought an ac-
" count of the duke of Bedford's having ſigned
" the preliminary articles of peace with France
" and Spain, at Fontainbleau, on the third in" ſtant. The ſecretary of ſtate's intention, for " making this immediate communication to your
" lordſhip of the firſt account relative to the ſig-
" nature of the preliminaries, which has been
" tranſmitted to his office by the king's miniſter
" at Paris, is in order to have it publicly known
" in the city without loſs of time. Your lordſhip
" will, no doubt, take ſuch ſteps as are moſt
" proper to anſwer the purpoſe.

" I am, &c. R. Wood."

And on the firſt of December the ceſſation of arms was proclaimed in the uſual places, and with the accuſtomed ceremonies.

On the thirteenth of February, 1763, the Thames roſe ſo high, that many houſes on the Surry ſide were four or five feet under water: the long walk at Lambeth, by the biſhop's-palace, was overflowed, and boats were employed in the town to carry people from houſe to houſe. The damage damage done by this high tide was computed at 20,000l. In Weſtminſter-hall the water was four feet deep; and the inhabitants of Tooly-ſtreet and Wapping were obliged to keep to their upper rooms.

On the twenty-fourth a riot happened at Covent garden theatre, occaſioned by a demand being made for full prices throughout the whole performance of Artaxerxes: all the benches in the boxes and the pit were entirely torn up, the glaſſes and chandeliers broken, and the linings of the boxes cut to pieces. The raſhneſs of the rioters was ſo great, that they cut away the wooden pillars between the boxes, ſo that, if the inſide of them had not been iron, they would have brought down the galleries upon their own heads. The damages were computed at two thouſand pounds

On the twenty-ſecond of March the definitive treaty of peace was proclaimed at the uſual places, purſuant to his majeſty's royal warrant ſigned for that purpoſe.

There being at this time a bill depending in parliament to ſubject the makers of cyder and perry to the exciſe laws. The court of common-council, on the above day, unanimouſly came to the following reſolution:

"That it is the opinion of this court, that a "petition be prepared to the honourable houſe "of commons, againſt ſo much of the bill now "depending in that houſe, for granting an addi-"tional duty on wine, cyder, and perry, as re-"lates to ſubjecting the makers of cyder and "perry to the laws of exciſe."

And at another court held the next day, a motion was made that inſtructions ſhould be given to the members of this city, in regard to the ſaid petition, and a committee of four aldermen and eight commoners was appointed to prepare the ſame, which being done, and read in court, was unanimouſly agreed to.

The repreſentation of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled, to the repreſentatives of this city in parliament.

"This court cannot forbear expreſſing to you their ſurprize, at the precipitate progreſs which has been already made in a new attempt towards a general exciſe. The extenſion of exciſe laws into private houſes, whereby the ſubject is made liable to a frequent and arbitrary viſitation of officers, and the judicial determination of commiſſioners, removeable at pleaſure, is inconſiſtent with thoſe principles of liberty which have hitherto diſtinguiſhed this nation from arbitrary governments. An attack upon the liberty of the ſubject, made ſo immediately after a glorious and ſucceſsful war, and at a time when we had juſt reaſon to expect to enjoy the bleſſings of peace, demands your ſerious attention. And this court doth remark, that whatever may be the neceſſity of the times, the ſmallneſs of the ſum indicates that cannot be the only motive to ſo extraordinary a meaſure. For theſe reaſons, this court doth earneſtly recommend your conſtant attendance in parliament, and utmoſt endeavours to oppoſe every enlargement or extenſion of the powers of exciſe; and that you do not conceal from the public any ſuch attempt, nor ſuffer yourſelves to be amuſed by any plauſible alteration in the bill ſubjecting the makers of cyder and perry, to exciſe laws."

And on the twenty-eighth the ſaid court, having been informed that the commons had paſſed and ſent up the cyder bill to the lords, reſolved that an humble petition ſhould be preſented, in their name, to the houſe of lords, and another to the king, praying that the ſaid bill might not paſs into a law. The petition to his majeſty was as follows:

"The humble petition of the Lord-mayor, al-"dermen, and commons, of the city of "London, in common-council aſſembled,

"Moſt humbly ſheweth,

"That your petitioners are fully convinced, "that the collecting the duties intended to be "laid on the makers of cyder and perry, by "way of exciſe, is not nor can in many inſtances "be, ſo regulated, but that it will occaſion num-"berleſs difficulties and queſtions.

"That the method of trial and deciſion of "exciſe diſputes are founded only in neceſſity, "being in their nature arbitrary, and inconſiſtent "with the principles of liberty, and the happy "conſtitution of your majeſty's government.

"That the expoſing private houſes to be en-"tered into and ſearched, at pleaſure, by per-"ſons unknown, will be a badge of ſlavery upon "your people.

"That your petitioners, firmly confiding in "your majeſty's favour, and filled with a moſt "humble and grateful ſenſe of your paternal af-"fection for your people, moſt humbly beſeech "your majeſty to protect their liberty, and keep "them happy and at eaſe; free from the appre-"henſion of being diſturbed in their property; "by which your majeſty will erect a laſting "monument of your goodneſs in every houſe in "the kingdom.

"Your petitioners, therefore, moſt humbly "implore your majeſty, that you will not give "your royal aſſent to ſo much of the bill, as "ſubjects the makers of cyder and perry, to ex-"ciſe laws.

"And your petitioners ſhall ever pray, &c."

For theſe zealous endeavours to oppoſe a bill ſo detrimental to the ſubject, the citizens received the particular thanks of the city of Exeter, and were greatly applauded by their fellow ſubjects in general; but their petitions had not ſufficient effect to prevent the ſaid bill paſſing into a law: though, by their repeated applications it was afterwards repealed.

On the ninth of April ſome recruits confined in the Savoy for the Eaſt-India ſervice, roſe upon the centinels, wreſted their arms from them, and made themſelves maſters of the keys; but the guards in the barracks being alarmed, another fray enſued, in which three of the recruits were

ſhot dead, ſome others mortally wounded, and one of the ſoldiers had his hand ſo ſhattered, that it was obliged to be cut off.

On the eighteenth the two ambaſſadors extraordinary from the republic of Venice to the court of London, made their public entry through the city to Somerſet-houſe, in the following manner:

The whole company aſſembled at Greenwich, from whence they ſet off between twelve and one. There were three ſtate barges, viz. the queen's of ten oars, and two others of eight oars each, with another of ſix oars for their attendants: beſides a great number of other barges belonging to the nobility and gentry, who accompanied the proceſſion.

They landed about three o'clock at the Tower, from whence they proceeded in the following order through the Minories, Leadenhall-ſtreet, Cornhill, Cheapſide, Ludgate-ſtreet, Fleet-ſtreet, and along the Strand to Somerſet-houſe, where they were entertained at the king's expence, till their audience of his majeſty.

Four king's under marſhal-men on horſeback.

City marſhal on horſeback.

Maſter of the ceremonies aſſiſtant, in a coach and ſix.

Thirty eight footmen, two and two, on foot.

Eight gentlemen of the bedchambers, belonging to the ambaſſadors, on horſeback, two and two.

Houſe ſteward alone, on horſeback.

Eight pages on horſeback, two and two.

Kettle drum.

Second maſter of the horſe, alone.

King's ſtate-coach, with the ambaſſadors, the earl of Guilford, and maſter of the ceremonies; ſix horſes.

King's ſecond coach, with the two ſecretaries to the embaſſy, ſix horſes.

Six gentlemen of the privy-chamber, in the next royal coaches.

The queen, princeſs of Wales, duke of York, princeſs Auguſta, duke of Cumberland, and princeſs Amelia's coaches with ſix horſes each.

The ambaſſador's grand ſtate-coach with eight horſes, empty.

The ſecond coach empty, with ſix horſes.

The third coach with two Venetian noblemen, ſix horſes.

The peer's coaches and ſix.

All the dreſſes of the perſons attending this proceſſion, both on the water, as well as at land, were extremely ſplendid.

On the 29th John Wilkes, eſq; member of parliament for Ayleſbury, was taken into cuſtody by a warrant from the ſecretary of ſtate, for writing a paper called the North-Briton, No. 45, and after examination was committed to the Tower. At the ſame time all his papers were ſeized, to be examined by perſons appointed by the ſecretaries. And on the third of May, he was brought from the Tower to the bar of the court of common-pleas, Weſtminſter, where he made the following ſpeech:

"My lords,

"I feel myſelf happy to be at laſt brought "before a court, and before judges whoſe cha- "racteriſtic is the love of liberty. I have many "humble thanks to return for the immediate or- "der you were pleaſed to iſſue, to give me an "opportunity of laying my grievances before "you. They are of a kind hitherto unparalleled "in this free country, and I truſt the conſequen- "ces will teach miniſters of Scottiſh and arbitrary "principles, that the liberty of an Engliſh ſub- "ject is not to be ſported away with impunity, in "this cruel and deſpotic manner.

"I am accuſed of being the author of the "North-Briton, No. 45. I ſhall only remark "upon that paper, that it takes all load of accu- "ſation from the ſacred name of a prince, whoſe "family I love and honour as the glorious de- "fenders of the cauſe of liberty, and whoſe per- "ſonal qualities are ſo amiable, great and re- "ſpectable, that he is deſervedly the idol of his "people. It is the peculiar faſhion and crime of "theſe times, and of thoſe who hold high mi- "niſterial offices in government, to throw every "odious charge from themſelves upon majeſty: "the author of this paper, whoever he may be, "has, upon conſtitutional principles, done di- "rectly the reverſe, and is therefore in me, the "ſuppoſed author, meant to be perſecuted ac- "cordingly; the particular cruelties of my treat- "ment, worſe than if I had been a Scotch rebel, "this court will hear, and I dare ſay, from your "juſtice in due time redreſs.

"I may, perhaps, ſtill have the means left me "to ſhew that I have been ſuperior to every "temptation of corruption. They may, indeed, "have flattered themſelves, that when they found "corruption could not prevail, perſecution might "intimidate. I will ſhew myſelf ſuperior to "both. My papers have been ſeized, perhaps "with a hope the better to deprive me of that "proof of their meanneſs and corrupt prodiga- "lity, which it may, poſſibly, in a proper place "be yet in my power to give."

The caſe was then learnedly argued by eminent lawyers on both ſides, and when they had finiſhed, the court, after making a polite excuſe to Mr. Wilkes for the delay, took time to conſider the caſe; and to give their opinion: therefore they remanded him priſoner to the Tower, till Friday the ſixth of May. On which day he was brought up to the court of common-pleas, where the lord chief juſtice and the other judges being aſſembled, Mr. Wilkes addreſſed them as follows:

"My lords,

"Far be it from me to regret that I have paſ- "ſed ſo many more days in captivity, as it will "have afforded you an opportunity of doing, "upon mature reflection, and repeated examina- "tion, the more ſignal juſtice to my country. "The liberty of all peers and gentlemen, and "what touches me more ſenſibly, that of all the middling

" middling and inferior claſs of people, who " ſtand moſt in need of protection, is, in my " caſe, this day to be finally decided upon: a " queſtion of ſuch importance as to deter- " mine at once, whether Engliſh liberty be " a reality or a ſhadow. Your own free-born " hearts will feel with indignation and compaſſion " all that load of oppreſſion under which I have " ſo long laboured. Cloſe impriſonment, the " effect of premeditated malice, all acceſs for " more than two days denied to me, my houſe " ranſacked and plundered, my moſt private and " ſecret concerns divulged; every vile and malig- " nant inſinuation, even of high treaſon itſelf, " no leſs induſtriouſly than falſly circulated by " my cruel and implacable enemies, together " with all the various inſolence of office, form " but a part of my unexampled ill treatment. " Such inhuman principles of ſtar-chamber ty- " ranny will, I truſt, by this court, upon this " ſolemn occaſion, be finally extirpated; and " henceforth every innocent man, however poor " and unſupported, may hope to ſleep in peace " and ſecurity in his own houſe, unviolated by " king's meſſengers, and the arbitrary mandates " of an overbearing ſecretary of ſtate.

" I will no longer delay your juſtice. The na- " tion is impatient to hear, nor can they be ſafe " or happy till that is obtained. If the ſame " perſecution is after all to carry me before ano- " ther court, I hope I ſhall find that the genuine " ſpirit of Magna Charta, that glorious inheri- " tance, that diſtinguiſhing characteriſtic of En- " gliſhmen, is as religiouſly revered there, as I " know it is here, by the great perſonages before " whom I have now the happineſs to ſtand; and " (as in the memorable caſe of the impriſoned " biſhops) that an independent jury of free-born " Engliſhmen will perſiſt to determine my fate, " as in conſcience bound, upon conſtitutional " principles, by a verdict of guilty or not guilty. " I aſk no more at the hands of my country- " men."

When Mr. Wilkes had finiſhed his ſpeech, the lord chief juſtice ſtood up, and delivered the opinion of the court on the three following heads, which were chiefly inſiſted on by counſel:

1. The legality of Mr. Wilkes's commitment.

2. The neceſſity for a ſpecification of thoſe particular paſſages in the 45th number of the North Briton, which had been deemed a libel. And

3. Mr. Wilkes's privilege as a member of parliament.

To the firſt of theſe his lordſhip was of opinion, that Mr. Wilkes's commitment was not illegal.

To the ſecond, which required a ſpecification of the particular paſſages in the North Briton, which were deemed a libel, his lordſhip took notice, that the inſertion of theſe paſſages, ſo far as they related to the point in queſtion, was not at all neceſſary.

And to the laſt point he obſerved, that the privilege of parliament ſhould be held ſacred and inviolable; and as there were but three particular caſes in which that privilege was forfeited, it only remained to examine how far Mr. Wilkes's was endangered. Mr. Wilkes ſtood accuſed of writing a libel; a libel in the ſenſe of the law was a high miſdemeanor, but did not come within the deſcription of treaſon, felony, or breach of the peace; at moſt it had but a tendency to diſturb the peace, and conſequently could not be ſufficient to deſtroy the privilege of a member of parliament.

Thus was the point of privilege determined, and Mr. Wilkes, by order of the court, immediately diſcharged.

In his way from the hall to his houſe in Great George-ſtreet, he was ſurrounded by many gentlemen of diſtinction, amidſt the moſt repeated acclamations of more than ten thouſand people.

[The particulars reſpecting the above gentleman will be progreſſively given from this firſt circumſtance to the cloſe of our work.]

On the ſixth of May, about four o'clock in the morning, a terrble fire broke out at the houſe of lady Moleſworth, in Upper Brook-ſtreet, Groſvenor-ſquare, which, in a ſhort time, entirely conſumed the ſame, with all its furniture. Lady Moleſworth, her brother captain Uſher, her ſecond and third daughters, and four or five ſervants, periſhed in the flames. Her eldeſt daughter jumped out of a window and broke her leg; the mother intended to follow, but the fire overpowered her, and ſhe ſunk into the midſt of the flames. Her fourth and fifth daughters jumped out of a garret window; the former broke her thigh, and the latter was greatly bruiſed. Dr. Coote Moleſworth, with his lady, being on a viſit, narrowly eſcaped with their lives. The doctor's lady threw herſelf from a two pair of ſtairs window into the garden, and was much ſcorched and terribly bruiſed. The doctor hung from the window by his hands till a ladder was brought him. An elderly woman, governeſs of the children, threw herſelf out of the nurſery-window, and was killed on the ſpot. One of the footmen, in jumping from a window, fell upon the iron ſpikes, where he hung till a chairman, at the hazard of his own life, took him off; but he afterwards died of his wound. Notwithſtanding the fire in this houſe was ſo fatal to its inhabitants, yet it is remarkable no other houſe received the leaſt damage.

In order to ſhew the contempt with which the citizens held the conduct of the miniſtry, in having made up a peace ſo very inadequate to the glorious ſucceſſes of the late war, it is only neceſſary to obſerve, that the common-council could by no means be prevailed on to addreſs: and the greateſt cavalcade which could be formed from the city for that purpoſe, conſiſted only of eight aldermen,* including the locum tenens at their

* On the twelfth of May 1763, between twelve and one o'clock, the following aldermen went in proceſſion from Guildhall to wait upon his majeſty with an addreſs on the peace:

Sir

their head, who, aſſuming the name of the Lord-mayor, and court of aldermen, waited on his majeſty with the following:

" Sir,

" Your majeſty's faithful and loyal ſubjects, " the Lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of " London, deſire to be permitted to pay their " humble duty to your majeſty, and to expreſs " their grateful ſenſe of your majeſty's gracious " and benevolent attention to your people, in re- " lieving them from the increaſing burdens of a " a long and expenſive, though glorious and ſuc- " ceſsful war.

" They enter not into a particular conſidera- " tion of the national advantages reſulting from " the treaty of peace, which your majeſty has " been pleaſed to conclude: Theſe have been " ſubmitted to a conſtitutional examination; but " they beg leave thus publicly to declare to your " majeſty their entire acquieſcence in a meaſure, " which your majeſty's councils, and the great " council of the nation, have ſeen reaſon to ap- " prove. And this they have thought it their " duty to do at this time, when they have with " concern obſerved a ſpirit of faction unhappily " ariſing, and are apprehenſive their ſilence " might be interpreted an encouragement of prac- " tices, which their dutiful attachment to your " majeſty's perſon and government leads them to " deteſt and abhor.

" They further beg leave to aſſure your majeſ- " ty, that as magiſtrates to whom the executive " power of the government of the city of Lon- " is intruſted, it ſhall be their conſtant endea- " vour to maintain and preſerve domeſtic tran- " quillity, order, and government, and that true " and perfect liberty, which has its foundation in " obedience to the laws, and of which licentiouſ- " neſs, though it often aſſumes the name, is, in " this country, the only enemy.

" By a conduct ſo conformable to your royal " example, they preſume to hope they ſhall in- " title themſelves to the continuance of your ma- " jeſty's protection and favour."

His majeſty's moſt gracious anſwer.

" I return you my ſincere thanks for this ad- " dreſs, and for the ſatisfaction you expreſs in " the ſucceſs of my endeavours to reſtore the " public peace.

" I receive with great pleaſure the aſſurances " you give me, of your abhorrence and deteſta- " tion of thoſe factious and licentious practices, " which, alone, can endanger our preſent happy " ſettlement, after the concluſion of peace with " all our foreign enemies.

" Your reſolution to ſupport, in oppoſition " thereto, the true conſtitutional liberty of theſe " kingdoms, is highly acceptable to me.

" The city of London may depend upon my " conſtant favour and protection."

The fourth of June being his majeſty's birth-day, the ſame was celebrated with more public demonſtrations of joy than had been ever known on a like occaſion. The principal buildings were grandly illuminated, as were almoſt all the private houſes in the ſquares and ſtreets of this metropolis; each vying with the other to expreſs their loyalty to their ſovereign, however they diſliked the meaſures of the miniſtry. A terrible accident happened in the evening on Tower-hill, where were exhibited grand fire-works at the public expence. The populace repaired thither in ſuch ſhoals, and crouded ſo faſt on each other, that the rails which ſurrounded a well, on the bank of the ditch, at the poſtern, gave way, and the multitude fell together about thirty feet deep. By which accident ſix were taken up dead, fourteen were ſo hurt that they died of their wounds, and many others were moſt dreadfully bruiſed.

About two o'clock in the morning on the 23d a fire broke out in King-ſtreet, Rotherhithe, which entirely conſumed fifteen houſes, beſides damaging many others. And on the tenth of July following, about one in the morning, a moſt terrible fire began in a ſtable, or ſome out-houſe, near the eaſt ſide of the plying-place called New-crane, in the pariſh of Shadwell, which communicated its flames to a loft adjoining, full of dry reeds for the uſe of the ſhip yard, in which it ſtood, and ſet fire to a ſhip in the dock. The wind being high, the flames immediately catched the back-fronts and out-buildings of the houſes next the water in the ſtreet called Wapping-wall; and ſo rapid was their progreſs, that before proper aſſiſtance could be brought, the fire croſſed the ſtreet, and, in a few hours, the houſes on both the ſouth and the north ſides were entirely conſumed. Eighty-ſeven houſes were burnt to the ground, and ſeveral perſons periſhed in the flames.

On the nineteenth of Auguſt, about twelve o'clock at noon, began a very terrible ſtorm of wind, rain, thunder, and lightning in this city, which was preceded by an almoſt total darkneſs. The air ſeemed greatly convulſed; the heat was intenſe, and was felt by the people as like the heat of an oven. The appearance of it being much the ſame as preceded the great earthquake at Liſbon, many people expected the moſt direful conſequences would follow: but it went off much

A great number of people aſſembled in Guildhall-yard to ſee them ſet out, who teſtified their diſpleaſure by continued hiſſing &c. As the proceſſion paſſed St. Bride's church the great bell began to toll, and then a dumb peal ſtruck up, which continued a conſiderable time; and at their return they were treated in the ſame manner by Bow bells.

milder in the city of London than in other places; for about Chatham the darkneſs was accompanied with one continual rolling of thunder for the ſpace of forty minutes, and the lightning was almoſt inceſſant, but at a great diſtance, for the ſame ſpace of time. At Twickenham large trees were torn up by the roots, ſtacks of chimnies were blown down, and other damage done by the hurricane that accompanied the darkneſs. About Reading ſeveral trees were torn up by the roots, two ſheep were killed, and ſeveral people were beat down and terribly frightened. At Brithelmſtone the ſtorm was very awful, and the oldeſt fiſhermen ſaid they had never ſeen any thing like it in their memories. About Maidſtone in Kent, the hops ſuffered conſiderably by the ſtorm. But the moſt ſurprizing circumſtance that attended this phænomenon was the ſudden flux and reflux of the tide in Plymouth pool, which exactly correſponded with the like agitation in the ſame place at the time of the great earthquake at Liſbon. At Sheerneſs, ſome dreadful convulſions of nature were apprehended. The windows expoſed to the fury of the ſtorm were cruſhed to pieces; fowls were killed by the hail and much damage done.

Her majeſty being ſafely delivered of a prince (afterwards chriſtened Frederick) the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, on the twenty-fifth waited on his majeſty with the following congratulatory addreſs on the occaſion:

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty.

The humble addreſs of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled.

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal " ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and com- " mons of the city of London, in common- " council aſſembled, moſt gladly embrace this " joyful occaſion of approaching your ſacred per- " ſon, with our ſincereſt and warmeſt congratu- " lations on the ſafe delivery of the queen, and " the auſpicious birth of another prince; firmly " truſting that every increaſe of your royal family " will prove an additional ſecurity to our religion, " and that great charter of liberty, which, in " conſequence of the glorious revolution, your " illuſtrious houſe was choſen to defend.

" Your majeſty's ever loyal and faithful citi- " zens of London, exceeded by none of your " ſubjects in honeſt and anxious zeal for your " majeſty's happineſs, and the glory and proſpe- " rity of your reign, rejoice in every event, which " augments your majeſty's domeſtic felicity.

" Permit us, royal Sir, to intreat your ma- " jeſty's acceptance of our faithful aſſurances, " that we will, at all times, be ready, chearfully " to render your majeſty every inſtance of alle- " giance and duty, which affectionate and loyal " ſubjects can pay to the beſt of princes."

His majeſty's moſt gracious anſwer.

" I thank you for this loyal addreſs, and for " the ſatisfaction you expreſs on the increaſe of " my family. The religion and liberties of my " people always have been, and ever ſhall be, " the conſtant objects of my care and attention. " I ſhall at all times depend upon the aſſurances " which you give me of your allegiance and " duty."

On the eighth of September another terrible fire broke out at Shadwell-dock, which burnt thirty houſes before it could be extinguiſhed, among which was Stoker's brewhouſe, and ſeveral others of great value.

On the twenty-ninth of September, William Bridgen, eſq; alderman of Farringdon without, was elected Lord- mayor of London for the year enſuing; at which time Mr. Beckford, the then Lord-mayor, roſe up, and addreſſed the livery as follows:

" Gentlemen, and fellow citizens,

" You were pleaſed to do me the honour of " electing me your firſt magiſtrate this day " twelvemonth, and I entered on that duty with " diffidence and reluctance, being conſcious to " myſelf, that it was not in my power to execute " ſo great a truſt with the aſſiduity and attention " that the dignity and importance of the office re- " quired; how far I have been able to go through " it with any degree of propriety, you are the " only judges. Very great aſſiſtance I have ex- " perienced from my brethren of the court of " aldermen, and I ſhall always retain a grateful " remembrance of their good-will towards me.

" The time of my mayoralty draws near a " concluſion; and I can ſafely ſay, it will give " me more comfort and ſatisfaction of mind to " quit, than it ever did to receive this high ho- " nour, the greateſt that can fall to the ſhare of " a citizen. That ſatisfaction is increaſed by the " reflection of being ſucceeded by a very worthy " alderman, for whoſe firmneſs, integrity, and " reſolution, I have the greateſt veneration: and " indeed firmneſs and reſolution are at all times " neceſſary in your firſt magiſtrate, eſpecially in " times ſo critical and difficult as the preſent " ſeem to be: however, I truſt, that the old " good humour and good ſenſe of this great city " will ſet an example of moderation to the reſt " of the kingdom, and convince every impartial " man that the duty and affection of the citizens " of London to the beſt of kings, can be equalled " only by their love of juſtice and of liberty, " founded on the glorious principles of the revo- " lution.

" Permit me to take this opportunity of re- " turning my ſincere acknowledgements to my " fellow-citizens, for all their favours conferred " on me; and of aſſuring them, that it ſhall be " the ſtudy of my life to ſupport the honour and " dignity of the crown, liberty, and conſtitution- " al independency of the people, and the rights " and privileges of my fellow-citizens, always " keeping in remembrance that noble declaration " of the great revolution patriots, That under " the houſe of Hanover only they could, and " under the houſe of Hanover they were deter- " mined they would be free."

On the ſixteenth of November a duel was fought between Samuel Martin, eſq; member of parliament for Camelford, and late ſecretary to the treaſury, and John Wilkes, eſq; when the latter was greatly wounded in the belly by a piſtol bullet. The wound, however, not proving mortal, Mr. Wilkes ſoon after recovered.

On the eighteenth the tide in the river Thames at eleven o'clock, when it was flowing, ſuddenly ſtopped, and ebbed for the ſpace of an hour; after which it returned, and flowed the uſual time.

A moſt violent ſtorm of wind and rain happened on the ſecond of December, which did incredible damage in and about London, and in many other parts of the kingdom. Several houſes were blown down, ſome people killed, many wounded, and buſineſs interrupted; chimnies in many parts of the town fell upon the roofs; the roofs were ſtripped, and the ſtreets, during the violence of the ſtorm, rendered impaſſable; part of the walls of Hyde-park and Sadler's-wells gave way; trees were blown up by the roots; and the river Thames roſe ſo high, that in many places it overflowed its banks, filled cellars, and did immenſe damage to the ſhipping and craft.

The next day, when the executioner, by order of both houſes of parliament, came to burn No. 45, of the North-Briton at the Royal-Exchange, there was ſuch a multitude gathered together upon the occaſion, that the officers appointed to put the order into execution, were greatly interrupted in the performance of their duty. Not only the executioner, the conſtables, and the inferior officers were pelted with filth and dirt, but the chief officers preſent were inſulted in the groſſeſt manner; the fore-glaſs of Mr. Harley's chariot, (one of the city ſheriffs, and a member of parliament for the city of London, was broken by a billet thrown at his perſon, which was taken from the fire that was kindled to conſume the North-Briton. Mr. Harley being ſlightly wounded, and obſerving the ſpirit of licentiouſneſs that prevailed among the multitude, haſtened to the Manſion-houſe to apprize the Lord-mayor of the danger.

The executioner thinking it his duty to follow the high ſheriff, made his retreat likewiſe as ſoon after as he could; and the conſtables, moſt of their ſtaves being broken by the furious reſiſtance they had made, mixed among the crowd, and marched off without further oppoſition. The North-Briton, however, was partly conſumed by means of a lighted link, on which it was placed, by the zeal of the proper officers, but the remains of it were reſcued from the flames by the violence of the aſſailants, who carried them off in triumph, and in the evening diſplayed them at Temple-bar, where a bonfire was made, and a large jack boot committed to the flames inſtead thereof, amidſt the acclamations of a great concourſe of ſpectators.

Mr. Wilkes having commenced an action in the court of common-pleas againſt Robert Ward, eſq; the under ſecretary, for ſeizing his papers, the ſame was tried on the ſixth of December, before lord chief juſtice Pratt, and a ſpecial jury, at the defendant's requeſt; when, after an hearing of near fifteen hours, many learned arguments on both ſides, and a moſt maſterly, pathetic, and eloquent charge given by his lordſhip, the jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff with one thouſand pounds damages, and full coſts of ſuit; on which the populace, as before, teſtified their joy in the moſt extravagant manner.

On the evening of the day on which this verdict was obtained, a perſon knocked at Mr. Wilkes's door, deſiring to ſpeak with him on particular buſineſs; but it appearing by his dialect that he was a Scotchman, and being beſides an entire ſtranger, he was refuſed admittance, on which he went to a coffee-houſe near Parliament-ſtreet, where a perſon made affidavit, that he overheard him declare, that himſelf and ten more were determined to cut off Mr. Wilkes, let the event be what it would; and next morning gave information of it by a letter to Mr. Wilkes, deſiring him to be on his guard. According to the information, the perſon ſworn againſt, as was ſuppoſed, bringing a letter to Mr. Wilkes's houſe, ſigned Alexander Dun, the purpoſe of which was to beg an interview with him on an affair of the moſt intereſting nature, he was deſired to call again at one o'clock, which he did accordingly; and ſeven o'clock being then appointed, as he was going out at the parlour door, into Mr. Wilkes's bedchamber, two gentlemen who had placed themſelves behind it, ſeized him by the arms, and threw him on his back. On ſearching him a new pen knife was found in his pocket, which he pretended he had purchaſed about nine months ago, but after many equivocations, owned he bought it at Chatham about a fortnight before. Upon this he was taken into cuſtody by a tipſtaff then preſent for that purpoſe, was carried next morning before one of the judges; and a complaint likewiſe exhibited againſt him in the houſe of commons, who thereupon ordered the officer in whoſe cuſtody he was, to bring him to the bar; but when he was there, the houſe diſcharged him from any farther appearance, as it was evident from his behaviour, that he was diſordered in his mind.

A little before this a complaint was exhibited againſt Mr. Wilkes in the upper-houſe, for affixing the name of a member of that houſe, to a book, intituled, "An Eſſay on Woman," which book was produced to the eternal diſgrace of all concerned in it; but Mr. Wilkes could not prefer his anſwer, being at that time indiſpoſed in conſequence of the wound he had received in the duel with Mr. Martin. On which account the houſe gave him time for his appearance, and afterwards enlarged it on the report of his phyſician and ſurgeon; but beginning at laſt to ſuſpect ſome colluſion betwixt him and them, on the ſixteenth of December they ordered doctor Heberden and Mr. Hawkins to attend him, in order to obſerve the progreſs of his cure, and to report the ſame to the houſe. Doctor Heberden acquainted the phyſician with this order, and deſired him to communicate it to Mr. Wilkes, that the time of attendance might be ſettled. Mr. Wilkes, in conſequence of the intelligence received by him from his phyſician, diſpatched cards to the two gentlemen appointed to attend him, expreſſing his ſenſe of the kind care of the houſe for his ſpeedy recovery, intimating his perfect reliance on the gentlemen to whom he had committed his caſe, and aſſuring them, that though he did not wiſh to ſee them at preſent, he was impatient for an opportunity of ſhewing the juſt regard he would ever pay to diſtinguiſhed merit.

After Mr. Wilkes had acted in this ſpirited manner, he thought proper, in juſtification of the characters of doctor Brockleſby his phyſician, and Mr. Graves his ſurgeon, to ſend for doctor Duncan, one of his majeſty's phyſicians in ordinary, and Mr. Middleton one of his majeſty's ſerjeant ſurgeons, who attended him accordingly. The reaſon Mr. Wilkes gave to thoſe two gentlemen for ſending for them was, that as he found the houſe thought it proper that he ſhould be watched, he himſelf thought two Scotchmen moſt proper for his ſpies.

We will not pretend to ſay whether the attention of the houſe had any happy effect on Mr. Wilkes's health, but he recovered ſo faſt, that on the twenty-fourth of December he ſuddenly ſet out for France to viſit his daughter, as he himſelf gave out, then dangerouſly ill at Paris.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

Violent ſtorm of wind. Marriage of princeſs Auguſta. City addreſs on the occaſion. Mr. Wilkes expelled the houſe of commons. The common-council preſent lord chief juſtice Pratt with the freedom of the city. The ſilk weavers petition his majeſty againſt the importation of foreign ſilks. Fire in St. James's-ſquare. Remarkable ſtorm of thunder and lightning. Election of a chamberlain. Freedom of the city preſented to the duke of Glouceſter. Great fire at Rotherhithe. Remarkable phænomenon in the air. Death of the duke of Cumberland.

THE year 1764 was introduced by a violent ſtorm of wind, on the fourteenth of January, which did great damage to houſes, trees, and ſhipping in the river. During the ſtorm two dreadful fires broke, the one near Hyde-park corner, and the other in Ratcliff-Highway; at each of which ſeven houſes were entirely conſumed.

On the evening of the ſixteenth the ceremony of the marriage of her royal highneſs the princeſs Auguſta, eldeſt ſiſter to his majeſty, with his moſt ſerene highneſs the hereditary prince of Brunſwick Lunenburgh, was performed in the great council-chamber, by his grace the archbiſhop of Canterbury, in preſence of a great number of peers, peereſſes, and foreign miniſters. After the ſolemnization of the nuptials, their ſerene and royal highneſſes repaired to Leiceſter-houſe, where was prepared an elegant entertainment; at which their majeſties, the princeſs dowager of Wales, and the reſt of the royal family were preſent. On this joyful occaſion, the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled, waited on his majeſty, to whom being introduced by earl Gower, lord-chamberlain, James Eyre, eſq; the recorder, made their compliments in the following addreſs:

" May it pleaſe your majeſty,

" Graciouſly to accept our ſincere and dutiful " congratulations on the marriage of your ma- " jeſty's eldeſt ſiſter, her royal highneſs the prin- " ceſs Auguſta, with his moſt ſerene highneſs the " hereditary prince of Brunſwick Lunenburg. " It was with the utmoſt joy and ſatisfaction, that " we ſaw your majeſty's wiſdom yield to the pro- " poſals for an alliance with a proteſtant family ſo " illuſtrious; and that a lady, whoſe amiable " character is not more exalted by the dignity of " her birth than her private virtues, was deſtined " to be the happy partner of a prince, whoſe " eminent and diſtinguiſhed ſervices, during a " ſucceſsful and glorious war, will ever be re- " membered by every friend of true religion and " public liberty.

" Your majeſty's faithful citizens of London " have ſeen, with gratitude, the conſtitution of " this country, ſettled and eſtabliſhed by our " great deliverer king William, maintained and " improved by the illuſtrious houſe of Brunſ- " wick; and, therefore, they cannot ſufficiently " applaud your majeſty's great wiſdom and good- " neſs in further ſtrengthening it by this happy " alliance.

" May this marriage anſwer your majeſty's " warmeſt wiſhes and expectations; and may the " prince and princeſs be bleſſed with an offſpring " truly worthy of ſo royal and illuſtrious a de- " ſcent!

" Permit us to aſſure your majeſty of our firm " attachment to your majeſty's ſacred perſon " and government; and of our conſtant endea- " vours, within our ſphere, to contribute to the " happineſs and proſperity of your majeſty's " reign."

To which addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following moſt gracious anſwer:

" My lord and gentlemen,

" I return you my thanks for your dutiful " congratulations on the marriage of my ſiſter " the princeſs Auguſta, with the hereditary prince " of

" of Brunſwick Lunenburg; and am glad that " this happy alliance gives ſuch general ſatisfac- " tion.

" I receive, with pleaſure, your aſſurances of " duty and affection to my perſon and govern- " ment. The city of London may always de- " pend on my favour and protection."

They afterwards waited on her royal highneſs the princeſs dowager of Wales, and their ſerene highneſſes the prince and princeſs of Brunſwick, to whom they reſpectively preſented their compliments of congratulation.

On the twentieth of this month the commons, after long debates, expelled John Wilkes, eſq; for a contempt of their authority, and publiſhing the North-Briton, being adjudged an infamous libel; and iſſued out a writ of election for Ayleſbury in his room.

On the twenty-fifth his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and gave, among others, the royal aſſent to the bill for naturalizing his ſerene highneſs the prince of Brunſwick, who was in the houſe during his majeſty's ſtay. In the mean time her royal highneſs the princeſs of Brunſwick remained at Leiceſter-houſe, taking leave of the ladies of quality her intimates with the greateſt tenderneſs and fortitude. In the afternoon their highneſſes took leave of the company; when the prince, on the populace expreſſing their ardent wiſhes for their highneſſes happineſs and proſperity, returned his prayers for the ſucceſs of the Britiſh nation, for which he ſaid he had already bled, and would again with pleaſure, on any future occaſion. Their highneſſes then deſcended the ſtairs to their coaches, amidſt an innumerable crowd of ſpectators, who were waiting for their laſt farewell of their amiable princeſs; and the people attended their departure with acclamations and tears.

On the twenty-firſt of February came on at the court of King's-bench, Weſtminſter, the trial of John Wilkes, eſq; for reprinting and publiſhing the North-Briton No. 45, at his own houſe. The trial laſted eight hours, and the jury, retiring an hour and three quarters, returned, and brought in their verdict guilty. The court then proceeded to the trial of Mr. Wilkes for printing and publiſhing the Eſſay on woman, of which alſo the jury, after withdrawing about half an hour, found him guilty.

At a court of common-council held at Guildhall the ſame day, the thanks of the court were ordered to be preſented to the repreſentatives of the city, for their zealous and ſpirited endeavours to aſſert the rights and liberties of the ſubject, by their laudable attempt to obtain a ſeaſonable and parliamentary declaration. " That a general " warrant for apprehending and ſeizing the au- " thors, printers and publiſhers of a ſeditious li- " bel, together with their papers, is not war- " rantable by law;" and to exhort them, in the warmeſt manner, ſteadily to perſevere in their duty to the crown, and uſe their utmoſt endeavours to ſecure the houſes, papers, and perſons of the ſubject from arbitrary and illegal violations. At the ſame time it was reſolved, that, " as the in- " dependency and uprightneſs of judges is eſ- " ſential to the impartial adminiſtration of juſtice, " and one of the beſt ſecurities to the rights and " liberties of the ſubject," this court, in manifeſtation of the juſt ſenſe of the firmneſs and integrity of the right honourable Sir Charles Pratt, lord chief juſtice of his majeſty's court of common pleas, doth direct, that the freedom of this city be preſented to his lordſhip, and that he be deſired to ſit for his picture to be placed in Guildhall, in gratitude for the honeſt and deliberate deciſion upon the validity of a warrant which had been frequently produced to, but, ſo far as appears to this court, never debated in the court of King's-bench, by which he hath eminently diſtinguiſhed his duty to the king, his juſtice to the ſubject, and his knowledge of the law. This example of the city of London in thanking and inſtructing their repreſentatives, in regard to general warrants, and thanking Lord chief juſtice Pratt, and preſenting him with the freedom of the city, was followed by a great many corporations and private companies in England.

On the twenty-fifth a treatiſe, intituled, " Droit " le Roy," a rhapſody of all the prerogatives at any time attributed to the kings of England, was burnt by the common hangman at Weſtminſter-hall gate, and on the 27th at the Royal-Exchange, purſuant to an order of both houſes of parliament.

About this time an act of parliament paſſed for the better regulating of buildings, and to prevent miſchiefs that may happen by fire within the weekly bills of mortality, &c. by which ſo much of the act of 2. George I. for regulating buildings, &c. as relates to party walls, ſhall extend to all caſes whatſoever within the city and liberty of Weſtminſter, and within the pariſhes of St. Mary-le-Bone and Paddington, and Chelſea and St. Pancraſs, when it ſhall be neceſſary to pull down and rebuild any party-wall, whether either of the adjoining houſes ſhall or ſhall not be, or require to be, rebuilt, or new built; except the city of London and liberties thereof, and party-walls of houſes on the river Thames below bridge. It then directs a ſurvey of the ſaid walls, and that upon a diſagreement of the ſurveyors it ſhall be lawful for two neighbouring juſtices of the peace to add another to them: and that the ſaid wall viewed by them may be pulled down and rebuilt, if the majority ſigns a certificate of ſuch wall being defective.

After which the ſaid act enacts, " that all party " walls to be erected or built within the ſaid city " or liberty of Weſtminſter, and the pariſhes, " precincts and limits aforeſaid, ſhall be two " bricks and an half thick at the leaſt in the cellar, " and two bricks thick upwards to the garret " floor, and from thence one brick and an half " thick, at leaſt, eighteen inches above the roofs " or gutters which adjoin to ſuch party-walls; and " that the ſame ſhall be built of ſtone, or of good " ſound burnt bricks, and none other.

" And that no timbers, except the timbers of " the girders, binding joiſts, and the templets " under the ſame, ſhall be laid into the party- " walls erected or built, or to be erected or built, " within the ſaid city or liberty of Weſtminſter, " and the pariſhes, precincts, and limits afore- " ſaid;

" ſaid; and that no timbers of the roof be laid " into ſuch party-walls, (except the purloins or " kerb thereof) and that the ends of girders, and " binding joiſts, lying within ſuch party-walls, " ſhall not exceed nine inches; and that none of " the ends of the girders, or binding joiſts, in " adjoining houſes, ſhall meet, or be laid oppo- " ſite to each other; and that the ſides thereof " ſhall be, at leaſt, 14 inches diſtant from each " other; and that there ſhall be nine inches, at " leaſt, of ſolid brick-work left at or between the " ends of all lentils, wall-plates, and bond-tim- " bers, which may or ſhall be laid in or upon " the walls of the fore and back fronts of all " houſes which ſhall adjoin to each other, on the " penalty of 50l. on the head builder.

" That no timber or timbers whatſoever ſhall " be laid or placed under the hearth or hearths " of any room or rooms, or within nine inches " of any funnel or flew of any chimney or chim- " nies, of any houſe or houſes within the limits " aforeſaid; and that no timber buildings what- " ſoever ſhall be built adjoining to any houſe or " houſes ſo as the timbers thereof ſhall be laid " into the wall of any ſuch houſe or houſes al- " ready built, or hereafter to be built, within " the limits aforeſaid, under the penalty of 50l.

" That after any party-wall or party-walls ſhall " be erected or built purſuant to the directions " of this act, no perſon or perſons whatſoever, " who ſhall build againſt ſuch party-wall or par- " ty-walls, ſhall, on any pretence whatſoever, " cut into or wound the ſame, for the convenience " of making a chimney or chimnies, or for any " other purpoſe whatſoever; nor ſhall lay into " the ſame any other timbers than are allowed by " this act to be laid into new party-walls, under " the penalty of 50l.

" That every maſter-builder who ſhall erect or " build any houſe within the limits above men- " tioned, ſhall, within fourteen days, after the " ſame ſhall be covered in, cauſe the ſame to be " ſurveyed by one or more ſurveyor or ſurveyors; " and ſuch ſurveyor or ſurveyors ſhall make " oath, before one or more of his majeſty's juſ- " tices of the peace for the ſaid county of Mid- " dleſex or city of Weſtminſter, that the ſame " hath been (to the beſt of his or their judgment " and belief) built and erected agreable to the " ſeveral directions in this act contained; which " affidavit ſhall be filed with the clerk of the " peace for the ſaid county of Middleſex, within " ten days after the making thereof; and if any " maſter-builder ſhall make default in the pre- " miſes, by neglecting to cauſe ſuch ſurvey to " be made, or ſuch affidavit to be made and " filed as aforeſaid, ſuch maſter-builder ſhall, for " every ſuch neglect or default, forfeit the ſum " of 50l.

" Provided always, that in all caſes where any " party-wall within the ſaid city or liberty of " Weſtminſter, and the pariſhes, precincts and " limits aforeſaid, ſhall, by virtue of the act of " the 11 George I. and of this preſent act, be " pulled down and rebuilt, agreeable to the di- " rections of this preſent act, by the owner or " occupier of one of the adjoining houſes, the " expence of ſuch party-wall ſhall be eſtimated " and computed at and after the rate of 6l. 10s. " per rod.

" Provided alſo, That in all caſes where any " party-wall ſhall be erected or built, agreeable " to the directions of this preſent act, in execu- " tion of any contract or contracts entered into " with the builder or workman before the firſt " day of July, 1764, the expence of ſuch party- " wall ſhall be eſtimated and computed at and " after the rate of 6l. 10s. per rod; any thing " in ſuch contract or contracts to the contrary " thereof in any wiſe notwithſtanding."

And be it further enacted, " That for the fur- " ther and better preventing the ſpreading of " fires, all houſes and other buildings, which " ſhall be erected or built within the ſaid city or " liberty of Weſtminſter, and the pariſhes, pre- " cincts, and limits aforeſaid, ſhall be built of " ſtone, or of good, ſound, hard, well-burnt " bricks, and none other, both in the fore front, " and back front thereof, from the breaſt-ſum- " mer upwards, (and likewiſe the party-walls " thereof) and that ſuch breaſt-ſummer, in all " ſuch houſes or other buildings, ſhall not be " higher than the floor of the one pair of ſtairs."

This act concludes with a clauſe directing, " That in all caſes where any of the rewards " ſhall be claimed by virtue of the ſtatute of the " 6th of queen Anne, for engines brought to " help to extinguiſh fires, ſuch reward ſhall be " payable and paid in the ſame manner to the " keeper of any other engine, though not a pa- " riſh-engine, who ſhall bring in ſuch engine in " good order and complete, to help and extin- " guiſh ſuch fire, in the ſame manner as if ſuch " engine was a pariſh engine."

On the ſeventh of March Sir Thomas Harri- ſon having waited on the right honourable the lord chief juſtice Pratt, and preſented to his lord- ſhip the freedom of the city of London in a gold box, purſuant to the order of common-council, his lordſhip returned the following anſwer:

" Sir,

" It is impoſſible for me not to feel the moſt " ſenſible pleaſure in finding my behaviour in the " adminiſtration of juſtice approved by the city " of London; the moſt reſpectable body in this " kingdom, after the two houſes of parliament.

" If they have been pleaſed, from any part of " my conduct, to entertain an opinion of my in- " tegrity (the beſt quality of a judge) my utmoſt " ambition is ſatisfied; and I may venture, with- " out the reproach of vanity, to take to myſelf " the character of an honeſt man, which the city " of London hath told me I am entitled to; " but they will give me leave, at the ſame time, " to aſcribe it only to my own good fortune, that " I happened to be diſtinguiſhed upon the pre- " ſent occaſion beyond the reſt of my brethren; " ſince I am perſuaded, that, if they had been " called upon as I was, they would have acted " with the like conſcientious regard to their " oaths, and to the law of the land.

" Since, however, the city of London has " now given me a reputation, I muſt take more

" of Brunſwick Lunenburg; and am glad that " this happy alliance gives ſuch general ſatisfac- " tion.

" I receive, with pleaſure, your aſſurances of " duty and affection to my perſon and govern- " ment. The city of London may always de- " pend on my favour and protection."

They afterwards waited on her royal highneſs the princeſs dowager of Wales, and their ſerene highneſſes the prince and princeſs of Brunſwick, to whom they reſpectively preſented their compliments of congratulation.

On the twentieth of this month the commons, after long debates, expelled John Wilkes, eſq; for a contempt of their authority, and publiſhing the North-Briton, being adjudged an infamous libel; and iſſued out a writ of election for Ayleſbury in his room.

On the twenty-fifth his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and gave, among others, the royal aſſent to the bill for naturalizing his ſerene highneſs the prince of Brunſwick, who was in the houſe during his majeſty's ſtay. In the mean time her royal highneſs the princeſs of Brunſwick remained at Leiceſter-houſe, taking leave of the ladies of quality her intimates with the greateſt tenderneſs and fortitude. In the afternoon their highneſſes took leave of the company; when the prince, on the populace expreſſing their ardent wiſhes for their highneſſes happineſs and proſperity, returned his prayers for the ſucceſs of the Britiſh nation, for which he ſaid he had already bled, and would again with pleaſure, on any future occaſion. Their highneſſes then deſcended the ſtairs to their coaches, amidſt an innumerable crowd of ſpectators, who were waiting for their laſt farewell of their amiable princeſs; and the people attended their departure with acclamations and tears.

On the twenty-firſt of February came on at the court of King's-bench, Weſtminſter, the trial of John Wilkes, eſq; for reprinting and publiſhing the North-Briton No. 45, at his own houſe. The trial laſted eight hours, and the jury, retiring an hour and three quarters, returned, and brought in their verdict guilty. The court then proceeded to the trial of Mr. Wilkes for printing and publiſhing the Eſſay on woman, of which alſo the jury, after withdrawing about half an hour, found him guilty.

At a court of common-council held at Guildhall the ſame day, the thanks of the court were ordered to be preſented to the repreſentatives of the city, for their zealous and ſpirited endeavours to aſſert the rights and liberties of the ſubject, by their laudable attempt to obtain a ſeaſonable and parliamentary declaration. " That a general " warrant for apprehending and ſeizing the au- " thors, printers and publiſhers of a ſeditious li- " bel, together with their papers, is not war- " rantable by law;" and to exhort them, in the warmeſt manner, ſteadily to perſevere in their duty to the crown, and uſe their utmoſt endeavours to ſecure the houſes, papers, and perſons of the ſubject from arbitrary and illegal violations. At the ſame time it was reſolved, that, " as the in- " dependency and uprightneſs of judges is eſ- " ſential to the impartial adminiſtration of juſtice, " and one of the beſt ſecurities to the rights and " liberties of the ſubject," this court, in manifeſtation of the juſt ſenſe of the firmneſs and integrity of the right honourable Sir Charles Pratt, lord chief juſtice of his majeſty's court of common pleas, doth direct, that the freedom of this city be preſented to his lordſhip, and that he be deſired to ſit for his picture to be placed in Guildhall, in gratitude for the honeſt and deliberate deciſion upon the validity of a warrant which had been frequently produced to, but, ſo far as appears to this court, never debated in the court of King's-bench, by which he hath eminently diſtinguiſhed his duty to the king, his juſtice to the ſubject, and his knowledge of the law. This example of the city of London in thanking and inſtructing their repreſentatives, in regard to general warrants, and thanking Lord chief juſtice Pratt, and preſenting him with the freedom of the city, was followed by a great many corporations and private companies in England.

On the twenty-fifth a treatiſe, intituled, " Droit " le Roy," a rhapſody of all the prerogatives at any time attributed to the kings of England, was burnt by the common hangman at Weſtminſter-hall gate, and on the 27th at the Royal-Exchange, purſuant to an order of both houſes of parliament.

About this time an act of parliament paſſed for the better regulating of buildings, and to prevent miſchiefs that may happen by fire within the weekly bills of mortality, &c. by which ſo much of the act of 2. George I. for regulating buildings, &c. as relates to party walls, ſhall extend to all caſes whatſoever within the city and liberty of Weſtminſter, and within the pariſhes of St. Mary-le-Bone and Paddington, and Chelſea and St. Pancraſs, when it ſhall be neceſſary to pull down and rebuild any party-wall, whether either of the adjoining houſes ſhall or ſhall not be, or require to be, rebuilt, or new built; except the city of London and liberties thereof, and party-walls of houſes on the river Thames below bridge. It then directs a ſurvey of the ſaid walls, and that upon a diſagreement of the ſurveyors it ſhall be lawful for two neighbouring juſtices of the peace to add another to them: and that the ſaid wall viewed by them may be pulled down and rebuilt, if the majority ſigns a certificate of ſuch wall being defective.

After which the ſaid act enacts, " that all party " walls to be erected or built within the ſaid city " or liberty of Weſtminſter, and the pariſhes, " precincts and limits aforeſaid, ſhall be two " bricks and an half thick at the leaſt in the cellar, " and two bricks thick upwards to the garret " floor, and from thence one brick and an half " thick, at leaſt, eighteen inches above the roofs " or gutters which adjoin to ſuch party-walls; and " that the ſame ſhall be built of ſtone, or of good " ſound burnt bricks, and none other.

" And that no timbers, except the timbers of " the girders, binding joiſts, and the templets " under the ſame, ſhall be laid into the party- " walls erected or built, or to be erected or built, " within the ſaid city or liberty of Weſtminſter, " and the pariſhes, precincts, and limits afore- " ſaid;

" ſaid; and that no timbers of the roof be laid " into ſuch party-walls, (except the purloins or " kerb thereof) and that the ends of girders, and " binding joiſts, lying within ſuch party-walls, " ſhall not exceed nine inches; and that none of " the ends of the girders, or binding joiſts, in " adjoining houſes, ſhall meet, or be laid oppo- " ſite to each other; and that the ſides thereof " ſhall be, at leaſt, 14 inches diſtant from each " other; and that there ſhall be nine inches, at " leaſt, of ſolid brick-work left at or between the " ends of all lentils, wall-plates, and bond-tim- " bers, which may or ſhall be laid in or upon " the walls of the fore and back fronts of all " houſes which ſhall adjoin to each other, on the " penalty of 50l. on the head builder.

" That no timber or timbers whatſoever ſhall " be laid or placed under the hearth or hearths " of any room or rooms, or within nine inches " of any funnel or flew of any chimney or chim- " nies, of any houſe or houſes within the limits " aforeſaid; and that no timber buildings what- " ſoever ſhall be built adjoining to any houſe or " houſes ſo as the timbers thereof ſhall be laid " into the wall of any ſuch houſe or houſes al- " ready built, or hereafter to be built, within " the limits aforeſaid, under the penalty of 50l.

" That after any party-wall or party-walls ſhall " be erected or built purſuant to the directions " of this act, no perſon or perſons whatſoever, " who ſhall build againſt ſuch party-wall or par- " ty-walls, ſhall, on any pretence whatſoever, " cut into or wound the ſame, for the convenience " of making a chimney or chimnies, or for any " other purpoſe whatſoever; nor ſhall lay into " the ſame any other timbers than are allowed by " this act to be laid into new party-walls, under " the penalty of 50l.

" That every maſter-builder who ſhall erect or " build any houſe within the limits above men- " tioned, ſhall, within fourteen days, after the " ſame ſhall be covered in, cauſe the ſame to be " ſurveyed by one or more ſurveyor or ſurveyors; " and ſuch ſurveyor or ſurveyors ſhall make " oath, before one or more of his majeſty's juſ- " tices of the peace for the ſaid county of Mid- " dleſex or city of Weſtminſter, that the ſame " hath been (to the beſt of his or their judgment " and belief) built and erected agreable to the " ſeveral directions in this act contained; which " affidavit ſhall be filed with the clerk of the " peace for the ſaid county of Middleſex, within " ten days after the making thereof; and if any " maſter-builder ſhall make default in the pre- " miſes, by neglecting to cauſe ſuch ſurvey to " be made, or ſuch affidavit to be made and " filed as aforeſaid, ſuch maſter-builder ſhall, for " every ſuch neglect or default, forfeit the ſum " of 50l.

" Provided always, that in all caſes where any " party-wall within the ſaid city or liberty of " Weſtminſter, and the pariſhes, precincts and " limits aforeſaid, ſhall, by virtue of the act of " the 11 George I. and of this preſent act, be " pulled down and rebuilt, agreeable to the di- " rections of this preſent act, by the owner or " occupier of one of the adjoining houſes, the " expence of ſuch party-wall ſhall be eſtimated " and computed at and after the rate of 6l. 10s. " per rod.

" Provided alſo, That in all caſes where any " party-wall ſhall be erected or built, agreeable " to the directions of this preſent act, in execu- " tion of any contract or contracts entered into " with the builder or workman before the firſt " day of July, 1764, the expence of ſuch party- " wall ſhall be eſtimated and computed at and " after the rate of 6l. 10s. per rod; any thing " in ſuch contract or contracts to the contrary " thereof in any wiſe notwithſtanding."

And be it further enacted, " That for the fur- " ther and better preventing the ſpreading of " fires, all houſes and other buildings, which " ſhall be erected or built within the ſaid city or " liberty of Weſtminſter, and the pariſhes, pre- " cincts, and limits aforeſaid, ſhall be built of " ſtone, or of good, ſound, hard, well-burnt " bricks, and none other, both in the fore front, " and back front thereof, from the breaſt-ſum- " mer upwards, (and likewiſe the party-walls " thereof) and that ſuch breaſt-ſummer, in all " ſuch houſes or other buildings, ſhall not be " higher than the floor of the one pair of ſtairs."

This act concludes with a clauſe directing, " That in all caſes where any of the rewards " ſhall be claimed by virtue of the ſtatute of the " 6th of queen Anne, for engines brought to " help to extinguiſh fires, ſuch reward ſhall be " payable and paid in the ſame manner to the " keeper of any other engine, though not a pa- " riſh-engine, who ſhall bring in ſuch engine in " good order and complete, to help and extin- " guiſh ſuch fire, in the ſame manner as if ſuch " engine was a pariſh engine."

On the ſeventh of March Sir Thomas Harri- ſon having waited on the right honourable the lord chief juſtice Pratt, and preſented to his lord- ſhip the freedom of the city of London in a gold box, purſuant to the order of common-council, his lordſhip returned the following anſwer:

" Sir,

" It is impoſſible for me not to feel the moſt " ſenſible pleaſure in finding my behaviour in the " adminiſtration of juſtice approved by the city " of London; the moſt reſpectable body in this " kingdom, after the two houſes of parliament.

" If they have been pleaſed, from any part of " my conduct, to entertain an opinion of my in- " tegrity (the beſt quality of a judge) my utmoſt " ambition is ſatisfied; and I may venture, with- " out the reproach of vanity, to take to myſelf " the character of an honeſt man, which the city " of London hath told me I am entitled to; " but they will give me leave, at the ſame time, " to aſcribe it only to my own good fortune, that " I happened to be diſtinguiſhed upon the pre- " ſent occaſion beyond the reſt of my brethren; " ſince I am perſuaded, that, if they had been " called upon as I was, they would have acted " with the like conſcientious regard to their " oaths, and to the law of the land.

" Since, however, the city of London has " now given me a reputation, I muſt take more

" than ordinary care to preſerve their gift by the " ſtricteſt attention to my duty, knowing, that " the beſt way of thanking the public for ho- " nours like theſe is by perſevering in the ſame " conduct, by which their approbation was firſt " acquired."

On the ninth of April many thouſand journeymen ſilk-weavers went in proceſſion from Spital-fields, and waited on his majeſty at the queen's palace in St. James's park, with a petition, repreſenting the miſerable condition themſelves and families were reduced to, by the clandeſtine importation of French ſilks. They waited before the court-yard, and two gentlemen, belonging to that manufactory, had the honour to be introduced to his majeſty's preſence; and preſent their petition, which his majeſty received in the moſt gracious manner; and gave for anſwer that he would ſend immediate orders to put an entire ſtop to the importation of French ſilks; that an affair of ſo much conſequence to the kingdom ſhould be properly laid before the parliament, and that he would do his utmoſt to procure them redreſs.

A terrible fire broke out, on the fourteenth, at Mr. Naſh's in St. James's ſquare, which inſtantly conſumed that houſe, and greatly damaged two others. The fire ſpread ſo rapid, that ſix perſons periſhed in the flames.

On the eighteenth of June happened in and about London one of the greateſt thunder ſtorms in the memory of man. Some buildings were very much damaged, particularly the elegant ſpire of St. Bride's-church, Fleet-ſtreet, which was ſhattered ſo much, that it was obliged to be rebuilt. Several balls of fire were ſeen in the ſtreets at the ſame time, but ſoon diſappeared without doing any miſchief. Many perſons, however, were hurt by the ſtones that flew from the damaged buildings.

In the month of Auguſt about ſix hundred Palatines, and other German proteſtants were landed at the port of London, in the greateſt diſtreſs; and were relieved with that generoſity which does honour to the Britiſh nation. Theſe unhappy people were prevailed upon to leave their own country, on the promiſe of a German officer, that on their arrival in England they ſhould be immediately provided with a paſſage to Britiſh America, and appointed to ſettle ſome of our new acquiſitions on that continent. This deluſion aroſe from a pretence ſet up by one, who had no authority, as after appeared, to make a contract with them, or to procure them a ſettlement in any of our American plantations; though the poor deluded people had great reaſon to hearken to ſuch propoſals, as were tendered to them, in the name of a nation, which had always given them the preference in ſuch caſes, and could not poſſibly people and cultivate their new acquired deſerts, without a vaſt number of new hands. However, they were deceived, and being embarked by the contractor's contrivance, and brought to the port of London, they who were in a condition to pay their paſſage, were permitted to land; ſuch as had no money, were kept on board, and both were reduced to a ſtarving condition; the contractor being left behind, and caſt into a Dutch priſon, for debts he imprudently contracted to carry this chimerical ſcheme into execution, without the leaſt countenance even of a promiſe from the Britiſh court, to realize his agreement with the German emigrants: of which incident there appeared the following intelligence from the Hague gazette, on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt laſt.

" One — de S.—, who ſtiles himſelf a colo- " nel in the ſervice of the king of Great-Britain, " having engaged a number of perſons to go into " England, upon aſſurances which he gave them, " that he was authorized by his Britannic majeſty " to promiſe them ſettlements in America; and " that they ſhould be carried there at the king's " expence: in order to prevent his continuing to " impoſe upon the credulity of the public in this " reſpect, it is thought proper to advertiſe that " the ſaid S.——was never authorized, as he pre- " tends, to engage people for thoſe ſettlements, " nor to make any promiſes on the part of the " Britiſh miniſtry."

The poor half ſtarved Palatines, who were put aſhore without a patron to provide for them, were not able to get entertainment or ſhelter from the intemperature of the rainy ſeaſon, which, juſt at that time, (about the middle of Auguſt) was very heavy. The men, with their wives, children, and infants, even their very women in labour, were driven to the neceſſity of lying in the open fields, without proviſions, without cover, and without any friend or aſſiſtance, but what could be collected during this exigency for them in German churches and chapels about this metropolis. All which is more fully and publickly deſcribed by the clergyman, whoſe piety led him to miniſter to them in their great diſtreſs, and to make their caſe known to the great and good, who had it in their power, and were ready to relieve their almoſt deſpairing German brethren.

This clergyman wrote a letter to the printer of the Daily-advertiſer, who publiſhed it on the thirtieth of Auguſt, in theſe words:

" I hope you will permit me, by means of your paper, to inform thoſe who have the power to redreſs it, of the very deplorable ſituation of the poor unhappy Palatines lately arrived here from Germany. They are in number, men, women, and children, about ſix hundred, conſiſting of Wurtzburghers and Palatines, all proteſtants, and were brought hither from their native country by a German officer, with a promiſe of being immediarely ſent to ſettle, at his own expence, in the iſland of St. John and le Croix, in America; but, by ſome inability, he has been obliged to decline the undertaking; ſo that inſtead of their being ſhipped off for thoſe places, ſome of them have lain, during the late heavy rains, and are now lying in the open fields adjacent to this metropolis, without covering, without money, and in ſhort, without the common neceſſaries of life; others lie languiſhing under the complicated evils of ſickneſs and extreme want, at the Statute hall in Goodman's-fields; and more than two hundred remain on board the ſhip, which brought them them over on account of their paſſage not being paid for, where they are periſhing for want of food, and rotting in filth and naſtineſs. Collections have been made at the German churches and chapels here ſeveral times, to afford them ſome relief; but as the number of theſe poor creatures are ſo conſiderable, it is impoſſible, by ſuch means, to furniſh them with a regular and continual ſupply, adequate to their wants; ſo that unleſs ſome proviſion is very ſpeedily made for them, they muſt inevitably periſh. Theſe unfortunate people would think themſelves inexpreſſibly happy, if the Engliſh government would be graciouſly pleaſed to take them under its protection, to allow them, for the preſent, ſome ground to lie on, tents to cover them, and any manner of ſubſiſtence, till it ſhall be thought proper to ſhip them off, and ſettle them in any Engliſh colonies in America; where, I doubt not, they will give their protectors and benefactors conſtant proofs of their affection and gratitude for ſuch kindneſs, by behaving as becometh honeſt, induſtrious, and dutiful ſubjects, to the Britiſh government. I take the liberty of thus expreſſing the hopes and wiſhes of theſe wretched beings, as they have no friend to intercede for them, who has intereſt ſufficient for ſuch an undertaking, or even a knowledge of the proper method of application.

That their diſtreſſes are unutterably great, I myſelf have been too often a mournful witneſs of, in my attendance on them to adminiſter the duties of my function; with one inſtance of which I ſhall conclude this melancholy detail. One of the poor women was ſeized with the pangs of labour in the open fields, and was delivered by the ignorant people about her in the beſt manner they were able; but from the injury the tender infant received in the operation, it died ſoon after I baptized it; and the wretched mother, after receiving the ſacrament at my hands, expired, from the want of proper care and neceſſaries ſuitable to her afflicting and truly lamentable condition.

That the Almighty may, of his infinite mercy, incline the hearts of the great and good of this kingdom, diſtinguiſhed for its charity and hoſpitality, to take under their protection theſe their unhappy fellow-chriſtians, (who did not intrude themſelves into this country, but were invited hither) and ſend them whitherſoever they in their wiſdom and goodneſs ſhall think proper, is the moſt ardent prayer of their and your moſt obedient ſervant,"

G. A. WACHSEL,
Miniſter of the German Lutheran St. George's-church, in Little Ayloffe-ſtreet.

This information reached the ears of the great, the noble, and the royal; and penetrated their hearts with ſuch expedition and abundance of compaſſion, that teſtifies the truth of that paſſage in holy writ, "the mercy of God is over all his "works." Of which the reverend Mr. Wachſel publiſhed the following account, September 5.

"Your readineſs in giving a place to my letter of Thurſday laſt, emboldens me to entreat that you would ſuffer me to communicate to the public, a brief account of the amazing ſucceſs with which it hath pleaſed the Almighty God to bleſs my endeavours therein for the ſervice of the diſtreſſed Palatines; and to teſtify their moſt grateful acknowledgments, as well as my own, to the very benevolent inhabitants of this metropolis, for their exceeding liberal and ſeaſonable contributions. When I reflect on the ſituation of theſe poor people at the time their caſe was related to the public, and the change that immediately ſucceeded, I am really loſt in wonder, and overcome with gratitude!

Before eleven in the morning, on which my letter appeared, we received from the Tower, by order of a great perſonage, one hundred tents, with all neceſſaries thereunto belonging; by the ſame bountiful hand the freight of thoſe on board the ſhips was diſcharged, and they were releaſed that day. The ſame morning a ſervant arrived expreſs from a lady at Iſlington with twenty pounds. Mr. Baldero, banker in Lombard-ſtreet, ſent twenty-pounds. Shortly after the earl and counteſs of Cardigan ſent one hundred pounds, ten guineas came from his grace the archbiſhop of Canterbury, ten guineas from David Berkeley, eſq; and ſons: ten guineas ſigned M. W. C. S. From Batſon's coffee-houſe, thirty-one pounds ten ſhillings, (nearly four hundred pounds have ſince been received from the ſame place): five pounds five ſhillings from the Bedford coffee-houſe: a bank note No. K. 280, for 100l. and a great number of ſmaller donations. The contributions ſince the above have ſtill increaſed more abundantly."

Crowds of people reſorted to the place of their encampment, and, with hearts melted to compaſſion, gave them what they could ſpare; to the honour of a benevolent baker, let it be remembered, that even before their caſe was known, paſſing by and perceiving their famiſhing condition, he beſtowed upon them his whole baſket of bread! By theſe means they were cloathed, their ſubſiſtence provided for, phyſicians, ſurgeons, and midwives, offered their ſervice for the ſick and thoſe in travail, for whom warm apartments were hired. The committee of gentlemen choſen to manage the ſubſcription, upon application to his majeſty, had a moſt gracious anſwer by Lord Halifax, purporting that the Palatines ſhould be ſent and eſtabliſhed in South Carolina, and that 150 ſtands of arms ſhould be delivered out for their uſe; upon which they contracted for proper veſſels to carry them to that colony, and for their proviſion and maintainance in the voyage, and for a time after their arrival.

The city of London in particular, and the nation in general, having, about this time preferred complaints in parliament, concerning the exorbitant price of proviſions; his majeſty, in order to prevent all unlawful combinations for enhancing the price of proviſions, and encourage thoſe who might diſcover any concerned in ſuch illegal practices, promiſed to all perſons who ſhould diſcover, or cauſe to be diſcovered ſuch offenders, ſo as to be convicted, a reward of one hundred pounds, to be paid out of the treaſury, without any other warrant in that behalf. When the merchants petition, touching the above complaint, was preſented to one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, a council was immediately called, and after an examination of evidence, his majeſty directly ordered his royal proclamation to be iſſued as abovementioned.

On the twenty eighth of September, there was the higheſt tide in the river Thames that had been known for many years. Great damages were done by the filling of cellars, and overflowing of the low marſhes. Several ſhips were daſhed againſt each other by the violence of the wind; and in many houſes near the river the waters roſe two feet in the ground floors.

About ten o'clock at night, on the twenty-fourth of November, a dreadful fire broke out in the workſhop of a ſnuff-maker in Alderſgate-ſtreet, which conſumed that and ſeveral other houſes, together with the timber-yard of Mr. Hatton, valued at ſeveral thouſand pounds. Many perſons were hurt, and ſome loſt their lives.

On the fourth of December her royal highneſs the princeſs Auguſta, ſiſter to his majeſty, and conſort to his ſerene highneſs the hereditary prince of Brunſwick, was ſafely delivered of a princeſs, to the great joy of that ancient line, as well as univerſal pleaſure of her native country.

During the courſe of this month, the weather proved extremely boiſterous, by which many ſhips were wrecked, and other very conſiderable damage was ſuſtained both by ſea and land.

The firſt remarkable circumſtance which happened in the year 1765, was, the election of a chamberlain of the city of London, in the room of the late Sir Thomas Harriſon, which came on at Guildhall the fifteenth of January. The candidates were, Mr. alderman Janſſen, Mr. alderman Turner, Mr. Bonus, Mr. deputy Ellis, Mr. Freeman, Mr. deputy Long, and Mr. Till. On holding up of hands, the ſheriffs ſaid they were doubtful which of the two aldermen had the majority, and therefore deſired they might be put up a ſecond time, which being done, they declared in favour of Mr. alderman Janſſen; but a poll was demanded in behalf of Mr. alderman Turner, Mr. Ellis, Mr. Freeman, Mr. Long, and Mr. Till. After which Mr. alderman Janſſen made a very polite ſpeech to the livery, returning them thanks for the great honour conferred on him, and hoped they would ſupport their choice by the poll.

When Mr. Janſſen had finiſhed his ſpeech, Mr. alderman Harley (who had been called upon in an advertiſement on the Monday preceding, to declare whether he had not received or been promiſed the general receiverſhip of the land-tax for this city and county of Middleſex) roſe up and addreſſed himſelf to the livery as follows:

"Gentlemen, and fellow-citizens,

"I am always happy to meet you, when aſſembled here; particularly when any part of my conduct is called in queſtion. I now find myſelf called upon in a very extraordinary manner, by a news-writer in the name of the ſeveral candidates for the office of chamberlain of this city, "publickly to declare, whether I have got, or "have been promiſed, the receiverſhip of the "land-tax." Now, gentlemen, this is a queſtion that no man has a right to aſk me. As to anſwer the public news-papers any thing I find relative to me, it is my determined reſolution never to do it, unleſs it is ſigned by a reputable perſon: but, gentlemen, if it will be the leaſt ſatisfaction to any one of the candidates, or to any particular liveryman, it is a reſpect that I ſhall be glad to ſhew them, and am both willing and ready to declare here, what I have repeatedly done both publickly and privately for this week paſt, that I have neither myſelf, or any perſon for me, to my knowledge, ſollicited for the receiverſhip of the land-tax; nor has it ever been offered me. But that I may be clearly underſtood, (for in every part of my conduct I love to be open and explicit) I do declare that if it ſhould be the intention and reſolution of adminiſtration to ſeparate the receiverſhip of the land-tax, from the office of chamberlain of London, and it ſhould be offered to me, I ſhall think myſelf as much at liberty to accept of it, as any one citizen of London."

On caſting up the books at the cloſe of the poll on the twenty-fifth the numbers appeared as follows:

For Mr. Alderman Janſſen	1316
Mr. Alderman Turner	1202
Mr. Till	250
Mr. Deputy Ellis	229
Mr. Freeman	180

In conſequence of which the former was declared dulyelected.

Mr. Alderman Janſſen then came forward, and addreſſed the livery, to the following purpoſe:

"Gentlemen and fellow citizens,

"The honour you have conferred, by elect-"ing me to the important office of chamberlain "of this city, calls for my moſt grateful ac-"knowledgments for ſo ſignal a mark of your "favour.

"While many of you, gentlemen, have moſt "affectionately recollected my former endea-"vours to deſerve your notice, and have been "pleaſed to call me forth, to offer my ſervices "on this occaſion, I muſt confeſs I was too back-"ward in complying; and not for want of an "ardent deſire to accept your kind invitation, "but from a diffidence, natural to one in my "ſituation.

"It was therefore an additional honour to me, "to have been thus rouſed in my ſtate of obſcu-"rity, and to have been compelled (as it were) "into your ſervice; an obligation greatly height-"ened by the uncommon unanimity, and remark-"able generoſity, manifeſted towards me at ſo "intereſting a juncture; it having been out of "my power to bias, or in the leaſt to influence, "the ſuffrage of any one of you in my behalf.

"It has given me a ſtill greater ſatisfaction, "that your fortitude alone could have afforded "me

" me the opportunity of diſproving the falſity " of thoſe many baſe and inveterate aſperſions " of my private enemies, to leſſen and depreciate " me in the eſteem of my fellow citizens; but I " am inclined to hope, that even thoſe will now " become my friends, who, through miſinfor- " mation, were before induced to be my ene- " mies.

" I ſhall trouble you no further, gentlemen, " than to aſſure you, I will do my utmoſt to con- " vince you, by a faithful and aſſiduous atten- " tion to the truſt you have ſo generouſly repoſed " in me, that you have not miſplaced your con- " fidence."

This gentleman having reduced his circumſtances, by his connections with ſeveral public ſpirited plans, had for ſome years lived in obſcurity, and abridged himſelf of every ſuperfluity, gradually to compenſate the loſs of his creditors. Such was his modeſty, that he was not without much difficulty prevailed upon to offer himſelf a candidate for the vacant poſt; but merit overcame every obſtacle, and his grateful fellow-citizens exulted in an opportunity of publickly honouring a man, who had given ſuch abundant and uncommon proofs of his integrity.

On the fourteenth of February Mr. John Williams, bookſeller, was, purſuant to his ſentence, brought from the King'sbench priſon, to ſtand in the pillory in New-palace-yard, Weſtminſter, for re-publiſhing the North Briton in volumes. A few minutes after twelve he mounted amidſt the acclamations of upwards of ten thouſand people, who maintained an inceſſant ſhout during the hour of his ſtanding. Oppoſite to the pillory were erected four ladders, with cords running from each other, on which were hung a jack boot, an axe, and a Scotch bonnet. The two latter, after remaining there ſome time, were burnt, and the boot beheaded. During his ſtand alſo, a purple purſe ornamented with orange-coloured ribbons, was produced by a gentleman eminent for his patriotiſm, who began a collection for the benefit of the culprit; after which, the purſe being carried round, every one contributed according to pleaſure, to the amount in the whole, as was ſuppoſed, of more than two hundred guineas. He had a ſprig of laurel in his hand all the time, and received, on this occaſion, greater and louder marks of the public applauſe, than would, perhaps, have been given to a foreign prince, at the head of a victorious army.

In the month of April, William, lord Byron, was tried by his peers in Weſtminſter, for the murder of Mr. Chaworth, in a duel at the Star and Garter tavern in Pall-mall; when, after a learned diſcuſſion of the caſe, the peers adjourned to their own houſe, and after ſome conſideration returned, when they found his lordſhip guilty of felony, but not of murder.

The law having declared by the 11 and 12 William III. c. 15. ſec. 5. " That every mayor, " or chief officer of every city, town corporate, " borough, or market town, ſhall, on requeſt to " him made, cauſe all ale-quarts and ale-pints, " made of wood, earth, glaſs, horn, leather, " pewter, or other good and wholeſome metal, " which ſhall be brought to him, to be meaſured " and ſized with the ſtandard in his cuſtody, and " ſhall then cauſe the ſame, and every of them, " to be plainly and apparently ſigned, ſtamped, " and marked with W. R. and a crown, for " which they ſhall not receive above one far- " thing for each meaſure, on pain of 5l. to be " recovered as aforeſaid; and he ſhall alſo pay " to the party grieved treble damages, with coſts, " by action at law;" the Lord-mayor, in purſuance of this act, ſummoned the publicans under his juriſdiction, for ſelling beer in pots that were not ſealed with the city mark, according to law. On which occaſion a great number of publicans were obliged to pay the penalty of 10s. each.

On the firſt of May, a great number of journeymen weavers, (jealous that they ſhould not receive the aid they petitioned for to both houſes of parliament) with a black flag carried before them, accompanied by their wives and children, went up to St. James's, to repreſent to his majeſty their diſtreſſed condition for want of work, occaſioned by the importation of French ſilks, and other foreign goods. Their majeſties being gone for Richmond before they reached St. James's, moſt of them went to Richmond, where one of the lords in waiting, brought them word from his majeſty, that he would do all in his power for their relief.

The lord-mayor and court of aldermen, at Guildhall, having notice of the above large body of weavers going up to St. James's, diſpatched orders to the beadles of the ſeveral wards, to give notice to the conſtables in every pariſh, to repair to their reſpective watch-houſes, with aſſiſtance, and there to remain till further orders, to prevent any riots that might happen.

On the ſixteenth they proceeded to St. James's again; and, poſſeſſed with an opinion, that the good effect of their petition had been prevented, in a great meaſure, by his grace the duke of Bedford, they went in a very riotous manner to Bloomſbury-ſquare, with ſuch threatenings of vengeance, that it was thought neceſſary to ſend for a ſtrong military force, to prevent their miſchievous intentions. They, by this means, were diſperſed; but on the ſeventeenth, in the morning, they aſſembled again, by beat of drum, in Spital-fields, to the number of more than thirty thouſand, from whence they proceeded, in three large bodies, to Weſtminſter. One corps took the rout of Gracechurch-ſtreet and London-bridge, from whence they paſſed over St. George's-fields. Another corps marched along Ludgate-hill, and the Strand, while the third proceeded by way of Holborn and Covent-garden. When united again in Weſtminſter, the crowd was ſo great, that the members could hardly get to their reſpective houſes. All Old Palace-yard, New Palace-yard, and the ſtreets adjoining, quite as far up as Weſtminſter-bridge, were filled with theſe poor petitioners, beſides multitudes of others that were in the Park. Before them, in their march, flags of various colours were borne by the women, particularly a French ſilk handkerchief, with a golden border on it, and a croſs of gold in the middle; a large piece of French ſpotted ſilk, ſaid to have been procured from the ſhop of a mercer in town, and three or four pieces of French lace, &c. The men wore red cockades and ſhreds of ſilk in their hats. In Weſtminſter, they ſtopped the carriages of the members, as they went to the houſe, praying them to take pity on the poor weavers, but behaved in all other reſpects with the greateſt good order. To prevent any tumult, however, the firſt troop of horſe-guards, with a party of horſe-grenadiers, and three companies of the foot-guards, all under arms, and headed by their proper officers, were ordered from the parade to Old Palace-yard, where they were drawn up in two lines before Weſtminſter-hall, to clear the paſſage for the members to get to the houſe. They continued aſſembled till near four o'clock, when being informed by their heads, that hand-bills would be diſtributed next day, which would allay all their fears, and every other neceſſary ſtep be taken for their advantage, they were recommended to ſeparate peaceably, and accordingly began their march home again; ſo that by five, the ſtreets round Weſtminſter-hall were entirely cleared of them. Sir John Fielding, and his brother juſtices had attended at the New Guildhall all the time; at which place there was alſo a conference between the chieftains of the weavers, to the number of about four hundred, their maſters, and the mercers, when it was agreed by the latter, immediately to recall all their contracts for foreign goods, and ſet the journeymen inſtantly to work. But though this had ſo good an effect, that it contributed, perhaps, more than any thing elſe, to diſperſe them; yet, in their return, they ſaid they ſhould not depend entirely upon promiſes, and talked of getting the watermen to join them. A body of them even went to Bloomſbury-ſquare, where they pulled down the ſtone poſts, and part of the wall, before the duke of Bedford's houſe, with the rails in the road to Fig-lane, beſides ploughing up the ground in the middle of the ſquare, and doing other damage. Theſe outrages being apprehended to be dangerous, a party of the horſe-guards had been added to the foot, which had been placed there the night before; but the mob was ſo unruly, that they tore up the very pavement to ſupply them with ſtones to pelt the guards: in conſequence of which much miſchief was done, many of the ſoldiers were cut and wounded, and ſeveral of the people trampled down by the horſes. Theſe outrages continued a great part of the night.

Another party went to Mr. Carr's, a ſilk mercer, on Ludgate-hill, where they demoliſhed the windows, broke the lamps at the door, and did other miſchief. In conſequence of this, between ſeven and eight o'clock, the lord-mayor, attended by the ſheriffs, recorder, city-marſhal, and ſword-bearer, with a number of peace-officers, repaired to the ſpot; but his lordſhip was obliged to leave his coach in St. Paul's church-yard, from whence he proceeded on foot to Mr. Carr's, when the recorder told the populace, that unleſs they diſperſed, the riot act ſhould be read. His lordſhip then repaired to the Globe-tavern in Fleet-ſtreet, and attended there with his brethren for ſome time. About nine in the evening, a ſtrong party of horſe, with another of foot, were drawn up before Mr. Carr's houſe, but happily the night paſſed without any farther diſorder.

A court of aldermen had previouſly met the morning before, to conſult on proper methods for preventing the ill conſequences that might ariſe from ſo large a body of people daily aſſembling, a party of guards from the Tower, did duty all the night of the ſixteenth, in Moorfields; another party had been ſent for the ſame night to Spitalfields, on account of the mob breaking the windows there of ſome maſter-weavers, who were reported to have had French ſilks in their houſes, particularly of one in Princeſs-ſtreet, whoſe windows were entirely demoliſhed. And early on the ſeventeenth, another party of guards, attended by a great number of conſtables, headboroughs, &c. marched from Hicks's-hall to Moorfields, to be at hand againſt any further riots.

Their principal orator was one Jones, a Welſhman. This perſon received the meſſage when they were at St. James's, after which he drew his brethren off to the Green-park, and ſignified what had paſſed from a tree. He alſo made a long harangue to them in Old Palace-yard, perſuading them to diſperſe, and ſeemed to conduct himſelf with a good deal of modeſty and decorum; he perſonally having no other view in taking the lead on that occaſion, but to keep his brethren from running into any exceſs that might be conſtrued a breach of the laws, or diſaffection to the government, as he himſelf declared.

About this time the court of common-council voted the freedom of the city, in a gold box, to the duke of Glouceſter; previous to which the Grocers preſented his royal highneſs with the freedom of their company.

Between ſix and ſeven o'clock in the evening, on the firſt of June, a dreadful fire broke out in a maſt-yard near Rotherhithe church, which in a few hours conſumed upwards of two hundred and ſix houſes. It alſo burnt the inſide of a brigg; but the wind driving the flames off from the water-ſide, there was no other damage done to the ſhipping, which otherwiſe, in all probability, would have greatly ſuffered. The fire was ſaid to have been occaſioned by a pitch-kettle boiling over, which ſet the maſts and timber in the yard all in flames. Great contributions were made in the city for the relief of the ſufferers; and ſo generouſly, that it exceeded the ſums required to reſtore their loſſes. And on the twenty-firſt, about ten o'clock at night, another dreadful fire broke out in the ſail-cloth warehouſe of Mr. Bovan, at Gun-dock, Wapping, which, in a few hours, deſtroyed that and about thirty dwelling-houſes, beſides warehouſes and other out-buildings. A ſhip in Gun-dock took fire; but by cutting away the maſts, &c. was ſaved. Moſt of the poor inhabitants loſt their all, and ſeveral had their arms and legs broke in endeavouring to ſave their children.

By a general act of parliament paſſed this ſeſſion, all waggons and carts, with nine inch wheels, paſſing through any turnpike gate or bar, after the twenty-fourth of June, are to pay full toll, unleſs they are ſo conſtructed as to roll a ſurface of ſixteen inches, and in that caſe only half toll; and all narrow wheels are to pay one-half toll more than the nine inch wheels, except carts and carriages drawn by one horſe and two oxen, and no more, having ſix inch wheels. And no perſon, by virtue of any act of parliament, is to have claim, or take the benefit or advantage of any exemption from tolls, unleſs the fellies of the wheels are nine inches broad.

About this time the inhabitants of the city of London and its ſuburbs were greatly alarmed, by many incendiary letters, threatening fire and deſtruction, which had been dropped in many parts of London. No leſs than ſeven or eight trains laid for this deſperate purpoſe, were diſcovered and defeated within a few weeks. Several of the incendiaries were taken into cuſtody, and the utmoſt precaution uſed to prevent the execution of their horrid deſigns.

Her majeſty being ſafely delivered of a prince on the twenty-firſt of Auguſt (afterwards chriſtened by the name of William Henry) the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council waited on his majeſty the twenty-eighth with the following congratulatory addreſs on the occaſion:

The humble addreſs of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled.

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" We your majeſty's ever loyal and faithful " ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com- " mons of the city of London, in common-coun- " cil aſſembled, humbly beſeech your majeſty to " accept our moſt ſincere and dutiful congratula- " tions on the ſafe delivery of the queen, and the " auſpicious birth of another prince.

" The joyful event of an increaſe in your ma- " jeſty's illuſtrious family, will always be grate- " fully conſidered by us as a further ſubſtantial " ſecurity to the civil and religious liberties of " this your majeſty's free and native country.

" Every addition to your majeſty's domeſtic " happineſs fills our hearts with the higheſt plea- " ſure and ſatisfaction; and fully confiding that " your majeſty's royal ſentiments ever coincide " with the united wiſhes of your faithful people, " we gladly embrace every opportunity of teſti- " fying our joy, and laying our congratulations " at your majeſty's feet.

" Permit us, therefore, royal Sir, to aſſure " your majeſty, that your faithful citizens of " London, from their zealous attachment to your " royal houſe, and the true honour and dignity " of your crown, whenever a happy eſtabliſh- " ment of public meaſures ſhall preſent a favour- " able occaſion, will be ready to exert their ut- " moſt abilities in ſupport of ſuch wiſe councils " as apparently tend to render your majeſty's " reign happy and glorious."

To which addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to return this moſt gracious anſwer:

" I thank you for this dutiful addreſs. Your " congratulations on the further increaſe of my " family, and your aſſurances of zealous attach- " ment to it, cannot but be very agreeable to " me. I have nothing ſo much at heart, as the " welfare and happineſs of my people; and have " the greateſt ſatisfaction in every event that may " be an additional ſecurity to thoſe civil and re- " gious liberties upon which the proſperity of " theſe kingdoms depend."

The above addreſs was but ill received by the new miniſtry, who thought themſelves highly reflected on.

On the twenty-fifth, about four o'clock in the morning, a fire broke out at a houſe oppoſite the Ship tavern, Ratcliff-croſs, which conſumed between twenty and thirty houſes, and did conſiderable damage to many others. The flames were ſo rapid, that moſt of the inhabitants loſt all their effects, to the amount of twenty thouſand pounds.

About nine o'clock at night, on the eighth of October, a moſt extraordinary phænomenon appeared in the air over the city of London. At firſt a ſtrong light was ſeen on the gravel and paved walks in the Temple, bright enough to pick up a pin; which ſurprize was encreaſed on the beholders looking upwards, when a globe of ruddy fire was ſeen deſcending from a great altitude over Temple-bar, as large as the full moon a little after her riſing; and taking its courſe obliquely towards the river Thames, as if it would have fallen therein; but coming low and over the ſame, it ſhot itſelf into a ſheet of fire, with one edge turned towards the water, in the form of a boy's kite, with head, wings and tail, appearing half as long, and in one part twice as broad, as Fleet-ſtreet. It fell or vaniſhed on the Southwark ſide of the water, in a yellow fire, to the ſurprize not only of all the watermen there on that part of the river, but of all the ſpectators, who declared they had never beheld the like appearance before.

At a court of common-council held at Guild-hall, on the fifteenth of October, it was reſolved to preſent the freedom of the city, in a gold box, to his ſerene highneſs the hereditary prince of Brunſwick. And on the twenty-ſecond they agreed to grant, as a benefaction to the ſociety of arts and ſciences in the Strand, the ſum of five hundred pounds.

To ſo great a height was the ſpirit of monopoly and oppreſſion got at this time, that the very retailers of milk, in and about this metropolis, attempted to raiſe the price of that commodity from three-halfpence to two-pence halfpenny a wine quart, which they purchaſe at a penny Wincheſter meaſure; and in ſome parts they carried their point; though the price was afterwards ſettled at two-pence the quart.

At a very numerous meeting of the grand jury, and other principal inhabitants of the borough of Southwark, at their Town-hall, it was unanimouſly agreed to give the following inſtructions to their members:

To Sir Joſeph Mawbey, bart. and Henry Thrale, eſq; repreſentatives in parliament for the town and borough of Southwark.

Gentlemen,

" Gentlemen,

" We, the grand jury for the town and borough of Southwark, and others the inhabitants thereof, this day aſſembled in the Town-hall, ſenſibly touched with the juſt complaints of the poor of this borough, as well as of thoſe of the nation in general, occaſioned by the preſent enormous price of every neceſſary of life, and the almoſt total ſtagnation of many valuable branches of our manufactures in conſequence thereof, think we ſhould be wanting in the duty we owe to our fellow-inhabitants, did we not employ every means in our power to procure a removal of this national evil.

" Actuated by theſe motives, gentlemen, we take this early opportunity to inſtruct you, our repreſentatives in the great council of the land, to uſe your utmoſt efforts, and influence to attain this ſalutary purpoſe, and as we apprehend nothing will ſo readily effect this, as the immediate prohibition of the exportation of all ſort of grain, that of bread corn more eſpecially (to the current price of which indiſpenſable neceſſary of life, that of every other article bears ſo great a proportion) we do hereby require and intruſt you to exert your beſt endeavours in parliament to obtain ſuch prohibition, or ſuch other wholeſome law as the body of the legiſlature ſhall in its wiſdom judge moſt expedient to put a ſtop to this crying grievance.

" In giving you theſe inſtructions, gentlemen, we firmly believe that we ſpeak your own ſentiments, who, as perſons of generoſity and humanity, cannot but feel for the diſtreſſes of the poor."

On the thirty-firſt of October, between ſeven and eight o'clock in the evening, his royal highneſs William, duke of Cumberland, died ſuddenly at his houſe in Upper Groſvenor-ſtreet. His royal highneſs was at court in the morning, dined with lord Albemarle in the afternoon, and drank tea with the princeſs of Brunſwick at St. James's; from whence he came to his own houſe in the evening, to be preſent at a council to be held on affairs of ſtate. As ſoon as he came in, he complained of a pain in the ſhoulder, with a cold and ſhivering fit, and deſired to be laid on the couch, which was done; but in about twenty minutes expired after without the leaſt ſtruggle.

On opening the body there was found in the right ventricle of the brain, a coagulation of extravaſated blood, about the ſize of a pidgeon's egg, which was the cauſe of his death. All the noble parts were ſound, except the membrane between the lobes of the brain, which was oſſified.

His royal highneſs gave near ſix thouſand pounds a year in private charity: and though he did not allow his workmen at Windſor (where he generally reſided) greater wages than the reſt of the country, he allowed them every day at noon table beer, and bread and cheeſe, and generally twice a week a hot dinner. This his royal highneſs called Old Engliſh hoſpitality.

On the eighth of November, the body and urn of his royal highneſs were conveyed from Groſvenor-ſquare to the prince's chamber in the houſe of lords, in a hearſe drawn by ſix white horſes, adorned with white feathers. The next evening, about ten o'clock, a ſignal from Weſtminſter-bridge, by the firing a ſky-rocket, was given, that the funeral proceſſion of his royal highneſs was begun, which ſignal being anſwered by another from the centre arch of London-bridge, minute guns were immediately fired at the Tower, and ſo continued, until, by ſecond ſignals from the ſame places, it was known the funeral ceremony was ended. The great bells in ſeveral of the churches in London and Weſtminſter alſo continued to toll, until the funeral was over.

The proceſſion was made through Old Palace-yard to the ſouth-eaſt door of the abbey, upon a floor railed in, covered with black cloth, and lined on each ſide with a party of the foot-guards.

At the entrance of Weſtminſter abbey, within the church, the dean and prebendaries attended by the choir, received the body, falling into the proceſſion juſt before the officer of arms, who conducted the lord-chamberlain; and ſo proceeded into king Henry VIIth's chapel, where the body was depoſited on treſſels, the head towards the altar: the coronet and cuſhion being laid upon the coffin, and the canopy held over it, while the ſervice was read by the dean of Weſtminſter; the chief mourner and his two ſupporters, ſitting on chairs, at the head of the corpſe; the lords aſſiſtants, and ſupporters of the pall ſitting on ſtools on either ſide.

The part of the ſervice before the interment being read, the corpſe was depoſited in the vault, and the dean having finiſhed the burial ſervice, Garter proclaimed his royal highneſs's ſtyle as follows:

> Thus it hath pleaſed Almighty God to take out of this tranſitory life, unto his divine mercy, the late moſt high, moſt mighty, and moſt illuſtrious prince William Auguſtus, duke of Cumberland, and duke of Brunſwick and Lunenburgh, marquis of Berkhamſtead, earl of Kennington, viſcount Trematon, baron of the iſle of Alderney, knight of the moſt noble order of the garter, and firſt and principal companion of the moſt honourable order of the bath, ſecond ſon of his late moſt excellent majeſty king George the ſecond.

Twenty-one pieces of artillery were drawn into the park, and fired minute guns during the ceremony; and three battalions, viz. one of each regiment of guards, were drawn up in St. Margaret's church-yard, and fired vollies, on a ſignal given, as ſoon as the corpſe was depoſited.

A very eminent hiſtorical writer gives the following character of the above illuſtrious prince: " A review of his life, ſays he, will afford a moſt " ſhining example of patriotiſm, valour, juſtice, " friendſhip, ſincerity and humanity. Inflexibly " attached to the intereſt of his country, he " braved every danger, nor indulged a thought " of life, when called on his ſovereign's duty. " Patriotic from principle, he gave ſanction to " wiſe and conſtitutional meaſures; nor feared

to

" to diſcountenance the ſchemes of oppreſſion, " ambition and avarice. Conſcientiouſly juſt, he " rewarded merit irreſpective of rank, nor ſuf- " fered the dignified minion to eſcape his reſent- " ment. Refined in his friendſhip, he ſweetened " life by a judicious ſelection of worthy men " to partake at his hoſpitable board, and amuſe " his leiſure hours with an unreſerved affability " of converſe. Inviolably ſincere, he never pro- " miſed without deliberation, or the moſt punc- " tual performance of his engagements. Above " all, ſympathetically humane, and extenſively " generous, his royal heart never failed to feel, " nor his royal hand to relieve the diſtreſſes of " his fellow creatures, of every age, ſex, and " condition. Nay, he ſought opportunities for " doing good, and ſtudied plans for the em- " ployment of the poor. With theſe virtues to " preponderate, his foibles may be eaſily con- " ſigned to oblivion, eſpecially when it is remem- " bered, that to err is the lot of humanity, but " to do good is the property of piety. If ſome " from prejudice may deem our deſcription ex- " aggerated, we preſume others from juſtice will " allow it but adequate, nor refrain a tributary " tear at the loſs of ſo eminent a compound of " all that was great, excellent, and amiable in " human nature." See Clarendon's Hiſtory of England, vol. II. page. 552.

About three o'clock in the morning, on the ſeventh of November, a moſt terrible fire broke out at a peruke-makers, near the end of Biſhopſ-gate-ſtreet, next Cornhill; when the wind being high and weſterly, the flames ſoon ſpread to the corner houſe, and from thence to the oppoſite ſide, and ſet fire to a millener's; and it being ſome time before aſſiſtance could be got, the fire ſoon communicated itſelf to all the four corner houſes, which was burning at one time: the paſtry-cook's houſe at the head of Cornhill was greatly damaged; the oppoſite paſtry-cook's the corner of Gracechurch-ſtreet was deſtroyed; all the houſes from the corner of Cornhill to the church of St. Martin Outwich, the corner of Threadneedle-ſtreet, excepting the praſonage houſe, were conſumed; and the ſaid church likewiſe taking fire, a part of the ſteeple was ſoon burnt down, whereby the great bell in it fell with a prodigious noiſe; the inſide of the church was next conſumed, and the flames ſpread to the back of Threadneedle-ſtreet, where ſeveral houſes were entirely burnt down to the ground; every houſe in White-lion-court; among them the White-lion tavern, which was bought but the evening before, at nine o'clock, for between two and three thouſand pounds. The back part of Merchant-taylors-hall received ſome damage. Five houſes on the Exchange-ſide of Cornhill, and upwards of twenty in Leadenhall-ſtreet, were entirely conſumed. On the whole, it was computed that this fire deſtroyed upwards of one hundred houſes, and did more damage than the memorable fire, which broke out oppoſite the Royal-Exchange on the twenty-fifth of March 1748, the loſs being computed at 100,000l. of which a conſiderable part was uninſured.—A gentleman who attended at this fire, thinking that many perſons might be ſtill alive under the rubbiſh, ventured among them the next day, before the fire was quite extinguiſhed, and, waving his hat upon the top of a pile of ruins to engage the attention of the ſpectators, declared that he was ſure many were actually under the ſpot on which he ſtood. Upon this the firemen, with their pick-axes, came to their aſſiſtance, and dug out alive two men, three women, a child about ſix years old, a dog and two cats. The next day as ſome workmen were clearing out the cellar of a tobacconiſt, whoſe houſe had been burnt, a ſtack of chimnies fell ſuddenly, by which eight perſons loſt their lives, and ſeveral had their limbs cruſhed in a moſt ſhocking manner. Subſcriptions were immediately ſet on foot for the relief of the uninſured ſufferers by this fire, and ſoon produced 30001. of which his majeſty was pleaſed to contribute 1000l. the grocers and ironmongers company one hundred pounds each, and the Lord-mayor fifty pounds, a handſome part of which was diſtributed amongſt the unfortunate widows and children of the men who were killed by the falling of the ſtack of chimnies.

On the twenty-ſeventh the right honourable the lord Cambden gave his opinion upon the granting of general warrants by ſecretaries of ſtate, which ſome days before had been learnedly argued in his preſence. After enlarging upon and explaining numbers of caſes, which laſted upwards of two hours, his lordſhip declared it, as the unanimous opinion of the court, that ſuch warrants (except in caſes of high treaſon) were illegal, oppreſſive and unwarrantable.

The court of common-council having referred to the commiſſioners of ſewers and pavements the conſideration of the moſt effectual way to correct the complaints of bad pavements and other nuiſances within the limits of the city juriſdiction, they made a repreſentation of what they had conſidered in the manner and form following:

To the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled.

The humble repreſentation of the commiſſioners of the ſewers and pavements within the ſaid city and liberties,

Sheweth,

That they, the commiſſioners of the ſewers, having received frequent complaints of bad pavements, and other nuiſances, within the limits of our juriſdiction, and having found our repeated endeavours to correct the ſame ineffectual, we think it incumbent on us to repreſent to this honourable court:

1. That the pavements are in general rough and irregular, and in many of the principal ſtreets very defective and bad, chiefly owing, as we conceive, to their being partially and at different times, and with different materials, repaired by the ſeveral inhabitants themſelves, to the frequent breaches made therein by the different water companies, and to their ſlight and inſufficient manner of patching up the ſame.

2. That

2. That the prevailing method of placing the channels in the middle of the ſtreets, which are generally made very deep, and in many caſes (ſometimes neceſſarily) attended with croſs channels, renders the coach-way very diſagreeable and unſafe to paſſengers, as well as highly detrimental to horſes and carriages.

3. That the too common practice of the lower ſort of inhabitants, and ſervants, throwing aſhes, rubbiſh, broken glaſs, and earthen ware, offals, and other offenſive things, into the ſtreets, ſtops the current of the channels, makes the highway very inconvenient, and ſometimes dangerous to coach, horſe and foot paſſengers, and even to the health of the neighbouring inhabitants.

4. That the paſſage of ſome of the greateſt thoroughfares is often obſtructed by the loading and unloading of ſtage-coaches, ſtage-waggons, and country carts, and by the waſhing of butts, caſks, and barrels, in the highway.

5. That the foot-ways, by not being raiſed above the level of the ſtreets, are much annoyed with mud, and frequently overflowed with water, which renders them diſagreeable and ſlippery in moiſt, and very dangerous in froſty weather; a nuiſance every day accumulated by the neglect of the houſholders to cauſe their ſervants to ſcrape and ſweep away the mud from before their houſes.

6. That poſts intended for the ſecurity of paſſengers, do but in part anſwer that intention, conſiderably leſſen the paſſage on both ſides, in ſtreets already too narrow, and, by their irregularity and aptneſs to decay, offend the eye, at the ſame time that they occaſion an expence which might be entirely ſaved by raiſing the foot-way a little higher.

That ſeveral of the foot-ways are encumbered with goods and packages, and others of them ſtreightened by the unwarrantable projection of ſhop-windows, bulks, and ſhew-boards, or the more dangerous encroachments of vaults and cellar doors.

8. That the daily increaſing rivalſhip in the ſize and projection of ſigns in a great meaſure defeats the purpoſe of them, obſtructs the free circulation of the air, (ſo deſirable in a large and populous city) in times of high wind often proves dangerous, and in rain always an annoyance to foot-paſſengers, and at night, more or leſs, intercepts the light of the lamps.

9. That foot-paſſengers are likewiſe greatly annoyed, in rainy weather, by the water conveyed from the tops of old houſes through ſpouts projecting into the ſtreets.

10. That for the want of the ſtreets and courts being properly marked and diſtinguiſhed, and the houſes regularly numbered, ſtrangers are often put to great trouble and difficulty to find their way to places and perſons they have occaſion to reſort to.

From this view of the many nuiſances and defects which leſſen the beauty, neatneſs, and convenience of this great and famous metropolis, we humbly conceive, that every perſon (not bigotted to ancient forms and cuſtoms, or biaſſed by narrow conſiderations of immediate intereſt) muſt be convinced of the neceſſity of a ſpeedy reformation, without which the little of our retail trade that remains will in time be totally loſt, our wards and pariſhes depopulated, and the burthen of our offices and taxes proportionally increaſed.

To obviate the objection which, in the minds of ſome, may ariſe fom a dread of the expence attending the propoſed regulations, and which can only be defrayed by a new tax, we humbly beg leave to offer it as our opinion, that a very moderate tax, little exceeding the average of the preſent ordinary repairs, might, by borrowing a ſum of money upon the credit of it, be ſufficient to anſwer the expence, not only of the firſt outſet, but of all neceſſary reparations for many years to come; that the difference (if any) would be more than amply compenſated by the preſervation, not to ſay recovery, of our retail trade, and that every ground of complaint of oppreſſion or partiality might be effectually removed, if the propoſed reformation was limited to ſtreets, the major part of whoſe inhabitants ſhould apply for and requeſt it.

To enable ourſelves to form this conjecture, as well as others to judge of its probability, we have enquired the prices contracted for by the commiſſioners for the new pavement at Weſtminſter, have cauſed the ſtreets from Temple-bar to Aldgate-church to be ſurveyed and meaſured, and different eſtimates to be made of the propoſed improvements within that diſtance; from all which we have formed the following computation:

An ESTIMATE of the expence of altering all the paving from Temple-bar, proceeding eaſtward up Fleet-ſtreet, Ludgate-hill, Ludgate-ſtreet, all round the ſouth-ſide of St. Paul's, along Cheapſide, the Poultry, Cornhill, Leaden-hall-ſtreet, and home to Aldgate-church.

A tax of 12d. in the pound upon the rents of the front houſes, which we find to amount to the ſum of 47,800l. and upwards would raiſe the yearly ſum of	2390	0	0
And as it ſeems reaſonable that the neighbouring inhabitants, whoſe houſes do not front the high ſtreets, ought to contribute towards the expence of improvements of which they will equally enjoy the benefit, we think the propoſed tax ſhould extend to all houſes in the adjoining yards, courts, and alleys, but with a power of mitigation in favour of the inferior and poorer ſort of houſholders; which diſcretionary tax we eſtimate at the yearly ſum of ——	150	0	0
Total of the tax per annum —	2540	0	0
On the other hand the intereſt of 17000l. (which is more than the larger eſtimate requires) at 4l. per cent. would amount to the yearly ſum of ——	680	0	0
We eſtimate the future annual repairs at ——	400	0	0

Which total charge being deducted from the amount of the tax, will leave a ſurplus of 1260l. per annum, applicable to a gradual diſcharge of the principal money borrowed, which it would compleat in about eleven years; and, if parliament (who have been ſo liberal in their encouragement to the improvements at Weſtminſter) ſhould be prevailed on to grant us the benefit of a Sunday's toll, the whole debt might be paid off, and the tax reduced, in a much ſhorter time.

It remains only to be conſidered what further powers will be requiſite for the execution of the plan in queſtion, in caſe it ſhould meet with the approbation of this honourable court; for which purpoſe we humbly conceive that we cannot better inform or direct their judgment than by a faithful enumeration of the many defects we have experienced in the exerciſe of our preſent authority: we therefore beg leave to repreſent,

1. That, whatever might have been the original intention and legal conſtruction of our authority as to pavements, at the time of its creation, we are adviſed, that the conſtant and uniform method in which it hath been exerciſed for near a century, as well as the implied interpretation of it by ſome late ſtatutes, reſtrain it wholly to the ordering, deſigning, and regulating, the manner of the paving; ſo that (except in two caſes, viz. that of untenanted, or where a defect complained of continues unreformed) we have no power to interfere with the paving itſelf, or (the former of thoſe caſes only excepted) to aſſeſs or levy any tax for the doing of it.

2. That we have no authority to try or puniſh even the moſt petty offenders in a ſummary way; the paviours and rakers, who are by law enjoined to obey our orders, and who we may fine for diſobedience, having it in their election whether they will ſubmit to ſuch fine or not; ſo that, in fact, we have no other way to enforce our orders, or to remove nuiſances of any kind, but by indictment at the ſeſſions, which, as it generally proves a very tedious and expenſive (and ſometimes a fruitleſs) remedy, without any fund appropriated to ſupport the charge of it, is ſeldom purſued.

3. That we have no particular controul over the water companies, to compel them to repair, in a proper and ſufficient manner, or within a reaſonable time, the ſeveral breaches which their workmen are daily making in the pavement of ſome or other of our moſt frequented ſtreets.

4. That we have no authority to pull up or remove any poſts, though found to be ever ſo inconvenient to the public.

5. That we have no kind of juriſdiction over ſigns, nor authority to affix any marks to houſes, whereby to diſtinguiſh them or the ſtreets they ſtand in.

Having preſumed to trouble this honourable court with our ſentiments upon a ſubject with which the duty of our office ſeems in ſome ſort connected, and in which the honour of this city, and the intereſt of its inhabitants, appears to us to be greatly concerned, we humbly ſubmit it to their ſuperior wiſdom, how far they will think proper to adapt a plan ſo ſucceſsfully purſued in the city of Weſtminſter, and what meaſures it may be expedient to take for carrying the ſame into execution. Dated at Guildhall, the fifteenth day of November 1765. By order of court.

John Smith, clerk to the commiſſioners.

An act of common-council being ſoon after paſſed, a petition was preſented from the corporation to the houſe of commons, praying that a bill might be brought in to pave the city of London, purſuant to the ſaid order. The laſt circumſtance which cloſes the year 1765 was the death of his royal highneſs prince Frederick William, youngeſt brother to his preſent majeſty, which happened on the twenty-ninth of December, at his houſe in Leiceſter-ſquare. His royal highneſs, at the time of his death, was in the ſixteenth year of his age.

CHAPTER XLIX.

The American ſtamp-act repealed. Great rejoicings on the occaſion. Weavers relieved by parliament. Act for new paving the city of London. City gates pulled down. Riots occaſioned by the high price of proviſions. Proclamation againſt foreſtallers. Marriage of her royal highneſs princeſs Carolina Matilda. Remarkable ſtorm of thunder and lightning. Great froſt. Violent hurricane. Fire in the Strand. State of the city hoſpitals. Death of the duke of York.

THE year 1766 began with a very warm conteſt in the houſe of commons reſpecting the repeal or continuance of the American ſtamp-act; and perhaps there ſcarce ever was any affair debated in a Britiſh parliament, in which the public thought themſelves more deeply intereſted, or for the reſult of which they felt a more impatient anxiety. Petitions were received from the merchants of London, Briſtol, Liverpool, Lancaſter, Hull, Glaſgow, &c. and indeed from moſt of the trading and manufacturing towns and boroughs in the kingdom, ſetting forth the great decay of their trade, owing to the new laws and regulations made for America. Petitions were likewiſe received from the agents for Virginia and Georgia, ſetting forth their inability to pay the ſtamp duty. But neither the arguments nor facts contained in the petitions could prevail on the party who had reſolved to ſupport the ſtamp act at all events, to remit in the leaſt of their ardor.

No matter of debate was ever more ably and learnedly handled in both houſes. The ſubject was of the higheſt importance, and it was not without difficulties both conſtitutional and political, in the diſcuſſion and in the conſequences. On the queſtion being put, the power of the legiſlature of Great Britain over her colonies, in all caſes whatſoever, and without any diſtinction in regard to taxation, was confirmed and aſcertained without a diviſion. And this was, perhaps, the only queſtion that could have been thought of, upon which the miniſtry, and their antagoniſts in the oppoſition, would have gone together on a diviſion.

The grand committee who had paſſed the reſolutions on which the foregoing queſtion was debated, had alſo paſſed another for the total repeal of the ſtamp act; and two bills were accordingly brought in to anſwer theſe purpoſes. By the reſolutions on which the former was founded, it was declared, that tumults and inſurrections of the moſt dangerous nature had been raiſed and carried on in ſeveral of the colonies, in open defiance of government, and in manifeſt violation of the laws and legiſlative authority of this kingdom. That theſe tumults and inſurrections had been encouraged and inflamed by ſeveral votes and reſolutions which had paſſed in the aſſemblies of the ſaid colonies, derogatory to the honour of government, and deſtructive to their legal and conſtitutional dependency on the crown and parliament.

By the bill itſelf, all votes, reſolutions, or orders, which had been paſſed by any of the general aſſemblies in America, by which they aſſumed to themſelves the ſole and excluſive right of taxing his majeſty's ſubjects in the colonies, were annulled, and declared contrary to law, derogatory to the legiſlative authority of parliament, and inconſiſtent with their dependency upon the crown.

The oppoſition, far from being diſpirited, ſeemed to gather freſh vigour, and ſtill oppoſed the repeal in every part of its progreſs: but notwithſtanding all their endeavours, the bill paſſed upon a diviſion, by a majority of 275 to 167, and was carried up to the houſe of lords by above two hundred members of the houſe of commons, where it met with a ſtrong oppoſition; thirty-three lords entered a proteſt againſt it at the ſecond reading, as did twenty-eight at the third. At laſt, however, it was carried through by a majority of thirty-four; and on the eighteenth of March his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and gave his royal aſſent to the ſame.

On this occaſion the American merchants made a moſt numerous appearance to expreſs their joy and gratitude; the ſhips in the river diſplayed their colours; great numbers of houſes in the city were illuminated; and every decent and orderly method was obſerved, to demonſtrate the juſt ſenſe that was entertained of his majeſty's goodneſs, and the wiſdom of parliament in conciliating the minds of the people on this critical occaſion.

On the fourteenth of May, his majeſty having given the royal aſſent, among others, to "the "bill to prohibit the importation of foreign "wrought ſilks and velvets for a limited time," ſeveral thouſand weavers went to St. James's, with colours flying, drums beating, and muſic playing, playing, and teſtified their gratitude by loud acclamations of joy.

At the ſame time his majeſty ſigned the act for better paving, lighting and cleanſing the city of London, and to prevent annoyances therein, and for other purpoſes. The particulars of which act run thus:

" That, from and after the paſſing of this act, " the ſole power and authority of pitching, pav- " ing, cleanſing and enlightening the ſtreets, &c, " is veſted in the mayor and commonalty of Lon- " don, to be executed by ſuch perſons as they, " in common-council aſſembled, ſhall appoint to " be commiſſioners of the ſewers, which com- " miſſioners of the ſewers ſhall be conſtituted " commiſſioners for carrying this act into execu- " tion.

" The recorder and common-ſerjeant of the " ſaid city of London, for the time being, are " to be commiſſioners, and ſeven commiſſioners " are to be a quorum.

" The commiſſioners are to meet on or before " the twenty-fourth of June 1766, with power " to adjourn; and the mayor may appoint ſpe- " cial meetings.

" The commiſſioners ſhall and may appoint " clerks, ſurveyors, and as many other officers as " they ſhall find neceſſary; and the ſaid com- " miſſioners ſhall take ſuch ſecurity as they ſhall " think proper, and may remove any of the ſaid " officers at their will and pleaſure, and appoint " others in their room, with ſuch ſalaries as they " ſhall judge reaſonable.

" The penalty on exactions of clerks, ſur- " veyors, and other officers, is, that every per- " ſon ſo offending ſhall from henceforth for ever " be incapable of being employed under this act, " and ſhall, over and above, forfeit and pay the " ſum of 50l. to any who ſhall ſue for the ſame, " within ſix calendar months next after the of- " fence committed.

" Non-freemen may be employed in paving, " cleanſing, &c. any of the ſtreets, &c. and may " contract for the performance of the ſaid works, " or any of them, as the commiſſioners ſhall think " fit. No common-council-man ſhall be con- " cerned in any contract.

" The general powers granted to the commiſ- " ſiners are, that they may cauſe all or any of " the ſtreets, lanes, ſquares, yards, courts, alleys, " paſſages, and places, to be new paved, or re- " paired, when, and as often, and in ſuch man- " ner, and with ſuch materials, as they ſhall " think fit, and may cauſe ſuch poſts, as they " ſhall think uſeleſs or inconvenient, to be taken " up and removed; and likewiſe all ſteps, bulks, " ſhew-glaſſes, and ſhew-boards, incroaching up- " on the foot-ways; as alſo all ſteps and doors, " opening or leading from the foot-ways into " vaults or cellars, to be removed or altered.

" The ſtreets that are to be firſt paved and en- " lightened are the great ſtreets from Temple-bar " to Whitechapel-bars, and they are to be paved " with the ſtone known by the name of whyn " quarry ſtone, or with rock ſtone, or with ſtone " of a flat ſurface. And a paſſage for carriages " is to be open on the north ſide of St. Paul's, " whilſt the ſouth ſide is repairing.

" The commiſſioners are alſo hereby impower " ed to have taken down and removed all ſigns, " or other emblems, uſed to denote the trade, " occupation, or calling of any perſon or perſons, " together with the ſign-poſts, ſign-irons, pent- " houſes, ſhew-boards, ſpouts, and gutters, and " all other incroachments, projections, and an- " noyances whatſoever, within the ſaid city or li- " berties; and for the future all ſuch ſigns, &c. " are to be fixed on the fronts of the houſes, and " not otherwiſe; and every perſon, offending " contrary to theſe directions, for every ſuch of- " fence, is to forfeit and pay the ſum of 5l. and " the further ſum of 20s. for every day ſuch of- " fence ſhall continue.

" Cranes ſhall be kept cloſe to the walls of " warehouſes; and, after the 24th of June, 1766, " no waggon ſhall, for the purpoſe of loading " and unloading the ſame, ſtand in the ſtreets " above an hour; nor any cart, waggon, dray, " or other carriage, be ſuffered to ſtand athwart " or acroſs any ſtreet, &c. or otherwiſe, longer " than is neceſſary for the loading or unloading " thereof; nor any goods, materials or things " whatſoever, to be laid or placed in any ſtreet, " &c. ſo as to obſtruct the paſſage thereof: and in " every ſuch offence, any one of the commiſſion- " ers, or officers by them appointed to remove " nuiſances, may ſeize the waggon, cart, dray, or " other carriage, ſo placed together with the " horſe or horſes; or the goods, materials, and " things ſo laid and left, and remove the ſame " to the common pound of the city, commonly " called the Greenyard, till claimed by the owner " or owners, on payment of the ſum of 20s. " with the charges of removing and keeping the " ſame; and, in caſe of non-claiming and pay- " ment within the ſpace of three days next after " ſuch ſeizure, it ſhall be lawful for the com- " miſſioners to appraiſe and ſell the ſame, and the " monies ariſing therefrom are to be applied to " the purpoſes of this act. This clauſe extends " to ſeizing, pounding, and ſelling in like man- " ner, any poſts, bars, rails, boards or other " thing, by way of incloſure for the purpoſe of " making mortar, or depoſiting bricks, lime or " other materials for building or repairing houſes, " or other works, if ſuffered to remain any " longer time than is neceſſary. The claiming " of them before ſold is limited to the ſpace of " eight days.

" No lime is to be ſlacked in the foot or carri- " age way of the ſtreets, &c. nor in any houſe, " but only on vacant ſites, where any houſe or " houſes are totally pulled down in order to be " rebuilt, on the penalty of forty ſhillings.

" The penalty of driving any bier, wheel or " wheels, ſledge, wheel-barrow or other carriage " whatſoever, or wilfully riding, leading, or " driving, any horſe, coach, or other carriage " whatſoever, upon any part of the foot-pave- " ments, is 10s. for the firſt offence; 20s. for " the ſecond; and 40s, for the third, and every " other time of offending. Any perſon whatever, " without any other warrant, who ſhall ſee any

" ſuch offence committed, may ſeize the offender,
" and convey him to the cuſtody of a juſtice of " peace, before whom he muſt be convicted upon " oath.

" The names of ſtreets, &c. are to be put up,
" painted, engraved, or deſcribed in ſtone or
" otherwiſe at or near each end, corner or en" trance, of each of the ſtreets, &c. and the " houſes are to be numbered, in order to the di-
" ſtinguiſhing them; and the penalty of malici-
" ouſly defacing or obliterating the ſame, for " every ſuch offence, is 40s.

" The form of the new pavement is not to be " altered without authority from the commiſſion-
" ers, on the penalty of 5l. over and above the " expence of relaying and reinſtating the ſame.
" But the pavements are to be repaired on com" plaint; and, when water-pipes are broken,
" and the pavement taken up for repairing them,
" the ground muſt be filled up within four days
" after, upon the penalty of the paviour of the " water-company, to whom the pipes belong,
" paying 5l. or the owners of ſuch pipes, not " belonging to any of the water-companies, pay-
" ing forty ſhillings. The paviours of the water-
" companies are to give notice of their names,
" &c. and the water companies are to pay the " expence of new laying the pavement, when
" the pipes are broken, &c. The expence of " alterations in the pipes is to be defrayed out of " the monies ariſing or to ariſe by virtue of this " act, and liſts of the turn-cocks are to be de" livered to the houſholders.

" The commiſſioners ſhall have full power to " cauſe the ſtreets to be watered as often as they
" ſhall think fit, and to have wells ſunk and
" pumps erected in proper places, for that or any " other purpoſe; likewiſe duſt holes erected,
" where the occupiers of houſes and tenements
" are required to have all their duſt, aſhes, and
" other filth to be depoſited, till the ſame ſhall be " carried away by the reſpective rakers or ſca-
" vengers. The perſon offending contrary to " this clauſe is to forfeit ten ſhillings for every " offence.

" The foot-ways are to be cleaned daily by the " occupiers of houſes or tenements, under the " penalty of two ſhillings.

" The commiſſioners are empowered to direct
" the ſetting up of lamps in ſuch a manner, and
" at ſuch diſtances, as they ſhall judge proper,
" and at what time they are to be lighted, and
" how long to continue ſo; the commiſſiones are
" alſo to direct the placing of private lamps.

" The property of the pavements, &c. are
" veſted in the mayor, commonalty, and citizens,
" of the city of London, and all actions and " indictments are to be preferred in their name.

" From and after the 29th of September,
" 1766, rates are to be collected half-yearly, or " oftener, as the commiſſioners ſhall think fit to " order, and not to exceed 1s. 6d. in the pound
" in any one year, in the whole of the yearly
" rents of lands, houſes, ſhops, warehouſes,
" cellars, vaults, or other tenements or hered-
" taments reſpectively, as ſhall be ſituate in any
" ſtreet, &c. actually begun to be new paved;
" and 1s. in the pound of the yearly rents of
" ſuch of the lands, houſes, &c. as ſhall not be
" ſo ſituate. Thoſe lands, houſes, &c. are ſuch
" as are actually rated towards the relief of the " poor in the reſpective pariſhes; and the owners
" of large warehouſes, &c. and poor tradeſmen,
" manufacturers, &c. upon petition to the com-
" miſſioners, are intitled to relief, as they ſhall
" think juſt and reaſonable. The parties con" cerned, thinking themſelves aggrieved, by the " award of the commiſſioners, may appeal to the " court of mayor and aldermen, who ſhall finally
" determine what relief to be granted.

" The ſeveral aldermen of the city or their " reſpective deputies, are empowered to examine " poor's rates and land-tax books. Duplicates
" of the rates are to be made out and ſigned; and
" collectors are to be choſen annually, on St.
" Thomas's-day. 50l. is the penalty on refuſing
" to ſerve, and, notwithſtanding, the party or " parties continue liable to be choſen again the " year following, or at any other time; and are " liable to the like penalty ſo often as they refuſe
" or neglect to take and duly execute the ſame.
" In caſe of death, or refuſal, the alderman of " each reſpective ward may appoint others, under
" the like penalty; and the only perſons exempt-
" ed are thoſe who are ſo by the laws now in be" ing from ſerving any ward office.

" Inmates, or the occupiers of houſes in lodg-
" ings or tenements, are to pay the rates, but
" are to be allowed the ſame out of their rents
" by the owners.

" Public buildings, hoſpitals excepted, may " be rated at 4d. per ſquare yard, and dead walls
" at 6d. per yard running meaſure. St. Paul's
" church and yard are to be rated by the alder-
" man of Caſtle-baynard ward, or his deputy, at
" ſuch rate as the major part of his common-
" council men ſhall judge reaſonable, not exceed" ing the rate of 1s. 3d. by the year for every
" ſquare yard of the ſaid pavement: wharfs,
" warehouſes, &c. are not to pay more than two-" thirds of the rates herein before directed: the " rates on meeting-houſes are to be paid by thoſe
" officiating therein; and of unoccupied houſes,
" &c. by the firſt tenants or occupiers thereof,
" allowance in the rent to be made by the land-
" lords or owners.

" The collector is to diſtrain in caſe of non-" payment; and, if diſtreſs followed, the war-
" rant is to be backed. The penalty on the neg" lect of granting or executing ſuch warrants, is " 40s. Nothing in this act ſhall be deemed to " make void any agreement between landlord and " tenant, concerning the paving, cleanſing, or " enlightening any part of the ſaid ſtreets, &c.

" Freemen, not paying the rates, are incapa-
" ble of voting; and perſons aggrieved may ap" peal to the commiſſioners, within 30 days next
" after ſuch rates ſhall have been demanded, and
" the commiſſioners are to hear and determine
" complaints.

" The money collected is to be paid into the " chamberlain's office; and the collector, upon
" demand, is to give in an account of all monies
" collected. The penalty on refuſal to account,
" or make payment, is diſtreſs and ſale of the " collector's goods and chattels; and if none ſuch, ſufficient

" ſufficient to ſatisfy the ſaid money, can be " found, with the charges of diſtreſs and ſale, " then the collector may be committed to one of " the compters, there to be detained till he ſhall " pay the ſame, or ſuch compoſition as the com- " miſſioners ſhall agree to accept.

" The collector dying, or becoming bankrupt, " his eſtate is liable to payment; but if inſolvent, " the money is to be again aſſeſſed.

" The chamberlain is to pay all ſums of mo- " ney, by order of the commiſſioners, and to " make entries.

" The preſent contracts for lighting, &c. the " ſtreets, are not hereby vacated.

" The commiſſioners may borrow money on " the credit of the rates, and 100,000l. may be " borrowed by annuities on lives, at 8l. per cent. " to be paid by four equal quarterly payments " during the full term of the natural life of the " annuitants, being of the age of 45 years, or " upwards. The clerk is to enter all ſecurities. " The annuities are not liable to taxes, and the " ſecurities are transferrable. The money bor- " rowed is charged on the rates; and perſons " charged towards theſe rates are not liable to " any former rates, in purſuance of any former " acts of parliament, towards paving, cleanſing, " &c. of the ſaid city and liberties, but arrears " of former rates are ſtill recoverable.

" The ſurplus remaining in the chamber of " London, under act 17. George II. is to be ap- " plied to this act.

" And that the purpoſes of this act may the " better be carried into execution, the following " tolls are to be taken at the turnpikes at " Mile-end, Bethnel green, Hackney, Kingſland, " Ball's pound or pond Iſlington, Holloway, end " of St. John's-ſtreet, end of Goſwell-ſtreet, and " the turnpike on the City-road; all which Turn- " pikes are in the county of Middleſex; viz. For " every coach &c. drawn by ſix or more horſes, " the ſum of 10d. For ditto drawn by four " horſes, 8d. For ditto, drawn by three, or two " horſes, 6d. For every chaiſe, chair, calaſh, " or other carriage, drawn by one horſe, 3d. " and for every horſe, &c. 1d."

At a court of common-council held at Guild-hall the ſixteenth of May, commiſſioners were choſen for executing the purpoſes of the above act, who met, on the twenty-third, and ſettled the appointments to their reſpective officers and ſervants, as follows: To the chief clerk, 100l. per annum; firſt-aſſiſtant-clerk, 60l. Junior aſ- ſiſtant-clerk, 50l. Surveyor, 200l. Three in- ſpectors, 60l. each.

The following is the ſubſtance of the inſtruc- tions given by the commiſſioners of the pave- ments for the city of London to their officers.

General Duties.

1. They muſt give ſecurity for the due execu- tion of their offices as the commiſſioners ſhall require.

2. They muſt not accept any fee or reward (other than ſalaries and rewards allowed by the commiſſioners) for any thing done, or to be done, for forbearing to do any thing, or on any account whatſoever, relating to the execution or non exe- cution of this act.

3. They muſt not be intereſted in any bargain made by the commiſſioners, on forfeiture of 50l. and perpetual diſability.

4. They muſt be active, and pay ready obedi- ence to the commiſſioners.

5. They muſt behave with good manners to- wards their ſuperiors, and every inhabitant; and, upon all occaſions, manifeſt a diſpoſition to oblige them as far as their truſt will permit.

Duty of the three Inspectors.

1. The city and its liberties to be divided into three diſtricts, as nearly equal as poſſible; and ſuch inſpector is to act within his own diſtrict as deputy to the principal ſurveyor, and to follow his direction.

2. He is, in a book to be by him kept, to en- ter an alphabetical liſt of all the ſtreets and places within his diſtrict, with an account in four ſepa- rate columns, of the quantity of paving in the carriage and footways, (diſtinguiſhing each ſort) the number of lamps, the ſituation of the grates, or gully-holes, and the courſes, dimenſions and declivities of the ſewers.

3. He is frequently to preambulate his diſtrict both day and night; and to obſerve whether the contractors for cleanſing and lighting do their duty; whether the foot-ways are daily ſcraped and cleanſed; whether any poſts, ſpurs, or ken- nels, are inconvenient; whether any pavement is out of repair; whether any water-pipe appears to be decayed; whether any ſewer is broken, or ſtopped up; whether any privies communicate with the common-ſewer; whether any of the grates or gullyholes are too narrow or ill-placed; whether any lime is ſlaked in any ſtreet, place or houſe; whether any carriage or horſe is driven upon the foot-pavements; whether any marks for diſtinguiſhing the ſtreets, or houſes, ſhall be de- faced; whether the form of any pavement new made, ſhall be altered; whether any ſigns or gut- ters ſhall be placed otherwiſe than in the fronts of houſes; whether any cranes are to project over the highway when not in actual uſe; whether any occupiers of tenements ſhall cauſe to be depo- ſited any duſt in any ſtreet, except in ſome box, or conveniency, provided by the commiſſioners; whether any of the lamps are broken, or the light extinguiſhed, or the irons damaged; whether any private lamps are placed otherwiſe than directed by the commiſſioners; and, laſtly, whether there are any nuiſances in the highway: and he ſhall make a minute of each obſervation on the left hand pages of a book, called The regiſter of the diſtrict; marking the place and time, propoſing the remedy, and eſtimating the ex- pence, if incumbent on the commiſſioners.

4. He is, on the right hand of his regiſter, (correſponding with his obſervations on the other ſide) to make fair diſtinct minutes of what is done in conſequence thereof, marking the time, and totals of the charges.

5. He is to attend every meeting of the commiſſioners with his regiſter, and be ready to anſwer all queſtions.

6. He is, immediately upon receipt of orders for any repairs, to cauſe the ſame to be done, if the expence ſhall not exceed five pounds. But where the expence is likely to exceed that ſum, he is to carry the order to the principal ſurveyor, that he may view, and report.

7. He is to employ ſuch workmen only as the commiſſioners ſhall direct.

8. He is, upon the burſting of any pipe belonging to the water company, to give immediate notice thereof to the paviours of the company; and, upon the burſting of any other pipe, to give the like notice to the owner, requiring an immediate repair; and if ſuch defect is not repaired, and the ground filled up within four days he is to report the ſame to the commiſſioners.

9. If after Midſummer, 1766, any common-ſtage-waggon ſhall ſtand in any ſtreet, &c. above an hour at a time; or any cart or other carriage, ſhall be placed acroſs any ſtreet, &c. or ſtand in any part thereof longer than is neceſſary for loading and unloading; or if any goods ſhall be left in any ſtreet, &c. ſo as to obſtruct the paſſage; he is, upon complaint by any two reputable houſekeepers, to remove ſuch carriages, with the horſes, and ſuch goods, to the Green-yard.

The commiſſioners, having thus adjuſted the neceſſary preparations for ſo capital an undertaking, immediately applied to parliament for leave to pull down what obſtructed the free air, and to make and widen ſuch ſtreets as ſhould be found neceſſary. And in conſequence of an act paſſed for that purpoſe, Ludgate, Alderſgate, Cripplegate, Moorgate, Biſhopſgate, and Aldgate, with the poſterns within their limits, were taken down; and the city wall, between the ſcite of Cripplegate and Moorgate, and in ſeveral other places, was razed from the foundation by the people who rent the adjacent ground from the city on a building leaſe. Narrow paſſages, which before were dangerous, were opened and widened, and new ſtreets formed on the ruins of the old. The ſigns, ſign poſts and irons, together with all ſpouts and projections, were entirely removed; and, in ſhort, ſuch extenſive amendments have been, and ſtill are making, as muſt in the end form the city of London the moſt elegant (as well as the moſt opulent) city in the world.

At a court of common-council held the 30th of July, the report of Mr. Recorder was read, touching the city of London's rights to import 4000 chaldrons of coals for the benefit of the city-poor; by which opinion it appeared, the corporation are by charter entitled to that quantity, at 1s. per chaldron leſs duty than is the cuſtom to pay in the port of London.

This month great outrages were committed by the poor in various parts of the kingdom, on account of the high price of proviſions. They aſſembled in large bodies, when they pulled down, burnt, or otherwiſe deſtroyed flour mills, ſeized on corn and other proviſions, which they ſold at a moderate price and delivered the produce to the owners. At ſome places they were ſo exaſperated that they ripped open the ſacks, and ſcattered the corn about, ſeized butter, cheeſe and bacon, in the ſhops, and threw it into the ſtreets, and committed numberleſs other violences.

On the firſt of Auguſt, about four o'clock in the morning a terrible fire broke out at Mr. Smith's, cheeſemonger, in Blackmoor-ſtreet, Clare-market, which entirely conſumed that houſe, greatly damaged two others in front, and burnt backwards as far as Craven-buildings in Drury-lane. The fire was ſo rapid, that an elderly woman, who lodged in the houſe, periſhed in the flames; and it was with the greateſt difficulty the family eſcaped ſharing the ſame fate.

In order to prevent the dreadful conſequences which had been, and ſtill were like to continue on account of the high price of proviſions, a proclamation was publiſhed on the eleventh of September for putting in force an act of parliament of the fifth and ſixth of Edward VI. and likewiſe an act made in the fifth of queen Elizabeth, againſt foreſtallers, regrators, and engroſſers of corn, &c. and that all judges, juſtices of the peace, mayors, ſheriffs, bailiffs, &c. within England and Wales, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, ſhould put the ſaid act (as well as all other acts relating to the ſame matter) into execution, on pain of his majeſty's high diſpleaſure, and of ſuch pains and puniſhments as might by law be inflicted upon the contemners of his royal authority.

The following melancholy circumſtance, which happened this month, is of ſo ſingular a nature, that we think its inſertion in this place needs little apology. A ſoldier being ſentenced to be ſhot at Plymouth-dock for deſertion, the marine companies and fourth regiment were ordered to attend the execution. After having received the ſacrament, the priſoner was brought out of the barracks, eſcorted by an officer's guard, and attended by a clergyman; his coffin was carried before him, which made the proceſſion appear more dreadful and ſolemn. About ten he got to the field of execution, where he repeatedly kneeled and prayed. About eleven o'clock the commanding officer ordered him to march round the troops to admoniſh them, and the clergyman dictated what he ſhould ſay, after which he returned to his place. There were nine men who were formerly deſerters, ordered to ſhoot him: he kneeled, and was bid by the officer to pull his cap over his face, which he did; and whilſt the officer turned round, the man dropped a handkerchief out of his hand, which being underſtood as a ſignal to ſhoot him, three of the men inſtantly fired through his body. The officer had a reprieve in his pocket, but by heightening the ſcene of horror too much, and by ſome unaccountable fatality, the poor man loſt his life. The dreadful confuſion of the officer may be more eaſily conceived than expreſſed.

The committee for building Black-friars bridge being met at Guildhall on the nineteenth, agreed to transfer to the watermen's company the ſum of 13,650l. three per cent. Bank annuities, which produces 409l. 10s. per annum, and which the ſaid company was annually to receive, in conſi-deration of the ferry at Black-friars being removed to admit the opening of the temporary bridge.

On the evening of the firſt of October, her royal highneſs princeſs Carolina-Matilda was married to the king of Denmark at the chapel royal at St. James's; the duke of York being proxy for his Daniſh majeſty; and the next morning her majeſty ſet out from Carlton-houſe, in order to embark for Denmark. She was attended by his royal highneſs the duke of Glouceſter, right hon. lady Mary Boothby, and count de Bothmar, her majeſty's vice-chamberlain, in a train of three coaches, eſcorted by parties of light-horſe, horſe-grenadiers, and life-guards, and a numerous train of domeſtics and attendants. The parting between the queen of Denmark and her royal highneſs the princeſs of Wales, was extremely tender: the young queen was obſerved on getting into her coach, to ſhed tears, which greatly affected the populace aſſembled in Pall-mall, to ſee her departure.

About two o'clock in the morning of the fifth of this month, there happened in London one of the greateſt ſtorms of rain, thunder and lightening, that had been ever known in the memory of man. A watchman in High Holbourn declared, that about three o'clock a ball of fire fell near his ſtand, that the earth trembled under him, and that there was ſo great a ſmell of ſulphur that he was near being ſuffocated.

Her majeſty having been delivered of a princeſs on the twenty-ninth of the preceding month, (who was afterwards baptized by the names of Charlotte-Auguſta-Matilda) the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council waited on his majeſty the eighth of October with the following addreſs on the occaſion:

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal "ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com-"mons of the city of London, in common-"council aſſembled, with the moſt zealous ar-"dour and affection, embrace the earlieſt oppor-"tunity of approaching the throne of the beſt "of princes, with our joyful congratulations on "every event pleaſing to your majeſty and ſalu-"tary to your kingdoms.

"The ſafe delivery of the queen, a princeſs "endeared to your majeſty and the whole nation "by every royal and virtuous accompliſhment, "fills our hearts with the utmoſt thankfulneſs to "divine providence.

"An increaſe of your majeſty's auguſt family "by the birth of a princeſs royal, cannot fail of "diffuſing univerſal joy amongſt all your faith-"ful ſubjects, as it farther ſecures to them and "their poſterity, a long continuance of thoſe "ineſtimable bleſſings, which they have hitherto "enjoyed under the protection of your majeſty's "illuſtrious houſe.

"The auſpicious marriage of your majeſty's "royal ſiſter, the princeſs Carolina Matilda, with "that great potentate the king of Denmark, (on "which we beg leave to felicitate your majeſty) "muſt afford the moſt intereſting ſatisfaction, "not only to us and all your majeſty's loyal ſub-"jects, but alſo to every proteſtant power in "Europe.

"Permit us, royal Sir, to aſſure you, that "your faithful citizens of London are ever ready "to evince to all the world, that their hearts and "affections are ſincere oblations of gratitude to "your majeſty, for your conſtant paternal care, "and eſpecially for the recent inſtance of your "tender attention to the neceſſities of your "people."

To which addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following moſt gracious anſwer:

"Your loyal and affectionate profeſſions upon "the happy events of my queen's ſafe delivery, "and the marriage of my ſiſter to my very good "ally, the king of Denmark, cannot but be moſt "acceptable to me.

"It is with pleaſure that I ſee the juſt ſenſe "which the city of London entertains of thoſe "meaſures, which the neceſſity of the occaſion "obliged me to take for the relief of my people; "and I hope they will have the deſired effect of "quieting mens minds, and removing the diſ-"treſſes which ſeemed daily to encreaſe."

Towards the end of December a violent froſt began, which continued to increaſe, and was very ſevere till the ſixteenth of January following; when, on that and the two following days, there was an appearance of its breaking; but on the nineteenth it returned with increaſed vigour, and continued till the twenty-ſecond, when a kindly thaw removed the diſmal apprehenſions of the people.

During the continuance of this froſt the diſtreſſes of the poor in town and country were truly pitiable, though the generous hand of charity was held forth by numbers of worthy perſons, and ſeveral public bodies. Fuel, and all other neceſſaries of life were remarkably dear: the river Thames was frozen ſo hard as to ſtop the navigation both above and below the bridge: many perſons retarded, or jammed in by the ice, periſhed with cold, in boats, or other craft; and the wherries in the river where wholly unemployed. In the cities of London, Weſtminſter, and their ſuburbs, many melancholy accidents happened, ſuch as numbers of people periſhing with cold, or breaking limbs by the ſlipperineſs of the ſtreets; and it was with the utmoſt difficulty the draught cattle could keep their feet. Many fatal accidents likewiſe happened to thoſe who were purſuing the diverſion of ſkaiting on the ice. In the country the ſnow lay ſo deep, and ſo filled up the roads, hollows and valleys, that many people loſing their way, died through the ſeverity of the weather. Sheep and cattle periſhed in conſiderable numbers: the roads were almoſt impaſſable, and the ſtages and mails performed their ſeveral journies with the utmoſt difficulty, danger, and loſs of time.

On the firſt of January 1767, about a quarter paſt ten at night, a moſt uncommon change of weather weather happened in London. The evening, which till then had been a bright ſtar-light, and remarkably ſerene, varied on a ſudden to cloudy, and in an inſtant a moſt terrible burſt of wind was heard, attended with a furious ſtorm of hail from the north eaſt. During this hurricane, windows ſhook, houſes trembled, and a ſtrange ruſling was perceived as if in the inſide of the buildings with the perſons who inhabited them. Though many people were too much engaged to perceive it, yet ſuch as did, particularly thoſe, who by their ſituation lay expoſed to the north and the north-eaſt, were not leſs ſurprized than alarmed. The gable end of a houſe in Weſtminſter, with ſome chimnies there, and in other parts of the town, were blown down. Great damages were ſuſtained near the Thames, by goods being ſpoiled in cellars and warehouſes on each ſide the river. Several boats were overſet, and twenty-ſeven perſons loſt their lives. The whole damage ariſing from this violent hurricane (which did not continue above two minutes) was computed at fifty-thouſand pounds.

On the nineteenth of this month one Williamſon, a ſhoemaker, was executed in Moorfields for the murder of his wife by ſtarving her to death. The poor unhappy woman was a kind of idiot, who having a ſum of money left for her maintenance, Williamſon, to poſſeſs himſelf of the money, found means to marry her. They were firſt aſked in church, but her truſtee forbid the banns; the villain, however, procured a licence, and about eight months before her death, they were married; after which time the uſage the unhappy creature met with was one continued ſcene of cruelty. He drove a ſtrong ſtaple into the wall of a cloſet in the room where they lodged; and to this ſtaple he daily tied her with a rope which he drew round her middle, her hands being faſtened behind her with iron handcuffs, and the little ſuſtenance ſhe received was laid upon a ſhelf juſt within the reach of her mouth, ſo that if ſhe dropped any part of it, ſhe could not again recover it; and to ſuch a height did he carry his barbarity, that he often tied her up ſo tight that her toes only reached the ground; and if his daughter endeavoured to alleviate her miſery by ſetting a ſtool for her to ſtand on, he would beat her unmercifully. In this manner ſhe languiſhed till ſhe became a mere ſkeleton; and when ſhe was ſo far reduced that her ſtomach loathed food, he releaſed her, let looſe her hands, ſet coarſe meat before her, and tempted her with tender words to eat, with a view to ſcreen himſelf from juſtice. In a day or two after this ſhe died a ſhocking ſpectacle, having no fleſh upon her bones, and the ſkin that encloſed them covered with vermin. There were not leſs than eighty thouſand people, who attended the execution of the inhuman wretch; and it was with great difficulty that the reſentment of the populace was reſtrained; for they were prepoſſeſſed that the puniſhment of hanging was too mild for ſo heinous a crime. He ſeemed apprehenſive of being torn in pieces, and haſtened the executioner to perform his office. We have mentioned this circumſtance, as we think it a duty incumbent on us to tranſmit to poſterity the infamy of a wretch, who could be capable of acting ſo contradictory to evey principle humanity.

At a court of common-council held the 23d it was unanimouſly reſolved, that, on account of the diſtreſſes of the poor (which at that time were very great, occaſioned by the inclemency of the ſeaſon) one thouſand pounds ſhould be ſubſcribed out of the chamber of the city; and that a ſubſcription book ſhould be opened in the chamberlain's office for the donations of all well-diſpoſed perſons; which money ſhould be appropriated to the relief of ſuch poor perſons inhabiting within the city and liberties as did not receive alms of the pariſh: and a committee was appointed, conſiſting of the Lord-mayor, and all the aldermen, and fifty-two commoners, who immediately withdrew, and began a ſubſcription among themſelves; to which the Lord-mayor gave one hundred pounds, and the reſt of the gentlemen very liberally. By this noble plan great numbers of people were happily relieved from the moſt abject ſtate of diſtreſs.

Between two and three o'clock in the morning of the twenty-fifth, a terrible fire broke out at a baker's in the ſtrand, oppoſite Hungerford-market, which in a ſhort time conſumed the ſame, with the houſe adjoining. The flames were ſo rapid, that the inhabitants could not preſerve any of their effects. The apprentice and ſervant maid periſhed in the flames, as likewiſe a young woman big with child. A youth about ſixteen years of age, apprentice to a jeweller, who lodged in the ſaid houſe, in order to avoid being burnt, jumped out of a two pair of ſtairs window into the ſtreet, by which means his ſcull was fractured, and his arm, two of his ribs, and his back broke; of which he expired in great agonies the morning following. Six perſons loſt their lives, beſides a great number that were ſhockingly bruiſed and wounded.

On the ſeventh of February a large houſe adjoining to the gate-way of the Saracen's-head-inn, on Snow-hill, ſuddenly fell to the ground, together with part of another houſe which went over the gate way. The houſe was only occupied by the family of Mr. Dodd, and that of Mr. Jarvis, a caſe-maker in the three pair of ſtairs forward. Mr. Dodd's family happily eſcaped unhurt; but Mrs. Jarvis and one of her children periſhed in the ruins.

The following calculation was made about this time of the number of cattle, &c. killed in one year in the city of London: ſheep and lambs 711,121; bulls, oxen, and cows, 78,254; calves, 104,760; hogs for pork, 146,932; for bacon, 41,000; ſucking pigs, 52,600.

At the ſpital ſermon preached at St. Bride's, in Fleet ſtreet, before the Lord-mayor, aldermen, &c, as governors of the city hoſpitals, was read the following report of the ſtate of thoſe hoſpitals for the year 1766:

At a court of common-council held at Guildhall the twenty-ſecond of May, a propoſal from the lords of the treaſury was laid before the court for taking Greſham-college, in order to pull it down, and build on that ground an Exciſe-office. The plan was agreed to, and a committee appointed to carry the ſaid work into immediate execution. Since which the college has been taken down, and the Exciſe-office is now building with all poſſible diſpatch.

On the fourth of June an uncommon inundation happened in the road between Newington and Clapham, occaſioned by heavy rains which had been falling three days before; the waters collected in the road meeting with a high tide, running up Vauxhall creek, ſwelled to ſuch a degree, that they ſoon covered Kennington-common, and entering ſome low grounds, deſtroyed the brick-works, and did other damage to the amount of two hundred pounds.

At another court of commmon-council held at Guildhall the ſeventeenth of June, the freedom of this city was voted to be preſented to the right honourable Charles Townſhend, chancellor of the exchequer, in a gold box, as an acknowledgment of his kind and ſucceſsful endeavours to ſerve them in their application to parliament for the ſeveral improvements to be made in the metropolis. At the ſame time the report which had been made relating to London-bridge, was taken into conſideration; when Mr. Milne, the ſurveyor, being examined, it was after a long debate agreed, that the proprietors of the London-bridge water-works ſhould be allowed the fifth arch of the ſaid bridge, agreeable to the terms contained in the city lands report, but under the expreſs conditions, that ſhould this grant be hereafter found prejudicial to the navigation of the river, the city ſhould have liberty to revoke their grant, upon paying the ſaid proprietors their whole expence in occupying the ſaid arch.

On the fourteenth of September, Elizabeth Brownrigg (wife of James Brownrigg, painter in Fetter-lane, Fleet-ſtreet) was executed at Tyburn for the murder of Mary Clifford her apprentice. It appeared upon the trial that this infamous woman had occaſioned the death of the child by a ſeries of barbarities, which, if they were not well atteſted, would ſeem incredible to a compaſſionate mind: that ſhe had beaten her on the head and ſhoulders with the ſtump of a riding whip and other weapons: that the child ſometimes lay on the boards in the parlour, ſometimes in the paſſage, and ſometimes in the cellar; but that her general lodging was in the cellar, under the kitchen ſtairs, a place about the bigneſs of a cloſet: that ſometimes ſhe had a piece of ſack with ſome ſtraw in it to lie on, ſometimes had a bit of a blanket to cover her, and ſometimes quite naked: that ſhe had been ſometimes tied to a water-pipe, and at others to a hook, and being ſtripped naked, whipped till the blood came: in a word, it appeared from the depoſitions of an apothecary and ſurgeon, that this poor child was beaten ſo as to occaſion almoſt one continued wound from head to foot, and that theſe wounds were the cauſe of her death. The huſband and ſon of the woman, who were in ſome degree concerned in the cruelties inflicted on the child, being acquitted of the murder, were afterwards tried for the aſſault, and ſentenced to be impriſoned in Newgate ſix months, and enter into recognizance for their good behaviour for ſeven years. Before ſhe left Newgate, her huſband and ſon took leave of her in the cell. She appeared very penitent in the way to, and at the place of execution, where the crowd was ſo great, that many perſons were conſiderably hurt. Her body was afterwards carried to Surgeon's-hall, and diſſected.

On Sunday the twenty-ſeventh captain Wrotteſly arrived in London with the melancholy news, that his royal highneſs Edward Auguſt, duke of York and Albany, died of a malignant fever, at Monaco, the capital of a principality of the ſame name, in the territories of Genoa, in Upper Italy, on the ſeventeenth.

The particulars of his royal highneſs's ſickneſs and death were as follow.

His royal highneſs had danced rather too much at the chateau of a perſon of faſhion, which had not only fatigued him, but occaſioned a very ſtrong perſpiration. As ſoon as the ball was finiſhed, the prince gave orders for his carriages to be got ready immediately, to ſet off for Toulon, from whence he was diſtant ſome three or four leagues. The gentlemen of the train, colonels Morriſon and St. John, and captain Wrotteſly, earneſtly repreſented to his royal highneſs the neceſſity of his remaining where he was, if not to go to bed yet till he was cool and had ſhifted himſelf: The prince declared there was no actual occaſion for ſuch caution, that he would wrap himſelf up in his cloak, and that would be ſufficient; he did ſo, and ſtepped into his carriage. The next day his royal highneſs complained of a ſlight chillneſs and ſhivering; the indiſpoſition, however, appeared ſo trifling, that he went at night to the comedy; but before it was over, his royal highneſs found himſelf infinitely worſe, and was obliged to withdraw. He was feveriſh, thirſty, and complained of an immoderate heat all over his body. By proper care, and drinking plentifully, the duke was much better in the morning, and therefore ſet forward for Monaco, the prince of which (who was perſonally acquainted with his royal highneſs in his former tour to Italy) was waiting there in expectation of the honour of a viſit from him; and the duke was rather inclined to accelerate his journey thither, as in that prince's palace he might naturally look for an aſſiſtance and accommodation ſuperior to what he could reaſonably hope to meet with in common places.

The weather happened to be uncommonly hot, which not a little incommoded his royal highneſs: he nevertheleſs arrived at Monaco in good ſpirits, but yet feveriſh, and with an head-ach; the latter of which he imputed principally to the intenſe heat of the ſun that whole day. The next day the duke was worſe, and took to his bed entirely. In hopes of a recovery, and unwilling to alarm the king, his royal parent, and relations, he enjoined his attendants on no account to write concerning his illneſs to England. All poſſible advice and aſſiſtance was given, but to no purpoſe; the fever was unconquerable. His royal highneſs now ſaw the danger of his ſituation; and he ſaw it with a fortitude and reſignation rarely to be met with, when bloom of youth and dignity of ſtation are united. Convinced that without ſome unexpected turn in his diſtemper he muſt die, his royal highneſs with the utmoſt calmneſs and compoſure of mind, adjuſted every ſtep conſequent of the fatal event himſelf. He ordered that captain Wrotteſly ſhould bring the news to England, and in what method it ſhould be diſcloſed. The captain was firſt to wait on Mr. Le Grand, of Spring-Gardens, and with him to go to Leiceſter-houſe, and then to Glouceſter-houſe, and having communicated the event to the dukes his brothers, to proceed to their majeſties, ſubmitting it to the king and queen in what manner and by whom it ſhould be imparted to his royal parent. After his royal highneſs had ſettled this arrangement, he ſeemed remarkably eaſy. He declared himſelf perfectly reſigned to the divine will; and he ſpoke of his diſſolution with all the piety and reſolution of a chriſtian and a man; acting up to thoſe exalted characters to his lateſt breath. His royal highneſs, through the mercy of the great creator, was ſenſible to his laſt moment; and the very morning of his death dictated a letter to their majeſties, his illuſtrious parent, and the royal family; deſiring the writer to expedite it, as he had but a few minutes to ſpare, and thoſe to employ in ſtill more momentous concerns.

Before his royal highneſs died, he ordered all the gentlemen of his retinue to his bedſide, where he took a very affectionate leave of them, and deſired, that as he could not poſſibly live many hours longer, his bliſters might be taken off to give him a little eaſe in his laſt moments, which was accordingly done.

As ſoon as his royal highneſs was dead, the prince of Monaco ordered a cannon to be fired every half hour, till the body ſhould be depoſited on board the ſhip, and the chambre ardent to be prepared for lying in ſtate, according to the cuſtom of that country, with his body guard to attend, and a guard from the regiment. Accordingly, the preparations were made in the largeſt apartment of the palace, hung with black: a high canopy in the middle, of black and ſilver, with a repreſentation of a coffin of the ſame, upon the top of ſix ſtages or ſteps of black, on each of which was a row of tapers, in large gold and ſilver candleſticks; on the coffin a ſilver pillow, with a coronet upon it, the ſword next to the coffin, and then the garter, george and ſtar; on the ground, a row of torches round the whole: under the canopy behind the ſtage, was placed the coffin, which was made as near as poſſible in the Engliſh manner, covered with the pall: on each ſide were two mutes; and behind, colonel St. John, colonel Morriſon, commodore Spry, and Mr. Schutz, attended. The whole lighting conſiſted of near two hundred tapers. The proceſſion from thence to the water-ſide was fixed for Sunday, at four o'clock in the afternoon, and the chambre ardent was opened at nine o'clock that morning. At the ſetting out of the proceſſion a ſignal was made for the ſhips to fire minute guns, till the body ſhould be aboard. As it came out of the palace the regiment was drawn up, their drums in black, and officers in crapes; at the water-ſide was the long boat, with a canopy for the body, covered with black, and the royal ſtandard hoiſted half height; and this was towed by the captain's barge with mutes in it; behind was the commodore's barge, with his royal highneſs's ſervants, and two more barges for the remaining officers. The prince of Monaco continued at the water-ſide till the whole was on board, when the royal ſtandard was hoiſted half high on board the ſhip, and the minute guns ceaſed: the garriſon then fired two rounds of cannon, and the regiment two rounds of running fire; and the whole was conducted with the greateſt regularity and ſolemnity.

The order of the proceſſion was as follows:

The guard.
Sailors with flambeaux.
All the duke's ſervants.
Two ſurgeons a-breaſt.
Four mutes.
Gentlemen who carry the enſigns of the garter.
Lieutenants, two by two.
The coffin, ſupported by ſailors.
Four pall-bearers, two on each ſide.
Six canopy bearers, three on each ſide.
Colonel St. John.
Colonel Morriſon.
The prince of Monaco.
Gentlemen his attendants.
The reſt of the Engliſh gentlemen, two by two.

Such were the laſt honours paid to the duke of York in a foreign country, by a catholic prince; a circumſtance which proves, that politeneſs and humanity are of all nations.

His royal highneſs's remains arrived at London in the ſhip Montreal on the firſt of November, and on the third was depoſited in the royal vault in king Henry the VIIth's chapel, with the accuſtomed pomp and ſolemnity. The coffin in which his remains were brought home was changed for one made by the king's upholſterer, on which his highneſs's titles were elegantly engraved.

About noon on the ſecond of November the queen was ſafely delivered of a prince, who, on the firſt of December following, was baptized at St. James's by the name of Edward. And on the eleventh the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled, waited on his majeſty; and being introduced to his majeſty by the right honourable the earl of Hertford, lord chamberlain of his majeſty's houſhold, James Eyre, eſq; the recorder, made their compliments in the following addreſs:

" May it pleaſe your majeſty,

" We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal " ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com- " mons of the city of London, in common- " council aſſembled, happy in every occaſion of " approaching your royal preſence with our moſt " dutiful congratulations, beg leave to expreſs " our unfeigned joy on the ſafe delivery of that " moſt excellent princeſs the queen, and further " increaſe of your royal family by the birth of " another prince.

" We cannot but feel ourſelves deeply in- " tereſted in every event which affects the illuſ- " trious houſe of Hanover, under whoſe mild " government the Britiſh ſubjects have, for more " than half a century, been bleſſed with a full " enjoyment of their civil and religious rights, " and a ſeries of happineſs unknown to the ſame " extent in any former period.

" Permit us, therefore, royal Sir, at the ſame " time, humbly to offer our ſincere condolence " on the much lamented death of your majeſty's " royal brother the duke of York, whoſe many " eminent and princely virtues have moſt juſtly " endeared his memory to all your majeſty's " loyal ſubjects, and made the private loſs of the " royal family a public misfortune.

" May the divine providence long preſerve " your majeſty; and may there never be wanting " one of your majeſty's royal deſcendants to be " guardian of our moſt happy conſtitution."

To which addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to return this moſt gracious anſwer:

" I thank you for this loyal addreſs, and for " the ſatisfaction you expreſs in the increaſe of " my family: thoſe expreſſions of your zealous " attachment cannot but be agreeable to me. " The religion and liberties of my people always " have been and ever ſhall be, the conſtant ob- " jects of my care and attention; and I ſhall " eſteem it one of my firſt duties to inſtill the " ſame principles into thoſe who may ſucceed " me.

" I regard your condolence on the melancholy " event of the duke of York's death, as an ad- " ditional proof of your attachment to me, and " my family; and I take this firſt opportunity of " expreſſing my thanks for it."

At a court of aldermen held at Guildhall the ſixteenth, the ſum of one hundred pounds was ordered to be paid to the widow of the late worthy alderman Cockayne, as a teſtimony of the ſenſe they entertained of his ever being ready and willing to ſerve his fellow-citizens,

On the twenty-eighth the tide ebbed and flowed about five in the morning, twice in an hour and a half, at London-bridge and Greenwich.

A body of weavers, armed with ruſty ſwords, piſtols and other offenſive weapons, aſſembled on the thirtieth at a houſe on Saffron-hill, with an intent to deſtroy the work in the looms of an eminent weaver near that place, but were happily diſperſed without much miſchief. Some of them were apprehended, and being examined before the juſtices at Hicks's-hall, it appeared that two claſſes of weavers were mutually combined to diſtreſs each other; namely, the engine and narrow weavers. The former were ſuppoſed to be ruinous to the latter, becauſe, by means of their engines, one of them could do as much in one day as ſix of the other, and the ſame kind of work equally good; for which reaſon the narrow weavers were determined to deſtroy them. The men who were taken up were engine weavers, and they urged in their favour that they only aſſembled in order to defend themſelves from a party of the others who were expected to riſe. As they had done no miſchief, they were all diſmiſſed with a ſevere reprimand for not having applied to the civil magiſtrate for protection.

At a court of common-council held at Guildhall the fifteenth of December, the ſum of two hundred pounds a year additional ſalary was voted to the recorder of London; and one hundred and fifty pounds a year to the common-ſerjeant.

On the twenty-firſt a ſevere froſt ſet in from the E. S. E. which was followed by a deep ſnow, by which the navigation of the river Thames was greatly obſtructed, and the poſts retarded all over the kingdom. This froſt was ſo ſevere in the Weſt of England, that a carpenter at work there, having put a key into his mouth, loſt the ſkin of his lips by taking it out again.

About eight o'clock in the evening of the twenty-fifth, a dreadful fire broke out adjoining to a cabinet-maker's in Hounſditch, which conſumed that houſe, a large ſtock of timber, new furniture, &c. and alſo two other dwelling-houſes adjoining, with many out-houſes, work-ſhops, and warehouſes. Among the goods conſumed was 1000l. of furniture juſt finiſhed for Mr. David Barclay, and intended to have been carried home in a few days. It was remarkable that a fire broke out the ſame day at the ſaid Mr. Barclay's ſtables at Hackney, and deſtroyed two fine hunters, with three other horſes.

able military order of the bath, in the room of his late royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland; the ſeveral officers of the order attended at St. James's on the thirtieth for that purpoſe. The ceremony was performed in his majeſty's cloſet, after the levee in the following manner: The ſovereign wearing the ribbon, with the ſymbol of the order pendant to it, Henry Hill, eſq; gentleman uſher, bearing the ſcarlet rod, and habited in the mantle of the order, and Samuel Horſey, eſq; Bath king of arms in his mantle, bearing on a cuſhion the ribbon, with the badge of the order, preceded his royal highneſs prince Frederick, ſupported by the earls of Cholmondley and Breadalbane, the two ſenior knights of the order, a gentleman uſher, daily waiter, carrying the ſword of ſtate. The ſword being delivered by the earl of Breadalbane to the ſovereign, his royal highneſs, kneeling, was knighted: after which the earl of Cholmondley having received the ribbon from Bath king of arms, preſented it to the ſovereign, who put the ribbon over his royal highneſs's right ſhoulder: his royal highneſs then kiſſed his majeſty's hand, and, riſing up, retired. His majeſty was afterwards pleaſed, in conſideration of the tender years of his royal highneſs, to grant a diſpenſation under his royal ſign manual and ſeal of the order, declaring it to be his royal pleaſure, that the conferring the degree of knighthood by the ſword of ſtate ſhould be ſufficient to inveſt his royal highneſs fully and effectually with this order, in as ample manner as if his royal highneſs had perſonally performed all the accuſtomed ſolemnities.

CHAPTER L.

Great froſt. Election of the city repreſentatives. Mr. Wilkes's addreſs to the livery. Is choſen member for the county of Middleſex. Riots occaſioned thereby. Remarkable low tide. Diſturbances among the coalheavers. Mr. Wilkes committed to the King's-bench priſon. Fire in Whitechapel. The ſailors petition his majeſty to raiſe their wages. Riot in St. George's-fields. Another in the Borough. Great fire at Dockhead. Fray between the coalheavers and ſailors. Farther proceedings againſt Mr. Wilkes. Violent ſtorm of thunder and lightning. Remarkable fall of rain. Mr. Wilkes elected alderman. Twice rechoſen member for Middleſex. Petitions preſented to his majeſty from the livery of London, and counties of Middleſex and Surry, &c. &c.

As this laſt chapter of the Hiſtory will contain many circumſtances of a very peculiar nature, we ſhall, for the ſake of perſpicuity, give them as near as poſſible in the order in which they occurred.

THE year 1768 began with a very ſevere froſt, which greatly contributed to the calamity of the lower ſort of people, who were already ſeverely diſtreſſed by the exorbitant price of proviſions. And on the ninth of January the river below bridge carried all the appearance of a general wreck; ſhips, boats, and ſmall craft lying in a very confuſed manner, ſome on ſhore, and others ſunk or overſet by the ice. A fiſhing boat was diſcovered near Deptford creek cloſe choaked in with ice; the people were all frozen to death; the youngeſt of them, a youth about ſeventeen, was found ſitting as erect almoſt as if alive.

On the ſecond of March, between five and ſix o'clock in the morning, a fire was diſcovered in the library of the right hon. Henry Seymour Conway, in Warwick-ſtreet, which conſumed a great number of books and writings, and greatly damaged the apartment. On examining the drawers in the writing table, bank notes to the value of 925l. were miſſing, one of which for 500l. was the ſame morning received at the bank: this circumſtance left no room to doubt but that the library had been wilfully ſet on fire; the general himſelf went therefore to the bank to ſee, if from the hand writing on the note received, any diſcovery could be made; and by a peculiar character in the aſſumed name, the gentleman was led to ſuſpect a young fellow who had married a ſervant of the lady's, on whom he had lately conferred a genteel place. This young fellow had been at firſt recommended to the general by the duke of Richmond. He therefore waited upon his grace, and deſired that the clerks of the bank who were concerned in paying the money would attend him there. They did ſo; and the young man, being ſent for, came, and on his firſt appearance was known, and poſitively charged with being the perſon who changed the note: on which he confeſſed the fact, with all its circumſtances; and for which he was afterwards executed.

On the ſixteenth of March came on at Guildhall the election of members to repreſent this city in parliament; when the right hon. Mr. Harley, Lord-mayor, Sir Robert Ladbroke, William Beckford, eſq; John Wilkes, eſq; Sir Richard Glyn, Barlow Trecothick, eſq; and John Paterſon, eſq; offered themſelves as candidates. The four firſt were declared to have the greateſt ſhew of hands; but a poll being demanded, the ſame commenced immediately, and was finiſhed on the 23d when the numbers appeared as follow:

Sir Robert Ladbroke	3678
William Beckford, eſq;	3402
Barlow Trecothick, eſq;	2957
Sir Richard Glyn	2823
John Paterſon, eſq;	1269
John Wilkes, eſq;	1247

After the poll was over, Mr. Wilkes addreſſed himſelf to the livery in the following ſpeech :

" Gentlemen and fellow-citizens,

" The poll being now finiſhed, I return my ſincereſt thanks to thoſe diſintereſted and independent friends, who have ſo generouſly and ſteadily ſtood forth in my favour. The want of ſucceſs, out of your power to command, has not in the leaſt abated my zeal for your ſervice. You cannot be unacquainted with the various circumſtances which have contributed to it. My friends were of opinion that I ſhould wait a diſſolution of the laſt parliament, while the other candidates had been for many months ſolliciting your intereſt. Miniſterial influence, aſſiſted by private malice, has been exerted in the moſt arbitrary and unconſtitutional manner, and by means of the baſeſt chicanery and oppreſſion.

" But, though diſappointed, I am not in the leaſt diſpirited : on the contrary, I reflect with pride and gratitude on the many inſtances of regard and affection I have received from the livery of London.

" I beg leave to make my beſt acknowledgments to the ſheriffs, who have ſhewn the utmoſt candour and impartiality during the election, accompanied with a dignity of character becoming their ſtation in this great metropolis.

" And now, gentlemen, permit me to addreſs you as friends to liberty, and freeholders of the county of Middleſex ; declaring my intention of appearing as a candidate to repreſent you in parliament, and ſtill hoping, by your means, to have the honour of being uſeful to you in the Britiſh ſenate.

" Gentlemen of the livery, I recommend it to you in the ſtrongeſt manner, to exert yourſelves to preſerve the peace and quiet of this great city."

The populace, on Mr. Wilkes's return from Guildhall, to ſhew their zeal, took the horſes from his carriage, and drew it themſelves.

The conteſt, during this election, was very warm ; and papers and addreſſes to the public were every day publiſhed, as uſual, for and againſt the ſeveral candidates. Mr. Wilkes ſeemed to be the darling of the populace, and ſome indecencies were committed in and about the hall. A ſubſcription was ſet on foot, ſucceſsfully, for paying that gentleman's debts ; and there appeared the following copy of a letter from him, to Meſſrs. Nuthall and Francis, ſollicitor and deputy ſollicitor of the treaſury.

Sir, London, March 22, 1768.

I take the liberty of acquainting you, that in the beginning of the enſuing term I ſhall preſent myſelf to the court of King's-bench. I pledge my honour as a gentleman, that on the very firſt day I will there make my perſonal appearance.

I am, Sir,
Your moſt humble ſervant,
JOHN WILKES.

The election for Middleſex having been appointed on the twenty-eighth, Sir William Beauchamp Proctor and Mr. Wilkes, two of the candidates for the ſaid county, ſet out for Brentford, where the election came on about ten in the morning. Mr. Cooke, the other candidate, could not attend, being confined to his room with the gout. Mr. Wilkes went in a coach drawn by ſix long-tailed horſes, and was attended by a prodigious number of people to the place of election, which was held in the middle of Brentford Butts, a temporary booth being erected there for that purpoſe. The majority of hands appeared in favour of Sir William Beauchamp Proctor and Mr. Wilkes, who were accordingly returned ; but a poll being demanded in behalf of Mr. Cooke, the ſame came on immediately ; and at five in the afternoon Mr. Wilkes had polled ſix to one more than that gentleman. At nine o'clock the poll finally cloſed, when the number for each candidate appeared as follows :

For John Wilkes, eſq;	1292
Sir W. B. Proctor	807
George Cooke, eſq;	827

Accordingly George Cooke, eſq; and Mr. Wilkes were declared duly elected.

The mob behaved in a very outrageous manner at Hyde-Park Corner, where they pelted Mr. Cooke, ſon of the city marſhal, and knocked him from his horſe, took off the wheels of one of the carriages, cut the harneſs, and broke the the glaſſes to pieces ; and ſeveral other carriages were greatly damaged. Theſe violent proceedings were occaſioned by a flag being carried before the proceſſion of Mr. Wilkes's antagoniſts, on which was painted, No Blaſphemer. Excluſive of the aſſault made upon Mr. Cooke, ſon of the city marſhal, ſome other gentlemen, and more particularly the two old members, were affronted by the populace.

At night likewiſe the rabble were very tumultuous : ſome perſons who had voted in favour of Mr. Wilkes, having put out lights, the mob paraded the whole town from Eaſt to Weſt, obliging every body to illuminate, and breaking the windows of ſuch as did not do it immediately. The windows of the manſion houſe, in particular, were demoliſhed all to pieces, together with a large chandelier and ſome pier glaſſes, to the amount of many hundred pounds. They demoliſhed all the windows of lord Bute, lord Egmont, Sir Sampſon Gideon, Sir William Mayne, and many other gentlemen and tradeſmen in moſt of the public ſtreets of both cities, London and Weſtminſter. In ſhort, the whole evening was one continued ſcene of noiſe and tumult.

The next day orders were given to the guards on duty at St. James's, to be in readineſs at the beat of drum, to march to ſuppreſs any riot that might happen. And the day following, a court of common-council was ſummoned on purpoſe to conſider of the moſt proper and effectual means to prevent for the future, as well as to puniſh, all ſuch as ſhould be found to have been guilty of the late riots and diſturbances in this city, and the court came to a reſolution to proſe-cute, with the utmoſt vigour, all and every perſon who ſhould be convicted of having been active in the riots, and to offer, by advertiſement, a reward of fifty pounds for the diſcovery of every offender, to be paid on their conviction; and ordered the ſame to be inſerted in every daily and evening paper, and a large number of the ſaid reſolution to be printed and poſted up in the moſt public places of this city, and the liberties thereof. They alſo directed, that ſuch proſecutions as ſhould ariſe from their reſolution ſhould be referred to the committee appointed to direct their law proceedings. It was referred to the manſion-houſe committee to order the immediate reparation of all ſuch damages as the ſaid houſe might have ſuſtained by the ſaid riots and tumults.

On the tenth of April the tide in the river Thames was ſo remarkably low, that it was with difficulty even a wherry could croſs it. The ſand banks on both ſides London-bridge were entirely dry.

On the fifteenth a deſperate fray happened at Wapping among ſeveral gangs of coalheavers, in which many perſons were wounded, and three houſes almoſt deſtroyed. And on the twentieth, a great body of them aſſembled at Wapping, and beſet the houſe of Mr. Green, a publican, who defended the ſame all night; and a great many ſhot were fired on both ſides, wherein three of the aſſailants were killed, and ſeveral dangerouſly wounded.

On the twentieth Mr. Wilkes appeared before the court of King's-bench, Weſtminſter, and declared his ſurrender in the following ſpeech:

"My lords,

"According to the voluntary promiſe I made to the public, I now appear before this ſovereign court of juſtice, to ſubmit myſelf in every thing to the laws of my country.

"Two verdicts have been found againſt me. One is for the re-publication of the North Briton, No. 45, the other for the publication of a ludicrous poem.

"As to the re-publication of the number of the North Briton, I cannot yet ſee that there is the ſmalleſt degree of guilt. I have often read and examined that famous paper. I know that it is in every part founded on the ſtrongeſt evidence of facts. I find it full of duty and reſpect to the perſon of the king, although it arraigns, in the ſevereſt manner, the conduct of his majeſty's then miniſters, and brings very heavy charges home to them. I am perſuaded they were well grounded, becauſe every one of thoſe miniſters has ſince been removed. No one inſtance of falſhood has yet been pointed out in that pretended libel, nor was the word falſe in the information before this court. I am, therefore, perfectly eaſy under every imputation reſpecting a paper, in which truth has guided the pen of the writer, whoever he was, in every ſingle line; and it is this circumſtance which has drawn on me, as the ſuppoſed author, all the cruelties of miniſterial vengeance.

"As to the charge againſt me, for the publication of a poem, which has given juſt offence, I will aſſert that ſuch an idea never entered my mind. I bluſh again at the recollection that it has been at any time, and in any way, brought to the public eye, and drawn from the obſcurity in which it remained under my roof. Twelve copies of a ſmall part of it had been printed in my houſe, at my own private preſs. I had carefully locked them up, and I never gave one to my moſt intimate friend. G——t, after the affair of the North Briton, bribed one of my ſervants to rob me of the copy, which was produced in the houſe of peers, and afterwards before this honourable court. The nation was juſtly offended, but not with me, for it was evident that I had not been guilty of the leaſt offence to the public. I pray God to forgive, as I do, the jury, who have found me guilty of publiſhing a poem I concealed with care, and which is not even yet publiſhed, if any preciſe meaning can be affixed to any word in our language.

"But, my lords, neither of the two verdicts could have been found againſt me, if the records had not been materially altered without my conſent, and, as I am informed, contrary to l—. On the evening before the two trials, —— —— cauſed the records to be altered at his own houſe, againſt the conſent of my ſollicitor, and without my knowledge; for a dangerous illneſs, ariſing from an affair of honour, detained me at that time abroad. The alterations were of the utmoſt importance; and I was in conſequence tried the very next day on two new charges, of which I could know nothing: I will venture to declare this proceeding un—nal. I am adviſed that it is i—l, and that it renders both the verdicts abſolutely void.

"I have ſtood forth, my lords, in ſupport of the laws againſt the arbitrary act of miniſters. This court of juſtice, in a ſolemn appeal reſpecting general warrants, ſhewed their ſenſe of my conduct. I ſhall continue to reverence the wiſe and mild ſyſtem of Engliſh laws, and this excellent conſtitution. I have been much miſrepreſented; but, under every ſpecies of perſecution, I will remain firm and friendly to the monarchy, dutiful and affectionate to the illuſtrious prince who wears the crown, and to the whole Brunſwick line.

"As to all nice, intricate points of law, I am ſenſible how narrow and circumſcribed my ideas are; but I have experienced the deep knowledge and great abilities of my counſel. With them I reſt the legal part of my defence, ſubmitting every point to the judgment of this honourable court, and to the laws of England."

When Mr. Wilkes had finiſhed this ſpeech, Mr. Attorney general moved for his immediate commitment on the outlawry. He was anſwered by Mr. Serjeant Glyn, Mr. Recorder of London, Mr. Mansfield, and Mr. Davenport, ſucceſſively; who all moved the court for a writ of error, which Mr. attorney-general, on being applied to the Saturday week before, had refuſed to grant. They ſpecified ſeveral particulars in which the proceſs of the outlawry was erroneous, as ſufficient ground for for the motion, and offered to give any bail for Mr. Wilkes's appearance. The court then proceeded to give their opinions: and firſt, lord M. ſpoke long and forcibly on the impropriety of the procedure on both ſides; obſerving, that the attorney-general could not, with the leaſt appearance of reaſon or of law, move for the commitment of a perſon who was not legally in court; nor had the counſel for the defendant any better plea for their motion in favour of a man who appeared gratis before them: He added, that had Mr. Wilkes been brought thither by a writ of capias utlegatum, the motion might then have been made with propriety, and the court might have exerted, had they pleaſed, their diſcretionary power in accepting or refuſing his bail. His lordſhip farther expreſſed himſelf as very happy in having an opportunity of explaining his ſentiments publickly, before ſo large an audience, with regard to the charge brought againſt him by Mr. Wilkes, of granting an order for the amendment in the information againſt him, in ſubſtituting the word tenor inſtead of purport; declaring, repeatedly, that he thought himſelf bound in duty to grant it; that he conceived it to be the uniform practice of all the judges to grant ſuch amendments; that he had himſelf frequently repeated the ſame practice in other cauſes, without the leaſt objection being over offered againſt it. The reſt of the judges agreed with the chief juſtice in opinion, that, as Mr. Wilkes was not legally before the court, no proceedings could be had upon his caſe. And it was particularly remarked, that the officers of the crown had no right to throw upon that court the buſineſs of commiting Mr. Wilkes upon his gratis appearance, out of the common courſe of law, when they might have brought him before it legally by a writ of capias utlegatum, which it would have been very eaſy to have executed, ſince he had notoriouſly appeared in publick for ſeveral weeks paſt; and in that caſe the attorney-general might have made his motion with propriety.

Theſe arguments being adjuſted, Mr. Wilkes, about two o'clock, left the court; and though there was a very great crowd, not the leaſt diſturbance happened. Information indeed had been given to the Lord-mayor, that ſome perſons at a public houſe in Duke's-place were preparing to raiſe a mob; and his lordſhip ordered the proper officers to enquire into the truth of that information, who found a blue flag with No. 45 upon it, a hanger and hatchet lying by it, and two men as a guard to defend it, whom the officers apprehended, and his lordſhip committed them to the compter.

Weſtminſter hall was very full on the occaſion, as well as both the palace-yards; but the populace behaved very quiet, except huzzaing Mr. Wilkes when he came to the window of a coffee-houſe, where he retired after he quitted the court. The magiſtrates of Weſtminſter divided themſelves in the ſeveral liberties, and the conſtables attended at call in every part, two battalions of the guards lay on their arms in St. James's-park, others were in St. George's-fields, alſo thoſe at St. James's, the Savoy and the Tower, were all kept in readineſs tomarch at a minute's warning; as were alſo ſeveral troops of horſe, in caſe of any diſturbance. Proper precautions were likewiſe taken in the city, by the conſtables being ordered to be in readineſs, all of whom, both in Weſtminſter and the city, together with the military, were ordered to be in waiting till two o'clock the next morning.

On the twenty-fifth a large body of coal-heavers aſſembled in a riotous manner in Wapping, went on board the colliers, and obliged the men who were at work to leave off. Theſe men complained of their maſters, the undertakers; that they oppoſed them in various ſhapes; that they curtailed their wages, paid them not in money, but in liquor and goods of a bad quality; and that theſe undertakers got fortunes, while they, who did the work, were ſtarving. This riot was attended with much bloodſhed: the rioters having met with oppoſition, fought deſperately, and ſeveral lives were loſt.

To return to the affair of Mr. Wilkes. On the 27th Mr. Wilkes's attorney acquainted the attorney general, that Mr. Wilkes was in cuſtody by a writ of capias utlegatum, and prayed that the writ of error might be granted, but the attorney general not thinking that information ſufficient (though he doubted not that gentleman's veracity) for him to grant it, the under-ſheriff waited on him in conſequence, and acquainted him, that Mr. Wilkes was in cuſtody, and would appear in court by his Habeas; whereupon the attorney-general admitted the writ of error; and, about three o'clock in the afternoon, Mr. Wilkes was introduced in a legal manner into the court of King's-bench: when his counſel moved, as the writ of error was granted, that Mr. Wilkes might be admitted to bail; but the court were of opinion that neither he nor any perſon could be admitted to bail after conviction, and accordingly ordered Mr. Wilkes into cuſtody by the proper officers of the court; but as he was conveying to the king's-bench priſon in a hackney coach, attended by Meſſ. Stichall and Holloway, tipſtaffs to lord Mansfield, the mob ſtopped the coach on Weſtminſter-bridge, took out the horſes, and drew it along the Strand, Fleet-ſtreet, &c. to Spital-fields. When they came to Spital-ſquare, they obliged the two tipſtaffs to get out, and let them go very quietly away: they then drew Mr. Wilkes to the Three Tuns tavern in Spital-fields, where, from a one pair of ſtairs window, he earneſtly entreated them to retire, which they did accordingly. After which he went in a private manner, and ſurrendered himſelf to the marſhal of the King's-bench priſon. Many juſtices of the peace, and a prodigious number of conſtables attended in and near Weſtminſter-hall, but not the leaſt noiſe or riot enſued.

The next day he was viſited by many of his friends, and the priſon was ſurrounded by a numerous concourſe of people, who it was expected would have offered ſome outrage; but all remained quiet till night, when they pulled up the rails which encloſed the footway, with which they made a bonfire, and obliged the inhabitants of the Borough to illuminate their houſes; but a captain's guard of 100 men arriving, about twelve, they all quietly diſperſed.

On

On the thirtieth a dreadful fire broke out in Whitechapel-road, occaſioned by laying wet ſawduſt on the oven to dry, which taking fire, ſoon communicated itſelf to a coach-makers adjoining; from whence the flames ſpread ſo rapidly, that ſix houſes were intirely conſumed, and the inhabitants loſt all their effects.

On the ſecond of May ſome thouſands of ſailors aſſembled in Stepney-fields, where certain articles relating to an increaſe of wages, and a petition intended to be preſented to parliament, were read; after which, a numerous party of them paraded to the Royal-exchange, and joined in repeated huzzas, but on remonſtrances from a gentleman there to one of their chieftains, they were immediately drawn off, and a deputation appointed to attend ſome merchants, aſſembled at the King's-arms tavern in Cornhill, in order that their complaints might be taken into conſideration. On the ſeventh a great number of them aſſembled in St. George's-fields, and went to St. James's, with colours flying, drums beating, and fifes playing, and preſented a petition to his majeſty, ſetting forth their grievances, and praying relief.

The following addreſs was at this time iſſued from Mr. Wilkes to the freeholders of the county of Middleſex.

" Gentlemen,

" In ſupport of the liberties of this country " againſt the arbitrary rule of miniſters, I was " before committed to the Tower, and am now " ſentenced to this priſon. Steadineſs, with, I " hope, ſtrength of mind, do not however leave " me; for the ſame conſolation follows me here, " the conſciencioufneſs of innocence, of having " done my duty and exerted all my poor abilities, " not unſucceſsfully for this nation. I can ſubmit " even to far greater ſufferings with chearfulneſs, " becauſe I ſee that my countrymen reap the " happy fruits of my labours and perſecutions, " by the repeated deciſions of our ſovereign " courts of juſtice in favour of liberty. I there- " fore bear up with fortitude, and even glory that " I am called to ſuffer in this cauſe, becauſe I con- " tinue to find the nobleſt reward, the applauſe " of my native country, of this great, free, and " ſpirited people.

" I chiefly regret, gentlemen, that this con- " finement deprives me of the honour of thank- " ing you in perſon, according to my promiſe; " and at preſent takes from me, in a great degree, " the power of being uſeful to you. The will, " however, to do every ſervice to my conſtituents " remains in its full force; and when my ſuffer- " ings have a period, the firſt day I regain my " liberty ſhall reſtore a life of zeal in the cauſe " and intereſts of the county of Middleſex.

" In this priſon, in any other, in every place, " my ruling paſſion will be the love of England " and our free conſtitution. To theſe objects I " will make every ſacrifice. Under all the op- " preſſions which miniſterial rage and revenge " can invent, my ſteady purpoſe is, to concert " with you, and other true friends of this coun- " try, the moſt probable means of rooting out " the remains of arbitrary power and ſtar-cham- " ber inquiſition, and of improving as well as " ſecuring the generous plans of freedom, which " were the boaſts of our anceſtors, and I truſt " will remain the nobleſt inheritance of our po- " ſterity, the only genuine characteriſtic of Eng- " liſhmen.

" I have the honour to be, with affection " and regard, gentlemen, your obliged " and faithful humble ſervant,

JOHN WILKES.

" King's-bench priſon,
" Thurſday, May 5, 1768."

On the tenth, in the afternoon, a great body of people aſſembled about the King's-bench priſon, in expectation that Mr. Wilkes was to go from thence to the parliament-houſe, (it being the firſt day of opening the new parliament) and deſigning to convey him thither. They demanded him at the priſon, and grew very tumultuous; whereupon the riot act was begun to be read, but the populace threw ſtones and brick bats while it was reading, when William Allen, ſon of Mr. Allen, maſter of the Horſeſhoe-inn, in Blackman-ſtreet, Southwark, being ſingled out, was purſued by one of the ſoldiers, and ſhot dead on the ſpot. Soon after this, the crowd increaſing, an additional number of the guards were ſent for, who marched thither, and alſo a party of horſe-grenadiers; when the riot continuing, the mob was fired upon by the ſoldiers, and five were killed on the ſpot, and about fifteen wounded. Two women were among the wounded, one of whom afterwards died in St. Thomas's-hoſpital. The next day an inquiſition was taken by the coroner for Surry, on the body of the above William Allen, when the verdict was given by the jury, that Donald Maclane was guilty of wilful murder, and Donald Maclaury, and Alexander Murray, the commanding officer, were aiding and abetting therein.—This inqueſt was held at the houſe of Mr. Allen; and it appeared on the examination that the deceaſed was only a ſpectator, and, on ſeeing ſome perſons run, he ran alſo, but was unhappily miſtaken, and followed by the ſoldiers five hundred yards into a cow-houſe, where he was ſhot. Donald Maclane was committed to priſon for the murder, but his aſſociates were admitted to bail. Two inquiſitions were afterwards taken in the Borough, on perſons killed by the ſoldiers in quelling the above riot; one on the body of Mary Jeffs, who, having a baſket with oranges to ſell, was ſhot dead in removing them; the other on William Bridgeman, who was ſhot on the top of a hay-cart, as he was looking at the fray at a diſtance: on both theſe inquiſitions the jury brought in their verdict chance medley. It appeared, by the evidence, that, on the juſtices taking down a paper that had been fixed againſt a wall of the priſon, the mob grew riotous, and cried out, " give us the paper; which the juſtices not regarding, ſtones began to be thrown; and the cry, " give us the paper," grew louder; the drums beat to arms; the proclamation was read; the juſtices were pelted who read it; great pains were taken to perſuade the people to diſperſe; the horſehorſe guards were ſent for, and it was not till the laſt extremity that the ſoldiers received orders to fire. But what was very remarkable, not one concerned in the riot was hurt by the firing, in the open fields. Donald Maclane was afterwards tried at the Surry aſſizes held at Guilford, and acquitted.

The next day the mob aſſembled before the houſe of Edward Ruſſel, eſq; diſtiller in the Borough, broke open the door, ſtaved ſome caſks of liquor, drank it immoderately, and began pulling down the houſe; but the military interpoſing, four of the moſt intoxicated were ſeized, and the reſt made their eſcape. At the ſame time the front of the houſe of Richard Capel, eſq; in Bermondſey was demoliſhed, and Mr. Capel himſelf wounded. Theſe outrages were occaſioned by the activity of the above two gentlemen, in ſuppreſſing the tumults in St. George's-fields.

The ſame day upwards of fifteen thouſand ſailors went through the city to petition the parliament for an augmentation of their wages. When they were in Palace-yard, they were addreſſed by two gentlemen, mounted on the roof of a hackney-coach, and were told, that they could receive no immediate anſwer to their petition; but that it would be conſidered in due time: on which they gave three cheers and diſperſed. Their chiefs afterwards waited on a committee of merchants, and matters were accommodated to their general ſatisfaction.

A very conſiderable body of coalheavers aſſembled in Stepney-fields, and proceeded from thence to all the coal-wharfs from Shadwell to Eſſex-ſtairs, carrying with them a writing, which they preſented to the maſters of the wharfs to ſign, ſignifying their conſent to raiſe their wages; which having accompliſhed, they next day waited on the Lord-mayor at the Manſion-houſe, to obtain a confirmation of this agreement; but his lordſhip thought proper to decline intermeddling with their affairs.

On the thirteenth died much lamented, after a long and painful illneſs, her royal highneſs princeſs Louiſa Anne, daughter of her royal highneſs the princeſs dowager of Wales, and ſecond ſiſter to his preſent majeſty. And on the twenty-ſecond the corpſe of her royal highneſs was privately interred in the royal vault in king Henry the ſeventh's chapel.

On the nineteenth a terrible fire broke out in a tar-yard at Dock-head, occaſioned by a tar-copper boiling over, by which upwards of 2000 barrels were conſumed, and near thirty houſes burnt to the ground.

A terrible fray happened on the twenty-fifth between the coalheavers and ſailors belonging to the colliers in the river, in which many were killed. The ſailors, having been long detained in the river by the coalheavers refuſing to work, had begun to deliver their ſhips themſelves; upon which a body of coalheavers fell upon ſome of the ſailors by ſurprize, and killed ſeveral of them. The ſailors took the alarm, the quarrel became general, and the conſequences were, the loſs of many lives.

On the ſeventh of June another fray happened in Stepney-fields between the coalheavers and ſailors, wherein ſeveral of the latter were killed. The coalheavers marched off in triumph, with colours flying, drums beating, &c. offering five guineas for a ſailors head. The ſhips below bridge were obliged to keep conſtant watch, day and night, crying, "all is well." In ſhort, to ſo great a height was this inſurrection got, that the inhabitants of Wapping were perpetually under the moſt direful apprehenſions. A party of guards conſtantly attended for ſome days; during which ſeveral diſturbances aroſe, and many coalheavers were taken up by the ſoldiery, and carried before Sir John Fielding, who, on examination, committed them to Newgate. Two of them were afterwards tried at the Old-Bailey for the murder of one Battie, a ſeaman, and being convicted, were executed at Tyburn, as were ſeven others (in the Sun tavern fields, near where the riot was committed) for ſhooting at Mr. Green, the maſter of the Round-about-tavern in Shadwell. This example produced a happy effect; the tumults immediately ceaſed, and peace and induſtry ſupplied the place of reſentment and miſchief.

On the fifteenth Mr. Wilkes was brought to the court of King's-bench, Weſtminſter hall; when the arguments on the arreſt of judgment was entered on by Mr. Attorney-general, Mr. Thurloe, and Sir Fletcher Norton, on behalf of the crown; and by Mr. Serjeant Glyn, Mr. Recorder of London, and Mr. Davenport, on the part of the defendant. Mr. Serjeant Glyn, entered further than he had before done on the impropriety of the information being filed by the ſollicitor-general; but the court were ſo clearly of opinion, the buſineſs of the attorney-general (in caſe of there being a vacancy in that office) muſt neceſſarily devolve on the ſollicitor-general, that it was judged needleſs to ſay more on that head. The whole that Mr. Wilkes then had to avail himſelf of was, the alteration of the record; which having been very learnedly and elaborately canvaſſed, the court declared themſelves fully of opinion, that the alteration of the record at the judge's chambers was what they had an indiſpenſable right to in the courſe of practice. After this the informations againſt Mr. Wilkes were read; and lord Manſfield ſtated to the court the evidence as it ſtood on the former trial, when Mr. Attorney-general and Sir Fletcher Norton gave their opinions in aggravation of the caſe, and Mr. Serjeant Glyn anſwered in extenuation. Mr. Wilkes then deſired that judgment might be paſſed; but was told, that the court having heard the opinion of council on both ſides, and ſome material objections having been offered, it was neceſſary to take theſe into conſideration; but was aſſured, that, though no day could then be fixed for that purpoſe, no time ſhould be delayed to bring it to an iſſue.

Among other proceedings, Mr. Serjant Glyn took notice that as a writ of error was intended to be brought before a higher court of juſtice, before the houſe of lords, he deſired that the caſe of the alteration of the records, under ſuch peculiar circumſtances, might be ſtated on the back of the record, to be tranſmitted to the lords; otherwiſe that important point could not come before the houſe. This was abſolutely refuſed by the court. He concluded by entreating their lordſhips, for the ſake of the ſafety of every ſubject of this nation, to fix ſome limits to the diſcretionary power of altering records; that counſel might know for the future when they can be certain of the cauſe they are to plead; and that the ſubject might not be liable to ruin at the diſcretion of a judge.

The deciſion of the matter being poſtponed to the eighteenth, Mr. Wilkes, on that day, attended the court again; when Mr. juſtice Yates, after enlarging on the malignant nature and dangerous tendency of the two publications of which Mr. Wilkes had been convicted, proceeded to pronounce the judgment of the court, which was as follows: That, for the republication of the North Briton, No. 45, in volumes (of which two thouſand copies had been printed for public ſale) he ſhould pay a fine of five hundred pounds, and be impriſoned ten kalendar months: and for publiſhing the Eſſay on Woman (of which only twelve copies were printed for the private uſe of ſo many particular friends) that he ſhould pay likewiſe a fine of five hundred pounds, and be impriſoned twelve kalendar months, to be computed from the expiration of the term of the former impriſonment: and that he afterwards find ſecurity for his good behaviour for ſeven years, himſelf to be bound in the ſum of a thouſand pounds, and two ſureties in five hundred pounds each. A writ of error returnable before the houſe of lords was afterwards moved for, in order to reverſe the judgment, on account of the alteration of the record; and the court recommended to the attorney-general to grant it on the firſt application.

In an addreſs to the freeholders of Middleſex, publiſhed after the event of the outlawry, Mr. Wilkes made this remarkable declaration. "In "the whole progreſs of miniſterial vengeance "againſt me for ſeveral years, I have ſhewn, to "the conviction of all mankind, that my ene-"mies have trampled on the laws, and been ac-"tuated by the ſpirit of tyranny, and arbitrary "power. The general warrant, under which I "was firſt apprehended, has been judged illegal. "The ſeizure of my papers was condemned ju-"dicially. The outlawry, ſo long the topic of "virulent abuſe, is at laſt declared to have been "contrary to law; and, on the ground firſt taken "by my learned counſel, Mr. ſerjeant Glyn, is "formally reverſed." It was thought neceſſary to inſert this, as it had been ſaid in all the papers, that the error on which the outlawry was reverſed was diſcovered by Mr. Wilkes's enemies.

On the firſt of July a moſt dreadful ſtorm of thunder and lightening happened in and about London. Two perſons on the road leading to town were ſtruck dead by the lightening, which was ſo powerful, that a leaden ſtatue, in the garden of a gentleman at Camberwell, was melted, and reduced to a heap of droſs. By this ſtorm the water of the river Thames was ſo driven out of its uſual channel, above bridge, as had never been remembered by the oldeſt man living; one half of the bed of the river remaining uncovered with water two tides. And on the ſecond of Auguſt another ſtorm happened, in which the thunder rolled ſo terrible, and the lightning flaſhed in ſuch dreadful ſtreams, in the neighbourhood of London, that ſeveral houſes were ſet on fire with it, and one man was ſtruck dead upon his coach-box, on the Kent ſtreet road. It was very remarkable, that his watch was found ſhivered in his pocket in a thouſand pieces, a ſmall hole in the crown of his hat, and a kind of ſeam down his breaſt.

The next day a terrible fire broke out in the King's-arms-inn yard, near Holbourn-bridge, which was attended with the moſt melancholy circumſtances. Mr. Green, at whoſe houſe it broke out, ſaved his life by jumping out of a window; but his wife, his child and ſiſter periſhed in the flames; his neighbour jumped out of a window ſeemingly unhurt, but died in leſs than ten minutes; a porter belonging to the inn, having loſt his wife and child, died raving mad; a clerk to a merchant in Bread-ſtreet, after ſaving his wife and child, returned for a box, in which was money and writings belonging to his maſter, but not being able to reach it, fell a ſacrifice to the flames. Of thoſe who endeavoured to eſcape by jumping out of the windows, three were killed upon the ſpot; the ſhrieks of thoſe who were burnt were piercing; in ſhort, a more horrid ſcene was never beheld.

On the firſt of September, the heavieſt rain fell at London and the country round, it that had ever been known in the memory of man. It began in the evening, and in a few hours the waters poured down Highgate-hill with incredible violence; the common ſewers in ſeveral parts of the town not being able to carry off the torrent, the adjacent houſes were filled almoſt to the firſt floors; immenſe damage was done, and as it happened in the night, many were awakened from ſleep in the greateſt conſternation. The ſerpentine river in Hyde-park roſe ſo high, that it forced down a part of the wall, and poured with ſuch violence upon Knightſbridge, that the inhabitants expected the whole town to be overflowed; the canal in St. James's-park roſe higher than ever was known; in ſhort, no man living remembered ſo much rain to fall in ſo ſhort a time. About Bagnigge-wells the waters roſe eight feet perpendicular height, though the rain did not continue to fall with violence more than eight hours. Several people in Cold Bath fields, Mutton-lane, Peter-ſtreet, and thoſe parts, ſuſtained great damage; ſome publicans had ſeveral butts of beer carried out of their cellars; three oxen and ſeveral hogs were carried away by the drain, and drowned; and in Mutton-lane, and the lower part of Hockley in the Hole, the inhabitants were obliged to quit their ground-floors, and go up ſtairs, for fear of being drowned. Many butts of beer were carried away from the cellar at the Cheſhire Cheeſe at Mount Pleaſant, and conveyed quite to Fleet-ditch, where they were taken out. The water in the canal in St. James's-park ſwelled ſo high, that it flowed up to the garden wall belonging to the treaſury, and was ſo deep, that foot-paſſengers could not paſs; the lower parts of ſome houſes near the Treaſury were overflowed, as was the wilderneſs; the centinel placed near the little gate leading into Duke-ſtreet, was obliged to quit his box; the cellars in ſeveral parts of

Weſtminſter were filled with water, and conſiderable damage was done.

Upwards of forty ſmall craft, on the river below bridge, were ſunk, drove on ſhore, or bulged, by the violence of the ſtorm; and a collier in Long reach was drove from her anchors, and beat her keel off: ſeveral ſhips alſo received damage by running foul of each other. The late duke of Cumberland's fine water-works, in Windſor-foreſt, were intirely deſtroyed; ſeveral perſons were drowned in different places, as well as horſes, oxen, and hogs. In ſhort, almoſt every part of England ſuſtained very conſiderable damage.

About this time the king of Denmark arrived on a viſit, and fixed his abode in the apartments which had been previouſly prepared for him at St. James's. He was entertained by their majeſties and the royal family in the moſt ſplendid manner, as likewiſe by the principal part of the nobility. During his ſtay, among many other places, he viſited the univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge; from the latter of which he went to Tadcaſter, Wentworth-caſtle, York, Leeds, Derby, Liverpool, Mancheſter, the duke of Bridgewater's canal, Leiceſter, Harborough, &c. And

On the twenty-third of September his Daniſh majeſty having previouſly condeſcended to dine with the Lord-mayor, Sir Robert Ladbroke, knt. locum tenens (the right honourable the Lord-mayor being indiſpoſed) together with the aldermen and ſheriffs, attended by the city officers, ſet out from Guildhall for the Three Cranes, the locum tenens being in the ſtate coach, accompanied by deputy John Paterſon, eſq; (who was deſired to act as interpreter on this occaſion) and the aldermen and ſheriffs in their reſpective carriages. At eleven o'clock they embarked on board the city ſtate barge, the ſtreamers flying, a ſelect band of water-muſic playing in the ſtern, the principal livery companies attending in their reſpective barges. At the ſtairs leading to New palace yard, a detachment of grenadiers of the honourable artillery company attended, to receive the locum tenens, aldermen and ſheriffs, who, upon notice of his Daniſh majeſty's approach, immediately landed to receive and conduct him on board. As ſoon as his majeſty entered the barge he was ſaluted by ſeveral pieces of cannon, and the joyful acclamations of the ſeveral livery companies, and a vaſt ſurrounding multitude.

The locum tenens, in order to give his majeſty a more compleat view of the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and of the river and the ſeveral bridges thereon (which as well as the river itſelf, and the ſhore on both ſides, were crouded with innumerable ſpectators) ordered the ſtate barge to take a circuit as far as Lambeth, from whence ſhe was ſteered down as far as to the ſteel-yard, through the centre arch of Weſtminſter-bridge, and thence up to the Temple-ſtairs, his majeſty being ſaluted at the New-bridge, both at his going and returning through the great arch, by fifes and drums, with the ſhouts of the ſeveral workmen above, and french horns underneath.

During the courſe of this grand proceſſion on the water, his majeſty frequently expreſſed himſelf highly pleaſed, and his admiration of the ſeveral great and beautiful objects round him; and ſometimes condeſcended to come forward in order to gratify the curioſity of the people, who eagerly endeavoured to get a ſight of his royal perſon, though at the hazard of their lives.

At the Temple, his majeſty (being landed on a platform erected and matted on purpoſe, and under an awning covered with blue cloth) was received by ſome of the benchers of both ſocieties, and conducted to the Middle-Temple-hall, where an elegant collation had been provided for him.

His majeſty, after taking ſome refreſhment, and thanking the two ſocieties for their polite reception and entertainment, was conducted to the city ſtate coach, in which his majeſty took his ſeat on the reight hand of the locum tenens, being accompanied by his excellency count Barnſdorff and Mr. deputy Paterſon, attended by the ſword and mace, and followed by nine noblemen of his majeſty's retinue, and by the aldermen and ſheriffs in a long train of carriages. From the Temple his majeſty (preceded by the artillery company, and worſhipful company of Goldſmiths, the city marſhals on horſeback, and the reſt of the city officers on foot) was conducted to the Manſion-houſe: the ſeveral ſtreets through which his majeſty paſſed, viz. Fleet-ſtreet, Ludgate-hill, St. Paul's church yard, Cheapſide, and the Poultry, being crouded with an innumerable populace, while the windows and tops of houſes were equally crouded with ſpectators of both ſexes, whoſe acclamations, together with the ringing of bells, and the ſhouts of the multitude, loudly expreſſed their joy at his majeſty's preſence; his majeſty expreſſing his ſurprize at the populouſneſs of this city, and his ſatisfaction at the kindneſs of the citizens.

At the Manſion-houſe, his majeſty was received by the committee (appointed to manage the entertainment) in their mazarine gowns: who with white wands, uſhered his majeſty into the great parlour, where, after he had reſted himſelf a few minutes, Mr. Common Serjeant (in the abſence of Mr. Recorder) made him the city's compliments in the following words:

" Moſt illuſtrious prince,

" The Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons " of the city of London, humbly beg leave to " expreſs their grateful ſenſe of your very obliging condeſcenſion, in honouring them with " your preſence at the Manſion of their chief " magiſtrate.

" The many endearing ties which happily " connect you, Sir, with our moſt gracious ſovereign, juſtly entitle you to the reſpect and " veneration of all his majeſty's faithful ſubjects. " But your affability and other princely virtues, " ſo eminently diſplayed, during the whole courſe " of your reſidence amongſt us, have in a particular manner, charmed the citizens of London; who reflect with admiration on your " early and uncommon thirſt of knowledge, and " your indefatigable purſuit of it by travel and " obſervation; the happy fruits of which they " doubt not will be long employed and acknow-

" ledged within the whole extent of your influ" ence and command.

" Permit us, Sir, to expreſs our earneſt wiſhes,
" that your perſonal intercourſe with our amiable
" monarch may tend to increaſe and perpetuate
" a friendſhip ſo eſſential to the proteſtant intereſt
" in general, and ſo likely to promote the power,
" happineſs and proſperity of the Britiſh and
" Daniſh nations; and that the citizens of Lon" don, in particular, may ever be honoured with
" a ſhare of your remembrance and regard."

To this compliment his majeſty was pleaſed to return a moſt polite anſwer, in the Daniſh language; which, by his majeſty's permiſſion, was interpreted to the company, by Mr. Deputy Paterſon, as follows:

" Gentlemen,

" I am highly ſenſible of the kindneſs of your expreſſions to me; I deſire you will accept my beſt thanks in return, and be fully perſuaded that I can never forget the affection which the Britiſh nation is pleaſed to ſhew me, and that I ſhall always be diſpoſed to prove my grateful ſenſe of it to them, and in particular to you, gentlemen, and this great, celebrated, and flouriſhing city which you govern."

Upon notice that the dinner was ſerved, his majeſty, with the locum tenens on his left, was conducted by the committee into the Egyptian-hall; where his majeſty condeſcended to proceed quite round, that the ladies (who made a moſt brilliant appearance in the galleries) might have a full view of his royal perſon; and all the gentlemen of the common-council below, an opportunity of perſonally paying him their reſpects.

His majeſty being ſeated in a chair of ſtate, on the right hand of the locum tenens, at a table placed upon an elevation acroſs the upper-end of the hall, with his noble attendants on the right, and the aldermen above the chair on the left, was ſaluted by a band of above forty of the beſt performers, in an orcheſtra fronting his majeſty's table.

During the dinner, the following toaſts were drank, being proclaimed by ſound of trumpet:

1. The king.
2. The queen, prince of Wales, and royal family.
3. His majeſty of Denmark and Norway.
4. The queen and royal family of Denmark.
5. Proſperity to the kingdoms of Denmark and Norway.

After which his majeſty was pleaſed to propoſe thef ollowing toaſts, which were proclaimed in the ſame manner:

1. Proſperity to the Britiſh nation.
2. Proſperity to the city of London.

Mr. Deputy Paterſon having the honour to attend his majeſty as interpreter, his majeſty, thro' him, repeatedly expreſſed to the locum tenens how much he admired the grandeur of the Egyptian hall, the brilliancy of the illuminations round it, the magnificence of the dinner, the excellence of the muſic, and the good order and decorum of the whole entertainment.

After dinner, his majeſty was reconducted into the great parlour, where he was preſented with tea and coffee, and entertained with Solos on different inſtruments, by ſeveral capital performers.

At eight o'clock in the evening, his majeſty and his retinue, after taking leave of the locum tenens and the corporation, were uſhered to their coaches, the committee going before his majeſty with wax lights. His majeſty then returned to his apartment in St. James's palace, amidſt the ſame crowd and acclamations as before, with the addition of illuminations in almoſt every window, that the people might have the pleaſure of ſeeing his majeſty as long as poſſible.

The diſpoſition of the lights, (which were at leaſt 2000) the arrangements of the tables, the erection of the temporary orcheſtra, and the whole of the ornamenting the Egyptian-hall were executed with the utmoſt propriety and elegance, under the direction of Mr. George Dance, clerk to the city works.

On the tenth of October, his majeſty the king of Denmark gave a moſt ſuperb maſked ball at the Hay-market, at which were preſent the greateſt number of the nobility and gentry ever aſſembled together upon any occaſion of the like nature. The illuminations were particularly ſplendid and elegant. His Daniſh majeſty went in a private manner, to the theatre, accompanied only by his excellency Count Holke, in his own coach and pair and afterwards robed himſelf in maſquerade in one of the dreſſing-rooms. A little after ten the noblemen of his majeſty's retinue followed in chairs, in their maſquerade dreſſes, extremely rich and elegant. The ball was opened by his Daniſh majeſty and the dutcheſs of Ancaſter. The principal groteſque characters were a conjuror, a black, and an old woman; there was alſo a methodiſt preacher, a chimney-ſweeper, with his bag, ſhovel and ſcraper, and a boor with a bull's head, all which were ſupported with the higheſt honour imaginable.

On the twelfth the king of Denmark took leave of their majeſties, and all the royal family. And the next day, after having breakfaſted, he took a reſpectful leave of the earl of Hertford and lord Talbot, who attended him, and ſet out for Dover, to embark for Calais, in his way to Paris. Before his departure, he made a preſent to the right hononourable the earl of Hertford, lord chamberlain, and to the right honourable lord Talbot, lord Steward, of a ring each, valued at 1500l. and left 1000 guineas to be diſtributed among the domeſticks at the king's palace.

The expence of the king of Denmark's table at St. James's was defrayed by the king of Great Britain. Beſides inferior ones, there were two principal tables; that of his Daniſh majeſty was ſumptuous, the deſart elegant and ſuperb; and the whole daily coſt was eſtimated at eighty-four pounds excluſive of wines.

Her majeſty being happily delivered of a princeſs on the eighth of November (afterwards baptized tized by the name of Auguſta Sophia) the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons, of the city of London, waited on his majeſty; when James Eyre, eſq, the recorder, made their compliments in the following addreſs:

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal " ſubjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and com- " mons of the city of London, in common- " council aſſembled, moſt humbly beg leave to " expreſs our ſincere and hearty congratulations " on the ſafe delivery of the queen, and the au- " ſpicious birth of another princeſs.

" Every increaſe of domeſtic happineſs to your " majeſty and moſt amiable conſort will always " fill the hearts of your faithful citizens of Lon- " don with joy and gratitude to the divine good- " neſs.

" Permit us, Sir, to offer you our moſt un- " feigned aſſurances of duty and affection to " your royal perſon; and we moſt ardently pray, " that your reign may be long and proſperous; " that loyalty to your majeſty, ſubmiſſion to the " laws, the love of true conſtitutional liberty, " and a well-governed zeal for the common wel- " fare, may animate your majeſty's ſubjects " throughout every part of your extenſive em- " pire."

To which addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following moſt gracious anſwer:

" I receive with the greateſt pleaſure this duti- " ful and affectionate addreſs, and return you " my hearty thanks for your congratulations on " the happy delivery of the queen, and the " birth of a princeſs, as well as for the repeated " aſſurances you give me of your loyalty and at- " tachment to my perſon and family.

" The preſervation of the religion, laws and " liberties of my people, in every part of my " dominions, is eſſential to their true happineſs, " and is, therefore, the great object of my at- " tention. Theſe are the principles which ever " have been, and ever ſhall be, the ſole rule of " my government."

There being at this time a vacancy in the houſe of commons by the death of Mr. Cooke, member for Middleſex, Mr. ſerjeant Glyn and Sir William Beauchamp Proctor offered themſelves as candidates for the ſaid county. And on the eighth of December, about eleven o'clock in the morning, the election began at Brentford, which was carried on with much tranquillity till about a quarter after two; at which time it was generally thought that Mr. ſerjeant Glyn had polled a greater number than Sir William Beauchamp Proctor, when on a ſudden a great riot enſued; the mob mounted the huſtings, attempted to ſeize ſome of the poll-books, and entirely put a ſtop to the buſineſs. On this, great numbers of freeholders were hurt in trying to get away, others came home directly, and the remainder of the day was a ſcene of confuſion.

The following ſpirited addreſs which appeared in the papers, together with the enſuing conſequences of this riot, will ſufficiently ſerve to ſhew the nature and deſign of it.

" To the gentlemen, clergy, and freeholders of the county of Middleſex.

" Gentlemen,

" The warm profeſſions of gratitude, ſo frequently uttered by thoſe who feel no gratitude to their conſtituents becauſe the means by which they ſucceed take off all obligation, make me at a loſs for terms to expreſs myſelf on ſo ſignal, ſo generous, and ſo glorious a ſupport as I have met with from you.

„ Every means employed, every influence exerted during a ſix months canvaſs, have not been able to divert a great majority of you from eſpouſing the cauſe of a candidate, whom you ſuppoſed a friend to the cauſe of the people, and in whom you hoped to find a zealous defender of the rights and liberties of his country.

" Honour or infamy will deſervedly attend me, in the ſame manner as my future conduct ſhall anſwer or diſappoint your expectations. I do not owe your ſupport to any perſonal friendſhip or connections; and am therefore free, even from the temptation of leaning to them: my obligations are to the public, and to the public I will return them.

" For my conduct in the courſe of this election, I can appeal even to my adverſaries; and the truth of my declaration to you has been moſt convincingly proved, by the infamous behaviour of my opponents, in their lawleſs interruption of the poll, when a mob of hired ruffians were at a ſignal let looſe upon the peaceable, unarmed, and inoffenſive freeholders of the county of Middleſex, in order to deſtroy thoſe whom they could not corrupt, and to wreſt from them by violence that freedom of election, which every undue and unconſtitutional interpoſition has failed to overthrow.

" The ſheriffs, and every perſon preſent, were witneſſes of a ſcene never before exhibited at an election. A deſperate ſet of ruffians, with Liberty and Proctor in their hats, without the leaſt oppoſition, without the leaſt provocation, or cauſe or quarrel, deſtroying thoſe who did not lift up a hand in their defence. Sir William, to whom I called to go with me and face this mob, made me no anſwer, and left me: I remained laſt man upon the huſtings.

" However, I live, gentlemen, to aſſert not ſo much my election, as your rights; and I pledge myſelf to you, that your blood ſo wantonly ſhed yeſterday, ſhall be vindicated, and the charge brought home both to the hired and the hirers. The more exalted their ſtations, and the more privileged their perſons, the louder is the call for juſtice; and the more neceſſary its execution. Whether as your repreſentative, or as a private gentleman, I pledge myſelf to you to go through with this buſineſs, or to periſh in the attempt.

ſacred privilege we have left; and it does not become any honeſt Engliſhman to ſurvive it. For my own part, I will not. And if by this declaration I may ſeem to depart from that moderation which has always particularly marked my character, it is becauſe I think tameneſs in a cauſe like this, is infamy. There is virtue ſtill left in this country; we are come to a criſis, and the conſequence of this ſtruggle will determine whether we ſhall be freemen or ſlaves.

"It is at preſent depending before the houſe of commons, what meaſures ſhall be next purſued in regard to this election. When they have decided, I will give you the earlieſt notice poſſible; and I promiſe you that no diſcouragement ſhall ever make me deſert you, who have ſhewn that you will not deſert yourſelves.

I am, gentlemen,
Your moſt grateful, and faithful humble ſervant,
JOHN GLYN,

Bloomſbury-ſquare,
Dec. 9, 1768.

The election was renewed on the fourteenth, and carried on with the utmoſt tranquillity, without the leaſt appearance of diſorder, except that a few ſnow-balls were thrown at the friends of one of the candidates; but the conſtables interfering, all was quiet: and at the cloſe of the poll, the number for each candidate appeared as follows:

For Mr. ſerjeant Glyn	1542
For Sir W. B. Proctor	1278

In conſequence of which the former was declared duly elected.

The next day Edward Umfreville, eſq; one of the coroners for the county of Middleſex, took an inquiſition on the body of John Clarke, a young gentleman, then lying dead, at the White-Hart, in Welbeck-ſtreet, in the pariſh of Marybone, before a reſpectable jury of neighbours, ſummoned to enquire how he came by his death; when it appeared to them, from very clear and poſitive evidence, that it was occaſioned by a blow given him by a ſtick or bludgeon at Brentford election, on the eighth inſtant, from a perſon or perſons, of the mob concerned in the riot on that day, at the time of the ſaid election. The jury deſired to have the aſſiſtance and opinion of a ſurgeon, when a very eminent one was ſent for, and, after opening the head of the deceaſed, examining him in a very particular manner, and giving his opinion, that the ſaid blow was the cauſe of his death, the jury, without the leaſt heſitation, unanimouſly gave in their verdict to be wilful murder, by ſome perſon or perſons unknown.

Soon after this two perſons (Lawrence Balfe, and Edward M^c^ Quirk) were taken up for the ſaid murder, and being tried at the Old Bailey, were capitally convicted; but in the intermediate time between their conviction, and that appointed for their execution, a reſpite was ſent to Newgate during pleaſure; after which they both received his majeſty's free pardon.

On the third of January 1769, came on at St. Bride's-church Fleet-ſtreet, the election for an alderman of the ward of Farringdon without (vacant by the death of Sir Francis Goſling.) The candidates were John Wilkes, eſq; and Mr. Bromwich, paper ſtainer. The ſhew of hands appeared in favour of Mr. Wilkes, but a poll being demanded by the latter, the ſame began immediately, at the cloſe of which (for that day) the numbers appeared as follow:

For Mr. Bromwich	60

Whereupon Mr. Bromwich declined the election, and Mr. Wilkes was declared duly elected.

At a numerous and reſpectable meeting of freeholders of the county of Middleſex, held at the Mile-end aſſembly room on the twelfth, the following inſtructions were unanimouſly agreed to, and directed to be tranſmitted to the knights of the ſhire:

To John Wilkes, eſq; and John Glyn, eſq; knights of the ſhire for the county of Middleſex.

Gentlemen,

We the freeholders of the county of Middleſex, direct and inſtruct you our repreſentatives in parliament,

1. To endeavour to continue to us, and to confirm our old conſtitutional and only rightful trial by jury.
2. To promote a ſtrict parliamentary enquiry into the tranſactions of the military in St. George's-fields on Tueſday the tenth of May laſt.
3. To promote a like enquiry into the riot and murders committed at Brentford, on the eighth of laſt December.
4. To examine into the adminiſtration of juſtice in this county; particularly into the preſent ſtate of the commiſſion of the peace.
5. And, as far as in your power, to promote an enquiry into the rights of the public to the territorial revenue ariſing from the conqueſts in India.

The like inſtructions were preſented by the electors of Weſtminſter, to the right honourable the earl Percy, and the honourable Edwin Sandys, repreſentatives in parliament for that city and liberty, with the following additional article:

"And we do ſtrongly inſiſt, that you never "ceaſe your endeavours to promote an enquiry "into the caſe and grievances of John Wilkes, "eſq; and to vindicate and ſupport the rights of "the people who have elected him their repre-"ſentative."

After various debates in the houſe of commons reſpecting the legality of Mr. Wilkes being member for the county of Middleſex, it was determined on the fourth of February that he was not a proper perſon to ſit as member, and was therefore expelled the ſaid houſe.

On the tenth, a common hall of the livery of the city of London was held at Guildhall, when Mr.

Mr. Clavey, an eminent linen-draper, and one of the common-council of Farringdon-ward within, was appointed chairman. Soon after which the livery being informed, that Mr. alderman Beckford was in the council-chamber, ſome of the gentlemen were deputed to wait on him to deſire his preſence, with which he complied; when they preſented the following inſtructions:

To Sir Robert Ladbroke, knt. William Beckford, eſq; The right hon. Thomas Harley, eſq; and Barlow Trecothick, eſq; aldermen, the repreſentatives in parliament for the city of London.

Gentlemen,

We, your conſtituents, aſſembled in the Guild-hall of London, fully ſenſible of the value of the laws and conſtitution tranſmitted to us by our anceſtors, and firmly reſolved to preſerve this inheritance entire, as we have received it, think it our indiſpenſible duty at this time, as well as our undoubted right, to inſtruct you, our repreſentatives in parliament, as follows:

1. We recommend that you exert your utmoſt endeavours, that the proceedings in the caſe of libels, and all other criminal matters, may be confined to the known rules of law, and not rendered dangerous to the ſubject by forced conſtructions, new modes of enquiry, unconſtitutional tribunals, or new and unuſual puniſhments, tending to take away or diminiſh the benefit of trial by juries.

2. That you carefully watch over the great bulwark of our liberties, the Habeas Corpus act, and that you enquire into, and cenſure any attempt to allude, or enervate the force of that law.

3. That you preſerve equally inviolate the privilege of parliament, and the rights of the electors in the choice of their repreſentatives.

4. That you do not diſcourage petitions, by ſelecting ſuch parts thereof as may tend not to relieve, but to criminate the petitioner, ſo as to prevent all approach to your houſe, by which means the moſt eſſential article of the declaration of rights may be eluded, or rendered of the leſs effect.

5. That you endeavour to prevent all application of the public money to influence elections of members to ſerve in parliament.

6. That you give no countenance to the dangerous doctrine of conſtructive treaſons, or to the application of doubtful or uncertain laws to this intereſting object, nor ſuffer miniſters to be inveſted with a vague and diſcretionary power of judging on, or proſecuting this offence, and that you will vigorouſly oppoſe any meaſures tending to introduce modes and circumſtances of trial, which may render it difficult or impoſſible for the party accuſed to obtain full and equal juſtice.

7. That you will, as the repreſentatives of this great commercial city, be particularly attentive to the intereſt of the manufactures, and the trade of this kingdom in all parts of the world, and more eſpecially in the Britiſh American colonies, the only profitable trade this kingdom enjoys unrivalled by other nations; for which purpoſe we recommend your utmoſt endeavours to reconcile the unhappy differences ſubſiſting between the mother country and the colonies, the fatal effects of which have, in part, been ſeverely felt by the manufacturer, and commercial part of the kingdom.

8. That you will, at this time particularly, attend to the preſervation of public faith, the ſole foundation of public credit; and that you do not, upon any pretence of public good whatſoever, concur in any meaſure that ſhall tend to weaken or deſtroy that faith.

9. That you uſe your utmoſt endeavours, that the civil magiſtracy of this kingdom be put on a reſpectable footing, and thereby remove the pretence of calling in a military force, and preſerve this nation from a calamity which has already been fatal to the liberties of every kingdom round us, and which we, at this day, are beginning to feel.

10. That you promote a ſtrict enquiry into the uſe which has lately been made of military power, whether any encouragement has been given to premature or injudicious military alacrity, and whether any undue meaſures have been taken to prevent or elude the courſe of public juſtice on ſuch an occaſion.

11. That you uſe your beſt endeavours for having a ſtanding committee appointed, from time to time to examine, and to ſtate the public accounts.

12. That if any demand ſhould come before parliament for payment of the debts of the civil liſt, you will diligently enquire how theſe debts have been incurred, to the prejudice of the ſubject, and the dignity of the crown.

13. That you will promote a bill for limiting the number of placemen and penſioners in the houſe of commons, for preventing the peers of Great Britain from interfering in elections for members of parliament, and that an oath to prevent bribery and corruption be taken not only by the electors, but alſo by the candidates, at the opening of the poll.

14. That you uſe your utmoſt endeavours to obtain an act to ſhorten the duration of parliaments; and laſtly, we ſubmit it to your conſideration, whether a change in the preſent mode of election, to that of ballot, would not be the moſt likely method of procuring a return of members, on the genuine and uncorrupted ſenſe of the people.

Mr. Wilkes having been expelled the houſe of commons, a new writ was iſſued out for the election of a knight of the ſhire for the county of Middleſex, which came on at Brentford the 17th; when John Wilkes, eſq; being put in nomination by James Townſhend, eſq; member for Weſt-Loo, in Cornwall, and ſeconded by John Sawbridge, eſq; member for Hithe, the freeholders were unanimous in their approbation of the gentleman nominated, and accordingly Mr. Wilkes was returned without oppoſition.

Notwithſtanding this the houſe of commons rejected Mr Wilkes, as not being a proper perſon ſon; and iſſued out a writ for a new election, which came on the ſixteenth of March, when Mr. Wilkes was re-choſen without oppoſition. Mr. Dingley, who had offered himſelf as a candidate by advertiſement in the papers, appeared on the huſtings, but was not propoſed by any gentleman preſent; and though the ſheriffs repeatedly went round the huſtings to aſk if any gentleman would offer himſelf as a candidate, no one was nominated; whereupon Mr. Wilkes was declared duly elected.

The houſe, however, ſtill perſevered in their objections to Mr. Wilkes, and that very evening declared the election null and void; after which they iſſued out a new writ for another election.

Addreſſes were at this time preſented to his majeſty from almoſt every part of the kingdom; among which was that of the merchants of the city of London, who waited on his majeſty the twenty-ſecond, and being introduced by the earl of Hertford, lord-chamberlain of the houſhold, they preſented the ſame, and were moſt graciouſly received. When they ſet out from the Royal-Exchange, in order to preſent the addreſs, the populace ſhewed their reſentment by the throwing of mud, &c. they ſhut the gates at Temple-bar, and did every thing poſſible to impede their progreſs. When ſome of the coaches got to Exeter-change, a hearſe came out of Exeter-ſtreet, and preceded them, drawn by a black and a white horſe, the driver of which was dreſſed in a kind of rough coat, reſembling a ſkin, with a large cap, on one ſide black, the other white, whoſe whole figure was very groteſque. On one ſide of the hearſe was painted on canvaſs a repreſentation of the rioters killing Mr. Clarke at the Brentford election; and on the other ſide was a repreſentation of the ſoldiers firing on young Allen in the cow-houſe. The populace were ſo outrageous, that ſome of the merchants were obliged to quit their carriages, and take ſhelter in the houſes; and others, whoſe clothes were entirely covered with mud, retired home to ſhift themſelves before they could proceed with the addreſs.

When Mr. Boehm (in whoſe poſſeſſion was the original addreſs) was obliged to get out of his coach at Nando's coffee-houſe, to avoid the mob, in his hurry he left the addreſs under the cuſhion on one of the ſeats in the coach, and immediately ordered the coachman to go home: ſome of the mob opened the coach door, and began to ſearch for the addreſs, but the coachman declaring it was ſent before, they were leſs diligent in their ſearch, and miſſed laying hold of it, by not feeling ſix inches farther on the ſeat. The coachman then drove back; but inſtead of going home, he drove to the coach-makers in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet. As ſoon as Mr. Boehm was ſafe in the coffee-houſe, ſome gentlemen went to St. James's to inform the lords in waiting of the occaſion of their delay, and that Mr. Boehm would follow when the crowd was a little diſperſed; but after waiting an hour or more, and no addreſs arriving, a meſſenger was diſpatched back to the coffee-houſe for the addreſs, where Mr. Boehm having miſſed it, remained in great ſuſpence, and had ſent to his houſe to have the coach ſearched; but no coach was arrived there, which for ſome time cauſed great confuſion. At laſt, however, they ſent to the coach-makers, and luckily found the addreſs under the cuſhion, which was immediately forwarded to St. James's. This accident retarded the preſenting the addreſs upwards of two hours. In the mean time, thoſe gentlemen who had arrived at St. James's, and were waiting for it, had began to ſign a copy, which one of the gentlemen had with him, in order to preſent; when luckily the addreſs came, after about a dozen had ſigned the copy.

On the fourteenth of April came on again at Brentford the election of a knight of the ſhire for the county of Middleſex. The candidates were, Mr. Wilkes, Mr. Luttrel, Mr. Roche, and Mr. ſerjeant Whitaker. At four o'clock in the afternoon the poll was cloſed, when the numbers for each candidate appeared as follow:

Mr. Luttrel	293
Mr. Whitaker	5

Whereupon Mr. Wilkes was declared duly elected.

The next evening the houſe of commons, after very conſiderable debates, determined that Mr. Wilkes was ſtill incapable of being a member in this parliament; and that colonel Luttrel ſhould be ſitting member for the county of Middleſex. In conſequence of which the next day colonel Luttrel took the oaths and his ſeat in the houſe of commons, as knight of the ſhire for the ſaid county.

The freeholders of Middleſex finding themſelves thus deprived of their right of election, immediately ſet about means for the recovery of their loſt privileges. For which purpoſe various meetings were held at the aſſembly room, Mile-end; the moſt material of which was on the twenty-eighth of April, when it was reſolved that John Glyn, eſq; Walpole Eyre, eſq; George Bellas, eſq; James Adair, eſq; John Sawbridge, eſq; James Townſhend, eſq; the Rev. Dr. Wilſon, George Preſcot, eſq; Arnold Wallinger, eſq; and Francis Aſcough, eſq; be deſired to wait upon his majeſty with a petition, which was read to and approved by all the freeholders. Mr. Townſhend deſired that it might be underſtood, that no other freeholder ſhould attend the delivering of this petition, becauſe it might give a pretence to adminiſtration, to miſrepreſent to his majeſty an act of their innocent curioſity as tumult, inſurrection, and open rebellion. The petition was then ſigned by above five hundred freeholders, and on the twenty-fifth of May was preſented to his majeſty at St. James's by the following gentlemen: Mr. ſerjeant Glyn, Mr. Sawbridge, Mr. Townſhend, Mr. Bellas, Mr. Ellis, Mr. Aſcough, and the rev. Dr. Wilſon. They were very graciouſly received, and all had the honour of kiſſing his majeſty's hand.

This petition being of a very ſingular nature, and of the higheſt importance to the liberty of the ſubject, we ſhall, for the ſatisfaction of our readers, inſert it at large.

To

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty.

The humble petition of the freeholders of the county of Middleſex.

Moſt gracious ſovereign,

We, your majeſty's dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the freeholders of the county of Middleſex, beg leave, with all affectionate ſubmiſſion and humility, to throw ourſelves at your royal feet, and humbly to implore your paternal attention to thoſe grievances, of which this country and the whole nation complain, and thoſe fearful apprehenſions with which the whole Britiſh empire is moſt juſtly alarmed.

With great grief and ſorrow, we have long beheld the endeavours of certain evil minded perſons, who attempt to infuſe into your royal mind, notions and opinions of the moſt dangerous and pernicious tendency, and who promote and counſel ſuch meaſures as cannot fail to deſtroy that harmony and confidence, which ſhould ever ſubſiſt between a juſt and virtuous prince and a free and loyal people.

For this diſaffected purpoſe, they have introduced into every part of the adminiſtration of our happy, legal conſtitution, a certain unlimited and indefinite diſcretionary power; to prevent which is the ſole aim of all our laws, and was the ſole cauſe of all thoſe diſturbances and revolutions, which formerly diſtracted this unhappy country; for our anceſtors, by their own fatal experience, well knew that in a ſtate where diſcretion begins, law, liberty, and ſafety end. Under the pretence of this diſcretion, or, as it was formerly and has been lately called—Law of State—we have ſeen

Engliſh ſubjects, and even a member of the Britiſh legiſlature, arreſted by virtue of a general warrant, iſſued by a ſecretary of ſtate, contrary to the law of the land—

Their houſes rifled and plundered, their papers ſeized, and uſed as evidence upon trial—

Their bodies committed to cloſe impriſonment—

The Habeas Corpus eluded—

Trial by jury diſcountenanced, and the firſt law officer of the crown publicly inſinuating that juries are not to be truſted—

Printers puniſhed by the miniſtry in the ſupreme court without a trial by their equals, without any trial at all—

The remedy of the law for falſe impriſonment barred and defeated—

The plaintiff and his attorney, for their appeal to the law of the land, puniſhed by expences and impriſonment, and made, by forced engagements, to deſiſt from their legal claim—

A writing determined to be a libel by a court where it was not cognizable in the firſt inſtance; contrary to law, becauſe all appeal is thereby cut off, and inferior courts and juries influenced by ſuch predetermination—

A perſon condemned in the ſaid court as the author of the ſuppoſed libel unheard, without defence or trial—

Unjuſt treatment of petitions, by ſelecting only ſuch parts as might be wreſted to criminate the petitioner, and refuſing to hear thoſe which might procure him redreſs—

The thanks of one branch of the legiſlature propoſed by a miniſter to be given to an acknowledged offender, for his offence, with the declared intention of ſcreening him from law—

Attachments wreſted from their original intent of removing obſtructions to the proceedings of law, to puniſh, by ſentence of arbitrary fine and impriſonment, without trial or appeal, ſuppoſed offences committed out of court—

Perpetual impriſonment of an Engliſhman without trial, conviction, or ſentence, by the ſame mode of attachment, wherein the ſame perſon is at once party, accuſer, judge, and jury—

Inſtead of the ancient and legal civil police, the military introduced at every opportunity, unneceſſarily and unlawfully patrolling the ſtreets, to the alarm and terror of the inhabitants—

The lives of many of your majeſty's innocent ſubjects deſtroyed by military execution—

Such military execution ſolemnly adjudged to be legal—

Murder abetted, encouraged, and rewarded—

The civil magiſtracy rendered contemptible by the appointment of improper and incapable perſons—

The civil magiſtrates tampered with by adminiſtration, and neglecting and refuſing to diſcharge their duty—

Mobs and riots hired and raiſed by the miniſtry, in order to juſtify and recommend their own illegal proceedings, and to prejudice your majeſty's mind by falſe inſinuations againſt the loyalty of your majeſty's ſubjects—

The freedom of election violated by corrupt and undue influence, by unpuniſhed violence and murder—

The juſt verdicts of juries, and the opinion of the judges, over-ruled by falſe repreſentations to your majeſty; and the determinations of the law ſet aſide by new, unprecedented, and dangerous means; thereby leaving the guilty without reſtraint, and the injured without redreſs, and the lives of your majeſty's ſubjects at the mercy of every ruffian protected by adminiſtration—

Obſolete and vexatious claims of the crown ſet on foot for partial and election purpoſes—

Partial attacks on the liberty of the preſs; the moſt daring and pernicious libels againſt the conſtitution, and againſt the liberty of the ſubject, being allowed to paſs unnoticed, whilſt the ſlighteſt libel againſt a miniſter is puniſhed with the utmoſt rigour.

Wicked attempts to encreaſe and eſtabliſh a ſtanding army, by endeavouring to veſt in the crown an unlimited power over the militia; which, ſhould they ſucceed, muſt, ſooner or later, ſubvert the conſtitution, by augmenting the power of adminiſtration in proportion to their delinquency—

Repeated endeavours to diminiſh the importance of members of parliament individually, in order to render them more dependant on adminiſtration collectively. Even threats have been employed by miniſters to ſuppreſs the freedom of debate; debate; and the wrath of parliament denounced againſt meaſures authoriſed by the law of the land—

Reſolutions of one branch of the legiſlature ſet up as the law of the land, being a direct uſurpation of the rights of the two other branches; and therefore a manifeſt infringement of the conſtitution—

Public money ſhamefully ſquandered and unaccounted for, and all inquiry into the cauſe of arrears in the civil liſt prevented by the miniſtry—

Inquiry into a pay-maſter's public accounts ſtopped in the exchequer, though the ſums unaccounted for by that pay-maſter amount to above forty millions ſterling—

Public loans perverted to private miniſterial purpoſes—

Proſtitution of public honours and rewards, to men who can neither plead public virrtue nor ſervices—

Irreligion and immorality, ſo eminently diſcountenanced by your majeſty's royal example, encouraged by adminiſtration both by example and precept.

The ſame indiſcretion has been extended by the ſame evil counſellors to your majeſty's dominions in America, and has produced to our ſuffering fellow ſubjects in that part of the world, grievances and apprehenſions ſimilar to thoſe of which we complain at home—

Moſt gracious ſovereign,

Such are the grievances and apprehenſions which have long diſcontented and diſturbed the greateſt and beſt part of your majeſty's ſubjects. Unwilling, however, to interrupt your royal repoſe, though ready to lay down our lives and fortunes for your majeſty's ſervice, and for the conſtitution as by law eſtabliſhed, we have waited patiently, expecting a conſtitutional remedy by the means of our own repreſentatives: but our loyal and free choice having been repeatedly rejected, and the right of election now finally taken from us by the unprecedented ſeating of a candidate who was never choſen by the county; and who, even to become a candidate, was obliged fraudulently to vacate his ſeat in parliament, under the pretence of an inſignificant place, invited thereto by the prior declaration of a miniſter, that whoever oppoſed our choice, though but with four votes, ſhould be declared member for the county. We ſee ourſelves, by this laſt act, deprived even of the franchiſes of Engliſhmen, reduced to the moſt abject ſtate of ſlavery, and left without hopes or means of redreſs but from your majeſty or God.

Deign then, moſt gracious ſovereign, to liſten to the prayer of the moſt faithful of your majeſties ſubjects; and to baniſh from your royal favour, truſt and confidence, for ever thoſe evil and pernicious counſellors, who have endeavoured to alienate the affection of your majeſty's moſt ſincere and dutiful ſubjects, and whoſe ſuggeſtions tend to deprive your people of their deareſt and moſt eſſential rights, and who have traiterouſly dared to depart from the ſpirit and letter of thoſe laws which have ſecured the crown of theſe realms to the houſe of Brunſwick, in which we make our moſt earneſt prayers to God, that it may continue untarniſhed to the lateſt poſterity.

Signed by 1565 Freeholders.

On the fifth of May a court of common-council was held at Guildhall, in conſequence of an application of a large body of the livery to the Lord-mayor, deſiring him to call a common-hall, and acquainting him, it was for the purpoſe of taking the ſenſe of the livery of London, on the meaſures proper to be purſued by them on the preſent alarming ſituation of public affairs, which his lordſhip had refuſed till ſuch time as he had taken the ſenſe of the common-council upon it; upon which a queſtion was moved by Mr. Bellas, and ſeconded by Mr. Freeman, "that the right "hon. the Lord-mayor be deſired to iſſue a pre-"cept to aſſemble the livery in common-hall, "purſuant to the application to his lordſhip," and after long debates thereon, the ſaid queſtion being put, was declared to be carried in the negative; upon which a diviſion was demanded, Mr. Bellas and Mr. Freeman, tellers for the queſtion, Mr. Paterſon and Mr. Deputy Ellis, tellers againſt the queſtion; when there appeared to be for the queſtion, three aldermen, ſixty-nine commoners, againſt the queſtion, ſix aldermen, eighty-ſix commoners.

The aldermen that divided on the queſtion were Aldermen for the queſtion.

William Beckford, eſq;
Sir William Stephenſon
Barlow Trecothick, eſq;

Aldermen againſt the queſtion.

Robert Alſop, eſq;
Rt. hon. Thomas Harley, eſq;
Brackley Kennett, eſq;
John Kirkmam, eſq;
Thomas Hallifax, eſq;
John Shakeſpear, eſq;

On the twenty-fourth of June, a wardmote was held at Leatherſeller's-hall by the right hon. the Lord mayor, for the election of an alderman of Biſhopſgate-ward, in the room of Sir Matthew Blackiſton, bart. who had reſigned; when James Townſend, eſq; member for Weſt-Loo in Cornwall, was choſen without oppoſition. Upon which Mr. Townſend expreſſed his thanks in a conciſe ſpeech; but at the ſame time obſerved, that the ſatisfaction he felt on the honour conferred on him, prevented his being able to expreſs the grateful ſenſe of it, in the manner he could have wiſhed, but that his future life ſhould be dedicated to the ſervice and intereſt of this great city in general, and the above ward in particular.

On the twenty-ſixth a court of aldermen was held at Guidhall for the choice of ſheriffs, and other officers for the year enſuing. Previous to the opening of the court, Samuel Vaughan, eſq; addreſſed himſelf to the livery, and ſtrongly recommended commended decency in their behaviour, as the moſt likely, and indeed the only means, by which they could accompliſh the end for which ſo numerous a body had aſſembled.

At one o'clock the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen came upon the huſtings, when the recorder came forward, and attempted to open the buſineſs of the day, but an almoſt general hiſs and uproar enſued, many calling out for them to conſider of a petition in the firſt place: on which the Lord-mayor addreſſed himſelf to the livery, and in a very genteel ſpeech acquainted them, that he had taken a great deal of pains to inform himſelf of the duty of his office on the preſent occaſion, and that he could not find one ſingle inſtance of any buſineſs being done previous to the choice of officers; at the ſame time aſſuring them, that no one had a greater regard to the liberty of the ſubject than himſelf, but ſtrongly recommended decency and good order, declaring that he would not break up the court till ſuch time as they had taken the opinion of the livery relative to the matter they wanted to enforce, if the livery would firſt proceed to do the buſineſs for which the common-hall was called. This declaration was received with ſhouts of applauſe; but a gentleman expreſſing his diſlike to the meaſure of delay, another clamour aroſe, when Mr. Bellas deſired to be heard, and begged the gentlemen to proceed to buſineſs in an orderly manner, as the only means to preſerve their liberty, and to free themſelves from the imputation of licentiouſneſs, obſerving, that as the Lord-mayor had promiſed not to break up the court till they were ſatisfied, it would be the height of rudeneſs to doubt the veracity of their chief magiſtrate.

Mr. recorder then ſpoke to the following effect:

He told them, that he did not intend to intrude any opinion of his own on the gentlemen of the livery, what he had to ſay was officially, and when that was over his buſineſs was done. He then deſcanted on the importance of the office, of ſheriff, and concluded with obſerving, "that honeſt, reſpectable, conſcientious men, ſhould be "the objects of their choice."

Thirteen candidates were then put in nomination, amongſt whom were James Townſend and John Sawbridge, eſqrs. who, upon holding up of hands, carried it nemine contradicente. What was very remarkable, amongſt the other eleven there were but two hands up. Several other officer were then put up for the enſuing year who are now in office, and who were all re-choſen, except two of the auditors, in whoſe room Mr. deputy Richard Townſend and Mr. Boddington ſucceeded.

The Lord-mayor, agreeable to his promiſe, then came into court, and ſaid he was ready to hear the livery's propoſal, on which Mr. Lovel got up, and ſpoke for near a quarter of an hour on the many grievances the liverymen, in common with their fellow-citizens, laboured under. After he had finiſhod, there was a propoſal made (which was carried una voce) that the petition ſhould be then read, and it was read accordingly; but the Lord-mayor begged leave to make one alteration, which was this, that inſtead of "the "humble petition of the Lord-mayor, alder-"men, and livery of the city of London," it ſhould run thus: "The humble petition of the "livery of the city of London."

The petition was read a ſecond time with this alteration, and was univerſally approved of.

A propoſal was then made by Mr. Vaughan, that the Lord-mayor, ſheriffs, and members of the city of London, ſhould be requeſted to wait on his majeſty with this petition, which, upon holding up of hands, was univerſally approved of.

Sir Robert Ladbroke then came forward, and told the gentlemen of the livery, that he not only aſſented to the propoſal, but thought it his duty.

Alderman Beckford being next, addreſſed them, by aſſuring them he was ever at the ſervice of the livery of London; that in regard to giving in the petition, it was a requeſt that made him happy, as it agreed entirely with his own opinion; and that in regard to the particulars of the petition now read (as far as he could judge from twice hearing it) he knew moſt, if not all of the particulars to be facts, and concluded by referring to his conſcience for the uprightneſs of his intentions.

Mr. alderman Trecothick next ſpoke to the ſame effect; and ſaid he was happy in attending his brother members on this occaſion. The other member, Mr. Harley, was not in court.

A motion was then made, and univerſally approved of, to return thanks to the Lord-mayor for his great candour and impartiality on this occaſion; which his lordſhip afterwards very politely thanked them for, and concluded by aſſuring them, that he would, to the beſt of his power, finiſh, as he had begun, his office, with juſtice and impartiality. The buſineſs of the day was then adjourned, which, during a courſe of four hours, and an unexampled number of liverymen, was conducted with the greateſt ſpirit, order and unanimity.

At a general and numerous meeting of the inhabitants of Langbourn-ward, held at Pewterer's-hall the 30th of June, to conſider of a proper perſon to be put in nomination for alderman of that ward, in the room of Sir Joſeph Hankey, knight, deceaſed, John Sawbridge, eſq; ſheriff elect, and Mr. deputy Wilſon were propoſed. Upon the queſtion being put for the former, the greateſt part of the inhabitants held up their hands with joyful acclamations, and for the latter a very few; upon which Mr. deputy Wilſon, who was in the chair, declared Mr. Sawbridge to have the majority.

After Mr. Sawbridge was unanimouſly elected alderman of Langbourn-ward, he addreſſed the inhabitants to the following effect:

"Gentlemen,

"I return you my warmeſt thanks for this diſtinguiſhed mark of your eſteem and confidence, an honour which gives me the higheſt ſatisfaction, as it can only proceed from your approbation of my publick conduct, and to which I have not the leaſt leaſt claim or pretence from perſonal friendſhip or connection. Permit me to give you this public aſſurance that I will endeavour to merit the continuance of your eſteem by a diligent and conſcientious diſcharge of the duties of this high office, ever remembering, that your unanimous choice can only be conſidered as an approbation of my zealous endeavours to procure redreſs of our invaded liberties."

The before-mentioned petition of the livery of London was preſented to his majeſty the fifth of July, and was as follows:

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty.

The humble petition of the livery of the city of London in common-hall aſſembled.

Moſt gracious ſovereign,

We your majeſty's dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the livery of the city of London, with all the humility which is due from free ſubjects to their lawful ſovereign, but with all the anxiety which the ſenſe of the preſent oppreſſions, and the juſt dread of future miſchiefs, produce in our minds, beg leave to lay before your majeſty ſome of thoſe intolerable grievances, which your people have ſuffered from the evil conduct of thoſe who have been intruſted with the adminiſtration of your majeſty's government; and from the ſecret unremitting influence of the worſt of counſellors.

We ſhould be wanting in our duty to your majeſty, as well as to ourſelves and our poſterity, ſhould we forbear to repreſent to the throne the deſperate attempts which have been, and are too ſucceſsfully, made, to deſtroy that conſtitution, to the ſpirit of which we owe the relation which ſubſiſts between your majeſty and the ſubjects of theſe realms, and to ſubvert thoſe ſacred laws, which our anceſtors have ſealed with their blood.

Your miniſters, from corrupt principles, and in violation of every duty, have, by various enumerated means, invaded our invaluable and unalienable right of trial by jury.

They have, with impunity, iſſued general warrants, and violently ſeized perſons and private papers.

They have rendered the laws non-effective to our ſecurity, by evading the Habeas Corpus.

They have cauſed puniſhments, and even perpetual impriſonment, to be inflicted, without trial, conviction or ſentence.

They have brought into diſrepute the civil magiſtracy, by the appointment of perſons who are, in many reſpects, unqualified for that important truſt, and have thereby purpoſely furniſhed a pretence for calling in the aid of a military power.

They avow, and endeavour to eſtabliſh, a maxim, abſolutely inconſiſtent with our conſtitution—that "an occaſion for effectually employing a military force always preſents itſelf, when the civil power is trifled with or inſulted;" and, by a fatal application of this maxim, they have wantonly and wickedly ſacrificed the lives of many of your majeſty's innocent ſubjects, and have proſtituted your majeſty's ſacred name and authority, to juſtify, applaud, and recommend their own illegal and bloody actions.

They have ſcreened more than one murder from puniſhment, and in its place have unnaturally ſubſtituted reward.

They have eſtabliſhed numberleſs unconſtitutional regulations and taxations in our colonies. They have cauſed a revenue to be raiſed in ſome of them by prerogative. They have appointed civil law judges to try revenue cauſes, and to be paid from out of the condemnation-money

After having inſulted and defeated the law on different occaſions, and by different contrivances, both at home and abroad, they have at length completed their deſign, by violently wreſting from the people the laſt ſacred right we had left, the right of election, by the unprecedented ſeating of a candidate, notoriouſly ſet up and choſen only by themſelves. They have therefore taken from your ſubjects all hopes of parliamentary redreſs, and have left us no reſource, under God, but in your majeſty.

All this they have been able to effect by corruption; by a ſcandalous miſapplication and embezzlement of the public treaſure, and a ſhameful proſtitution of public honours and employments; procuring deficiencies of the civil liſt to be made good without examination; and, inſtead of puniſhing, conferring honours on a pay-maſter, the public defaulter of unaccounted millions.

From an unfeigned ſenſe of the duty we owe to your majeſty, and to our country, we have ventured thus humbly to lay before the throne theſe great and important truths, which it has been the buſineſs of your miniſters to conceal. We moſt earneſtly beſeech your majeſty to grant us redreſs. It is for the purpoſe of redreſs alone and for ſuch occaſions as the preſent, that thoſe great and extenſive powers are intruſted to the crown by the wiſdom of that conſtitution, which your majeſty's illuſtrious family was choſen to defend, and which we truſt in God it will for ever continue to ſupport.

The gentlemen, clergy, and freeholders of the county of Surry met at Epſom on the twenty-ſixth of June, in conſequence of ſeveral public advertiſements, to conſider of the beſt conſtitutional meaſures to be taken in ſupport of the right of election. After one o'clock the gentlemen, who were as numerous and reſpectable as were perhaps ever aſſembled on any occaſion at that place, entered the bowling green, where, in the abſence of John Thornton, eſq; the ſheriff, the honourable Peter King was choſen to preſide. Mr. King then addreſſed the freeholders, and acquainted them how neceſſary he, and many other reſpectable gentlemen, had thought it to call a county meeting, to conſider of the beſt meaſures to be taken in ſupport of the right of election, which he and they, had deemed one of the moſt valuable privileges we were poſſeſſed of, and in conſequence told them they were now aſſembled to conſider of ſuch meaſures. Sir George Colebrooke next ſpoke in vindication of one of the moſt important rights we enjoy enjoy as freemen; ſhewed, in clear and approved terms, how that right had been infringed in the caſe of the Middleſex election, and made the following motion, which was ſeconded by Sir Robert Clayton, bart. and unanimouſly agreed to, viz.

"That it is the opinion of this meeting, that by the law of the land, the freeholders and electors of Great Britain have an undoubted right to be repreſented in parliament by any perſon qualified according to law, who has a majority of legal votes; and that they have reaſon to apprehend theſe rights have been abridged in the caſe of the Middleſex election."

After this Sir George Colebrooke further expatiated on the object of the preſent meeting, and acquainted the freeholders, that there appeared in the judgment of the gentlemen he had talked with on this occaſion, two meaſures to be propoſed for their adoption, that ſeemed likely to procure redreſs in a caſe affecting the moſt important right of every elector of this kingdom; the one, a petition to the king; the other, inſtructions to the county repreſentatives. He gave his reaſons why he thought the latter more parliamentary and conſtitutional, and concluded his ſpeech with a motion for inſtructions; which being ſeconded, Dr. Allen immediately addreſſed the company, and ſhewed how ineffectual inſtructions were like to prove in the preſent caſe: one of the members had already done every thing in his power to prevent a violation of our franchiſes, and therefore needed them not: the other all he could to deprive us of them, who was not likely, in his preſent ſituation, to change his opinion, and therefore there could be no uſe in inſtructing him: he inſiſted there was no meaſure ſo proper to be taken, as to petition the king on the grievance complained of. In this opinion he was ſtrongly ſupported by William Ellis, eſq; who ſhewed the legality of the meaſure in clear terms; ſupported it by the example of the petitions of the county of Middleſex, and livery of London; and declared, that as the conſtitution had given us the right, he thought it the only proper method now to be adopted.

Sir Joſeph Mawbey next ſpoke againſt the motion for inſtructions, and inſiſted on their being unneceſſary, and would prove ineffectual in the preſent caſe. Sir Francis Vincent, he obſerved, with an integrity and independency which had done him honour, had already diſcharged his duty in ſuch a manner, as, he hoped, would procure him the unanimous thanks of this meeting; and Mr. Onſlow, there was reaſon to think, would pay no kind of attention to them in the preſent caſe: he therefore hoped a petition would be prepared to his majeſty, in temperate and becoming terms, and full of that duty, love and attachment, this county has always borne to his majeſty; but, at the ſame time, confined to one ſingle point, and aſcertaining, in manly terms, that right which we conſider as the foundation of all others we enjoy. Redreſs might be obtained, if in conſequence his majeſty ſhould either think it right to remove ſuch of his preſent miniſters, as have counſelled and ſupported a meaſure, which has violated the firſt principles of the conſtitution; or ſhould determine on a diſſolution of the preſent parliament, which, he hoped would take place, ſooner than the right of election ſhould be taken away.

After this the reverend Mr. Horne, Claud Creſpigny, eſq; Marchant Tubb, eſq; and others, ſpoke with great ability, in favour of a petition, and its being immediately prepared; and that meaſure appearing to be the almoſt general ſenſe of the company, Sir George Colebrooke declared he would no longer object, provided a petition was prepared in decent terms, and confined to the ſingle object of the Middleſex election.

Sir Robert Clayton then propoſed to give the thanks of the county to Sir Francis Vincent, bart. in which he was ſeconded by Sir Joſeph Mawbey, and they were given with the greateſt unanimity and chearfulneſs, in the following words:

Reſolved, that the thanks of this county be given to Sir Francis Vincent, bart. our worthy repreſentative, for his ſteady, firm, and independent conduct in parliament, and particularly for his endeavours to maintain the rights and franchiſes of the freeholders and other electors of England.

Before ſix o'clock in the evening, the petition, which had been prepared by twenty-three gentlemen of the firſt rank and fortune in the county, was ingroſſed and read twice by the honourable Mr. King to the freeholders, who unanimouſly approved of the ſame. The petition was afterwards diſperſed in various parts of the county, where it met with univerſal approbation; and was preſented to his majeſty the 24th of Auguſt by the following gentlemen:

Sir Francis Vincent, bart. member for the county.
The honourable Peter King.
Sir George Colebrooke, bart.
Sir Robert Clayton, bart.
Sir Joſeph Mawbey, bart.
Joſeph Martin, eſq;
Barlow Trecothick, eſq;
Braſs Croſby, eſq;
Henry Crab Bolton, eſq;

Sir Anthony Abdy, bart. met the above gentlemen, previous to their going to court, at the Thatched-houſe tavern; but being greatly indiſpoſed with the gout, could not attend them to the palace.

On the king's return from the drawing-room, Sir Francis Vincent, Bart. repreſentative of the county, preſented the petition to his majeſty, which was moſt graciouſly received, and was as follows.

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty.

The humble petition of the freeholders of the county of Surry.

"Moſt gracious ſovereign!

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the freeholders of the county of Surry, from a grateful ſenſe of the ineſtimable bleſſings which this nation has enjoyed under the mild and equal government of your majeſty, and your illuſtrious predeceſſors of the houſe of Brunſwick, and from a ſteady attachment, zeal, and affection to your royal perſon, and family, think it our duty to join with our injured fellow ſubjects in humbly offering to your majeſty our complaints of the meaſures adopted by pernicious counſellors, who, we apprehend, have countenanced and adviſed a violation of the firſt principle of the conſtitution.

" The right of election in the people, which is the ſecurity of all their rights, is alſo the foundation of your majeſty's; we cannot, therefore, forbear being alarmed when we ſee that firſt principle violated in the late inſtance of the Middleſex election.

" We have ſeen, royal ſire, with great concern, an application of the freeholders of the county of Middleſex, made by their humble petition to the houſe of commons, complaining of that meaſure, defeated; and it is with the utmoſt reluctance we now find ourſelves conſtrained to appeal to your ſacred perſon, from whoſe juſtice and goodneſs we can alone hope for redreſs.

" We therefore moſt humbly implore your majeſty, that you would be graciouſly pleaſed to give us ſuch relief as to your royal wiſdom ſhall ſeem meet, by an exertion of that prerogative which the conſtitution has ſo properly placed in your majeſty's hands.

" And your majeſty's petitioners ſhall ever pray, &c."

Petitions of the like nature are now in agitation from Worceſter, Hertford, Cornwall, Kent, Bucks, Norfolk, Liverpool, Norwich, Yarmouth, Briſtol, York; and, in ſhort, from almoſt every part of the kingdom.

On the 26th of July, about eight o'clock in the evening, a terrible fire broke out at Mr. Roſs's, whip-maker to the duke of Cumberland, in Marybone-ſtreet, St. James's, which entirely conſumed the ſame, together with Mr. Mundy's, a ſhoe-maker; Mr. Frith's Mancheſter warehouſe; Mr. Warren's, a perfumer; Mr. Thackwait's, cabinet-maker, with his workſhop, and a large quantity of timber; Mr. Lynes, confectioner; beſides damaging a number of houſes on each ſide, and three which lay backwards, with a great quantity of goods. The flames communicated themſelves into Sherard-ſtreet, and deſtroyed Ruſtat's coffee-houſe; Mr. Schooler's, a ſilk-dyer, and Mr. Hole's a taylor. The number of houſes conſumed and damaged was about eighteen. It was occaſioned by melting of ſome roſin for whip handles.

A moſt numerous and reſpectable meeting of the electors of the city of Weſtminſter was held at Weſtminſter-hall the 29th of Auguſt, agreeable to a publiſhed notice for that purpoſe, to conſider of a petition to his majeſty for the redreſs of grievances. About twelve o'clock Sir Robert Barnard, the chairman, attended by Robert Jones, eſq; chairman of the committee, and ſeveral other gentlemen, entered the hall, amidſt the re-ecchoed acclamations of the populace. Sir Robert being ſeated in an arm chair for that purpoſe placed on the ſteps of the court of common-pleas, Mr. Jones opened the buſineſs of the day in the following addreſs:

" Gentlemen,

" Senſible of the many grievances, that the " electors of the county and city of Weſtminſter " labour under, in common with his majeſty's " ſubjects, a committee of gentlemen has been " appointed (of which I had the honour to be " chairman) to draw up a petition to his majeſty, " praying a redreſs of thoſe grievances; we have " accordingly, gentlemen, drawn up a petition, " which I flatter myſelf will be agreeable to you, " and if it is your pleaſure, it is now prepared for " reading to you."

The electors then unanimouſly cried out, read, read, and accordingly the petition was read, firſt by Sir Robert Barnard; the purport of which was as follows:

" The petitioners in common with the reſt of " his majeſty's loyal ſubjects, feeling ſenſibly a " variety of grievances and oppreſſions, could " not be longer ſilent on the ſubject of a late vio- " lent and moſt alarming invaſion of their liber- " ties, in the affair of the Middleſex election, " which threatens a ſpeedy annihilation of our " excellent conſtitution." And in the concluſion they petioned to his majeſty to diſſolve the preſent parliament, and call another as ſpeedily as may be.

The petition was received with univerſal applauſe: after which Mr. Martin read it again with a loud voice; and when he had ended, Sir Robert Barnard aſked, if they choſe to have it read any more; to which they univerſally anſwered, " enough, enough," and accompanied it with huzzas, and other demonſtrations of joy.

The chairman then deſired all thoſe who were for the petition to hold up their hands, when every hand in the hall was inſtantly up; and, on the queſtion being reverſed, not a ſingle hand was raiſed.

After this eight clerks were placed in different parts of the hall, with large ſkins of parchment, on which was wrote the petition for the electors to ſign. Sir Robert Barnard and Mr. Jones were the two firſt who ſigned the parchment, which was placed next the chair, and at the cloſe of the afternoon, it was ſigned by near 4000 people.

Thus ended the buſineſs of the day, which, notwithſtanding the prodigious concourſe of people, and the public ſituation of the place, was conducted with the greateſt ſpirit, unanimity and moderation.

The chairman's ſeat was firſt placed on the upper ſtep in the hall, that leads to the King's-bench; but ſome little time before the committee arrived, the electors carried it off, and removed it juſt before the entrance of the court of common-pleas, declaring that the fitter ſituation; for the chair of liberty ſhould be near that court where general warrants were firſt condemned.

On

On the fourteenth of September, about two o'clock in the morning, a fire broke out at Mr. Hill's, an ironmonger, in St. Martin's-le-Grand, which entirely conſumed that houſe, and four others in St. Chriſtopher's-court adjoining. Two brothers with great difficulty ſaved themſelves by eſcaping over the tops of the houſes. And the ſame morning, about ſeven o'clock, another fire broke out in the dwelling-houſe of Meſſrs. Buxton and Enderby, oil merchants at Paul's-wharf, Upper Thames-ſtreet, which entirely conſumed the ſame, with their Warehouſes adjoining, in which were 4000 barrels of oil: alſo a timber-yard and many other adjacent houſes. The flames reached quite to the water-ſide, where two barges (which could not be got off, it being low-water) took fire, and were conſumed: one of them was loaded with oil, which was thrown into the Thames to prevent its feeding the flames. The damage was computed at ſome thouſands of pounds.

Thus have we reduced the Hiſtory of this great metropolis to the month of September, 1769; at a time, when we are ſorry to ſay, that not only the city of London, but almoſt every county in the kingdom, is in the greateſt commotion.—The enſuing parliament, however, will, in all probability, bring theſe commotions to ſome iſſue: and we heartily wiſh that iſſue may tend to the univerſal ſatisfaction of the people, and to the farther emolument of the Britiſh throne.

 If any material circumſtances ſhould occur during the courſe of the Survey, we ſhall for the better completion of our undertaking, inſert the ſame at the cloſe of the work, by way of Appendix.

THE

THE SURVEY OF LONDON.

CHAPTER I.

Containing the number of ſtreets, houſes, and inhabitants in the city and liberties of London. Number of pariſhes within the bills of mortality. Proviſions brought to London market. Juriſdictions and government of the city. Its officers and different courts. Number of wards, &c.

THE foundation, form, extent, and ſituation of this great metropolis has been already given in the former part of this work. We ſhall now take as minute a ſurvey of its preſent ſtate and condition as the great improvements which have been made, and ſtill are making will poſſibly admit.

By an eſtimate made in the year 1738 of the number of ſtreets, ſquares, lanes, alleys, courts, &c. within the bills of Mortality there appeared to be 5099; and the number of houſes 95,897; but the very conſiderable improvements which have been made ſince that time of the waſte ground in the city, and the new buildings which extend towards Paddington and Chelſea on the weſt, to Marybone on the North, and to Bow on the eaſt, render it almoſt impoſſible to aſcertain the exact number at this time; but by the neareſt computation they cannot be leſs than 150,000, which, upon an average of 20l. per annum for each houſe, amounts to 3,000,000l. total for rent; and if, upon a like average, we allow 300l. for the building of each houſe, the eſtate of this circuit of buildings will amount to 45,000,000l. ſterling.

Various have been the attempts made to aſcertain the number of inhabitants within theſe extenſive buildings; but the only method of forming any calculation is from the bills of mortality which give the births and deaths, and from the great number of houſes; in which, if we allow upon an average, eight perſons to a houſe, the number of inhabitants will appear to be 1200,000.

The weekly bills of mortality took their origin from the year 1592, in which was a great peſtilence that continued for three years after; when the plague ceaſing, they were diſcontinued, and laid aſide as uſeleſs, till the year 1603; ſince which they have extended, at different intervals, to ſuch a length as to include 97 pariſhes within the walls, and 16 without; 23 out pariſhes in the counties of Middleſex and Surry, and 10 pariſhes in the city and liberties of Weſtminſter. Theſe pariſhes, which form the circuit uſually called within the bills of mortality, are as follow:

The number of inhabitants in this metropolis may be in a principal degree aſcertained by the great quantity of proviſions which are yearly brought to the London markets; of which the following is an eſtimate from Midſummer 1759 to Midſummer 1760.

Wheat-flour	369,635	quarters
Cattle	98,244
Sheep and Lambs	711,123
Calves	194,760
Hogs	186,932
Sucking Pigs	52,000
Oyſters	115,536	buſhels
Mackarel	14,740,000
Butter	16,366,728	pounds
Cheeſe	21,066,000	pounds

Excluſive of all kinds of poultry, fiſh, garden-ſtuff and milk. And the quantity of beer brewed in the city and ſuburbs the ſame year amounted to 975,217 barrels.

We have included in this view not only the city of London and its liberties, but likewiſe the city of Weſtminſter and Borough of Southwark; we ſhall now divide theſe parts, and conſider each ſeparately as enjoying ſome peculiar advantages, and ſubject to particular modes of government; beginning with that part which contains the city of London and its liberties.

We are to underſtand by the city of London no more than that part which was formerly encompaſſed by the wall of the city. Within this wall were eight gates, all of which, except Newgate, have been taken down to make the avenues to the city more airy and commodious. The wall likewiſe has ſhared the ſame fate for the admiſſion of new buildings.

The other parts of the city called the liberties, and which lie without the wall, are bounded on the eaſt, in Whitechapel, the Minories, and Biſhopſgate, by bars, which were formerly poſts and chains. They are bounded on the north in the ſame manner in Pickax-ſtreet, the end of Fan-alley, and in St. John's-ſtreet. On the weſt by bars in Holbourn, at the eaſt end of Middle-row, and at the weſt end of Fleet-ſtreet by the gate called Temple-bar. And on the ſouth may be included the juriſdiction which the city holds on the river Thames, and over the borough of Southwark.

The city and liberties of London are ſubject to three governments, viz. civil, eccleſiaſtical, and military. The firſt divides it into wards and precincts, under a Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council; the ſecond into pariſhes, under a biſhop, archdeacon, and miniſters or paſtors; and the laſt is the militia, under the power of a lord-lieutenant, which is lodged in the mayor and aldermen, and ſome of the principal citizens. The government of the city may be ſaid to bear ſome affinity to the legiſlative power of the nation; the former being directed by the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, in the ſame manner as the latter is by the king, lords and commons.

The Mayor, or Lord-mayor, who is the ſupreme magiſtrate of this metropolis, was, before the Norman conqueſt, called the Portreve, or Portgreve, which title in the reign of Henry II. was changed for that of Mayor, a name by which the chief magiſtrate of the city of Roan, the capital of Normandy, was then diſtinguiſhed. In 1215 the citizens obtained from king John a charter which granted them the privilege of chuſing this magiſtrate, which was afterwards confirmed by ſeveral other royal grants; and the mayors were elected by the court of aldermen, and a number of commons ſummoned by them out of each of the wards; but the number thus ſummoned being occaſionally varied at the diſcretion of the aldermen, gave great uneaſineſs to the commonalty; for the removing of which the method of election was altered by an act of common-council in the year 1476, whereby the preſent manner of electing by the liverymen of the ſeveral companies was eſtabliſhed: by virtue whereof the Lord-mayor is annually choſen on Michaelmas day. On which day the liverymen aſſemble in Guildhall, where, by holding up of hands, they uſually chooſe two of the ſenior aldermen below the chair, who being returned to the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, the ſenior is generally declared Lord-mayor elect.

Soon after the new Lord-mayor, accompanied by the recorder and ſeveral of the aldermen, is preſented to the lord-chancellor (as his majeſty's repreſentative) for his approbation; which being obtained he is ſworn into the office of mayor, at Guildhall the eighth of November, and the next day before the barons of the exchequer at Weſtminſter.

On the morning of the ninth of November, being the day on which the Lord-mayor elect enters upon his office, the aldermen and ſheriffs repair to the Lord-mayor's reſidence, from whence they attend him to Guildhall in a proceſſion formed by coaches, which about noon proceed to the Three-crane ſtairs, where the Lord-mayor, aldermen, recorder and ſheriffs, go on board the city barge, attended by ſeveral corporations of the citizens, in their formalities, and magnificent barges, elegantly adorned with a great number and variety of flags and pendants; and thence proceed to Weſtminſter, forming a moſt grand and magnificent appearance.

When the ceremony is over at Weſtminſter, the dazzling fleet returns in the ſame pompous manner to Black-friars ſtairs, from whence the livery of many of the city companies, preceded by colours and bands of muſic, march to their reſpective ſtands, which are erected on both ſides the ſtreets through which his lordſhip is to paſs.

The Lord-mayor being at length landed at Black-friars, he is preceded by the artillery-company, which is followed by the company of which the Lord-mayor is free. After them follow ſeveral others with their muſic, flags, and ſtreamers, and among the reſt the armourers have a perſon riding on horſeback, completely dreſſed in poliſhed armour. At length march the Lord-mayor's domeſticks and ſervants, followed by his lordſhip in the coach of ſtate, and after him come the aldermen, recorder, ſheriffs, chamberlain, common-ſerjeant town-clerk, &c. in their ſeveral coaches and chariots, and in this manner proceed to Guildhall, where an elegant entertainment is provided, as there is likewiſe for the ſeveral companies at their reſpective halls.

On all public occaſions the Lord-mayor is cloathed, according to the ſeaſon, either in ſcarlet or purple robes richly furred, with a velvet hood and golden chain, or collar of S. S. with a rich jewel appendant. When he goes abroad in his ſtate coach, the mace bearer ſits upon a ſtool in the middle facing one of the windows, and the ſword-bearer upon another ſtool oppoſite the other; and when on foot his train is ſupported by a page, and the mace and ſword carried before him.

The principal officers belonging to the Lord-mayor for the ſupport of his dignity are, the ſword-bearer, the common hunt, common crier, and water bailiff, who have all great ſalaries or perquiſites, with each the title of eſquire. He has alſo three ſerjeant carvers, three ſerjeants of the chamber, a ſerjeant of the channel, two yeomen of the chamber, four yeomen of the water-ſide, a yeoman of the channel, an under water bailiff, ſix yeomen waiters, three meal weighers, two yeomen of the wood wharf; an officer called a foreign taker; and the city marſhals.

The power of this great officer is at preſent much more conſiderable than it was formerly, for he is not only the king's repreſentative in the civil goverment of the city, but alſo firſt commiſſioner of the lieutenancy, perpetual coroner and eſcheator within the city and liberties of London and the Borough of Southwark; chief juſtice of oyer, terminer and jail-delivery of Newgate; judge of the court of wardmote at the election of aldermen; conſervator of the river Thames and Medway; perpetual commiſſioner in all affairs relating to the river Lea, and chief butler of the kingdom at all coronations.

The aldermen are properly the ſubordinate governors of their reſpective wards under the Lord-mayor's juriſdiction, and hold their offices during life or good behaviour. The perſon elected muſt be returned by the Lord-mayor (or other returning ing officer in his ſtead, duly qualified to hold a court of wardmote) to the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, by whom the perſon ſo returned muſt be admitted and ſworn into the office of alderman before he can act. If he refuſes to ſerve the office when choſen, he is ſubject to a fine of 500l. There are twenty five in number, and each has his ſeparate ward, to the government of which he is more immediately to attend. Thoſe who have ſerved the office of Lord-mayor, are ſaid to be above the chair, and with three of the eldeſt that are next it, are juſtices of the peace by charter. All the aldermen keep their wardmote for chooſing ward officers, and ſettling the buſineſs of the ward; for redreſſing grievances, and preventing all defaults found in the ward. In the management of theſe affairs every alderman has his deputy, choſen out of the common-council, and in ſome of theſe wards, which are very large the alderman has two deputies.

The common-council are choſen after the ſame manner as the aldermen, only with this difference, that as the Lord-mayor preſides in the wardmote, and is judge of the poll at the election of an alderman, ſo the alderman of each ward is judge of the poll at the election of a common-council-man. Thus the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, when aſſembled, may be deemed the city parliament, reſembling the great council of the nation: for it conſiſts of two houſes; one for the Lord-mayor and aldermen, or the upper-houſe; another for the commoners or repreſentatives of the people, commonly called the common-council-men. Theſe have a power in their incorporate capacity to make and to repeal bye laws; and the citizens are bound to obey or ſubmit to thoſe laws. When they meet in their incorporate capacity, they wear deep blue ſilk gowns. No act can be performed in the name of the city of London without their concurrence: but they cannot aſſemble without a ſummons from the Lord-mayor, who, nevertheleſs, is obliged to call a common-council, whenever it ſhall be demanded, upon extraordinary occaſions, by ſix reputable citizens and members of that court.

The two ſheriffs of this city, which is a county of itſelf, are alſo ſheriffs of the county of Middleſex, and are choſen at Guildhall on Midſummer-day by the liverymen, but not ſworn till Michaelmas-eve, when they enter on their office; and two days after are preſented in the Exchequer-court in Weſtminſter-hall, to the lord-chancellor, by the Lord-mayor and aldermen. Each ſheriff has an under-ſheriff, ſix clerks, thirty-ſix ſerjeants; and every ſerjeant a yeoman, who belongs to either of the priſons, called Woodſtreet-compter, or the Poultry-compter. If the perſon choſen ſheriff refuſes to ſerve, he pays a fine of four hundred pounds to the city, and thirteen pounds, ſix ſhillings and eight-pence to the miniſters of the city priſons, unleſs he ſwears himſelf not worth fifteen thouſand pounds; and if he ſerves he is obliged to give bond to the corporation. Their office in general is to collect the public revenues within their ſeveral juriſdictions; to gather into the exchequer all fines belonging to the crown; to ſerve the king's writs of proceſs; to attend the judges and execute their orders; to impannel juries; to compel head-ſtrong and obſtinate men by the poſſe comitatus to ſubmit to the deciſions of the law, and to take care that all condemned criminals be duly puniſhed and executed. In particular, they are to execute the orders of the court of common-council, when they have reſolved to petition parliament, or to addreſs his majeſty. They have a power to make arreſts, and ſerve execution on the river Thames.

After the ſheriffs are elected, the livery chuſe the chamberlain of the city, and other officers, called the bridge-maſters, auditors of the city and bridge-houſe accounts, and the aleconners.

The recorder is choſen by the Lord-mayor and aldermen only, and continues in his office during life. He takes place in all courts, and in the common-council before any one that hath not been mayor: of whom we have the following deſcription in one of the books of the chamber. "He ſhall be, and is wont to be, one of the moſt ſkilful and virtuous apprentices of the law of the whole kingdom; whoſe office is always to ſit on the right hand of the mayor, in recording pleas, and paſſing judgments; and by whom records and proceſſes, had before the Lord-mayor and aldermen at Great St. Martin's, ought to be recorded by word of mouth before the judges aſſigned there to correct errors. The mayor and aldermen have therefore uſed commonly to ſet forth all other buſineſſes, touching the city, before the king and his council, as alſo in certain of the king's courts, by Mr. Recorder, as a chief man, endued with wiſdom and eminent for eloquence." He ſpeakes in the name of the city upon extraordinary occaſions; reads and preſents their addreſſes to the king; and when ſeated upon the bench delivers the ſentence of the court. He is the firſt officer in order of precedence that is paid a ſalary, which originally was no more than ten pounds ſterling per annum, with ſome few perquiſites; but it has from time to time been augmented to 600l. per annum and become the high road to preferment in the law.

The chamberlain of London is an officer of great truſt, and is annually choſen by the livery on Midſummer-day, though he enjoys his place for life, if he is not found guilty of ſome great crime. He has the keeping of the monies, lands and goods, of the city orphans, or takes good ſecurity for the payment thereof when the parties come to age. To which end he is deemed in the law a ſole corporation, to him and his ſucceſſors, for orphans; and therefore a bond, or a recognizance made to him and his ſucceſſors, is recoverable by his ſucceſſors. His office may be termed a public treaſury, collecting the cuſtoms, monies, and yearly revenues, and all other payments belonging to the corporation of the city. He hath a court particularly belonging to him, of which we ſhall ſpeak of hereafter.

The common-council, conſtables, and other officers, are choſen by the houſekeepers of the ward, on St. Thomas's-day at a wardmote then held by the aldermen.

The coroner of London is an officer of great antiquity, even ſo far back as the time of king Alfred. His buſineſs is, to enquire into the cauſes of all ſudden deaths, where there is the leaſt leaſt ſuſpicion of murder; and for that purpoſe he impannels a jury, to whom he gives a charge, and takes evidence upon oath. The Lord-mayor for the time being is coroner of the city; but he appoints a deputy for the diſcharge of that office. The coroner's jury have a right to examine the body of the deceaſed, and to call in the aſſiſtance of phyſicians and ſurgeons. They are to try the ſuppoſed murderer; and if they acquit him of all guilt, and concern in the death of the deceaſed, he is ſet at liberty; but if they find him guilty, their ſentence is not final: the ſuppoſed murderer being ſent to priſon to take his trial at the Old Bailey. The coroner is likewiſe to enquire into the eſcape of a murderer, and alſo concerning found treaſure, deodands, and wrecks at ſea. There are ſeveral other coroners, who hold courts out of the liberties of the city, as for Weſtminſter, the Tower Hamlets, &c.

Beſides theſe the Lord-mayor has the following officers, viz. The common ſerjeant; the town clerk; the city remembrancer; the ſword bearer; the common hunt; the common crier; and the water bailiff; all of which, except the town clerk, who is choſen by the livery, purchaſe their places.

The common ſerjeant is to attend the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen on court days, and to be in council with them, on all occaſions, within or without the precincts or liberties of the city. He is to take care of orphan's eſtates, either by taking account of them, or to ſign their indentures, before their paſſing the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen. He is likewiſe to let, ſet and manage the orphans eſtates, according to his judgment, to their beſt advantage.

The town-clerk, or common clerk is an officer who keeps the original charters of the city, the books, rolls and other records, wherein are regiſtered the acts and proceedings of the city; ſo that he may not be improperly ſtiled the city regiſter. He attends the Lord-mayor and aldermen at their courts, in order to take down any extraordinary proceeding that may occur. The town clerk and common ſerjeant take place according to ſeniority.

The city remembrancer is to attend the Lord-mayor on certain days, to put his lordſhip in mind of the ſelect days when he is to go abroad with the aldermen, &c. He is to attend daily at the parliament houſe, during the ſeſſions, and to report to the Lord-mayor their tranſactions.

The ſword-bearer is to attend the Lord-mayor at his going abroad, and to carry the ſword before him, being the emblem of juſtice. It is an ancient and honourable office, repreſenting the ſtate and princely office of the king's moſt excellent majeſty, in his repreſentative the Lord-mayor, and according to the rule of armory, "he muſt carry the ſword upright, the hilts being holden under his bulk, and the blade directly up the midſt of his breaſt, and ſo forth between the ſword-bearer's brows."

The common hunt is an officer whoſe buſineſs it is to take care of the pack of hounds belonging to the Lord-mayor and citizens, to attend them in hunting in thoſe grounds to which they are authorized by charter.

The common crier is to ſummon all executors and adminiſtrators of freemen to appear, and to bring in inventories of the perſonal eſtates of freemen, within two months after the deceaſe; and and he is to have notice of their appraiſements. He is likewiſe to attend the Lord-mayor on ſet days, and at the courts held weekly by the mayor and aldermen.

The water bailiff is ro look after the preſervation of the river Thames againſt all encroachments, and to prevent the fiſhermen from deſtroying the young fry by unlawful nets. For that end there are juries for each county, that hath any part of it lying on the ſides or ſhores of the ſaid river: which juries, ſummoned by the water bailiff at certain times, do make enquiry of all offences relating to the river and the fiſh, and make their preſentments accordingly. He is alſo bound to attend the Lord-mayor on ſet days in the week.

The following officers are likewiſe belonging to the city: farmer of the markets; auditor; clerk of the chamber; clerk to the commiſſioners of the ſewers; clerk of the court of conſcience; beadle of the ſame court; clerk of the city works; printer to the city; juſtice of the Bridge-yard; clerk comptroller of the Bridge-houſe; ſteward of the Borough; bailiff of the Borough.

The city of London is at preſent divided into twenty-ſix wards, viz. Alderſgate, Aldgate, Baſſiſhaw, Billingſgate, Biſhopſgate, Bread-ſtreet, Bridge, Broad-ſtreet, Candlewick, Caſtle Baynard, Cheap, Coleman-ſtreet, Cordwainer, Cornhill, Cripplegate, Dowgate, Farringdon-within, Farringdon without, Langbourn, Lime-ſtreet, Portſoken, Queenhithe, Tower, Vintry, Wallbrook, and the ward of Bridge-without.

The city has alſo two ſubordinate kinds of government: one executed by the aldermen, deputy, and common-councilmen, and their inferior officers, in each ward; under which form are comprehended all the inhabitants, free or not free of the city. Every ward is therefore like a little free ſtate, and at the ſame time ſubject to the Lord-mayor, as chief magiſtrate of the city. The officers and ſervants of each ward manage the affairs belonging to it, without the aſſiſtance of the reſt, and each has a court called the wardmote, (of which we ſhall ſpeak hereafter) for the management of its own affairs. The other by the maſter, wardens, and court of aſſiſtants, of the incorporate companies; whoſe power reaches no further than over the members of their reſpective guilds or fraternities; except that in them is inveſted the power to chuſe repreſentatives in parliament for the city, and all thoſe magiſtrates and officers elected by a common-hall: which companies are inveſted with diſtinct powers, according to the tenor of their reſpective charters.

CHAPTER II.

Containing an account of the ſeveral courts of juſtice within the city and liberties of London.

The Lord-mayor's Court.

THIS is a court of record, held before the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and recorder, every Tueſday in Guildhall, wherein actions of debt, treſpaſs, attachments, covenants, &c. ariſing within the city and liberties of any value may be tried, and actions from the ſheriffs court removed hither, before the jury be ſworn. It is alſo a court of chancery or equity, reſpecting affairs tranſacted in the city and liberties; and gives relief when judgment is obtained in the ſheriffs court, for more than the juſt debt. This court has an office peculiar to itſelf, conſiſting of four attornies, by whom all actions cognizable therein are entered, for the execution whereof there are ſix ſerjeants of mace, who daily attend in the ſaid office. In many reſpects this court is the beſt to commence a proceſs in, ſeeing an action (excluſive of ſtamps) may be entered at the ſmall charge of four-pence, and which, tho' not proceeded upon, never dies, as thoſe in other courts: beſides, a ſuit may be begun and ended here, within the ſpace of fourteen days, for ſo ſmall a charge as thirty ſhillings. In ſhort, this is the moſt extenſive court of the kingdom; for all that is cognizable in the ſeveral courts of England, is the ſame in this. The juries for trying cauſes in this, and the ſheriffs courts, are by the ſeveral courts of wardmote annually returned at Chriſtmas, when each ward, according to cuſtom, appoint a ſufficient number of perſons to ſerve on the ſaid juries for every month in the year as follows:

Months	Wards.
January,	Aldgate, Portſoken and Cornhill.
February,	Cheap-ward.
March,	Baſſiſhaw and Cripplegate.
April,	Vintry and Bread-ſtreet.
May,	Tower and Billingſgate.
June,	Farringdon Without.
July,	Bridge-ward.
Auguſt,	Alderſgate, Coleman-ſt. and Broad-ſtreet.
September,	Farringdon Within, and Caſtle Baynard.
October,	Queenhithe, Dowgate, and Wallbrooke.
November,	Langbourn, and Lime-ſtreet.
December,	Candlewick, Cordwainer, and Biſhopſgate.

The Court of Lord-mayor and Aldermen.

This is a court of record, wherein is lodged a great part of the executive power, whereby all leaſes and other inſtruments that paſs the city ſeal, are executed; the aſſize of bread aſcertained; conteſts relating to water-courſes, lights and party-walls adjuſted; and the city officers ſuſpended and puniſhed according to the notoriety of their ſeveral offences.

The ſaid court has not only a power of electing annually eleven overſeers, or rulers of the fraternity of watermen; but likewiſe a right of fixing their ſeveral taxes, with the approbation of the privy council; and alſo a right of diſpoſing of moſt of the places belonging to the city officers.

The Sheriffs Courts.

Theſe are courts of record, held in Guildhall every Wedneſday and Friday, for actions entered at Wood-ſtreet-Compter, and on Thurſdays and Saturdays for thoſe entered at the Poultry-Compter, of which the ſheriffs being judges, each has his aſſiſtant or deputy, who are commonly called judges of theſe courts, before whom are tried actions of debt, treſpaſs, covenant, &c. and where the teſtimony of an abſent witneſs in writing is allowed to be good evidence. To each of theſe courts belong four attornies, who upon their being admitted by the court of aldermen, have the following oath adminiſtered to them:

"Ye ſhall ſwear, that ye ſhall well and lawfully examine your clients, and their quarrels, without champarty and without procuring of any juries, or any inqueſt embracing. And that ye ſhall change no quarrel out of ill-nature, after your underſtanding. Alſo ye ſhall plead, nor ſuffer to be pleaded by your aſſent, no foreign releaſe, acquittance, payment, arbitration, plain account, whatſoever it be, to put the court out of its juriſdiction; nor none other matter; but it ſhall be ſuch as ye may find rightful and true by the information of your client, whoſe information and ſaying, upon your oath and conſcience, ye ſhall think to be true.

And ye ſhall not inform, nor inforce, any man to ſue falſely againſt any perſon, by falſe or forged action. Ready ye ſhall be at all times to come and attend at the warning of the ſaid mayor, and of the ſheriffs of the ſaid city, unleſs ye be letted about the buſineſs of the ſaid city, or for ſome reaſonable cauſe. The franchiſes, laws, and ordinances of this city, you ſhall keep, and due to be kept to your power: and that well and lawfully ye ſhall do all things that to the office of attorney pertaineth to do, as God help you."

To each of theſe courts likewiſe belong a ſecondary, a clerk of the papers, a prothonotary, and four clerks ſitters. The ſecondary's office is to allow and return all writs brought to remove cauſes out of the ſaid courts; the clerk of the papers files and copies all declarations upon actions; the prothonotary draws and engroſſes all declarations; the clerks, ſitters, enter actions and attachments, and take bail and verdicts. To each of the compters, or priſons belonging to theſe courts, appertain ſixteen ſerjeants at mace, with a yeoman to each, beſides inferior officers, and the priſon keeper.

In the ſheriffs court may be tried actions of debt, caſe, treſpaſs, covenant, and all perſonal actions, attachments and ſequeſtrations. And the uſual practice of this court is to enter your action at one of the compters; and any one of the ſerjeants may arreſt the defendant and bring him into cuſtody, which arreſt may be made without warrant or precept; and the ſerjeant need not declare his name, becauſe he is ſworn and known; but he ought to ſhew at whoſe ſuit the arreſt is made, for what, and of what return the proceſs is of, that the defendant may know how to make his defence. After a verdict obtained in the ſheriffs court, before the judgment is entered, the defendant may ſtop judgment by marking the cauſe before the Lord-mayor, for time to pay the money recovered. This is to be done by an attorney of the mayor's court; and if, upon hearing of a marked cauſe, it appears that the plaintiff had a verdict for more than his own juſt debt, his lordſhip may remit the cauſe to judgment for the juſt debt only, and allow ſuch time to pay the ſame as he ſhall think reaſonable, on ſecurity given. When an erroneous judgment is given in either of the ſheriffs courts of the city, the writ of error to reverſe this judgment, muſt be brought in the court of huſtings, before the Lord-mayor, for that is the ſuperior court.

The Court of Huſtings.

This is a court of record, and the ſupreme judicature of the city of London, and held weekly on Tueſdays: it was originally eſtabliſhed for the preſervation of the laws, franchiſes, and cuſtoms of the city, and there preſided as judges, the principal magiſtrates; as at preſent do the Lord-mayor and ſheriffs, who are aſſiſted by the recorder upon all cauſes of conſequence. In this court, two ſorts of cauſes are pleadable, viz. pleas of land, and common pleas, diſtinctly; for one week, pleas merely real are held, and the next, mixed actions are decided. Here deeds are inrolled, recoveries paſſed, writs of right, waſte, partition, dower and replevin determined.

The Court of Wardmote.

This court is denominated from the words ward and mote; that is, the ward court: for, in this city, pariſhes are as towns, and wards as hundreds, wherefore this court reſembles that of the leet in the county; for, as the latter derives its authority from the county court, ſo does the former from that of the Lord-mayor; as is manifeſt by the annual precept iſſued by the Lord-mayor to the ſeveral aldermen, for holding their reſpective motes or leets, for the election of proper officers in each ward, the tenor whereof is as follows:

"To the alderman of the ward of —

"We charge and command you, that, upon St. Thomas's day the apoſtle, next coming, you do hold your wardmote; and that you have afore us, at our general court of aldermen, to be holden the Monday next after the feaſt of Epiphany next coming, all the defaults that ſhall be preſented afore you by inqueſt in the ſaid wardmote; and the ſaid inqueſt ſhall have power and authority, by one whole year, to inquire into and preſent all ſuch defaults as ſhall be found within your ſaid ward, as oftentimes as ſhall be thought to you expedient and needful; which we will ſhall be once every month at leaſt.

2. "And if it happen any of your ſaid inqueſt do die, or depart out of your ſaid ward, within the ſaid year, that then, in place of him or them ſo dying, or departing out of your ſaid ward, you cauſe to be choſen one able perſon in his ſtead, to inquire and preſent with the other, in manner and form aboveſaid.

3. "And that, at the ſaid general court, you give afore us the names and ſurnames of all them of your ſaid ward that come not to your ſaid wardmote, if they be duly warned; ſo that due redreſs and puniſhment of them may be had, as the caſe ſhall require, according to the law.

4. "And that you provide that, at all times convenient, a ſufficient watch be kept; and that lanterns, with light by nightertail, in old manner accuſtomed, be hanged forth; and that no man go by nightertail without light, nor with vizard, on the peril that belongeth thereto.

5. "And alſo that you do cauſe to be choſen men of the moſt ſufficient, honeſt, and diſcreet men of your ſaid ward, to be, for your ſaid ward, of the common-council of this city for the year enſuing, according to the cuſtom in that behalf yearly uſed. And alſo that you do cauſe the ſaid men, ſo to be choſen to be of the common-council, to be ſworn before you, and in your preſence, according to the oath by them uſed and of old time accuſtomed.

6. "And that alſo, in the ſaid wardmote, you cauſe to be choſen certain other honeſt perſons to be conſtables and ſcavengers, and a common beadle, and a raker, to make clean the ſtreets and lanes of all your ſaid ward, according to the cuſtom yearly uſed in that behalf; which conſtables have, and ſhall have, full power and authority to diſtrain for the ſalary and quarterage of the ſaid beadle and raker, as oftentimes as it ſhall be behind, or unpaid.

7. "Alſo that you keep a roll of the names, ſurnames, dwelling-places, profeſſions and trades, of all perſons dwelling within your ward, and within what conſtables precinct they dwell; wherein the place is to be ſpecially noted by ſtreet, lane, alley, or ſign.

8. "Alſo that you cauſe every conſtable, from time to time, to certify unto you the name, ſurname, dwelling-place, profeſſion and trade, of every perſon who ſhall newly come to dwell within his precinct, whereby you may make and keep your your roll perfect; and that you cauſe every conſtable for his precinct, to that purpoſe, to make and keep a perfect roll in like manner.

9. " Alſo that you give ſpecial charge to every inholder, and other perſons within your ward, who ſhall receive any perſon to ſojourn in his houſe above two days, ſhall, before the third day after his coming thither, give knowledge to the conſtable of the precinct, where he ſhall be ſo received, of the name, ſurname, dwelling-place, profeſſion and trade of life, or place of ſervice, of ſuch perſon, and for what cauſe he ſhall come to reſide there; and that the ſaid conſtable give preſent notice thereof to you; and that the ſaid inholder lodge no ſuſpected perſon, or men or women of evil name.

10. " Alſo that you cauſe every conſtable within his precinct, once every month at the fartheſt, and oftener if need require, to make diligent ſearch and inquiry what perſons be newly come into his precinct to dwell, ſojourn or lodge; and that you give ſpecial charge, that no inholder or perſon ſhall reſiſt or deny any conſtables in making ſuch ſearch or inquiry; but ſhall do his beſt endeavour to aid and aſſiſt him therein.

11. " And for that, of late, there is more reſort to the city of perſons evil affected in religion and otherwiſe than in former times hath been; you ſhall diligently inquire if any man be received to dwell or abide within your ward that is not put under frank-pledge, as he ought to be by the cuſtom of the city; and whether any perſon hath continued in the ſaid ward by the ſpace of one year, being above the age of twelve years, and not ſworn to be faithful and loyal to the king's majeſty, in ſuch ſort as by the law and cuſtom of this city ought to be.

12. " To all theſe purpoſes the beadle of every ward ſhall employ his diligence, and give his beſt furtherance.

13. " Alſo you are to take order that there be provided and ſet up a pair of ſtocks, and a whipping-poſt, in ſome convenient place in every pariſh within your ward, for the puniſhment of vagrants and other offenders.

14. " Alſo that you have ſpecial regard that, from time to time, there be convenient proviſion for hooks, ladders, buckets, ſpouts, and engines, in meet places, within the ſeveral pariſhes of your ward, for avoiding the peril of fire.

15. " Alſo that the ſtreets and lanes of this city be, from time to time, kept clean before every church, houſe, ſhop, warehouſe, door, dead-wall, and in all other common-paſſages and ſtreets of the ſaid ward.

16. " And whereas, by divers acts of common-council, aforetime made and eſtabliſhed for the common-weal of this city, among other things, it is ordained and enacted as hereafter enſueth:

" That, from henceforth, no huckſter of ale or beer be within any ward of the city of London, but honeſt perſons of good name and fame, and ſo taken and admitted by the aldermen of the ward for the time being; and that the ſame huckſters do find ſufficient ſurety, afore the mayor and aldermen for the time being, to be of good guiding and rule; and that the ſame huckſters ſhall keep no bawdry, nor ſuffer no letchery, dice-playing, carding, or any other unlawful games, to be done, exerciſed, or uſed within their houſes; and to ſhut in their doors at nine of the clock in the night from Michaelmas to Eaſter, and from Eaſter to Michaelmas at ten of the clock in the night; and, after that hour, ſell no ale or beer. And if any huckſter of beer or ale after this act is publiſhed and proclaimed, ſell any ale or beer within any ward of the city of London, and be not admitted by the alderman of the ſame ward ſo to do, or find not ſufficient ſurety, as is above rehearſed, the ſame huckſter to have impriſonment, and make fine and ranſom for his contempt, after the diſcretion of the Lord-mayor and aldermen. And alſo that the ſaid huckſters ſuffer no manner of common eating or drinking within their cellars or vaults, contrary to the ordinance thereof ordained and provided, as in the ſaid act more plainly appeareth at large. We charge you that you put the ſame in due execution accordingly.

17. " And alſo that you ſee all tipplers, and other ſellers of ale or beer, as well privy oſteries as brewers and inholders within your ward, not ſelling by lawful meaſures, ſealed and marked with the city arms, or dagger, be preſented, and their names in your ſaid indentures be expreſſed, with their defaults; ſo that the chamberlain may be lawfully anſwered of their amerciaments.

18. " And alſo that you ſuffer no alien, or ſon of any born an alien, to be of the common-council; nor to exerciſe or uſe any other office within this city; nor receive nor accept any perſon your watch, privy or open, but Engliſhmen born; and if a ſtranger born out of this realm, made denizen by letters patents, or any other, after his courſe or lot, be appointed to any watch, that then ye command and compel him, or them, to find in his ſtead and place an Engliſhman to ſupply the ſame.

19. " And alſo that you cauſe an abſtract of the aſſize, appointed by act of parliament for billets and other fire wood, to be fair written in parchment, and to be fixed or hanged up in a table, in ſome fit and convenient place in the pariſh within your ward, where the common people may beſt ſee the ſame.

20. " And furthermore we charge and command you, that you cauſe ſuch proviſion to be had in your ſaid ward, that all the ſtreets and lanes within the ſaid ward be, from time to time, cleanſed, and clearly voided of ordure, dung, mire, rubbiſh, and other filthy things, whatſoever ſhall be the annoyance of the king's majeſty's ſubjects.

21. " And alſo that at all times, as you ſhall think neceſſary, you do cauſe ſearch to be made within your ſaid ward for all vagrant beggars, ſuſpicious and idle people, and ſuch as cannot ſhew how to live; and ſuch as ſhall be found within your ſaid ward, that you cauſe to be puniſhed and dealt with according to the laws and ſtatutes in ſuch caſe ordained and provided.

22. " And alſo we will and charge you, the ſaid alderman, that yourſelf certify and preſent before us, at the ſaid general court, to be holden the aforeſaid Monday next after the feaſt of the Ephiphany, all the names and ſurnames, truly written, written, of ſuch perſons being and dwelling within your ſaid ward, as to be able to paſs in any petty jury by themſelves; that is to ſay, every grand juryman to be worth in goods an hundred marks, and every petty juryman forty marks, according to an act in that caſe ordained and provided; and the ſame you ſhall indorſe on the back ſide of your indenture.

23. "Item, For divers reaſonable and urgent conſiderations us eſpecially moving, we ſtraightly charge and command you, on the king our ſovereign lord's behalf, that ye diligently provide and foreſee, that no manner of perſon or perſons, within your ſaid ward, what condition or degree ſoever he or they be of, keeping tavern or ale-houſe, ale-cellar, or any other victualling houſe, or place of common reſort to eat or drink in, within the ſame ward, permit or ſuffer, at any time hereafter, any common women of their bodies, or harlots, to reſort and come into their ſaid houſe, or other the places aforeſaid, to eat or drink, or otherwiſe to be converſant, or abide, or thither to haunt or frequent, upon pain of impriſonment as well of the tenant and keeper of every ſuch houſe or houſes, and all other the places aforeremembered, as of the common women and harlots.

24. "Alſo that you do give in charge to the wardmote inqueſt of your ward all the articles delivered to you herewith; and that you may have a ſpecial care of keeping the peace and good order during your wardmote; and if any offend herein, you may fine or puniſh them according to law.

25. "And whereas the monies received for the fines of perſons refuſing to hold ward-offices within your ward ought to be employed in the ſervice and for the public benefit of the whole ward, and not of any particular precinct or pariſh within the ward; theſe are therefore to require you to take care that all ſuch fines be, from time to time, diſpoſed of accordingly, for the benefit of the whole ward, as you, with the deputy and common-council-men of your ward, ſhall think moſt fitting and convenient; and that no ſuch fines be received or employed in any particular precinct or pariſh.

"Not failing hereof, as you tender the common-weal of this city and advancement of good juſtice, and as ye will anſwer to the contrary at your utmoſt peril.

Dated at under the ſeal-office of mayoralty of the ſaid city, in the year of the reign of our ſovereign lord George the Third, &c.

It appears by this precept, that the court of wardmote conſiſts of the alderman and the reſpective houſholders of his ward, by whom are annually elected the ſeveral officers peculiar to the ſame; among whom being thoſe of the inqueſt, they receive the aforeſaid inſtructions for their better regulation.

The Court of Requeſts; alſo called the Court of Conſcience.

This court was firſt inſtituted in the reign of Henry VIII. by an act of common-council, for the recovery of ſmall debts, under the value of forty ſhillings and has ſince been confirmed by ſeveral acts of parliament (ſee page 184. 211.) It is of great uſe to ſuch poor debtors as are not able to pay their debts immediately; and alſo of great benefit to ſuch poor perſons as have ſmall debts owing to them, and are unable to enter into a more expenſive ſuit.

The Lord-mayor and court of aldermen appoint monthly ſuch commoners to ſit as commiſſioners in this court as they think fit, and theſe, or any three of them, compoſe a court, kept in Guildhall every Wedneſday and Saturday, from eleven till two o'clock, to hear and determine ſuch cauſes as are brought before them. They have the power of adminiſtering an oath to the creditor, of examining witneſſes, and of making ſuch orders between the plaintiff and defendant, the creditor and debtor, as they think moſt agreeable to equity and conſcience; and if the debtor be unable to pay the whole ſum at once, they appoint it to be paid monthly in ſuch proportions as they judge to be in his power; but if he neglects paying monthly into court the ſmall ſums appointed, he may be ſerved with an execution, and carried to priſon; or if the perſon cannot be found, his goods may be ſeized.

In this court a cauſe may be brought and determined for the value of ten pence, viz. ſixpence for the plaint and ſummons, and four-pence for the order; but if the defendant does not appear the ſecond court day after the ſummons, an attachment may be awarded againſt him.

If any citizen ſhall be arreſted for a debt under forty ſhillings, this court will grant a ſummons for the plaintiff in the action, and if he does not appear on the firſt court day after the ſummons is left at his houſe, the court will grant an attachment againſt him, force him to take his debt, and pay the defendant his coſts; and if any attorney in London ſhall preſume to proceed in any ſuch ſuit, after notice to the contrary, or ſhall refuſe to obey the order of this court, upon complaint thereof to the court of aldermen, they will ſuſpend ſuch perſon from his practice.

The fees taken by the clerks of the Court of Conſcience are as follows:

For every plaint — —	0	2
For every appearance —	0	2
For every order — —	0	4
For every remittance to the common law	0	4
For every precept or warrant to commit to priſon — —	0	6
For every ſearch — —	0	2
For every ſatisfaction acknowledged on an order — —	0	6
For warning any perſon within the liberties	0	6
For ſerving any precept or warrant	0	6

Beſides the Court of Conſcience held at Guildhall for the city, there is one in Bedford-court, near Covent-garden; another in Fulwood's-rents, High-holbourn; another at St. Margarets-hill Southwark; and another in Whitechapel.

The

The Court of Conſervacy.

This court is yearly held eight times before the Lord-mayor, at ſuch places and times as his lordſhip ſhall think fit to appoint, within the reſpective counties of Middleſex, Eſſex, Kent, and Surry; in which ſeveral counties he has a power of ſummoning juries, who for the better preſervation of the fiſhery of the river Thames, and regulation of the fiſhermen that fiſh therein, are upon oath to make inquiſition of all offences committed in and upon the ſaid river, from Staines-bridge in the weſt to Yenfleta in the eaſt; and to preſent all perſons that are found guilty of a breach of the following ordinances:

That no perſon ſhall ſhoot any draw-net, &c. at any time of the year before ſun-riſing or after ſun ſetting; that no fiſherman ſhall ſtill-lie, or bend over any net during the time of the flood, whereby ſalmons, &c. may be hindered, and kept back from ſwimming upwards; that no fiſherman, or others, ſhall uſe any ſpear called an eel-ſpear, nor exerciſe any flue-trammel, double-walled net, or hooped net, to deſtroy the fry of fiſh; that no fiſherman uſe any mill-poſts, or other engines, with the heads againſt the ſtream; that no fiſherman ſhall rug for flounders between London-bridge and Weſtminſter, &c. but only two caſts at low water, and two caſts at high water; and that no flounder be taken under the ſize of ſix inches; that no fiſherman, or other, fiſh with or uſe any angle with more than two hooks upon a line, within the limits of London-bridge; that no Peter-men fiſh further weſtward than Richmond, to which place the water ebbs and flows; that no fiſherman keep two boys in one boat, unleſs one be at man's eſtate; nor take up any wreck or drift upon the water, without notice to the water-bailiff, &c. and all fiſherman ſhall be regiſtered, &c. under divers penalties and forfeitures.

Theſe orders are for regulating the fiſh weſtward, between London-bridge and Staines-bridge; and there are ſeveral orders for the government of the fiſhery eaſtward, between London-bridge and Yendale, touching unlawful taking of ſmelts, whitings, ſhads, fiſh out of ſeaſon, royal fiſh; ſuch as whales, ſturgeons, porpuſſes, &c. and preſerving the ſame, at the court of conſervacy of the river Thames.

By an order of the tenth of July, 1673, no perſon ſhall draw the ſhores in the river of Thames, ſave only for ſalmon, by perſons empowered, &c. and none ſhall fiſh with a net under ſix inches in the meaſh, on pain of 20l. and the water-bailiff hath power to authorize two honeſt fiſhermen in any town, &c. to be aſſiſtant to him in ſearching for and ſeizing unlawful nets, &c. no fiſherman, or other perſon, ſhall caſt any ſoil, gravel, or rubbiſh, in the Thames, whereby banks or ſhelves are raiſed, and the common paſſage hindered, nor drive any piles or ſtakes in the ſaid river, upon which the like danger may ariſe on the penalty of ten pounds.

And by ſtatue 27. Hen. 8. if any perſon ſhall procure any thing to be done to the annoyance of the Thames, in making of ſhelves, mining, digging, &c. or take away any boards or ſtakes, undermine banks, walls, &c. he ſhall forfeit five-pounds. ſee page 191.

And, for the more effectual preſervation of the navigation and fiſh in the river Thames, the Lord-mayor, as conſervator thereof has his aſſiſtant, or deputy, the water-bailiff; who, together with his ſubſtitutes, detect and bring to juſtice all ſuch perſons as ſhall preſume to deſtroy either the current, or the fiſh of the ſaid river.

Pie-Powder Court.

This is a court of record denominated pipoudres (vulgarly Pie-powder) and is incident to every fair, as a court-baron is to a manor. It is derived from pedas pulveriſati, and is ſo called from its expeditious proceedings in the deciſion of all controverſies that happen in fairs; becauſe for the encouragement of traders who frequent the ſame, juſtice is as quickly adminiſtered as duſt can fall from the feet.

This is held in Cloth-fair (during the time of Bartholomew-fair by the city of London, and Mr. ——, for hearing and deciding all differences committed againſt the tenor of the following proclamation, which is annually made before the Lord-mayor, on the eve of St. Bartholomew, for the better regulation of the ſaid fair.

"The right honourable———, Lord-mayor of the city of London, and his right worſhipful brethren the aldermen of the ſaid city, ſtraightly charge and command, on the behalf of our ſovereign lord the king, that all manner of perſons, of whatſoever eſtate, degree or condition they be, having recourſe to this fair, keep the peace of our ſovereign lord the king.

"That no perſon or perſons make any congregation, conventicles, or affrays, by which the ſame peace may be broke or diſturbed, upon pain of impriſonment, and fine to be made after the direction of the Lord-mayor and aldermen.

"Alſo, that all manner of ſellers of wine, ale, or beer, ſell by meaſures unſealed, as by gallon, pottle, quart, and pint, upon pain that will fall thereof.

"And that no perſon ſhall ſell any bread except it keep the aſſize; and that it be good and wholeſome for man's body, upon pain that will follow thereof.

"And that no manner of cooke, pie-baker, nor huckſter, ſell or put to ſale any manner of victual, except it be good and wholeſome for man's body, upon pain that will fall thereof.

"And that no manner of perſon buy, nor ſell, but with true weights and meaſures, ſealed according to the ſtatute in that behalf made, upon pain that will fall thereof.

"And that no perſon or perſons take upon him or them, within this fair, to make any manner of arreſt, attachment, ſummons, or execution; except it be done by the officers of this city thereunto aſſigned, upon pain that will befal thereof.

"And that no perſon or perſons whatſoever, within the limits or bounds of this fair, preſume to break the Lord's day, in ſelling, ſhewing, or offering offering to ſale, or in buying or offering to buy, any commodities whatſoever; or in ſitting, tippling, or drinking, in any tavern, inn, ale houſe, tippling-houſe, or cook's-houſe, or in doing any other thing that may tend to the breach thereof, upon the pains and penalties contained in ſeveral acts of parliament, which will be ſeverely inflicted upon the breakers thereof.

"And finally, that what perſons ſoever find themſelves grieved, injured, or wronged by any manner of perſon in this fair, that they come with their plaints before the ſtewards in this fair, aſſigned to hear and determine pleas; and they will miniſter to all parties juſtice according to the laws of the land and cuſtoms of this city."

The Chamberlain's Court.

This is an office kept in Guildhall, in a room on the right hand ſide of the paſſage leading into the court of King's-bench, where the chamberlain attends every morning to decide the differences that ariſe between maſters and apprentices, to enroll and turn over the latter, and to admit all who are duly qualified, to the freedom of the city; of whom there are annually admitted about fifteen hundred.

The Court of Hallmote.

This court is denominated from the place wherein it is kept, and belongs to the ſeveral companies of citizens, by whom it is occaſionally held in their reſpective halls, and wherein, the affairs belonging to each of the ſaid corporations are reſpectively tranſacted.

St. Martin's-le-Grand Court.

This court, though within the city, is yet without its juriſdiction, as being in, and belonging to the liberty of that name, which is ſubject to the dean and chapter of Weſtminſter. It is a court of record, held weekly on Wedneſdays, for the trial of all perſonal actions whatſoever, the principal whereof is a capias againſt the body, or an attachment againſt the goods; ſo that a man's goods may be ſeized upon in his own houſe, upon the firſt proceſs, if his perſon is not ſecured before; which is according to the practice of all ancient liberties or franchiſes.

The Court of the Tower of London.

This is a court of record held by preſcription within the verge of the city, on Great Tower-hill, by a ſteward appointed by the conſtable of the Tower of London, by whom are tried actions of debt (for any ſum) damage and treſpaſs.

Juſtice-hall Court.

This court is held eight times a year by the king's commiſſion of oyer and terminer, for the trial of criminals for crimes committed within the city of London and county of Middleſex. The judges are, the Lord-mayor, the aldermen paſt the chair, and the recorder, who, on all ſuch occaſions, are attended by both the ſheriffs, and by one or more of the national judges. The offences in the city are tried by a jury of citizens, and thoſe committed in the county by a Middleſex jury. The crimes tried in this court are high and petty treaſon, murder felony, forgery, petty larceny, burglary, cheating, libelling, the uſing of falſe weights and meaſures, &c. the penalties incurred by which are the loſs of life, corporal puniſhment, tranſportation, amerciaments, &c.

The Coroner's Court.

The Lord-mayor being perpetual coroner of the city, this court is held before him or his deputy; the buſineſs of which has been explained in deſcribing the office of coroner.

The Court of Orphans.

This court is occaſionally held at Guildhall, by the Lord-mayor and aldermen, who are guardians to the children of freemen under the age of twenone years at the deceaſe of their fathers, and take upon them not only the management of their goods and chattels, but likewiſe that of their perſons, by placing them under the care of tutors, to prevent diſpoſing of themſelves during their minority, without their approbation.

By this court the common ſerjeant is authorized to take exact accounts and inventories of all the deceaſed freemens eſtates; and the youngeſt attorney of the Lord-mayor's court being clerk to that of the orphans, is appointed to take ſecurities for their ſeveral portions in the name of the chamberlain of London, who is a corporation of himſelf for the ſervice of the ſaid orphans; and to whom a recognizance or bond, made upon the account of an orphan, ſhall by the cuſtom of London, deſcend to his ſucceſſor.

It is likewiſe to be obſerved, that when a freeman of London dies and leaves children in their minority, the clerks of the ſeveral pariſhes are, according to a law of the city, to give in their names to the common crier, who is immediately to ſummon the widow, or executor, to appear before the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, to bring an inventory of, and ſecurity for the teſtator's eſtate; for which two months time is commonly allowed: and, in caſe of non-appearance, or refuſal of ſecurity, the Lord-mayor may commit the contumacious executor to Newgate.

The Court of Eſcheator.

The Lord-mayor of London being perpetual eſcheator within the city, the court is held before him or his deputy, to whom all original writs of Diem clauſit extremum, Mandamus Devenerunt, Melius inquirend', &c. are directed to find an office for the king, after the death of his tenant who held by knight's ſervice. The eſcheator may alſo find an office for treaſon, felony, &c.

The Court of Common-Council.

This court conſiſts of the Lord-mayor, aldermen and repreſentatives of the ſeveral wards; and and being the city legiſlature, make bye-laws for the good government thereof. They aſſemble in Guildhall as often as the Lord-mayor by his ſummons thinks proper to convene them: they annually ſelect from among themſelves a committee of ſix aldermen and twelve commoners for letting the city lands, to which end they generally meet at Guildhall on Wedneſdays. They likewiſe appoint another committee of four aldermen and eight commoners, for tranſacting the affairs belonging to the benefactions of Sir Thomas Greſham, who generally meet at Mercer's-hall at the appointment of the Lord mayor, who is always one of the number. They alſo, by virtue of a royal grant, yearly appoint a governor, deputy and aſſiſtants, for managing the civil lands in Ireland. They have alſo a right of diſpoſing of the offices of town-clerk, common-ſerjeant, judges of the ſheriffs court, common crier, coroner, bailiff of the Borough of Southwark, and city garbler.

Having thus gone through the juriſdiction and government of this great metropolis, we ſhall now proceed to ſurvey the reſpective wards into which the city of London is divided.

CHAPTER III.

Of the antiquity of wards. Deſcription of Alderſgate Ward, with an account of its bounds, ſtreets, churches, halls, and all other public buildings.

THE firſt intelligence we have of the number of wards in this city is in the year 1284, at which time there appeared to be twenty-four; and in the year 1393, the great ward of Farringdon being very much increaſed both in number of houſes and inhabitants, it was, by parliament, divided into the inward and outward wards, by which the number was increaſed to twenty-five. And in the year 1550 the citizens having purchaſed of king Edward VI. the Borough of Southwark, with divers privileges thereunto belonging, they formed the ſame into another ward, which made twenty-ſix; but the power granted them by charter not proving ſufficient to ſupport their title thereto, by excluding the juſtices of peace for the county of Surry from interfering in the government thereof, it is only therefore a nominal ward, and is of no other uſe then adding a farther dignity to the ſenior alderman, who is called Father of the city.

Theſe wards, being twenty-ſix in number, and which contain the whole city and liberty of London, we ſhall deſcribe in alphabetical order, beginning with

ALDERSGATE WARD.

This ward took its origin from a city gate, which lately ſtood near St. Botolph's church: it is divided in two parts, viz. Alderſgate within, and Alderſgate without; each of which conſiſt of four precincts, under one alderman, eight common-council-men (two of whom are the alderman's deputies) eight conſtables, fourteen inqueſt men, eight ſcavengers and a beadle; excluſive of the officers belonging to St. Martin's le Grand. The jurymen returned by the wardmote inqueſt ſerve in the ſeveral courts in Guildhall in the month of Auguſt.

The north extremity of this ward terminates in Pickax-ſtreet, and other parts without the freedom: on the eaſt it is bounded by Cripplegate ward; on the weſt by Farringdon ward within and without; and on the ſouth by Farringdon ward within. Its principal ſtreets are Alderſgate-ſtreet, Pickax-ſtreet, Jewin-ſtreet, Noble-ſtreet, Long lane, Little-Britain, Staining-lane, Maiden-lane, and Foſter-lane.

Alderſgate-ſtreet, which is very ſpacious and long, runs northward to the end of Barbican on the eaſt ſide, and Long-lane on the weſt.

About the middle of this ſtreet formerly ſtood London-Houſe, ſo called from its being the palace of the biſhops of that ſee. It was a large commodious brick building, with a neat chapel belonging to it; but being deſerted by the prelates, was at laſt let out into ſeveral tenements and warehouſes. This ancient edifice was lately conſumed by fire, ſince which new buildings have been erected in its ſtead.

Nearly oppoſite to this ſtands Shafteſbury-houſe, now called

The London Lying-in Hoſpital.

This edifice is built with brick and ornamented with ſtone, in a moſt noble and elegant taſte. The front to the ſtreet is adorned with Ionic pilaſters. The door which is arched, and has a balcony ſupported by ſcrolls, opens into a ſmall area encompaſſed with buildings, within which are accommodations for the patients. It was built by the maſterly hand of Inigo Jones, and was formerly the reſidence of the earls of Shaftesbury; but being deſerted by its polite inhabitants, it was alſo let out for ſeveral mechanical uſes, and would have entirely run away to decay, had it not been for the pious founders and promoters of this noble charity; by which every neceſſary, accommodation and aſſiſtance are furniſhed for married women in the laſt ſtate of their pregnancy, time of labour, and month of lying-in.

This excellent charity was inſtituted on the thirtieth of March 1750, by ſeveral generous and humane perſons; and has met with great encouragement from both ſexes; but ſo many diſtreſſed objects daily preſent themſelves, that its income, ſupported only by voluntary contributions, tions, is not equal to its wants; wherefore the governors find it ſtill neceſſary to apply for the aſſiſtance of the public, to whom the following conditions are offered:

1. Such perſons as ſubſcribe thirty guineas are governors for life, and may recommend one pregnant woman to be upon the books at a time.

2. Thoſe who ſubſcribe five guineas per annum, are governors ſo long as they continue their ſubſcriptions, and entitled to recommend as in the former article.

3. Annual governors may make up their ſubſcriptions thirty guineas, within one year from the laſt payment, and thereupon become governors for life.

4. Ladies and gentlemen are at liberty, in all elections of officers, to vote by proxy, ſignified in writing.

N. B. All leſſer benefactions are thankfully received. And for the ſatisfaction of the public, that the women are well and properly taken care of, ladies, though not governeſſes, are permitted to go into the wards.

Rules of the hoſpital.

A general court of the governors is held four times a year; namely, in the months of March, June, September and December, to receive the report of the quarterly committees, elect a new committee, and tranſact ſuch other buſineſs as may then be laid before them.

Houſe committee.

A houſe committee is appointed at every general quarterly court, conſiſting of twelve governors; three of whom are a quorum. This committee meets every Wedneſday morning at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, at the ſaid hoſpital to receive and diſcharge patients, inſpect the diet and proviſions, order any furniture and conveniences that may from time to time be wanted, and examine into and regulate the conduct of all the ſervants and patients of the houſe. Theſe committees are to make their reports to the general quarterly courts.

The number of Beds at preſent in this Hoſpital is 40.

Servants.

A matron, who is a midwife, conſtantly reſides in the hoſpital, and acts as ſuch in all natural and eaſy labours.

A ſufficient number of nurſes and ſervants to take care of the patients, and the common buſineſs of the houſe.

Alſo a beadle, who conſtantly reſides at the hoſpital, to be ready to go on all meſſages on ſudden emergencies, and ſummon the governors, &c.

Note, the ſervants of the houſe are forbid to take any fee or reward from the patients, on any pretence whatſoever, on pain of being diſcharged.

Qualification for admiſſion.

Married women admitted into this hoſpital, muſt previouſly produce a certificate of their marriage from a lawful miniſter, or in caſe they cannot, then an affidavit of their being married, and the time when and place where, and alſo the ſettlement of the huſbands, and by what means ſuch ſettlement was gained. And no woman is to be taken into the houſe, who hath any contagious diſtemper.

The preſent ſtate of the hoſpital, together with the number of patients which have been delivered, ſince its firſt inſtitution, is as follows:

A little to the ſouth of London-houſe formerly ſtood the fine manſion of the earls of Weſtmoreland; but this, like the two former, being deſerted by its inhabitants, was afterwards let out in tenements and to mechanic uſes; and at length became ſo decayed, that the whole of the remains have been entirely taken down, and new buildings are now erecting in their ſtead.

At the ſouth-weſt corner of this ſtreet, where Little-Britain ends in the eaſt, ſtands the pariſh church of St. BOTOLPH, ALDERSGATE.

This church is ſo denominated from its dedication to St. Botolph, a Saxon Monk, and its vicinity to one of the city gates. It eſcaped the fire of London in the year 1666, but afterwards grew ſo ruinous, that, except the roof, it was entirely rebuilt. The building is a plain brick edifice, with a Tower ſupported on a kind of arch-work, and crowned with an open turret and its fane. It was anciently a rectory, but is at preſent a curacy in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Weſtminſter-abbey; and is ſubject to the biſhop and archdeacon of London, to whom it pays procuration.

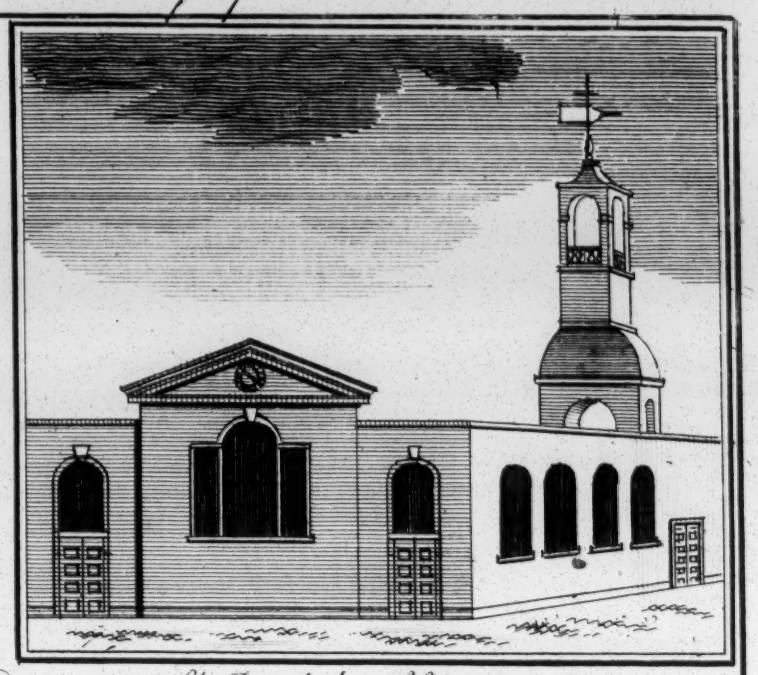
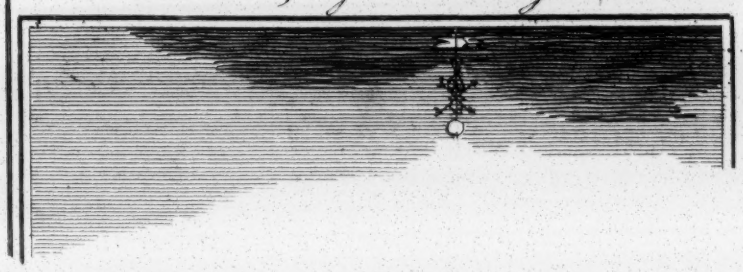
St. Annes & Agnes Aldersgate.



St. Botolph's Aldersgate.



Nearly oppoſite to this church is

COOK's HALL.

Which takes its name from the company of cooks, incorporated by Edward IV. in the year 1480, and is more to be admired for its convenience than elegance in building. This company have two maſters, two wardens and twenty-five aſſiſtants, and are entitled to the livery of the city; but, in conformity to their charter, every member of the company muſt be preſented to the Lord-mayor before he is admitted into the freedom.

On the north ſide of St. Anne's-lane, within Alderſgate is the pariſh church of St. ANNE.

This church owes its name to its dedication to St. Anne, the mother of the Virgin Mary. The old church was entirely burnt down in the fire of London, and the preſent was raiſed in its place about three years after. It is a very plain edifice: the body is enlightened by a few large windows, caſed with ruſtic; the Tower, which is very plain, is alſo ſtrengthened at the corners with ruſtic, and from its top riſes a turret and ſpire. The advowſon of this church was given by queen Mary to the biſhop of London, in whoſe gift it continues: and the pariſh of St. John Zachary, whoſe church was burnt down in the year 1666, not being rebuilt, is now annexed unto it. Theſe joined together have made the living worth 140l. per annum: and St. John Zachary's being in the gift of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, the biſhop and the dean and chapter alternately preſent to this united living. It is a rectory, and ſubject to the archdeacon.

The ſite and church-yard of the aboliſhed church of St. John Zachary, whoſe pariſh is united to St. Anne's, is ſituate at the corner of Maiden-lane, in Foſter-lane; adjoining to which there formerly ſtood the ſtately houſe of Sir Richard Kennet, on whoſe ruins is raiſed a handſome modern building for the

This office was erected by a conſiderable number of perſons, who mutually agreeing to inſure each others goods and merchandize from loſs by fire by an amicable contribution, entered into a deed of ſettlement for that purpoſe, on the 16th of February 1714-15, and had it enrolled in chancery on the third of July following; and this deed being ſigned by all perſons deſirous of becoming members, they are thereby admitted to an equal ſhare in the profit and loſs, in proportion to their reſpective policies. They inſure for all merchants, traders, houſe-keepers, and others in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and within ten miles round, merchandize, goods, wares, untenſils in trade, houſhold furniture, and wearing apparel; except plate, pictures, glaſs and china ware not in trade; ready money, jewels, books of account, tallies, writings, barns, ricks, and ſtacks of corn, hay, ſtraw and horſes. The term of inſurance is ſeven years, or leſs if required.

The affairs of this office are under the management of twenty-four directors, elected by a majority of the members out of their own body, by ballot, at a general meeting in the month of September; at which time the eldeſt eight of the twenty-four go out, and eight others are elected in their ſtead in a way of conſtant rotation. Theſe appoint all the other officers, and meet every Wedneſday in the afternoon, between the hours of three and ſeven, to diſpatch buſineſs; and in March to aſcertain the dividends and contributions for the preceding year. The directors alſo chuſe out of their own body, by ballot, a treaſurer, and two aſſiſtant treaſurers; alſo ſix truſtees, three of whom ſign all policies; and five auditors to paſs and examine the accounts.

There are alſo porters, watermen, &c. provided by the office, who are commonly called firemen, becauſe it is their duty to attend all fires, and to aſſiſt in putting out the ſame, and moving of goods; and theſe men are diſtinguiſhed by the livery and badge of the ſociety.

At the north-eaſt angle of Foſter-lane ſtands

GOLDSMITHS-HALL.

This ſpacious building ſupplies the place of one which was originally built by Drew Berentin, about the year 1407, but was deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666. It is an irregular ſtructure built with brick, and the corners wrought in ruſtic of ſtone. The door is large, arched, and decorated with doric columns, which ſupport a pediment of the arched kind, but open for a ſhield, in which are the arms of the company. The hall room is ſpacious, and both that and the other rooms well enlightened. In the hall are ſeveral good pictures, particularly thoſe of Sir Martin Bowers, and Sir Hugh Middleton, both of this company, and great benefactors to it.

The company of Goldſmiths appears to be of great antiquity; for in the reign of Henry II. in the year 1180, it was, among other guilds, fined for being adultering, that is, ſetting up without the king's ſpecial licence. But at length, in 1327, Edward III. in conſideration of the ſum of ten marks, incorporated this company by letters patent, and granted them the privilege of purchaſing an eſtate of twenty pounds per annum in mortmain, for the ſupport of their valetudinary members, which, in the year 1394, was confirmed by Richard II. for the ſum of twenty marks. Theſe grants were afterwards confirmed by Edward IV. in the year 1462, who alſo conſtituted this ſociety a body politic and corporate, to have a perpetual ſucceſſion, and a common ſeal. By the ſaid grant they had likewiſe the privilege of inſpecting, trying, and regulating all gold and ſilver wares, not only in this city, but in all other parts of the kingdom; with the power of puniſhing all offenders concerned in working adulterated gold and ſilver; and the power of making bye-laws for their better government.

This fraternity is governed by a prime warden, three other wardens, and a numerous court of aſſiſtants.

At the eaſt end of Staining-lane is the ſite and church-yard of St. Mary Staining's pariſh-church, burnt down in 1666, which pariſh is ſince united with St. Michael's, in Wood-ſtreet.

Towards the north end of Noble-ſtreet ſtands a ſpacious hall originally built by the Scriveners, an ancient fraternity, denominated "The wri-"ters of the court letter of the city of London;" but not incorporated till the year 1616, when king James I. granted them his letters patent by the name and ſtyle of "The maſter, wardens, "and aſſiſtants of the ſociety of writers of the "city of London." This company is governed by a maſter, two wardens, and twenty-four aſſiſtants; and enjoy the livery: but being reduced to low circumſtances, they ſold their hall to the company of Coach-makers, from whom it takes its preſent name of

COACH-MAKERS HALL.

This company was incorporated in the year 1677 by the name and ſtyle of "The maſter, "wardens, aſſiſtants, and commonalty, of the "company of coach and coach-harneſs makers of "London." It is a livery company, and is governed by a maſter, three wardens, and twenty-three aſſiſtants. The company, however, cannot be in much better circumſtances than their predeceſſors, the hall being at this time let out as an auction room, and for other very trifling purpoſes.

At the north eaſt corner of Noble-ſtreet is ſituate the church-yard of St. Olave's, Silver-ſtreet; this church was burnt down in 1666, and the pariſh was afterwards united to St. Alban's-church in Wood ſtreet.

Barbican is a large ſtreet which comes out of the upper end of Alderſgate-ſtreet, and runs up to Redcroſs-ſtreet; on the north ſide of which is Bridgewater-ſquare, the ſite where once ſtood a large houſe fronting Barbican, and the garden of the earl of Bridgewater. It is a ſmall and neat quadrangle, covered with plain, but handſome and convenient houſes, with a graſs plat and gravel walks, ſhaded with trees and ſurrounded with iron rails.

Carthuſian-ſtreet takes its name from the Charter-houſe, which, before the reformation, was a convent of Cathuſian Monks.

In Little-Britain, anciently called Britain ſtreet, was once the city manſion of the duke of Bretagne, near to the church of St. Botolph; but this has for ſeveral ages paſt been erazed, and the ſite alienated to private property.

At the ſouth eaſt corner of the ſame ſtreet, and near the ſpot where the ſouth part of St. Bartholomew's hoſpital now ſtands, was formerly Peterborough-houſe, a palace belonging to the earls of that title. And almoſt the whole eaſt ſide of Little-Britain was adorned with a ſuperb palace, the ancient reſidence of the lord Mountague.

Near the north eaſt corner of Little-Britain, in Alderſgate ſtreet, formerly ſtood an hoſpital, hall, or priory belonging to the abbey of Cluny in France; which, among other alien foundations, being ſuppreſſed by king Henry V. his majeſty granted its revenues to the pariſhioners of St. Botolph, on condition that they ſhould found in their church a fraternity or altar dedicated to the Holy Trinity. The ſite of this ancient religious houſe remains ſtill, by the name of Trinity-hall, and ſeveral tenements in Trinity-lane, in the poſſeſſion of the pariſh; and part of the building now remains. The lower part is let out for a coffee-houſe, (called Alderſgate coffee-houſe) but the upper room retains ſomething of the appearance of its original uſe, and is uſed as a place of worſhip for a congregation of Non-jurors. This room is likewiſe uſed by the pariſhioners who meet in veſtry on particular occaſions.

We come now to the liberty of St. Martin's-le-Grand, which comprehends no more than that part of the ſtreet which runs from Blowbladder-ſtreet, on the ſouth, to Bell-court near St. Anne's-lane on the eaſt ſide: the remaining part of St. Martin's-le-Grand-ſtreet being in the freedom of the city.

This liberty was an eccleſiaſtical foundation. It takes its name originally from a Collegiate church founded by Ingalricus and his brother Edward, in the year 1056, for a dean and ſecular canons or prieſts, and dedicated to St. Martin, with the addition of Le Grand, from the great or extraordinary privileges of ſanctuary, &c. granted by divers monarchs thereto.

The charter granted by William the conqueror, concerning the ancient privileges of St. Martin's-le-Grand, concludes with this remarkable clauſe, "that whoſoever ſhall preſume to alter any thing "hereby granted, let him periſh with Judas the "traitor."

This charter was confirmed by king Henry III. who granted the dean of the monaſtery and church more ample privileges. And it was again confirmed by Edward III. with an additional privilege, that no inhabitant within this juriſdiction ſhould be ſued out of their own court, except before the king or his chief juſtice.

King Henry III, Edward I, and king Henry VI. confirmed the foregoing charters; but this laſt mentioned king eſtabliſhed certain articles concerning its ſanctuary, in caſes of debt, felony, and treaſon; by which articles or regulations it appears that St. Martin's was at that time a ſanctuary for great diſorders, and a ſhelter for the looſeſt ſort of people, ſuch as rogues, ruffians, thieves, felons, and murderers; and that every exceſs of vice and irreligion, fraud, oppreſſion, and breach of the laws, were exerciſed within its liberty.

By the charter of king Edward III. it was ordained that all inquiſitions to be taken by the juſtices, and other the miniſters of the men of the city of London, ſhould be taken at Great St. Martin's in London, and not elſewhere; except inquiſitions to be taken in circuits in the Tower of London, and for the jail delivery of Newgate. But king Henry VIII. in the year 1519, revoked that charter, and removed the ſeſſions of the peace from St. Martin's to Guildhall. See page 185.

To ſo great a height of licentiouſneſs was this ſanctuary grown, that in the reign of Henry VII. the ſheriffs of London venturing to take from thence by violence a perſon who had taken ſhelter there, the abbot of Weſtminſter (to whom the deanery, with its ſanctuary and privileges had been been granted) exhibited a bill to the king againſt them, upon which the cauſe was heard in the ſtar-chamber, and the ſheriff ſeverely fined.

The church of St. Martin's-le-Grand was anciently in the donation of the king, as appears by an inquiſition taken at the Tower in the reign of king Edward II. And in this church there was a curfeu bell, at whoſe ſound all perſons were obliged to repair home, or, at leaſt, not to wander in the ſtreets.

In the year 1585 a great number of foreign tradeſmen and artificers planted themſelves on this ſpot; among whom were John James and Anthony Emerick, ſubjects of Philip, king of Spain, and who were ſaid to have been the firſt ſilk-twiſters, or ſilk-throwers, in London, and to have brought that trade into England.

Though this place is in a manner in the heart of the city, it is ſtill in the liberty of Weſtminſter; and the inhabitants are governed and vote accordingly. The courts and alleys are now chiefly inhabited by Taylors and others who are not free of the city; for all foreigners carry on their trades and profeſſions there without moleſtation.

As St. Martin's-le-Grand is a liberty diſtinct from the government of London, and ſubject to the deanery of Weſtminſter, it has a court of record kept every Wedneſday, for the trial of all perſonal actions of what nature ſoever. In this court the leading proceſs is a capias againſt the body, or an attachment againſt the goods; ſo that a man's goods may be ſeized in his own houſe, upon the firſt proceſs, if he himſelf be not taken.

CHAPTER IV.

Of ALDGATE WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from the eaſt gate of the city, called Aldgate, or anciently Ealdgate. It is bounded on the eaſt by Portſoken ward; on the ſouth by Tower-ſtreet ward; and on the weſt and north, by the wards of Langbourn, Lime-ſtreet and Biſhopſgate. It extends from the place where Aldgate ſtood, to Lime-ſtreet corner in Leadenhall-ſtreet, and takes in all the ſtreets and lanes on the one hand to Bevis Marks and Shoemaker-row; and on the other to Ironmongers-hall in Fenchurch-ſtreet.

The principal ſtreets which this ward contains are, High-ſtreet, Leadenhall-ſtreet, as far as Lime-ſtreet: Fenchurch-ſtreet, as far as Fiſhmonger's-alley incluſive: Poor Jewry-lane and Crutched-friars, as far as Seething-lane: Shoemaker-row and Bevis Marks, to Camomile-ſtreet: St. Mary Axe and Lime-ſtreet, as far as Cullum-ſtreet. The ward is governed by an alderman, ſix common-council-men, ſix conſtables, twenty inqueſt men, ſeven ſcavengers, and a beadle.

Aldgate High-ſtreet, which is the principal, begins where Aldgate formerly ſtood, and reaches weſtward as far as the ſtone pump between Leadenhall-ſtreet and Fenchurch-ſtreet; from whence, cloſe to the North-eaſt corner, branches out Shoemaker-row, and thence, more to the north, runs Bevis marks; near the ſouth-eaſt corner, between Heneage-lane and Bury-ſtreet, ſtands the Portugueſe Jews ſynagogue, an handſome, large and commodious brick building, which is ſupported and frequented only by the ſect of the Phariſees; and in Little Bury-ſtreet is an independent meeting. The names of Bevis, Bury, and Heneage, are derived from a manſion-houſe, which anciently ſtood upon, and, with courts and gardens, took up the whole ſite of Heneage and Bury-ſtreet, and belonged to the abbots of Bury in Suffolk: from whence the ſtreet in which it ſtood was called Buries-marks. And after the diſſolution of the abbey of Bury, this manſion being granted to Sir Thomas Heneage, it was pulled down, and two ſtreets were built upon the ſite thereof, called Bury-ſtreet and Heneage-ſtreet.

Cloſe to the ſpot where Aldgate ſtood, on the ſouth ſide of High-ſtreet, runs poor Jerwy-lane, on the eaſt ſide whereof the old houſes have been lately pulled down, and handſome ones built in their ſtead; in which alſo is a preſbyterian meeting-houſe. And at the north weſt corner of Crutched-friars* is a large pile of warehouſes built by the Eaſt India company, which open a way quite from Crutched-friars to Fenchurch-ſtreet; oppoſite to which is a fine ſpacious ſtreet with new buildings, that leads into the Minories. Adjoining to this new ſtreet is Gold-ſquare and Woodroof-lane, which leads to Tower-hill.

On the weſt ſide of Shoemaker-row is the ſynagogue of the Dutch Jews, as they are commonly called, with whom the Jews from all the northern parts communicate, who are a diſtinct ſect from the Portugueſe, Spaniſh, Italian, &c. This ſynagogue has been lately enlarged by an addition of building in brick, which has ap-

* This ſtreet took its name from a monaſtery of the Holy Croſs, at the ſouth-eaſt corner of Hart-ſtreet, near Tower-hill. This monaſtery was founded about the year 1298, and continued till the ſuppreſſion of the other religious houſes. In the reign of Henry VIII. a prior of this houſe being found in bed with a whore in the day-time, by the viſitors appointed by the lord Cromwell, he diſtributed thirty pounds among them, and promiſed them as much more; an account of which being ſent by the viſitors to Cromwell, theſe ſcandalous crimes haſtened the diſſolution of monaſteries. The ruins of this religious houſe have been entirely erazed for a conſiderable time paſt, and nothing of it remains but the name, which is given to the ſtreet, that is more commonly called Crutched-friars than Hart ſtreet. In the place where the monaſtery ſtood is now erected the Navy-office, and many other handſome buildings.

proached ſo near to the church of St. James's, Duke's-place, that the congregation may be heard from each other.

The ward of Aldgate terminates at about two thirds on the eaſt ſide of Woodroff-lane: and on the weſt it takes in both that and River-ſtreet, Colcheſter-ſtreet, and Draper's-Alley; in the latter of which are fourteen houſes called Milbourn's Almshouses.

Theſe were founded and left in truſt to the Draper's company, by Sir John Milbourn, Lord-mayor of London, for thirteen poor houſeholders, either married or unmarried, free of the Draper's company, old men and their wives, with an appointment of ſeven-pence per week each: and in caſe there ſhould not be found ſo many poor houſholders in the Draper's company, as would receive the ſaid alms, then there ſhould be named, to ſupply the ſame number of alms-men, other houſholders of the pariſh of St. Edmund, in Lombard-ſtreet, and St. Bartholomew the Little, to receive the ſaid alms. It was likewiſe directed and provided by the ſaid founder, that theſe poor people to be elected ſhould be of ſober and honeſt converſation, and not detected of any open crime; and that after their admiſſion they ſhould be reſident and abiding upon the ſame, and not to keep any common ſelling of ale, beer or wine, or any thing concerning tippling, or any petty oiſtrey; with an obligation alſo that the ſaid alms men ſhould daily come into the church of the Croſſed Friars, place themſelves near the founder's tomb, and abide and continue there till ſervice was ended. Over the gate of theſe houſes, towards the ſtreet is the figure of the aſſumption of the Virgin Mary, ſupported by ſix angels in a cloud of glory, with this inſcription: "Ad laudem dei et glorioſæ virginis Maria, hoc "opus erexit donus Johannes Milbourn, miles et "alderman hujus civitatis, A. D. 1535." In Engliſh thus: "To the praiſe of God, and the "glory of the Virgin, this edifice was erected "by John Milbourn, mayor of this city, in the "year 1535." The appointment for the poor of theſe houſes was augmented by Sir Richard Champion, with the addition of nineteen pounds fourteen ſhillings per annum more. And the Drapers company have not only increaſed the number of penſioners to fifteen, but have doubled their penſions, with a load of coals, and twenty or more ſhillings annually, out of the money left to be diſtributed by that company at diſcretion.

At the extremity of this ward, in Crutched-friars, is ſituate

The NAVY OFFICE.

Here all affairs relating to the royal navy are managed by the commiſſioners under the lords of the admiralty. Though the plainneſs of the building gives us no idea of its importance, yet it muſt be allowed the merit of being very convenient. The office where the commiſſioners meet, and the clerks keep their books, is detached from the reſt, as a precaution againſt accidents by fire, the papers here being of the utmoſt importance; and in the other buildings ſome of the commiſſioners and other officers reſide.

The treaſurer of the navy is an officer of great truſt, as he receives and pays all ſums for the uſe of the navy: his ſalary is 2000l. per annum, and 800l. for his inſtruments.

Here are likewiſe ſeven commiſſioners, who have their different departments in the management of the buſineſs of the office, and a ſalary of 500l. per annum each.

One is comptroller of the navy: he attends and comptrols all payments of wages; is obliged to know the market price of all ſtores belonging to ſhipping, and to examine and audit all the treaſurers, victuallers, and ſtore-keepers accounts.

Two others are joint-ſurveyors of the navy; and their buſineſs is to know the ſtate of all ſtores, and to ſee the wants ſupplied; to ſurvey the hulls, maſts and yards, and to eſtimate the value of repairs by indenture, to charge all boatſwains and carpenters of the navy with what ſtores they have received; and at the end of each voyage to ſtate and audit their accounts.

The fourth is clerk of the acts. It is his office to record all orders, contracts, bills, warrants, and other buſineſs tranſacted by the principal officers and commiſſioners of the navy.

The fifth is comptroller of the treaſurers accounts.

The ſixth is comptroller of the victualling accounts.

And the ſeventh is comptroller of the ſtore-keeper's accounts.

There are alſo three extra commiſſioners, who have 500l. per annum, and 80l. each for houſe rent.

Beſides theſe there are alſo a commiſſioner reſiding at Gibraltar, who has 1000l. a year, and ſeveral officers who have conſiderable under him. A commiſſioner reſident at Chatham yard, at Portſmouth yard, and at Plymouth yard, who have 500l. a year; but Deptford and Woolwich yards are under the immediate inſpection of the navy board; as Sheerneſs yard is under the inſpection of the commiſſioner at Chatham. The principal of theſe officers hold their places by patent under the great ſeal.

On the north ſide from Aldgate formerly ſtood the priory of Holy Trinity, founded by queen Maud, wife to king Henry I. in the year 1108, for canons regular of the order of St. Auguſtin, with great endowments; amongſt which the ſaid king granted the port of Aldgate, and the ſoke thereunto belonging, &c. And, in order to eſtabliſh this foundation, the four pariſhes of St. Mary Magdalen, St. Michael, St. Catherine, and the Bleſſed Trinity, were united in the one pariſh of the priory of the Holy Trinity called Chriſt-church.

This priory was built on a piece of ground upwards of three hundred feet long, in the pariſh of St. Catharine, near a parochial chapel dedicated to St. Michael, which ſtood where are now the row of houſes by the pump, between Leadenhall-ſtreet and Fenchurch-ſtreet.

§ The

The priory was diſſolved by Henry VIII. in the year 1531; after which his majeſty gave the houſe, church and ſite thereof to Sir Thomas Audley, who ſold the bells, four to the pariſh of Stepney (where they now are) and five to the pariſhioners of Coleman ſtreet. The church was pulled down, and the priory converted into a noble manſion, in which Sir Thomas reſided when he was lord-chancellor, and when he died in the year 1544. His only daughter being married to Thomas duke of Norfolk, the eſtate deſcended to his grace, and was from that time called and known by the name of Duke's-place, which it retains to this day. The duke of Norfolk, however, loſing his head on Tower-hill, this manſion deſcended to Thomas Howard, earl of Suffolk, eldeſt ſon to the ſaid duke, by Audley's daughter; who by indenture of bargain and ſale, dated the 21ſt. July 34 Eliz. ſold the ſame to the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, to have and to hold to them and their ſucceſſors, in as large and ample a manner as the ſaid earl, or lord Audley, or the king, or the prior and convent, or their predeceſſors at any time before the diſſolution of the ſaid priory, or any other time, had, uſed, or enjoyed the ſame, by virtue of any grant, privilege, preſcription, law, cuſtom, or any other ways or means whatſoever.

Some time before the priory of Holy Trinity was diſſolved, the inhabitants within its boundaries, who had been deprived of their pariſh churches, to make way for that religious foundation, finding it very inconvenient to be confined to the conventual church, petitioned and obtained leave, under certain conditions and reſtrictions, to build a chapel in the church yard of the ſaid priory, for their own conveniency, which eſcaping the fate of the religious houſes at the diſſolution of the priory, became the only place, after the conventual church was pulled down, for the inhabitants within that diſtrict to repair to for divine ſervice. This, however, in time, creating ſome diſlike, the inhabitants of Duke's-place were deſirous to raiſe a ſufficient pariſh church for themſelves, on the ground within their own precinct; to effect which they applied to the archbiſhop of Canterbury for his aſſiſtance; who having obtained the king's warrant, under the broad ſeal, for proceeding in their pious intention, prevailed with the lord-mayor, the court of aldermen, and common-council, to build them a church of the ſtones of the conventual church, which ſtill remained on the premiſes. And the ſame was compleated, conſecrated, and dedicated to St. James, on the ſecond of January 1622, and is now called

St. JAMES's, DUKE's PLACE.

This pariſh is a precinct within itſelf, diſtinct from the ward of Aldgate, under a miniſter, two church-wardens, an overſeer, two conſtables, two headboroughs, a ſcavenger, and fifteen jurymen. The church having eſcaped the dreadful fire in 1666, ſtill remains in its orignal form. The body is well enlightened, and the Tower, which is compoſed of four ſtages, is terminated by a very ſingular kind of turret in the form of a canopy.

This church is a curacy, the patronage of which being in the Lord-mayor and commonalty of London, the pariſh claims a right of exemption from the biſhop of London's juriſdiction, in matters eccleſiaſtical. The incumbent receives about 60l. a year by tithes, and 13l. a year from the chamber of London.

At the ſouth eaſt corner of St. Mary-ax, and at the weſt extremity of this ward, on the north ſide of Leadenhall-ſtreet, is the parochial church of

St. ANDREW UNDERSHAFT.

This church was originally founded in the year 1362, and obtained the name of Underſhalft from a maypole, which was annually raiſed in the ſtreet near it on May-day, and which was called a ſhaft. The ancient church fell to decay, and the pariſhioners began to build the preſent church in or ſoon after the year 1520. The whole north-ſide of the great middle iſle, both of the body and choir, was built by Stephen Jennings, merchant-taylor, and ſome time Lord-mayor of London; as appears by his arms carved over every pillar: as was the north iſle alſo, which he roofed with timber and ceiled: alſo the whole ſouth ſide of the church was glazed, and the pews in the ſouth chapel were made at his expence. This generous benefactor to the pariſh died in 1524, and the work went on ſo heavily after his deceaſe, that it was not finiſhed till the year 1532.

This church is a plain gothic ſtructure, with a well enlightened body, and a ſquare tower terminated by battlements, with pinnacles at the corners, within which riſes a turret that contains the bell. It is a rectory in the patronage of the biſhop of London: and the incumbent receives 120l. per annum by tithes.

At the north eaſt corner of St. Mary-ax ſtreet ſtands

FLETCHERS HALL.

This is a ſmall, neat, convenient building, and belongs to the company of Fletchers or arrow makers, from the french word fléche, an arrow. Though arrows have been near three centuries out of uſe in England, and notwithſtanding this is a company only by preſcription and not by charter, they have nevertheleſs obtained a coat of arms and a livery: they are the thirty-ninth company in the city, and ſeem in all reſpects as firmly eſtabliſhed as thoſe incorporated by letters patent. This fraternity which entirely conſiſts of people of other trades, is under the government of two wardens, ten aſſiſtants, and the liverymen.

On the north ſide of Leadenhall-ſtreet, formerly ſtood the church of St. Mary-ax. It was originally dedicated not only to the Virgin Mary, but to St. Urſula, and her eleven thouſand virgins; but it was commonly called St. Mary at the Ax, from the ſign of the ax which hung over againſt the eaſt end of the church; and ſometimes it was named St. Mary Papillar, from a plot of ground belonging to the Skinners company, that lay on the north ſide of it. But this pariſh being, about the year 1565, united to the pariſh church of St.

Andrew Undershaft, St. Mary at the Ax, was let out as a warehouse to a merchant, and for mechanical uses; but the street, however, in which this edifice stood, still retains its name.

From the time of the union of these parishes, the bishop of London, for the time being, has successively, as the said church of St. Andrew has happened to be void, collated to it with the church of St. Mary-ax thereunto annexed. Besides, queen Elizabeth, at the time she granted the patronage of St. Mary-ax to the bishop of London, also granted the church-yard for burying the dead, and all the houses, buildings, rents, &c. Belonging to the said church of St. Mary, to the rector and churchwardens of the said parish of St. Andrew and their successors for ever, to the use, sustaining, and reparation of the said church of St. Andrew.

Near the extremity of this ward, on the north side of Fenchurch-street, is a very noble, modern building, erected in the year 1748, by the Ironmongers, for transacting their affairs as a body corporate, and from that company called

IRONMONGERS HALL.

This edifice is entirely fronted with stone, and the whole lower story is wrought in rustic. The center part of the building projects a little; and in this are a large arched entrance, and two windows, with two others on each side. Over this rustic story rises the super-structure, which has a light rustic at the corners, to keep up a correspondence with the rest of the building: the part which projects is ornamented with four Ionic pilasters coupled, but with a large columniation. In the middle is a very noble venetian window, and over it a circular one. In each space between the pilasters, is a smaller window, with an angular pediment; and over these are also circular ones; but the side parts have arched windows with square ones over them. The central part is crowned with a pediment supported by these pilasters, and in its plain is the arms of the company with handsome decorations in relievo. The rest of the building is terminated by a balustrade crowned with vases.

The Ironmongers company was incorporated by charter from king Edward IV. in the year 1464, and is the tenth of the twelve principal companies in this city. It was incorporated by the name and style of "The master and keepers or wardens and commonalty of the art or mystery of Ironmongers of London". And, by virtue of the said charter, the government of this fraternity is now in a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants, which consists of the whole livery, and represent the commonalty or whole freedom. This company enjoys very great estates both in their own right and in trust from several donors, by whose will they pay yearly near 1800l. in charities; besides the interest or profits of 26000l. left to them by Mr. Thomas Betton, a Turkey merchant, in the year 1724, under the special trust of employing one moiety of the said profits perpetually in the redemption of British captives from Moorish slavery; and the other moiety to be equally distributed between the poor of the company of Ironmongers and the several charity schools within the bills of mortality.

At the corner of Magpye-alley, behind the houses that front Fenchurch-street, stands the parish church of

ST. CATHARINE COLEMAN.

This church is so denominated from its dedication to St. Catharine, a virgin of Alexandria, and celebrated for her great knowledge in philophy, and as being a martyr for the christian faith. It received the addition of Coleman from a great yard or garden, called at that time Coleman-haw, in the parish of the Trinity, afterwards Christchurch. It is a rectory of ancient foundation, even so far back as the year 1346. The old church was substantially repaired, and a south isle added in 1489, by Sir William White, Lord-mayor of London; which church escaped the fire of London in 1666, and, with the assistance of several other repairs, stood, but was much buried by the raising of the street, till the year 1734, when it was pulled down, and the present church was erected at the expence of the parish, under the sanction of an act of parliament 12 Geo. II. whereby, and by another act passed for the same purpose, the parishioners were enabled to raise money by annuities at the rate of eight pounds per cent per annum, and to rate the inhabitants to pay the said annuities.

This church was originally in the patronage of the dean of St. Martin's-le-Grand, London, and so continued till that religious house with its appurtenances, was annexed to the abbey of Westminster: at whose dissolution it fell to the crown, and the advowson was given by queen Mary, on the third of March, in the first year of her reign, to the bishop of London and his successors in that see for ever. The present church has a lofty body, well lightened with two rows of windows. The steeple is a plain tower, crowned with battlements; and the floor is raised so much above the surface of the street, that you ascend by several steps into the church from the church-yard; by which means there is little reason to expect this edifice will ever fall under the like disadvantage with the former.

In this parish is a select vestry, which consists of those who have served the office of churchwarden. The officers are two churchwardens, who are likewise collectors for the poor.

Adjoining to the south side of this church-yard is a Jews synnagogue, supported by the congregation of Portuguese Jews. And close to the east side stands a large pile of brick buildings erected by the East India company for warehouses; with convenience for carts and waggons to load and unload within, and to pass through from Fenchurch-street into Crutched Friars.

Opposite St. Catherine Coleman's church is the new street called Fenchurch-buildings, a paved court, well built, and genteelly inhabited; the north end of which ascends by a narrow passage into Sugar-loaf court.

More to the east is Northumberland-alley, so called from the mansion-house of Henry Piercy, earl earl of Northumberland, in the 33d. of Henry VI. This noble manſion ſoon after fell ſo greatly to decay that it became the common rendezvous for all ſorts of diſſolute people. The ſite of it, however, is at preſent covered with very mean buildings, inhabited by induſtrious and labouring people.

About thirty yards from Mark-lane is a new built ſtreet, called London ſtreet; ſo called from its being built upon that ſpot of ground where the London tavern, and the firſt houſe of that kind, formerly ſtood.

At the ſouth eaſt angle of Cree-church-lane, in Leadenhall ſtreet, ſtands the church of ST. CATHERINE-CREE.

So called from its being dedicated to St. Catherine, an Egyptian virgin; and diſtinguiſhed from other churches of the name, by the addition of Cree or Chriſt, from its vicinity to the conventual church of the Holy Trinity, which was originally called Chriſt's church.

King Henry VIII. in his grant of the priory of Holy Trinity to Sir Thomas Audley, afterwards lord Audley, gave this church alſo to Sir Thomas; the prior and canons of Chriſt-church having been originally and always patrons thereof. By the will of lord Audley, dated April nineteen, 1544, this church fell to the maſter and fellows of Magdalen-college, in Cambridge, and their ſucceſſors, whom he enjoined to ſerve the cure for ever; who leaſed out the impropriation to the pariſhioners for ninety years: but a diſpute ariſing between the college and the pariſh, at the expiration of the ſaid leaſe, in 1725, about a renewal, a leaſe was granted to Jerome Knapp, haberdaſher of London; and, in order to ſettle the difference, it was agreed, that one hundred and fifty pounds per annum, ſhould be raiſed by the pariſhioners, in lieu of tythes, &c. out of which the officiating curate ſhould be paid fifty pounds per annum, for the firſt ten years, beſides ſurplus fees, &c. and after the expiration of that term of years, ſeventy pounds per annum, beſides ſurplus fees; and this agreement was, in May 1727, confirmed by act of parliament.

The antiquity of this church may be collected from its priority, to the conventual church of Holy Trinity, Chriſt-church, in which foundation St. Catherine's, St. Michael's, St. Mary Magdalen's, and the Bleſſed Trinity, were ſwallowed up.

Within the church-yard of the ſaid priory, another church was founded with the addition of Chriſt or Cree, to be ſupplied by one of the canons, and removeable at the pleaſure of the prior. This church was ſo buried, by the frequent raiſing of the pavement in the high-ſtreet, (now called Leadenhall-ſtreet) that they were obliged to deſcend into it by ſeven ſteps, and otherwiſe appeared very old and much decayed, except the bell-tower or ſteeple, which had been rebuilt, at the expence of Sir John Percival, in the year 1504.

The preſent edifice was erected in the year 1630: it is built with ſtone, and of a mixed Gothic ſtyle. It has rounded battlements on the top, and a ſquare tower that has the ſame kind of battlements: this tower is crowned with a ſquare turret, over which is a dome, and from its ſummit riſes the weather-cock.

When this church was built, they took in a cloiſter, which ſtood on the back-ſide of the old church, of more than ſeven feet in breadth: and at the weſt-end of this new church, on the ſouth-ſide, ſtands a pillar of the old church, as it ſtood, and was there erected; which pillar being eighteen feet high from the baſis or foot to the chapiter or head, upon which the old arch was raiſed, and not above two feet appearing now above the floor of the preſent church, ſhews that the floor is raiſed fifteen feet above that of the old.

This pariſh church being a donative, pays neither firſt fruits nor tenths. It is a curacy, and the pariſhioners have the privilege of chuſing their own miniſters, who muſt be licenced by the biſhop of London. Here is a ſelect veſtry, conſiſting of the church-wardens, and thoſe who have ſerved or fined for that office: the officers are two church wardens, four overſeers, and two ſideſmen.

Nearly oppoſite to this, but behind houſes, on the ſouth ſide of the High-ſtreet, ſtands

BRICKLAYERS HALL.

This is a handſome and convenient building, adapted for tranſacting the affairs of the company of tylers and bricklayers, who were incorporated in the tenth of Elizabeth, on the third of Auguſt 1568, by the ſtyle and title of "The maſter and keeper and wardens of the Society of the freemen of the myſtery or art of tylers and bricklayers of London." It is a livery company and governed by a maſter, two wardens and a court of aſſiſtants.

This being the laſt material building, we ſhall leave the ward of Aldgate, and proceed to the next chapter.

CHAPTER V.

Of BASSISHAW and BILLINGSGATE Wards.

THE ward of Baſſiſhaw is very ſmall, conſiſting only of one ſtreet, which is called Baſinghall-ſtreet, and derives its name from Baſinghall, the manſion-houſe of the renowned family of Baſings, which was the principal houſe in it, and ſituate where Blackwell-hall now ſtands.

This ward is bounded on the eaſt and ſouth by Coleman-ſtreet ward; on the north by Cripplegate ward; and on the weſt by Cheap and Cripplegate wards. It begins in the ſouth by Blackwell-hall, and runs northward to the ſpot where London-wall ſtood. It is governed by an alderman, four common-council men, one of whom is the alderman's deputy; three conſtables; ſeventeen inqueſt men; three ſcavengers, and a beadle.

Baſinghall-ſtreet, of which this little ward conſiſts, is of no great uniformity, as not running ſtraight, and of an equal breadth; but it is graced with good buildings, and well inhabited by merchants. Near the center of this ſtreet, on the weſt-ſide, is the parochial church of

St. MICHAEL BASSISHAW,

So denominated from its dedication to St. Michael the archangel, and its ſituation near Baſinghaw or hall. It is a rectory of very ancient foundation, dedicated to the ſame ſaint, in or about the year 1140, at which time, and till the year 1327, it was in the gift of the prior and canons of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield; tho' the regiſter of London gives no name of its rector before Ralph de Waltham, who died in the year 1327, at which time the preſentation was in Henry Bodyke, citizen of London; but about a century after, it fell to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, who, from that time to this, have continued patrons thereof.

The old church, which was very beautiful, was entirely deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666; ten years after which, the preſent ſtructure was begun, and finiſhed in 1679. The walls of this building are ſtrengthened with ruſtic work at the corners, and the body is well enlightened by a ſingle ſeries of large windows. At the eaſt-end, where the top is terminated by an arch, the light is given by three windows; one of them tall and upright, the two others circular: the ſteeple is a tower, crowned with a turret, from which riſes a kind of ſpire. The veſtry is general, and the parochial officers, are too church-wardens and two overſeers.

On the South-eaſt angle of Maſon's-alley, on the eaſt-ſide of Baſinghall-ſtreet, is ſituate

MASONS HALL.

A ſmall building, but very convenient; it is made of ſtone, and bounded on the ſouth by Coleman-ſtreet church-yard. This company was incorporated about the year 1410, by the name and ſtyle of "The Free Maſons;" a fraternity which have been honoured by many of the gentry and nobility, and even by ſeveral kings, who have been members of their ſociety. William Hanckſtow, clarencieux king at arms, in the year 1477, granted them the arms of their ſociety, as borne at this time: but the preſent company act under the incorporation granted by the letters patent of the 29th of Charles II. on the ſeventeenth of September 1677, by the name of "The maſter, wardens, aſſiſtants and commonalty of the company of Maſons of the city of London." Under which title they enjoy the privilege of the livery, and are governed by a maſter and two wardens, who are choſen annually, as in all other companies; and a court of aſſiſtants, who are choſen for life, except guilty of ſome capital offence.

From this hall we proceed to another in the ſame ſtreet, called

WEAVERS HALL.

It is handſomely built, and neatly adorned on the inſide with hangings, fret work, and a crown of the Ionic order.

From the origin of this company we have reaſon to imagine it was the firſt incorporated ſociety in the city of London. Anciently the weavers were named Thelarii; and in the reign of king Henry I. they paid ſixteen pounds to the crown for their immunities, and eighteen marks annually. King John, in the year 1200, diſfranchiſed them, at the inſtance of the mayor and citizens of London. for which favour the citizens paid the king twenty marks per annum. This difference between the citizens and weavers, in all probability, aroſe from ſome bad practices of the latter, who, by virtue of a power granted by king Henry II. in the thirty-firſt year of his reign, were put under the inſpection of the portgreve, or chief magiſtrate of London; for, amongſt other articles, the king ordained, "if any man made cloth of Spaniſh wool mixed with Engliſh wool, the portgreve, or chief magiſtrate of London, ought to burn it.

In the ſeventh of Henry IV. this company which originally conſiſted of tapeſtry and cloth-weavers, were reinſtated with their freedom, and by act of parliament put under the management and authority of the Lord-mayor and aldermen of the city; but its preſent ſtate is very different, conſiſting chiefly of worſted, cotton, and ſilk weavers.

This fraternity is governed by two officers called bailiffs, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants. It is privileged with the livery, and is the forty-ſecond company.

To the north of this ſtands

GIRDLERS HALL.

A handſome and convenient building, finiſhed in 1681, well wainſcotted within, and adorned with a ſcreen of the compoſite order for tranſacting the affairs of the company, which is a livery company, and the twenty-third on the liſt. It was incorporated in the twenty-ſeventh of Henry VI. on the ſixth of Auguſt 1449; and re-incorporated with the Pinners and Wire-drawers by queen Elizabeth on the twelfth of October 1568, by the name of "The maſter and wardens or keepers of the art or myſtery of the Girdlers of London." It is governed by a maſter, three wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants.

Between the church-yard of St. Michael Baſſiſhaw and Guildhall paſſage ſtands

COOPERS HALL.

This a is ſtately edifice, and well built of brick. The hall is a handſome room, paved with marble and wainſcotted, about fourteen feet high. The company was incorporated in 1501, by king Henry VII. under the title of "The maſter, wardens, and aſſiſtants of the company of coopers of London and ſuburbs thereof;" and in the ſucceeding reign was impowered to ſearch and gauge all beer, ale, and ſoap veſſels within the city of London, and two miles round its ſuburbs, for which they were allowed a farthing for each caſk. They are governed by a maſter, three wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants; and their livery are very numerous.

On the ſouth ſide of Baſinghall-ſtreet is ſituate

BLACKWELL HALL.

This is a very ancient edifice, and has been uſed for ſeveral ages paſt as a market for all broad and narrow woolen cloth brought to London. It was originally called Baſings-haw or hall, from the family of the Baſings, who built the houſe, and gave name alſo to the ward. In proceſs of time this houſe deſcended to Mr. Thomas Bakewell in the 36th of Edward III. and from him called Bakewell-hall. It afterwards fell to the crown, and was ſold, with its gardens and appurtenances, by king Richard II. to the city of London for fifty pounds; and has, from that time, been called Blackwell hall, and employed as a weekly market for all broad and narrow woolen cloths brought out of the country.

This hall, which was rebuilt in 1558, was deſtroyed by the fire in 1666, and the preſent ſtructure was erected in 1672. It is a ſquare building with a court in the middle, ſurrounded with warehouſes, and has two ſpacious entrances or gates for carriages; one from Baſinghall-ſtreet, the other from Guildhall-yard, where is the principal front, and a door-caſe, adorned with two columns of the Doric order, with their entablature and a pediment, in which are the king's arms, and the city arms a little lower, enriched with cupids.

Theſe buildings have likewiſe an entrance on the weſt ſide from Cateaton-ſtreet; and within them are divers apartments or warehouſes, called the Devonſhire, the Glouceſterſhire, the Worceſterſhire, the Kentiſh, the Medley, the Spaniſh, and the blanket halls; in which each piece of cloth pays one penny for pitching, and a half-penny per week reſting; by which means it is ſaid, there ariſes a revenue of eleven hundred pounds per annum; which, by the generoſity of the citizens, is applied towards the ſupport of Chriſt's Hoſpital; the governors whereof have the ſole management of theſe warehouſes.

This market may be ſaid to be the greateſt woolen cloth market in the world; and therefore it has always been the particular care of the city of London to keep it under the moſt eſtabliſhed regulations and orders: for, ſo early as the 21ſt of Richard II. it was ordained, that no manner of perſon ſhould ſell any woolen cloths, except they were firſt brought, harboured, and diſcharged at the common market of Blackwell-hall, upon pain of forfeiture thereof. And that ordinance was confirmed by an act of common-council, held on the firſt of Auguſt, 8 Henry VIII. with this addition, that no manner of perſon, being freeman of this city, ſuffer any manner of perſon whatſoever, be he free or foreign, to buy or ſell any manner of woolen cloths, harboured, or lodged, contrary to the ſaid ordinance, within his ſhop, chamber, or other place within his houſe, unleſs the ſaid cloths were firſt brought to Blackwell-hall, and there bought and ſold; under the penalty of ſix ſhillings and eight-pence for every broad cloth; three ſhillings and four-pence for every Kerſey; and twenty-pence for every Deſſein of Bridgewater and other pieces of cloth. Double for a ſecond offence; and diſfranchiſement for a third.

Of BILLINGSGATE WARD.

FROM whence this ward took its name, is not quite certain. Some authors have deduced it from king Ballinus; but the moſt probable opinion refers us to ſome eminent perſon, who, in ancient times, had large poſſeſſions in this part of the city, or held this ward by the ſame tenure as the Baſings, &c. held other wards. It is ſituated on the river ſide, and is bounded on the ſouth by the Thames; on the eaſt by Tower-ſtreet ward; and on the weſt by the ward of Bridge Within. It extends from the weſt end of Tower-ſtreet ward, about to Smart's-key in Thames-ſtreet, from whence it runs, on the ſouth ſide of Thames-ſtreet, to St. Magnus church, at the foot of London-bridge; and from Smart's-key, it runs up almoſt to Fenchurch-ſtreet, in a direct line, and then weſtward, within a few houſes of Gracechurch.

This ward is divided into twelve precincts, viz. St. Mary Hill, Smart's-key, Billingſgate, Love-lane; the three precincts of St. Botolph Billingſ-gate; two precincts of St. Andrew Hubbard; St. George, Botolph-lane, Pudding-lane, and Rood-lane. It is governed by an alderman, ten common-council men, (one of whom is the alderman's deputy) eleven conſtables, fourteen inqueſt men, ſix ſcavengers and a beadle.

Thames-ſtreet is a place of very conſiderable trade, on account of its convenient ſituation near the river, the Cuſtom-houſe, Billingſgate, and the ſeveral wharfs and keys for lading and unlading merchants goods, &c. and is well adapted for that purpoſe. The keys, wharfs, and docks, which are aſſigned by act of parliament, for ſhipping, lading, and landing of goods and merchandizes, are as follow: Brewer's-key, Cheſter's-key, Galley-key, Wooldock, Cuſtom-houſe-key, Porter's-key, Bear's-key, Sab's-key, Wiggan's-key, Young's-key, Rafe's-key, Dice-key, Smart's-key, Somer's-key, Lion's-key, Botolph's-key, Hamon's-key, Gaunt's-key, Cock's-key, Freſh-wharf, and Billingſgate: the latter of which is not ſo remarkable for loading and landing of goods and merchandize, as it is for being the greateſt market for fiſh in England, and the only port for fiſh in London. It is a large water-gate or key, or port for ſmall veſſels, laden with fiſh of all ſorts, oranges, lemons, Spaniſh onions, and other commodities. It is likewiſe the port for Graveſend boats and wherries to take in their fare, from whence they are (under a penalty) to depart at the ringing of a bell, erected near the ſtairs for that purpoſe, which rings a quarter of an hour, to give notice of the time of high-water at London-bridge, and the time of ebb. On the wharf is the common exchange every day at noon, for maſters of colliers, and dealers in coals concerned in the Newcaſtle coal trade.

Nearly oppoſite Billingſgate, is the ſtreet called St. Mary-hill; on the weſt-ſide of which is ſituate the church of St. MARY at HILL.

This church is ſo called, from its being dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and its ſituation on an eminence. With reſpect to the original foundation, we have no certain date; but, if we may be permitted to conjecture, from its being ſo much decayed in the year 1497, as to require rebuilding, it muſt be allowed to have ſtood above two hundred years at leaſt before that time. Beſides, we can account for one hundred and ſixty years: for Roſe de Wrytel founded a chantry in the church of St. Mary at Hill, in the year 1330, and Richard de Hackney, citizen of London, preſented Nigellus Dalleye to this living, in the year 1337.

It is remarkable, that, in digging the foundation of the new church, in 1497, the corpſe of Alice Hackney, who died about the year 1322, was diſcovered in a very rotten coffin; and that the ſkin was ſound and flexible, and the joints pliable, though buried about one hundred and ſeventy-five years. The body was kept above ground three or four days, without any noiſome ſmell, but then beginning to be tainted, was again laid in the ground.

Though this church was not entirely deſtroyed by the dreadful conflagration in 1666, every thing combuſtible in it was conſumed: it was, however, ſoon after repaired, and the pariſh of St. Andrew Hubbard annexed to it. It is a well-proportioned Gothic ſtructure, conſiſting of a plain body, enlightened by large windows, and a tower crowned by a handſome turret. The veſtry, which is ſelect, conſiſts of nineteen members, and the officers are two church-wardens, and two ſideſmen.

The advowſon appears to have been in private hands, till about the year 1638, when it was purchaſed by the pariſh; but ſince the pariſh of St. Andrew Hubbard was united to it, the duke of Somerſet, who is patron thereof, preſents in his turn. The rector receives two hundred pounds a year in lieu of tythes.

In this church is founded a divinity-lecture, to be preached every Thurſday morning, endowed with forty pounds per annum, by Sir John Loman.

Annually, on the Sunday after Midſummer-day, according to antient cuſtom, the fraternity of fellowſhip porters of the city of London, repair to this church in the morning, where, during the reading of prayers, they reverently approach the altar, two and two; on the rails of which are placed two baſons, into theſe they put their reſpective offerings; and being generally followed by the congregation, the money offered is diſtributed among the aged poor and indigent members of that fraternity.

In this church is the following epitaph on Sir Thomas Blancke, Lord-mayor of London, in the year 1582.

Here lyeth a knight, in London borne,
Sir Thomas Blancke by name,
Of honeſt birth, of merchants trade,
A man of worthy fame.
Religious was his life to God,
To man his dealing juſt;
The poor and hoſpitals can tell,
That wealth was not his truſt.
With gentle heart and ſpirit milde,
And nature full of pitie,
Both ſheriff, Lord-maior and alderman,
He ruled in this citie.
The good knight was his common name,
So cal'd of many men:
He lived long and died of yeares
Twice ſeven and ſix times ten.
Obiit 28 Octob. Ann. Dom. 1588.

The pariſh church of St. Andrew Hubbard ſtood where, at preſent, the king's weigh-houſe is ſituate, between St. Botolph's-lane, and Love-lane in Little Eaſtcheap. The patronage of which, anno 1389, was in the earl of Pembroke, who being killed in a tournament at Woodſtock, and leaving no iſſue, the crown ſeized on the advowſon for ſome time, till it came to John lord Talbot, afterwards earl of Shrewſbury, in whoſe family it continued till the death John earl of Shrewſbury at the battle of Northampton, anno 1460, when it came to Edward IV. who a few years after reſtored it to that noble family; wherein it continued till it came to the earls of Northumberland, from whom by marriage it went to the duke of Somerſet. This church being deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666, and not rebuilt, the pariſh thereof was by act of parliament, annexed to that of St. Mary Hill, whereupon the pariſhioners diſpoſed of the ground both of church and cemetery to the city, the purchaſe-money whereof they gave towards new paving the church of the ſaid St. Mary Hill, the place of public worſhip for the united pariſhes.

On the weſt ſide of Botolph-lane is a parochial church, dedicated to St. George of Cappadocia, and patron of the Engliſh nation. It is called

St. GEORGE, Botolph-Lane.

From its ſituation near the middle of the hill that leads from Thames-ſtreet to Little-eaſtcheap. It is a rectory founded in the year 1321, and was originally in the abbot and convent of St. Saviour's Bermondſey; at whoſe diſſolution it came to the crown, where the patronage ſtill remains. This church was burnt down in 1666; after which the preſent ſtructure was raiſed. It is built of ſtone, and though ſmall, yet it is very neat; the outſide is handſome, the inſide well adorned. The pariſh of St. Botolph Billingſgate was annexed to it when rebuilt; and their yearly value together was ſettled by act of parliament at 180l. in lieu of tythes.

The church of St. Botolph Billingſgate, deſtroyed by the fire, and not rebuilt, was a very ancient foundation. It was a rectory, and ſtood oppoſite the end of Botolph-lane, on the ſouth ſide of Thames-ſtreet, and gave name to the adjoining gate or wharf, known by the name of Botolph's-gate in the reign of Edward the Confeſſor: in the reign of Richard I. the patronage was in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's.

The greateſt part of the ground on which the chancel ſtood was, after the fire of London, taken into the paſſage to Botolph-wharf; and on part of the ground where the body of the church ſtood, there was built a houſe, at ſix pounds per annum, ground rent. The reſt was walled in for a burying-place. About 1677, a vault was built for the interment of the dead in part of the church-yard; and a leaſe was let to Francis Minſhall, to build a ſhop or ſhed thereon for the benefit of the poor at four pounds per annum. The pariſhioners alſo built another vault in a different part of the ſaid church-yard; and, for the benefit of the poor, did, in 1693, let to the ſaid Minſhall the ſite thereof for ſixty one years, at the rate of two pounds per annum, and a fine of one hundred and fifty pounds to build a ſhop over the ſaid vault. There was alſo another church-yard or burying place in Botolph-lane belonging to this pariſh, part of which was leaſed out to Joſhua Green for ſeventy-one years, at twenty pounds per annum on a building leaſe. Both veſtries are general; and the officers of each pariſh are, two church-wardans and two overſeers.

At the ſouth eaſt angle of Rood-lane, in Little Tower-ſtreet, ſtands the parochial church of St. MARGARET PATTENS.

It is ſo called, from its dedication to St. Margaret, virgin and martyr, and its ſtanding in a lane, which was entirely occupied by makers and dealers in pattens. In after-times, however, this lane was called Rood-lane, on account of a rood or croſs ſet up in the church-yard of St. Margaret, when pulled down to be rebuilt. This croſs or rood was bleſſed in a particular manner, and privileged by the pope with many indulgences, for the pardon of their ſins who came to pray before it, and to make their offerings towards the rebuilding of St. Margaret's-church: by which means much money was collected from the devotees that frequented the tabernacle in which this rood was placed or ſet up. But the church being finiſhed in the year 1538, ſoon after the reformation, ſome people unknown aſſembled without noiſe in the night of the twenty-ſecond of May that ſame year, and broke the rood to pieces, and demoliſhed the tabernacle in which it was erected. The lane adjoining has, however, ever ſince been called Rood-lane.

The advowſon of this church, which is a rectory, was anciently in the family of the Nevils, in which it continued till the year 1392, when it came to Robert Rickenden of Eſſex, who, in the year 1408, confirmed the ſame to Richard Whittington: and in 1411 the ſaid Richard Whittington conveyed it to the mayor and commonalty of London; don; ſince which time it has been in the gift of the citizens, who have preſented thereto after various manners, viz. ſometimes the mayor alone; at other times, the mayor and aldermen; then, the mayor and commonalty; and again, the mayor and commonalty and citizens of London, in whom it ſtill remains.

This church was entirely deſtroyed in the lamentable fire of 1666, and the preſent one was erected in the year 1687. It is built part of ſtone and part of brick, and conſiſts of a plain body, 66 feet in length, 52 feet broad, and 32 feet in height to the roof. The windows are arched, with port-hole windows over them. Over the front door is a large Doric window, with a cherubim's head and a large feſtoon over it; and above theſe is a pediment, which ſtretches from the ſteeple to the end of the church. The tower riſes ſquare to a conſiderable height, and is terminated by four plain pinnacles, crowned with balls, and a baluſtrade, within which riſes a very ſolid ſpire, terminated by a ball and fane.

The officers of this pariſh are, one churchwarden, and one overſeer or collector for the poor; and the veſtry is general.

After the fire of London, the living of St. Gabriel Fenchurch, which was entirely deſtroyed, was annexed to St. Margaret Pattens. That was alſo a rectory, founded about the year 1321, and dedicated to the angel Gabriel; it ſtood in the middle of Fenchurch-ſtreet, in the broad way near Cullum-ſtreet, and was originally a ſmall church, but was enlarged and richly beautified in 1632.

The patronage of this rectory appears to have been anciently in the prior and convent of the Holy Trinity within Aldgate, in whom it continued till the ſuppreſſion of their priory, when it devolved to the crown, in which it ſtill remains. The veſtry is general, and has but one churchwarden.

The living of theſe two pariſhes, ſince the union, is ſettled at 120l. per annum, in lieu of tythes; and as there is but one rector to ſerve them both, the patrons of each preſent alternately.

At the north-weſt corner of Love-lane, as you enter into Little Eaſtcheap, is ſituate

The KING's WEIGH-HOUSE.

This houſe ſtands on the ground where the church of St. Andrew Hubbard ſtood before the fire of London, at which time the weigh-houſe was in Cornhill. The original intent of this houſe was, to prevent frauds in the weight of merchandize brought from beyond ſeas, by the king's beam. It was under a maſter and four maſter porters, with labouring porters under them; who uſed to have carts and horſes to fetch the merchants goods to the beam, and to carry them back. The houſe belongs to the Grocers company, who choſe the ſeveral porters, &c. but of late years little is done in this office, as a compulſive power is wanting to oblige merchants to have their goods weighed, they alledging it to be an unneceſſary trouble and expence.

In a large room over the weigh-houſe is a commodious meeting-houſe uſed by a congregation of proteſtant diſſenters.

In Pudding-lane, the weſt boundaries of this ward, is ſituate

BUTCHERS HALL.

This is a neat convenient little building, and is finely adorned with fret-work and wainſcot.

The fraternity of butchers appears to be of great antiquity; for in the 26th of Henry II. it was fined for ſetting up a guild without the king's licence, And its preſent charter, under which the butchers act, was not granted till the third of James I. who, on the 16th of September 1605, did, by letters patent, incorporate them by the ſtyle of "The maſter, wardens, and commonalty, of the art or myſtery of butchers of the city of London." The company is governed by a maſter, five wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants: it is a livery company, and the twenty-fourth in the city liſt.

CHAPTER VI.

Of BISHOPSGATE and BREAD-STREET WARDS.

THE ward of Biſhopſgate takes its name from a gate which ſtood almoſt in the center thereof, between the north-weſt end of Camomile-ſtreet and the north-eaſt end of Wormwood-ſtreet. It is bounded on the eaſt by Aldgate ward, Portſoken ward, and part of the Tower liberty; on the ſouth by Langbourn ward; on the weſt by Broad-ſtreet ward, and Moorfields; and on the north by Shoreditch; and extends from the bars at the north end near Spital-ſquare, on both ſides of the way, including almoſt half of Houndſditch, as far as the pump, at the corner of St. Martin's Outwich; and then winding by the weſt corner of Leadenhall, down Gracechurch-ſtreet, to the ſouth-weſt corner oppoſite Fenchurch-ſtreet.

This ward conſiſts of two parts, viz. Biſhopſgate within, and Biſhopſgate without: and is divided into nine precincts, five in the former, and four in the latter. It is under the government of one alderman, two deputies, twelve common-council-men, ſeven conſtables, thirteen inqueſtmen, nine ſcavengers, and two beadles.

In ſurveying this ward we ſhall begin at the ſouth extremity, which takes in that part of Gracechurch-ſtreet, on both ſides the way, that reaches from the north-weſt corner of Leadenhall-ſtreet, and north-eaſt corner of Cornhill, to Lombard ſtreet and Fenchurch-ſtreet.

Grace, or Graſs-church-ſtreet, is a large and ſpacious ſtreet, with well built and lofty houſes, and inhabited by good tradeſmen. The whole ſtreet begins at Eaſtcheap, and falls into Leadenhall-ſtreet at the four croſs ſtreets; but the part in this ward begins only at Lombard ſtreet end, as mentioned before.

Leadenhall herb market, which is large and not inferior to any in London, is in this ward; but the other parts of Leadenhall, viz. the fleſh market, and the fiſh market, &c. are in Lime-ſtreet ward.

Biſhopſgate ſtreet is large, long and ſpacious, and generally well inhabited: on the eaſt ſide of which is Croſby-ſquare, ſo called from Sir John Croſby knt. who built a great houſe thereon in the year 1466, upon a building leaſe of ninety-nine years, from the prioreſs and convent of St. Helen's. In this houſe Richard, duke of Glouceſter, who ſeized upon the crown by contriving the death of his two nephews, reſided during the time he was forging his deſigns and plots to pave his way to the throne. Part of this houſe, as it was repaired and carried higher by a turret built by alderman Bond, in the year 1576, is ſtill to be ſeen on the north ſide of the entrance into the ſquare from Biſhopſgate-ſtreet; the ſquare being chiefly built upon the garden ground. Part of the houſe is at this time uſed by a congregation of diſſenters.

Nearly oppoſite to this ſquare ſtood Greſham college. This ancient building, which was the manſion-houſe of the renowned Sir Thomas Greſham, founder of the Royal Exchange, has been lately taken down, and a moſt ſuperb edifice of ſtone is at this time erecting (as an Exciſe office) in its ſtead.

In a ſpacious court called Great St. Helen's, on the ſouth ſide of this ſtreet, is ſituate the church of

ST. HELEN'S,

So denominated from its dedication to St. Helen the mother of Conſtantine the Great. The patronage of this church appears to have been anciently in lay hands; for one Ranulph, about the year 1180, granted the ſame to the dean and canons of St. Paul's, by whom it was ſome time after granted to William, ſon of William, the Goldſmith, who founded the adjacent priory of St. Helen; on the prioreſs and nuns of which he conferred the advowſon thereof, in whom it continued till the ſuppreſſion of their convent in 1539, when it came to the crown. Edward VI. in the year 1550, granted the advowſon to Nicholas, biſhop of London, and his ſucceſſors; which was confirmed by queen Mary in the year 1553. But it having been ſince re-granted to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, they are both patrons and ordinaries, and collate to the vicarage.

This church eſcaped the fire of London in 1666, and is a gothic ſtructure of the lighter kind, conſiſting of a plain body, with large windows. The Tower was not built till the year 1669, and is wrought with ruſtic at the corners, and is crowned with a turret and dome, with a bell in it. In this church are ſeveral very curious monuments; particularly that of Francis Bencroft, who having in a courſe of years amaſſed a very conſiderable ſum of money, left the principal part of it in truſt to the draper's company to found and maintain an alms-houſe and a ſchool, and to keep this his monument in good and ſubſtantial repair; within which he is emboweled, embalmed, and in a cheſt or box, made with a lid to fall down, with a pair of hinges without any faſtening; and a piece of ſquare glaſs in the lid juſt over his face. It is a very plain monument, almoſt ſquare; and has a door for the ſexton, on certain occaſions, to go in and clear it from duſt and cobwebs; but the keys of the iron rails about the monument, and of the vault door, are kept by the clerk of the drapers company. The miniſter has twenty ſhillings for preaching a ſermon once a year in commemoration of Mr. Bencroft's charities; on which occaſion the alms-men and ſcholars attend at church, and are, by the will of the founder, entertained with a good dinner at ſome neighbouring public houſe. The ſexton has forty ſhillings a year for keeping the monument clear of duſt.

At the weſt end of the church in the center of the ſquare, lies the church-yard, which is encloſed with a wall and iron rails, and ornamented with tall trees.

The officers of this pariſh are, two church-wardens, four overſeers of the poor, and two ſideſmen; and the veſtry is general.

Juſt at the entrance of this ſquare are the alms-houſes founded by lady Holles, and given by her ladyſhip in truſt to the ſkinners company for ſix poor men or women, and endowed the ſame with lands, lett at ten pounds per annum, out of which each perſon was to receive ſeven pence per week. Alice Smith afterwards gave more lands, lett at fifteen pounds per annum for their ſupport. And theſe eſtates being increaſed in value, the company has rebuilt the houſe in a very handſome manner, and augmented the allowance of the penſioners.

A little beyond this, on the ſame ſide, is another court called Little St. Helen's. On this ſpot ſtood the nunnery, which was annexed to the above church, and from which this court is ſeparated only by a row of dwelling-houſes, built on the ruins of that religious fabric: ſome remains of which are ſtill to be ſeen in

LEATHERSELLERS HALL,

Which contains the nuns hall, and other apartments belonging to that nunnery, purchaſed from the crown from the company of leatherſellers; and notwithſtanding its antiquity, may be ſaid to vie with moſt of the halls in London, for neatneſs and convenience. The entrance into the common hall is up a handſome flight of ſtone ſteps from the court yard. The ſcreen is magnificently adorned with ſix columns of Ionic order, enrichments, &c. and the ceiling enriched with fret work.

The company of leatherſellers was incorporated by letters patents of the twenty ſecond of Henry VI. in 1442, by the name of, "the wardens and "ſociety of the myſtery or art of leatherſellers of "the city of London." They are governed by a prime, three wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants. It is a livery company, and the fifteenth among the corporations of this city.

By a grant of Henry VII. the wardens of this corporation, or their deputies, were empowered to have the inſpection of ſheep, lamb and calves leather throughout the kingdom, for the more effectually preventing frauds in theſe ſeveral commodities.

Not far from the hall is an alms-houſe for four poor men and three women, erected by the company of leatherſellers, agreeable to the will of John Haſdwood, who endowed them with eightpence per week each; ſince which it has been augmented by other benefactions to two ſhillings per week, and ſix buſhels of coals at Chriſtmas. In this court is likewiſe a preſbyterian meeting-houſe.

Some little way further to the north, in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, ſtands the pariſh church of

ST. ETHELBURG.

This church is ſo denominated from its dedication to Ethelburga, the firſt chriſtian Saxon princeſs, and daughter to Ethelbert king of Kent, the firſt chriſtian Saxon prince, and patron to Auſtin the monk, the Engliſh apoſtle.

The advowſon of this church, which is a rectory, was in the prioreſs and nuns of St. Helen, till the ſuppreſſion of their convent in the year 1539; when coming to the crown it was ſome time after granted by queen Elizabeth, to the biſhop of London and his ſucceſſors, who have ever ſince collated and inducted to the ſame. And in eccleſiaſtical matters it is ſubject to the archdeacon. This church is very ancient, having eſcaped the fire of London. The body is irregular and in the Gothic ſtyle, with very large windows: and the ſteeple is a tall ſpire, ſupported on a ſquare tower. The rector receives about 60l. a year in lieu of tythes.

Being now arrived at the ſite of Biſhopſgate, we enter that part of the ward called Biſhopſgate-without: on the north ſide of which ſtands the parochial church of ST. BOTOLPH's, BISHOPSGATE.

This church appears to be of very ancient foundation, and dedicated to St. Botolph, an Engliſh ſaxon ſaint, who died about the year 680; but the firſt rector we have any account of was John of Northampton, who reſigned the ſame on the fourth of June 1323. At which time it was, and ſtill remains, in the gift of the biſhop of London.

The old church, which was built of brick and ſtone, eſcaped the fire of London, but became ſo ruinous, that the parſhioners thought it neceſſary to apply to parliament to enable them to raiſe money by annuities, to pull it down and build a new church; which was begun in 1725, and finiſhed in two years after.

The preſent ſtructure is maſſy and ſpacious; the body is built with brick, and well enlightened, and the roof hid by a handſome baluſtrade. The ſteeple, though heavy, maintains an air of magnificence. In the center of the front is a large, plain, arched window, decorated at a diſtance with pilaſters of the Doric order. Over this window is a feſtoon, and above that an angular pediment; on each ſide is a door, crowned with windows, and over theſe there are others of the port hole kind; above which riſes a ſquare tower, crowned with a dome, whoſe baſe is circular, and ſurrounded by a baluſtrade in the ſame form; by the ſide of which, on the corners of the tower, are placed urns with flames. From this part riſes a ſeries of coupled corinthian pillars, ſupporting other urns like the former, and over them riſes the orgive dome, crowned with a very large vaſe, with flames. The roof within-ſide is arched, except over the galleries, and two rows of corinthian columns ſupport both the galleries and arch, which extends over the body of the church, and is neatly adorned with fret work. The whole expence of building this church amounted to £.10,444 1s. 8d.½

This church has a ſelect veſtry, which conſiſts of twenty-ſeven, including the rector and churchwardens for the time being; and there are two churchwardens and four overſeers. The rector beſides other conſiderable advantages, receives about 300l. per annum by tythes.

This pariſh being greatly confined for room to bury their dead, the city, in the year 1615, gave them a piece of waſte ground, which is now the church-yard, and is handſomely railed with iron work: ſince which time that ſpot of ground has been raiſed above eight feet.

At the Weſt end of this burial ground, and eaſt ſide of Moorfields, was a ſtreet of mean buildings, denominated Petty France, from its being originally inhabited by people of that nation. But this place, which about forty years ago was little better than a lay ſtall, is now covered with capital houſes, inhabited by ſome of the moſt reputable citizens; and is called New Broad-ſtreet; at the ſouth weſt angle of which is a Preſbyterian meeting-houſe, and at the north eaſt corner an independent meeting-houſe.

From this ſtreet we proceed to a place called Old Bethlehem, (or more commonly Old Bedlam) which was originally a priory, founded in the year 1247, by Simon Fitzory, alias Fitz-Mary, ſheriff of London, for the ſupport of a community of brothers and ſiſters that wore a ſtar upon their outer garments; and dedicated to St. Mary of Bethlehem.

This priory, however, undergoing the fate of all other religious houſes, was ſuppreſſed by king Henry VIII. and in the year 1546, the mayor and commonalty of London purchaſed the ſaid priory from the crown; and it was by them converted into an hoſpital for the cure of lunatics, at a certain expence to be paid weekly by the relations or pariſh of the patient admitted. And at a court of aldermen held the ſeventh of April, 5 Edward VI. it was ordered, that the inhabitants within the precinct of Bethlehem ſhould be from thenceforth united to the pariſh of St. Botolph without Biſhopſgate, and to be allotted and charged to all officers and charges, tythes and clerks wages excepted.

This priory encloſed all the eſtate and ground, in length, from Biſhopſgate-ſtreet eaſt, to the great ditch in the weſt, which was called deep ditch, dividing the ſaid lands from Moorfields, and in breadth, to the land of Ralph Downing, viz. Downing's-alley in the north, and to the land of the church of St. Botolph in the ſouth.

The ſite and lands of this priory, after its diſſolution, being diſpoſed of to the citizens, it was immediately let out to divers tenants, and was built upon and divided into ſtreets, alleys and courts, except a ſquare piece of ground, conſiſting of about one acre, which is at the north eaſt extremity of the lower Moorfields, commonly known by the name of Broker's-row, where formerly was the place called deep ditch.

In the year 1568, Sir Thomas Roe, merchant-taylor and Lord-mayor of London, cauſed this ground to be incloſed with a brick wall, to be a common burial-ground, at a low rate, for ſuch pariſhes in London, as wanted convenient burial places. He called it the New church-yard near Bethlehem, and eſtabliſhed a ſermon to be preached there on Whitſunday, annually; which, for many years, was honoured with the preſence of the Lord-mayor and aldermen. This, however, has been for a conſiderable time diſcontinued, and the burial place ſhut up.

On the ſouth ſide of this burial ground, oppoſite the ſtreet leading from Moorfields, is ſituate Devonſhire ſquare. On this ſpot originally was a large houſe built by the lord John Powlet; and near that a ſtill more beautiful houſe, built by Jaſper Fiſher, a freeman of the Goldſmiths company, one of the ſix clerks in chancery, and a juſtice of peace. It was afterwards the earl of Oxford's houſe, and then earl of Devonſhire's, whoſe name is ſtill preſerved in the ſtreet and ſquare built upon its ruins. This houſe being ſo large and ſumptuouſly built by a man of no great birth or fortune, (for he was much in debt) was mockingly called Fiſher's Folly.

This is a neat but ſmall ſquare, ſurrounded with good houſes,) with rows of trees before them) which are principally inhabited by wealthy merchants; and juſt without the eaſt paſſage is a baptiſt meeting-houſe, and a quaker's meeting-houſe.

North eaſt from this lies a ſpacious incloſure called the artillery-ground, let by the prior of St. Mary Spittal to the gunners of the Tower, for thrice ninety-nine years, for the uſe and practice of the great and ſmall artillery. And they came hither every Thurſday to exerciſe their large artillery; which moved his majeſty king Henry VIII. to grant them a charter; and the ſame was confirmed in 1584, and was eſtabliſhed, with additions, for the increaſing of good gunners for the royal navy and forts. In both thoſe charters this ground being nominated and ordered to be ſet apart for thoſe uſes, the artillery ground became ſubject to the Tower hamlets, and the inhabitants are ſtill ſummoned on juries belonging to the court held on Tower-hill.

At the ſouth eaſt corner of Halfmoon-alley, on the weſt ſide of Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, is a large and commodious brick building, called

The LONDON WORK-HOUSE.

This edifice was founded by act of parliament, in 1649, for the relief and employment of the poor, and the puniſhing vagrants and diſorderly perſons within the city and liberties of London. However, in the year 1662, the continual increaſe of the poor, and the defects in the laws relating to the ſettlement of them, occaſioned another act, by which the governors were conſtituted a body corporate with a common ſeal; the Lord-mayor for the time being was appointed preſident, and the preſident and governors were allowed to purchaſe lands or tenements to the annual value of 300l. Beſides, the common-council were empowered to rate the ſeveral wards, precincts, and pariſhes of this city, for the ſupport of the ſaid workhouſe; as will more clearly appear from the following extract:

" Be it further enacted, by the authority aforeſaid, that it ſhall and may be lawful to and for the ſaid preſident and governors of the ſaid corporation for the time being, or any two of them, or to or for any perſon authorized and appointed by them, or any two of them, from time to time, to apprehend, or cauſe to be apprehended, any rogues, vagrants, ſturdy beggars, or idle or diſorderly perſons, within the ſaid city and liberties, places, diviſions, and precincts, and to cauſe them to be kept and ſet to work in the ſeveral and reſpective corporations or workhouſes.

" Be it further enacted by the authority aforeſaid, that if the preſident and governors of any of the ſaid corporations ſhall certify, under their common ſeal, their want and defect, either of a preſent ſtock for the foundation of the work, or for ſupply thereof for the future, and what ſum or ſums of money they ſhall think fit for the ſame, to the common-council of the ſaid city of London, that thereupon the common-council of the ſaid city of London are hereby required, from time to time, to ſet down and aſcertain ſuch competent ſum and ſums of money for the purpoſes aforeſaid, not exceeeding one year's rate from time to time uſually ſet upon any perſon, for or towards the relief of the poor, and the ſame to proportion out upon the ſeveral wards, precincts, and pariſhes, as they ſhall think fit: and thereupon the aldermen, deputies, and common-council-men of every ward in the city of London, ſhall have power and authority, and are hereby required, equally and indifferently, according to the proportions appointed, as aforeſaid, for the ſeveral wards, precincts and pariſhes, as aforeſaid, to tax and rate the ſeveral inhabitants within the ſaid reſpective wards, precincts, and pariſhes, as well within the liberties as without; with which tax if any perſon or perſons find him or themſelves aggrieved, ſuppoſing the ſame to be be unequal, he or they ſhall and may make their complaint known to the juſtices of the peace at the next open ſeſſions, who ſhall take ſuch final order therein, as in like caſe is already by the law provided.

" And be it further enacted by the authority aforeſaid, That it ſhall and may be lawful to and for any alderman of the city of London, or his deputy, by their warrant under their hands and ſeals, to authorize the churchwardens or overſeers for the poor within the places and pariſhes aforeſaid, to demand, gather, and receive of every perſon and perſons ſuch ſum and ſums of money, as ſhall be aſſeſſed upon them by virtue of the taxations and contributions aforeſaid; and for default of payment within ten days after demand thereof made, or notice in writing left at the dwelling-houſe or lodging of every perſon ſo aſſeſſed, to levy the ſame by diſtreſs and ſale of the goods of every ſuch perſon, and after ſatisfaction made, to reſtore the ſurpluſſage to the party ſo diſtrained.

" And it is further enacted by the authority aforeſaid, That the reſpective preſident and governors, or any ſeven of them, ſhall have power from time to time to make and conſtitute orders and bye-laws for the better relieving, regulating, and ſetting the poor to work, and the apprehending and puniſhing of rogues, vagabonds, and beggars, within the city, liberties, and places aforeſaid, that have not wherewith to maintain themſelves, and for other matters aforeſaid.

" Provided the ſaid orders and bye-laws ſhall from time to time be preſented to the juſtices of the peace in their quarter ſeſſions aſſembled, to be allowed by the major part of them, and confirmed by order of the ſaid court."

The ſeveral pariſhes, beſides their aſſeſſments, formerly paid one ſhilling per week for pariſh children; but in 1751 the governors came to a reſolution, that no more children paid for by the pariſhes to which they belong, ſhould be taken into the houſe; and ſince that time it has been reſolved, that only ſuch children ſhould be taken in, as were committed by the magiſtrates of the city, found begging in the ſtreets, pilfering on the keys, or lying about in glaſs-houſes and uninhabited places; the common receptacles of the wretched and the wicked.

Theſe poor abandoned children are educated according to the uſage of the church of England, and meet at ſix in the morning and evening in a large room, which ſerves them both for a chapel and dining room, where they hear prayers; they are taught the catechiſm; have a miniſter who attends upon them; and on Sundays they all go to church at Great St. Helen's. A part of the day is appropriated to their learning to read, write, and obtaining ſome knowledge of arithmetic; the reſt of their time is ſpent in weaving nets for the Britiſh fiſhery; and the girls are employed in ſewing, knitting, and other labour, by which they are qualified for ſervice. The boys make twenty-five yards of netting per week; and, as an encouragement to induſtry, every boy who makes above twenty-four yards, receives a penny a week. There are here ſeldom leſs than four hundred children thus employed, all of whom are dreſſed in ruſſet cloth, and wear a round badge upon their breaſts, repreſenting a poor boy and a ſheep with the following motto: God's providence is our inheritance. Theſe children thus ſaved from the miſeries of vice and beggary, after being inſtructed and inured to labour, are put out apprentice; the boys to the ſea ſervice or to trades, and the girls to ſervice in honeſt families.

It may not be altogether unpleaſing to recite the ſpeech of John Truſty, one of theſe poor boys, to her majeſty queen Anne, upon her coming to dine at Guildhall, on Thurſday the 29th of October 1702, the Lord-mayor's day.

" May it pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty to " pardon this great preſumption in us poor chil- " dren, who throw ourſelves at your royal feet, " among the reſt of your glad ſubjects, that here " in crouds appear to behold your ſacred ma- " jeſty.

" We, madam, have no fathers, no mothers, " no friends; or, which is next to none, thoſe " who, through their extreme poverty, cannot " help us. God's providence is our inheritance, " [pointing to the motto on his breaſt.] All the " ſupport we have is from the unexhauſted cha- " rities of your loyal citizens of London, and " others your good ſubjects, and the pious care " of our governors, who are now teaching our " little hands to work, and our fingers to ſpin.

" Theſe threads, madam, [holding out ſome " yarn, which he had in his hand] are ſome of " the early fruits of our induſtry. We are all " daily employed in the ſtaple manufacture of " England, learning betimes to be uſeful to the " world. And there ſeemed nothing wanting " to compleat our happineſs, but the opportunity " which this day affords us, of being the ob- " jects of your tender pity and compaſſion. One " gracious ſmile from your majeſty on this new " foundation will make us live—and live to call " you bleſſed.

" And may God Almighty long preſerve your " majeſty, for the good of theſe your kingdoms, " and your royal conſort the prince. So pray " we, your little children: and let all your peo- " ple ſay, Amen."

In another part of the houſe, called The Keeper's ſide, are kept beggars, vagrants, diſſolute and abandoned ſturdy fellows, who have no honeſt means of ſupport; and the lewd women who are taken up in the ſtreets. All theſe are kept to hard labour and employed in beating of hemp and waſhing of linen. All theſe are not only ſupported, but in caſe of ſickneſs, broken limbs or wounds, have advice, phyſic and ſurgery gratis.

It is a large, ſtrong and uſeful building, with three long rooms or galleries one over another, which are filled with boys and girls at work, who have a proper number of men and women to inſtruct them. They have likewiſe a large and convenient brewhouſe for brewing their own drink, and and over that a malt houſe. In ſhort, every thing is managed with the greateſt prudence and œconomy.

Farther to the north is Lamb-alley; in which are two charitable foundations.

1. Alleyn's alms-houſes for ten poor men and women, built and endowed with forty ſhillings per annum each, by the founder of Dulwich college, in 1614, in Petty France, now New Broad-ſtreet. And

2. Alms-houſes for ſixteen poor old women, built and endowed with two ſhillings and ſixpence a month each, by one Mr. Underwood.

Both theſe charitable foundations were removed from their ſituation into Lamb-alley; where they are accommodated with new houſes, at the expence of the pariſh, and builders of New Broad-ſtreet.

Returning again to the eaſt ſide of Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, we come to Spittal-ſquare, and the ſite of the ancient priory and hoſpital of St. Mary Spittal, founded in the year 1197, by Sir Walter Brune, and Roſſia his wife, for canons regular, and dedicated to the honour of Jeſus Chriſt, and his mother the Bleſſed Virgin Mary.

This foundation was of very conſiderable extent; for in the compoſition made by the prior with the rector of St. Botolph's, concerning tythes, it appears to have begun at Berwards-lane, towards the ſouth, and to run as far as the pariſh of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, to the north, in breadth: and from the king's ſtreet in the weſt, to the biſhop of London's field, called Lallorſworth, (now Spittalfield) on the eaſt.

At the diſſolution of this priory in the reign of Henry VIII. it was valued at 478l. per annum, and there were found in it 178 beds for the receipt of the poor.

On the ſpot where this hoſpital ſtood, and near adjoining, are now many handſome houſes, inhabited by manufacturers, and merchants of great trade and worth.

A part of the large church-yard pertaining to this hoſpital, and ſevered from the reſt by a brick wall, was for a long time remaining, with a pulpit croſs therein, ſomewhat like to that in St. Paul's church-yard; and againſt the ſaid pulpit, on the ſouth ſide, before the charnel and chapel of St. Edmond the biſhop, and St. Mary Magdalen (which chapel was founded about the year 1391) there was a handſome houſe of two ſtories high, for the mayor, aldermen, ſheriffs, and other perſons of diſtinction to ſit in, to hear the ſermons preached in the Eaſter holidays.

It was for a long time a cuſtom, on Good Friday in the afternoon, for ſome learned man, by appointment of the prelates, to preach a ſermon at Paul's croſs, treating of Chriſt's paſſion; and upon the three next Eaſter holidays, Monday, Tueſday and Wedneſday, other learned men, by the like appointment, preached in the forenoon at the Spittal, to perſuade the articles of Chriſt's reſurrection. And then, on Low Sunday, before noon, another learned man, at Paul's Croſs, was to make rehearſal of thoſe four former ſermons, either commending or reproving them, as to him, (by judgment of the learned divines) was thought convenient; after which he was to make a ſermon himſelf. At theſe ſermons, ſo ſeverally preached, the mayor, with his brethren the aldermen, were accuſtomed to be preſent in their violets at St. Paul's on Good Friday, and in their ſcarlets, at the Spittal in the holidays, except Wedneſday in violet, and the mayor, with his brethren, on Low Sunday, in ſcarlet, at Paul's croſs.

This cuſtom was kept up till the year 1642; but in the grand rebellion the pulpit was broken down, and the cuſtom of preaching was diſcontinued. However, at the reſtoration, it was ſo far revived, that the Spittal ſermons have been ſince preached every Eaſter at St. Bride's in Fleet-ſtreet, and honoured with the preſence of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, &c.

We ſhall leave this ward at the ſouth-eaſt corner of Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, next Cornhill, where are a row of ſpacious new buildings, which ſupply the place of thoſe conſumed by fire in the year 1765. Among theſe is one remarkably extenſive and lofty, which was built at the expence of ſome principal merchants, who are proprietors thereof, as a tavern, and is called The London.

It is worthy of remark, that in clearing the rubbiſh to make way for theſe new buildings, there appeared the remains of an ancient church or chapel, which had long ſerved for the uſes of cellaring to the four houſes that covered this relick of antiquity; but when, or by whom this old church was founded, we have no account. In taking the dimenſions of it, the inſide meaſured forty feet in length, and twenty-ſix feet and an inch in breadth. The length conſiſted of four arches; and the breadth of two iſles: that towards the ſouth being of nine feet three inches broad, and that on the north ſixteen feet. The roof of this ſubterraneous monument was at that time only ten feet nine inches above the preſent floor, occaſioned by the extenſive raiſing of the ground in this part of the city. And if we may be allowed to form a conjecture upon a well grounded authority, that this was once a church dedicated to St. Andrew the apoſtle, ſuper or at the top of Cornhill, which cannot be applied to St Andrew's Underſhaft, without many objections; and as there are no other remains of a church near the top of Cornhill, beſides theſe ruins, it appears very probable that the premiſes here deſcribed are the remains of the church, which once ſtood at the top or above Cornhill, dedicated to St. Andrew the apoſtle, from which the other church at the corner of St. Mary-ax, dedicated to the ſame ſaint, was diſtinguiſhed by the addition of Underſhaft.

About twelve feet more to the north, and under the very houſe where the fire was ſuppoſed to have begun, there was another ſtone building, thirty feet long, fourteen feet broad, and eight feet ſix inches above the preſent floor, with a door on the north ſide, a window at the eaſt end, and the appearance of another at the weſt end. This building was covered with a ſemicircular arch, made of ſmall pieces of chalk in the form of bricks, and rubbed with ſtone, reſembling the arches of a bridge: but this ſtructure did not appear to have any connection or communication with the before-mentioned. Nor does any ancient hiſtory give us the leaſt account thereof; nor of any religious or other remarkable foundation in this neighbourhood, ſerving to lead us to a diſcovery and explanation of ſo remarkable a building, buried by the ſtreets of London.

Of BREADSTREET WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from the principal ſtreet therein, called Bread-ſtreet, where formerly was held the bread-market; as appears by records of the year 1302, when the bakers of London were obligated not to ſell any bread in their ſhops or houſes, but in open market.

Bread-ſtreet ward is encompaſſed on the north and north-weſt by the ward of Farringdon within; on the eaſt by Cordwainer's ward; on the ſouth by Queenhithe ward; and on the weſt by Caſtle Baynard ward. It begins in Cheapſide on the north, and runs on the ſouth ſide from where the ſtandard, to where the croſs formerly ſtood, then called Goldſmiths-row. It extends on the ſouth in Watling-ſtreet up almoſt to the houſe next to St. Auguſtin's church on the north ſide; and on the ſouth ſide, up to the Old Change; and down the ſame at the eaſt ſide, by the weſt end of Maiden-lane, or Diſtaff-lane, to Knightrider-ſtreet, or, as that part is called, Old Fiſh-ſtreet; and all the north ſide of the ſaid ſtreet, till over againſt the Trinity church and Trinity-lane.

This ward is divided into thirteen precincts, and is governed by an alderman, twelve common-council-men, (of whom one is the alderman's deputy) thirteen conſtables, thirteen inqueſt-men, thirteen ſcavengers, and a beadle.

The principal ſtreets and places in this ward are, Watling ſtreet, Bread-ſtreet, Friday-ſtreet, Diſtaff-lane, Baſing-lane, with the eaſt ſide of the Old Change, from the corner of St. Auſtin's gate to Old Fiſh-ſtreet; and the north ſide of Old Fiſh-ſtreet and Trinity-lane, with part of the ſouth ſide of Cheapſide, betwixt Friday-ſtreet, and St. Mary-le-Bow church.

Bread-ſtreet is an open ſtreet, well built, and principally inhabited by hop-merchants and other great dealers: on the eaſt ſide of which, at the corner next Watling-ſtreet, is ſituate the pariſh church of ALLHALLOWS Bread-Street.

This church, which is a rectory, and a peculiar belonging to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, owes its name to its ſituation, and dedication to All Saints.

The advowſon of this church was in the prior and canons of Chriſt's church in Canterbury till the year 1365, when, in return for the many favours conferred upon them by their archbiſhop, they, on the twenty-fourth of April, by a proper inſtrument under their common ſeal, did convey and aſſign the right of preſentation to Simon archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his ſucceſſors, in whom it ſtill continues.

The old church being deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666, the preſent edifice was erected in 1684, at the expence of the public; and ſerves not only for the accommodation of the inhabitants of its own pariſh, but likewiſe thoſe of St. John the Evangeliſt's, who are thereunto annexed by act of parliament. This church conſiſts of a plain body, with a ſquare tower eighty-ſix feet high, divided into four ſtages with arches near the top. The inſide is handſomely wainſcoted and pewed, the pulpit finely carved, the ſounding board veneered, a neat gallery at the weſt end, and a ſpacious altar-piece well adorned and beautified. The veſtry is general, and the officers are two church-wardens.

At this church are prayers every Thurſday at five o'clock in the afternoon, from Michaelmas to Midſummer, and a ſermon, the gift of Mr. Daniel Elliot. And on the twenty-fifth of July is another gift ſermon in memory of the defeat of the Spaniſh armada.

The pariſh church of St. John the Evangeliſt burnt down in 1666, (and afterwards united to Allhallows) was a rectory, and ſtood on the eaſt ſide of Friday-ſtreet, next Watling-ſtreet. It was founded about the ſame time as Allhallows, and was in the gift of the prior and chapter of Chriſt church, Canterbury, till they conveyed it, with the aforeſaid church, to the archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The ſite of this church remains now only as a burial place for the inhabitants of this pariſh. The veſtry is general, and they have two church-wardens. The two pariſhes united together produce the yearly value of 140l. in lieu of tythes.

On the ſame ſide of this ſtreet ſtands the pariſh church of St. MILDRED, Breadstreet.

So denominated from its dedication to St. Mildred, a Saxon ſaint, who was abbeſs of a monaſtery in the Iſle of Thanet, where ſhe died in the year 676.

It is a rectory, founded by lord Trenchant of St. Albans, about the year 1300; but it had neither veſtry-room nor church-yard till 1428, when Sir John Chadworth, or Shadworth, by his will gave a veſtry and church-yard to the pariſhioners, and a parſonage houſe to the rector. After this church was burnt down in 1666, and rebuilt, it had the pariſh of St. Margaret Moſes united to it.

The front of the preſent edifice is built of free-ſtone; the other parts of brick: the roof is covered with lead, and the floor paved with purbeck ſtone. Within is a neat wainſcot gallery at the weſt end, and the pulpit is enriched: the altar-piece is handſomely adorned; and the communion table ſtands upon a foot-piece of black and white marble, incloſed with rails and banniſters.

The advowſon of this church was anciently in the prior and canons of St. Mary Overies, Southwark, till Bartholomew, the prior, and convent, in the year 1533, granted the patronage thereof to John Oliver and others, for a certain term of years; after the expiration of which it came to Sir Nicholas Criſpe, in whoſe family the gift is ſaid ſtill to remain. The veſtry is general, and the pariſh officers are only two churchwardens.

The pariſh of St. Margaret Moſes, which is annexed to St. Mildred, was a rectory, the church whereof ſtood at the ſouth weſt corner of Piſſing-alley (now Little Friday-ſtreet) oppoſite diſtaff-lane. It received its name from being dedicated to St. Margaret, virgin and martyr of Antioch in Piſidia; and takes the addition of Moſes from one of that name who was a conſiderable benefactor or rebuilder thereof.

The patronage of this rectory appears to have been anciently in lay hands; for Robert Fitzwalter gave the ſame to the prior and canons of St. Faith's, at Horeham in the county of Norfolk; which being confirmed to them by a bull of pope Alexander III. in the year 1163, it continued in the ſaid prior and cannons till the ſuppreſſion of their convent by Edward the third: when this church came to the crown, where it has ever ſince continued.

This church, which was burnt down in 1666, being annexed to St. Mildred's, the yearly value of both theſe rectories was ſettled by act of parliament at 130l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

One part of the ſite of this church was ſold to the city for widening Piſſing-alley, lying between Friday-ſtreet and Bread-ſtreet; and the money which aroſe from the ſale thereof was applied towards the paving and beautifying the ſaid church of St. Mildred; the other part now remaining is the burial place form the inhabitants of St. Margaret's pariſh.

The officers of this pariſh are two church-wardens; and the veſtry is general.

The patronage of St. Mildred's being in the family of the Criſps, and that of St. Margaret's in the crown, they preſent to both livings alternately.

On the north ſide of Great Diſtaff-lane is a handſome brick building, conſiſting of ſeveral good rooms, called

CORDWAINERS HALL;

The principal room of which, is adorned with the pictures of king William and queen Mary.

This company was incorporated by letters patent granted by king Henry IV. in the year 1410, by the name of Cordwainers and Coblers, the latter of which names was then far from being a deſpicable term, as it ſignified not only a ſhoemaker, but a dealer in ſhoes; and it does not appear that the word ſhoe-maker was then in uſe.

King Richard II. marrying the daughter of Wenceſlaus king of Bohemia, the Engliſh by her example wore long peaked ſhoes tied to their knees with ſilk laces, or ſilver chains gilt. This prepoſterous faſhion occaſioned the paſſing of an act of parliament, in the reign of Edward IV. in which it was enacted, that no cordwainer or cobler within the city of London, or three miles of it, ſhould make any ſhoes, galoſhes or huſeans; that is, boots or buſkins, with any pyke, or poleyn, exceeding the length of two inches, to be adjudged by the wardens or governors of the ſame myſtery in London; nor ſhould they preſume to ſell, or put upon the legs or feet of any perſon, any ſhoes, boots, or buſkins, on Sundays, or on the feaſts of the nativity and aſcenſion of our Lord, or on Corpus Chriſti day, on the penalty of paying twenty ſhillings for each offence. See page 131.

This company, by a late charter, is ſtiled, "The maſter, wardens and commonalty of the "myſtery of cordwainers, of the city of London." They are governed by a maſter, four wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants. It is a livery company, and the twenty ſeventh on the city liſt.

On the weſt ſide of Bread-ſtreet formerly ſtood a priſon-houſe belonging to the ſheriffs of London, called the compter. But in the year 1555 the priſoners were removed from thence to another new compter in Wood-ſtreet; provided by the city's purchaſe, and built for that purpoſe. The cauſe of this priſon being removed may be ſeen in page 203.

On the ſouth ſide of Baſing-lane is ſituate

GERARD's-HALL-INN.

This building has ſtood many geenerations in great repute, for its accommodations and good entertainment, both for man and horſe, and for all kinds of carriages. It is built upon the remains of the manſion-houſe of the ancient family of Giſors, ſome of whom, for many ages, filled, and with dignity and honour ſerved, the chief offices in the magiſtracy of this city. In thoſe days it was called Giſor's hall. John Giſor, mayor of London, was owner of it in 1245, and by deſcent it came to another of the ſame name in 1386, who made a feoffment of it. From which we are to look upon the preſent appellation of Gerard's-hall to be no other than a corruption of Gerard for Giſor, and Gerard's-hall for Giſor's-hall; without having recourſe to the fabulous tradition which was ſwallowed by our credulous anceſtors, who were weak enough to believe that this was the habitation of Gerard, a giant, who uſed a poll in the wars forty feet long, and fifteen inches round; and whoſe ſkull being found would hold five pecks; and his thigh bone was ſix feet long, and one of his teeth weighed ten pounds troy: without conſidering that a perſon of ſuch prodigious dimenſions could not poſſibly inhabit a houſe or hall of the ſize this appears to have been by its remains, which are ſtill to be ſeen in the arched vaults, ſupported by ſixteeen pillars, built of ſtone brought from Caen in Normandy, and are now uſed for cellars, being entirely under the floor of the building.

Before

Before we leave this ward, we ſhall take notice of a moſt beautiful ſet of houſes and ſhops which were, in ancient times, ſituate between Bread-ſtreet end, and the croſs in Cheap, at that time called Goldſmith's Row. This row of houſes was built by Thomas Wood, goldſmith, one of the ſheriffs of London in the year 1491. It contained in number ten dwelling houſes and fourteen ſhops, all in one frame, uniformerly built four ſtories high, beautified towards the ſtreet with the goldſmiths arms, and the likeneſs of woodmen, in memory of his name, riding on monſtrous beaſts; all which were caſt in lead, richly painted over and gilt. Theſe he gave to the goldſmiths, with a ſtock of money to young men who inhabited theſe ſhops. This ſaid front was again new painted and gilt over in the year 1593, Sir Richard Martin being then mayor.

The goldſmiths originally kept their ſhops and trade in Weſt-cheap, even before the days of king Edward III. to the time of king Charles I. And the Exchange for the king's coin was not far off the place now called the Old Change, as appears by record, which not only ſhews the place of the goldſmiths habitation, but their occupation and buſineſs about the coin and plate.

CHAPTER VII.

Of BRIDGE-WARD Within and BROAD-STREET Ward.

BRIDGE Ward within derives its name from its connection with London-bridge; for it begins at the end next Southwark, from whence it reacheth direct north up Grace-church-ſtreet, as far as the corner of Lombard-ſtreet and Fenchurch-ſtreet, including all the bridge, the greateſt part of all the alleys and courts on the eaſt ſide, and on the weſt ſide all the alleys, courts and lanes in Thames-ſtreet on both ſides to New key, part of Michael's-lane, and part of Crooked-lane.

It is encompaſſed on the ſouth by Southwark and the river Thames; on the eaſt by Billingſgate ward; on the north by Langbourn ward; and on the weſt by Candlewick and Dowgate wards.

The government of this ward is an alderman, fifteen common-council-men, (of whom one is the alderman's deputy) fourteen conſtables, fifteen inqueſt-men, fourteen ſcavengers and a beadle.

London bridge, which is the firſt principal place in this ward, the reader will find particularly deſcribed (from its origin to its preſent ſituation) in pages 29—34.

At the north end of this bridge, under the four arches, are fixed the works of a water company, who, from this ſituation, are called the company of the London-bridge water-works. It was originally the invention of Peter Maurice, a Dutchman, in 1582, to ſupply the city with water from the Thames through wooden pipes. (See page 207) This invention has, by many improvements, arrived to ſuch perfection, under the direction of that great maſter the late Mr. Hadley, that theſe works, in their preſent condition, are ſaid to be ſuperior to the moſt famed water-engine at Marli in France, which coſts 25000l. ſterling per annum, to keep it in repair.

The wheels placed, under the arches, are moved by the common ſtream of the tide water of the river Thames. One turn of the four wheels makes 114 ſtrokes; and, when the river is at beſt, the wheels go ſix times round in a minute; and but four and a half at middle water; ſo that the number of ſtrokes in a minute are 684. And as the ſtroke is two feet and a half in a ſeven inch bore, which raiſes three ale gallons, they raiſe 2052 gallons in a minute; that is, 123,120 gallons, or 1954 hogſheads in an hour; which is at the rate of 46,896 hogſheads per day, to the height of 120 feet, including the waſte, which may be computed at a fifth part of the whole. The wheels force the water to a baſon on the top of a high tower of wood, which ſtands on the ſterling of the firſt arch on the north weſt end of the bridge; by which means the water is raiſed to any part of the city. A farther addition has been lately made to theſe water-works on the ſouth-weſt ſide of the bridge.

Excluſive of the improvements made to London bridge, the narrow entrance on the north ſide is made as wide as the bridge, by pulling down all the houſes on the weſt ſide of the ſtreet as far as Thames-ſtreet, and throwing the new buildings backwards; and on the eaſt ſide a foot way is made under the ſteeple or tower of the church of ST. MAGNUS.

This church, which is a rectory, ſituate at the north-eaſt corner of London-bridge, owes its name to its dedication to St. Magnus, who ſuffered martyrdom under the emperor Aurelian, in the city of Cæſarea, for his ſtedfaſt adherence to the chriſtian religion.

The patronage of this church was anciently in the abbots and convents of Weſtminſter and Bermondſey, who preſented alternately, till the general ſuppreſſion of monaſteries; when coming to the crown, queen Mary, by her letters patent, A. D. 1553, granted the ſame to the biſhop of London, and his ſucceſſors, in whom it ſtill remains.

The old church ſuffered the like fate with others in the general conflagration in 1666; and when rebuilt, was made the parochial church for this and the pariſh of St. Margaret, New Fiſh-ſtreet, which is annexed to it by act of parliament. The body of the preſent ſtructure was built in the year 1676, but the ſteeple was not added till ſeveral years after.

It is a ſpacious and maſſy ſtone building; plain, and yet well ornamented. The corners have ruſtic quoins, and the body is enlightened by tall arched windows, over each of which is a cornice ſupported by ſcrolls, and between theſe is a cherub over the center of each window. At the weſt end coupled pilaſters riſe on each ſide the door, from a plain courſe, and ſupport a pediment. The door on the northſide is alſo placed under a pediment, but without the particular decorations of the other. Over each door is an oval window, and the laſt is decorated with feſtoons. The roof is hid by a kind of attic courſe, from which the tower riſes ſquare and plain; and from this the dial, which is very richly ornamented, projects over the ſtreet. The courſe above this is adorned at the corners with coupled pilaſters of the Ionic order, ſupporting an open work in the place of a baluſtrade, with large urns at the corners of an uncommon ſhape. From within this open work riſes the lanthorn, which has alſo Ionic pilaſters, and arched windows in all the intercolumniations. The doom reſts upon theſe pilaſters, and on its crown is placed a piece of open work like that which ſurrounds the baſe of the lanthorn. On this is raiſed the turret which ſupports the fane.

The veſtry is ſelect, and conſiſts of thirty-three members; and the officers are, two church-wardens, one of whom is collector for the poor. In this church is a peal of ten bells.

Before the fire of London the parochial church of St. Margaret was ſituate on the eaſt ſide of Fiſh ſtreet-hill (ſo called from the number of fiſhmongers which formerly inhabited this ſtreet; but now there is only one of that trade, or two at the moſt) on the ſpot where the monument now ſtands, and dedicated to Margaret, a virgin, who was beheaded for the chriſtian faith under the emperor Decius.

The patronage of this rectory appears to have been in the abbot, and convent, and biſhop of Wincheſter, till queen Mary, by her letters patent, in the year 1553, granted the ſame to the biſhop of London, and his ſucceſſors, in whom it ſtill continues.

The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are two churchwardens.

This pariſh being annexed to St. Magnus, the two are valued together at 17ol. in lieu of tythes.

On the ſite of St. Margaret's church now ſtands the monument, which the reader will ſee fully deſcribed in page 253-4

At the ſouth weſt corner of Fenchurch-ſtreet is ſituate the parochial church of

St. BENNETS GRASS-CHURCH,

So called from its dedication to St. Benedict, and its vicinity to the graſs or herb market, which was anciently kept before the weſt door of this church.

It is a rectory, and in the gift of the canons of St. Paul's, London, in the year 1181, in whom the patronage ſtill continues.

The old church, being much damaged by the fire in 1666, was taken down, and the preſent ſtructure erected in its place, which is built principally of ſtone, and is a regular, convenient and neat edifice, without the expence of columns and porticos. It has a handſome baluſtrade at the top, and a very high ſpire of the obeliſk kind, the baſe of which is ſupported by four porticos. The inſide is well wainſcoted and handſomely pewed; the pulpit well veneered, carved, and adorned with cherubs, &c. Here is a Sunday's afternoon lecture, with an endowment of forty pounds per annum, founded by Mrs. Joan Newton.

The veſtry is ſelect; and the officers of the pariſh are, only two churchwardens.

This church not only accommodates its own inhabitants, but likewiſe thoſe of the pariſh of St. Leonard, Eaſtcheap, which is annexed to it; and both together are of the yearly value of 140l. in lieu of tythes.

The church of St. Leonard Eaſtcheap was burnt down in 1666, and never rebuilt. It was dedicated to one Leonard, a french ſaint, and biſhop of Limognes, and was ſome time named St. Leonard Milk-church, from William Malker, the builder thereof.

The patronage of this rectory, which was anciently in the prior and convent of Canterbury, is at preſent in the dean and chapter of that ſee. The ſite of it remains now only a burial place for the inhabitants of this pariſh, whoſe veſtry is ſelect, and has no more officers than two church-wardens.

Some little way from the bridge, on the weſt ſide of this ward, oppoſite the Thames, ſtands

FISHMONGERS HALL.

The front entrance to this hall is from Thames-ſtreet, by a handſome paſſage, that leads into a large ſquare court, paved with flat ſtones, and encompaſſed by the great hall, the court room for the aſſiſtants, and other grand apartments, with galleries. Theſe are of an handſome conſtruction, and are ſupported by Ionic columns, with an arcade. The back front, or that next the Thames, has a grand double flight of ſtone ſteps, which lead to the firſt apartments from the wharf. The door is adorned with Ionic columns, and theſe ſupport an open pediment, in which is a ſhield, with the arms of the company. The windows are ornamented with ſtone caſes, and the quoins of the building are wrought with a handſome ruſtic. Within is the ſtatue of Sir William Wallworth, knt. Fiſhmonger, who, when he was Lord-mayor, ſlew Wat Tyler. (See page 85.)

The company of fiſhmongers, as well as other perſons concerned in furniſhing the city with proviſions, were anciently under the immediate direction of the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, to whom this power was confirmed by an act of parliament in the ſeventh of Richard II. in the year 1384. At that time the dealers of fiſh conſiſted of two communities, viz. the ſtock fiſhmongers and ſalt fiſhmongers; and both of them had no leſs than ſix halls; two in Thames-ſtreet, two in New Fiſh-ſtreet, and two in Old Fiſh-ſtreet; and were in ſuch reputation for valuable members, that ſix Lord-mayors were choſen out of them in twenty-four years.

The ſalt fiſhmongers were incorporated in the year 1433, but the ſtock fiſhmongers not till 1509. This ſeparation, however, proving prejudicial to both, they united, and obtained a charter from king Henry VIII. in 1536, by which they were incorporated by the name of "the "wardens and commonalty of the myſtery of "fiſhmongers of the city of London."

This is one of the twelve principal companies; and is governed by a prime, five other wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants. It is a livery company, and the fourth on the liſt of the city corporation.

Of BROAD-STREET WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from that part of it called Old Broad-ſtreet, which before the fire of London, was accounted one of the broadeſt ſtreets in the city.

It is bounded on the north and eaſt by Biſhopſgate-ward, on the ſouth by Cornhill-ward and Wallbrook-ward, and on the weſt by Coleman-ſtreet ward: and extends from the eaſt corner of Helmet or Croſs keys court in Wormwood-ſtreet in the north eaſt, to the iron grate over the common ſewer, near the backgate of Bethlehem-hoſpital, in the north weſt; and from the eaſt corner of Allhallows church, where New Broad-ſtreet begins, in the north, to the iron grate over the common ſewer, under the eaſt end of St. Margaret's-church in Lothbury, in the ſouth weſt, and up pig-ſtreet, to the pump facing St. Bennet Fink's church in the ſouth; and from the pump near the north eaſt corner of St. Martin Outwich's church-wall in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, in the ſouth eaſt, to ſcalding-alley in the Poultry, which is the ſouth-weſt extremity, including Threadneedle-ſtreet, both ſides; Bartholomew-lane; Princes-ſtreet, almoſt as far as Catharine-court on the eaſt ſide; both ſides of Lothbury, from the grate eaſtward; Throgmorton-ſtreet, Pig-ſtreet, and Broad-ſtreet, both ſides; Wincheſter-ſtreet, Auguſtine-friars, and Wormwood-ſtreet, as far as Helmet-court in the eaſt; and ſo much of London-wall as extends from the north weſt corner of Old Broad-ſtreet to the grate near Bethlehem back-gate, with the alleys and courts on the ſouth ſide, as far as Swan-alley in Little Bell-alley, Coleman-ſtreet pariſh.

This ward is governed by an alderman, ten common-council-men, (one of whom is the alderman's deputy) ten conſtables, thirteen inqueſt men, eight ſcavengers, and a beadle; and is divided into ten precincts.

We ſhall begin the ſurvey of this ward in that ſtreet which gave riſe to its name, viz. Old Broad-ſtreet; on the eaſt ſide of which ſtood a ſet of alms-houſes, founded by Sir Thomas Greſham in the year 1575, for eight decayed poor men, citizens of London, which Sir Thomas endowed with ſix pound, thirteen ſhillings and four pence per annum for each perſon, to be paid quarterly out of the chamber of London; a load of coals every year, and a gown once in two years. And the Lord-mayor and commonalty of London were empowered to execute the ſaid truſt. Theſe houſes however have been lately taken down to make way for the new exciſe office.

On the weſt-ſide of this ſtreet, nearly oppoſite the back entrance of the South ſea-houſe, is ſituate the pariſh of St. PETER LE POOR.

We cannot minutely account for the origin of this church; but that it is of ancient foundation is manifeſt from the ſtate thereof in 1181. It was dedicated to St. Peter, the apoſtle, and diſtinguiſhed from other churches of that name, by the addition of le Poor, either from the builder's name, or the poor ſtate of the pariſh at the time of its foundation.

This church, which eſcaped the general conflagration in 1666, is ſuppoſed to have been rebuilt in the year 1540. And in 1615 it was enlarged with the left wing, at the ſole expence of Sir William Garway, knt. who expended 400l. in the improvement for the convenience of the pariſhioners. After which the pariſhioners, being animated by this generous act, repaired and beautified the whole church, new built the ſteeple and a good gallery at the weſt end, and new caſt and hung the bells, at the charge of 158/l.

It is a gothic ſtructure, but mean in itſelf; and made more ſo by its untoward ſituation: one of its corners being thruſt as it were into the ſtreet, makes the ſtreet narrow, obſtructs the paſſage, and deſtroys the viſta. It is of very conſiderable breadth in proportion to its length, viz. fifty four feet long, and fifty-one broad; the height to the roof is no more than twenty-three feet, and the height of the tower and turret together ſeventy five feet. The body is plain and unornamented; the windows are very large; and the dial is fixed to a beam, that is joined at one end to a kind of turret, and extends acroſs the ſtreet like a country ſign poſt. The tower riſes ſquare, without diminution, is ſtrengthened at the corners with ruſtic; and upon this is placed a turret, which conſiſts of ſtrong piers at the corners arched over, and covered with an open dome; whence riſes a ball, with a fane.

The advowſon of this church, which is a rectory, appears to have been all along in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's. The tythes at preſent amount to about 130l. a year; and the other profits by annual annual donations ſettled upon the rector, are ſuppoſed to amount to near as much more.

The veſtry is general, and the pariſh officers are, ſix auditors of accounts, two churchwardens and two ſideſmen.

A little to the north of this church is a ſtreet known by the name of Auſtin-friars. On which ſpot was a priory dedicated to St. Auguſtin, biſhop of Hippo in Africa, and founded for the Friars Eremites, of that order, in the year 1253, by Humphrey Bohun, earl of Hereford and Eſſex. Theſe eremites or friars, were of the mendicant ſort, and continued in the poſſeſſion of the place till its diſſolution by king Henry VIII. who granted a great part of it to William Pawlet, lord St. John, afterwards marquis of Wincheſter; ſince which time the greateſt part has been pulled down, and many houſes built; but a part of the old church belonging to the priory is ſtill remaining. King Edward VI. granted all the church, except the choir, to a congregation of Germans, and other ſtrangers, who fled hither for the ſake of religion, ordered it to be called the Temple of the Lord Jeſus; and ſeveral ſucceſſive princes have confirmed it to the Dutch, by whom it is ſtill uſed as a place of divine worſhip.

It is a large and ſpacious Gothic edifice, ſupported by two rows of ſtone pillars. At the eaſt end are ſeveral ſteps, which lead to a large platform, on which is placed a long table with ſeats againſt the wall, and forms round, for the uſe of the holy communion, and the windows on one ſide have painted on them in ſeveral places, the word Jeſus Temple. On the weſt end over the ſcreen is a library thus inſcribed, Eccleſiæ Londino Belgicæ, Bibliotheca, extructa ſumptibus Mariæ Dubois 1659, It contains ſeveral valuable manuſcripts, among which are the letters of Calvin, Peter Martyr, and other foreign reformers.

This church is now called the Dutch church in Auſtin Friars; and is ſerved by two miniſters, who preach twice every Sunday, and once in the week. They adminiſter the ſacrament on the laſt Sunday of every month; and exchange churches every firſt Sunday in the month with the Walloon congregation, for their adminiſtration of the Euchariſt, their own church in Threadneedle-ſtreet being too ſmall for them. The miniſters have good ſalaries, and the church provides a ſufficient ſubſiſtence for their widows.

In 1704 this Dutch congregation in Auguſtin-friars, built at their common charge, in Middle Moorfields, a handſome alms-houſe, containing twenty-ſix rooms, for maintaining their poor men or women, and a room for the elders and deacons of their church to meet weekly upon buſineſs, and to pay the alms people, who receive more or leſs, as their neceſſities may require. The whole charge of their poor is computed at 1200l. per annum, part of which is collected after ſermon every Sunday, &c. at the church door.

A little to the eaſt of Bethlehem hoſpital is ſituate the parochial church of ALLHALLOWS, London-Wall.

It does not ſufficiently appear when this church was founded; but we have reaſon to ſuppoſe it was ſome time after the foundation of the priory of the Holy Trinity near Aldgate, in whoſe patronage this church was originally, and who preſented Thomas Richer de Sanſton thereunto in the year 1335. At the diſſolution of their religious houſes under king Henry VIII. this church was, with the priory, unto which it belonged, ſurrendered to the crown, in whom the advowſon ſtill remains, the lord-chancellor or lord-keeper, for the time being, preſenting thereunto.

The old church eſcaped the fire of London in 1666; but was become ſo ruinous, that in 1765 the pariſhioners obtained an act of parliament to empower them to pull it down, together with the parſonage-houſe, and to enable them to raiſe money by annuities to rebuild the ſame. This church, which has been finiſhed ſome time, is built with brick and ſtone; and though plain, yet is very neat. It is ſomewhat longer than the old church, and the parſonage houſe is built at the north eaſt corner of the church-yard.

The produce of this living is computed to be about 150l. per annum. The veſtry is ſelect, and formed of ſuch as have ſerved or fined for churchwardens and conſtables. And the pariſh officers are two churchwardens, two overſeers of the poor, and two ſideſmen.

In a court on the ſouth ſide of the ſtreet called London Wall, nearly oppoſite the eaſt end of Bethlehem hoſpital, is ſituate.

CARPENTERS HALL.

This building, though very old, and compoſed of timber and plaiſter, is not without its beauty and peculiar ornaments; and it enjoys an agreeable proſpect into drapers gardens, which lie towards the ſouth.

This fraternity, which is very ancient, was incorporated by king Edward III. in the year 1344, with power to make by-laws. It is now governed by a maſter, three wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants; and has a livery.

At the ſouth eaſt corner of Great Wincheſter-ſtreet is Pinners or Pinmakers Hall.

This hall is principally uſed as a meeting-houſe for independents and anabaptiſts; and is the only meeting-houſe in London where the audience are not Calviniſts. The independents meet on the Sunday morning; and the anabaptiſts on the Sunday afternoon.

This company was incorporated by king Charles I. in the year 1636; and are governed by a maſter, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants: but have not a livery.

This end of Wincheſter-ſtreet leads us into Old Broad ſtreet, and terminates on the north ſide with

THE PAY OFFICE.

This office, whoſe front is in Old Broad-ſtreet, is kept in a large houſe, part of the remains of the marquis of Wincheſter's manſion-houſe, called Wincheſter-

Wincheſter-place. It is under the direction of a treaſurer and paymaſter, who pay for all the ſtores uſed in the royal navy, and the wages of thoſe that ſail in his majeſty's ſervice. The treaſurer's ſalary is 2000l. per annum; and the paymaſter, who is alſo accomptant, has 500l. a year: under this laſt are eight clerks who attend the payment of wages; three who have eighty pounds a year; and five who have forty pounds a year each; beſides two extra clerks who have each 50l. a year. There are alſo five clerks for paying bills in courſe, and writing ledgers, viz. three who have eighty pounds a year; and two who have only forty pounds a year each; beſides an extra clerk who has 50l. a year.

In this office there is likewiſe a caſhier of the victualling, who has a ſalary of 150l. per annum, and has three clerks under him; one of 70l. one of 50l. and one of 40l. a year.

Not far from this is Wormwood-ſtreet, in which are a ſet of alms-houſes for twelve poor women, founded by Mr. Kemp, and endowed with one ſhilling per week, with other perquiſites.

From this ſtreet we return back to Throgmorton-ſtreet, on the north ſide of which is ſituate

DRAPERS HALL.

This is a ſpacious and noble edifice, built upon the ruins of a palace erected on that ſpot by Thomas lord Cromwell in the reign of king Henry VIII. which, being forfeited to the crown by his attainder and execution for high treaſon, was purchaſed by the company of drapers, who converted it into a hall for tranſacting the buſineſs of their corporation: and that building being deſtroyed in the fire of London, the drapers company built the preſent hall, which is a moſt elegant building, compoſing the four ſides of a quadrangle, each of which is elevated on columns, and adorned with arches, formed in a piazza round a ſquare court; and between each arch is a ſhield mantling and other fretwork. On the eaſt ſide is the common-hall, to which you aſcend by a grand ſtair-caſe; and within it is adorned with a ſtately ſcreen and fine wainſcot. On the ſcreen between the two doors, hangs the picture, a three quarters length of Henry Fitz-Alwyn, a draper, and the firſt Lord-mayor of London. At the north end of this room are the pictures, at full length, and as big as life, of king William III. king George I. and king George II, in their royal robes.

At the north weſt angle of this room a door opens into another called the court room, richly wainſcoted and furniſhed; at the eaſt end of which hangs an original picture of Mary queen of Scots, at full length, with her infant ſon, king James I. in her hand. From this court room another door, at the weſt end, opens into a large gallery, at the north end of which a folding ſaſh-door opens into a ground ſquare rooom called the ladies chamber; in which, formerly, the company treated their wives and friends with a ball. In the center of this room hangs a large and beautiful chandalier of cut glaſs, preſented to the company by Sir Joſeph Eyles, knt. and over the chimney is a fine picture of Sir Robert Clayton, knt. ſometime Lord-mayor of London. The ſouth end of this gallery leads into the apartments alloted to the clerk, which are very commodious and elegant, with offices below for the tranſacting of buſineſs. And theſe apartments, with the accommodation for the upper porter, fill up the whole front of this noble building.

At the north-weſt angle of this quadrangle there is a paved paſſage to the gardens belonging to this hall. Over this paſſage, upon an arch built of brick and ſtone, is a ſtrong room, covered with a large back or ciſtern of water. This is the record room, where the company keep their writings, books, and papers; and their plate, which for quantity and workmanſhip, is ſaid to exceed all the ſervices of plate in other companies. The gardens, which are pleaſant and commodious, are open every day except Sundays and wet days, for the recreation of all perſons decently dreſſed. The ground which they occupy is very near upon a ſquare: the middle is incloſed with iron rails, and laid out in graſs beds, gravel walks and borders of flowers; with a ſtatue of Flora in the center. Without the rails are fine ſpacious walks, kept in good order, and agreeably ſhaded with rows of lime trees. At the ſouth weſt corner is a very handſome pavilion for the accommodation of company in hot weather, when tired with walking: and near the north eaſt angle is a very commodious houſe for the uſe of the upper beadle of the company. The north ſide lies open to carpenters hall; and at the ſouth eaſt angle there is a privy garden, incloſed with walls; on the ſouth ſide of which, under the ladies chamber, is a private room elegantly furniſhed, where the managers, or ruling part of the company, hold their ſecret committees, or previous meetings, before matters are repreſented to a general court.

This company was an ancient ſociety or guild, devoted and dedicated to the Virgin Mary; and was incorporated by letters patent of Henry VI. A. D. 1439, by the ſtile and title of "the maſter, "wardens, brethren and ſiſters of the guild or "fraternity of the Bleſſed Mary the Virgin, "of the myſtery of drapers of the city of "London."

This is the third of the twelve principal companies, and is governed by a maſter, four wardens and a court of aſſiſtants. They have very large eſtates, and pay to charitable uſes about four thouſand pounds per annum.

Near the ſouth end of Princes-ſtreet, on the north ſide of Threadneedle-ſtreet, is ſituate the parochial church of St. CHRISTOPHER.

This church, which is a rectory, was founded by the noble family of the Nevils about the year 1368, and dedicated to St. Chriſtopher, a convert from paganiſm, and martyr for the chriſtian faith under Decius the emperor. It was rebuilt of ſtone in 1506 in its preſent form, except the inſide, which was entirely conſumed by the fire in 1666. The body is well enlightened, and the tower is crowned with four handſome pinnacles.

The patronage of this church has been in the biſhop biſhop of London for upwards of three hundred years; and the rector beſides other advantages, receives 120l. a year in lieu of tithes.

Here are two pious foundations: one by Mr. John Kendrick, citizen and draper, who left lands to the drapers company to pay 20l. per annum for ever to the curate of this church, to read divine ſervice in the ſaid pariſh-church at ſix o'clock in the morning every day in the week, except Sundays; with fifty ſhillings per annum to the clerk; the like to the ſexton; and five pounds to the churchwardens yearly for ever, for the ſupport of lights in the winter. The other was founded by Mr. Benedict Harlewing, who gave certain houſes in Fleet-ſtreet to this pariſh, on condition they ſhould pay, out of their rent 20l. per annum to the curate, for reading prayers every day in the week, Sundays excepted, at ſix o'clock in the evening.

The veſtry is general, and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens and overſeers, and two ſideſmen.

A little to the eaſt of this church ſtands

The BANK of ENGLAND.

This is a ſtone building, the front of which next Threadneedle ſtreet is about eighty-feet in length, of the Ionic order, raiſed on a ruſtic baſement, in a good ſtile. Through this front is a grand gate that opens into the court yard, and leads into the great hall. This is of the Corinthian order, with a pediment in the middle. The top of the building is adorned with a baluſtrade and handſome vaſes, and in the face of the above pediment is engraved in relievo the company's ſeal, viz. Britannia ſitting with her ſhield and ſpear, and at her feet a cornucopia pouring out fruit. The hall within this building is ſeventy-nine feet long, and forty feet broad, wainſcoted about eight feet high, with a fine fretwork ceiling, and is adorned with the ſtatue of king William III. in a nich at the upper end. On the pedeſtal of the ſtatue is a latin inſcription, the tranſlation of which the reader will find in page 297.

Behind this is another quadrangle, with an arcade on the eaſt and weſt ſides thereof: and on the north ſide is the accomptant's office, which is ſixty feet long and twenty-eight feet broad. Over this and the other ſides of the quadrangle are handſome apartments, with a fine ſtair-caſe, adorned with fretwork; and under it are large vaults, with ſtrong walls and iron gates, for the preſervation of the caſh.

Very conſiderable additions having been lately made to this noble edifice, and a new ſtreet is opened before it, which ſhews the front to great advantage. This ſtreet which leads from the bank gate into Cornhill, conſiſts of no more than one large building on each ſide, made of brick and ſtone, and uniform, to ſerve for public offices. The old offices next St. Bartholomew-lane have been taken down, and new ones erected in their ſtead; as have likewiſe all the houſes from the eaſt ſide of the bank, now built to Bartholomew-lane, and down that lane within fifty feet of Lothbury. In ſhort ſuch extenſive improvements have been already made, and others ſtill intended, that when finiſhed it will in all probability be the moſt magnificent building of a public nature in the whole univerſe.

The bank was eſtabliſhed by act of parliament in the year 1693, under the name of "the governor and company of the Bank of England," in conſideration of 1,200,000l. lent to the government by the ſubſcribers, at the rate of eight per cent.

This company is now under the direction of a governor, deputy governor, and twenty four directors, who are annually elected at a general court by ballot. Thirteen make a court of directors for managing the affairs of the company. And if the governor and deputy governor ſhould be abſent two hours after the uſual time of proceeding to buſineſs, the directors may chuſe a chairman by majority; all whoſe acts are equally valid, as if the governor and deputy governor had been preſent.

The privileges of this bank are,

1. Their ſealed notes were by law made tranſferable by indorſement.
2. They have power to purchaſe lands, (except thoſe of the crown) and to receive goods as a ſecurity for money lent, to buy gold or ſilver bullion, and to ſell goods, &c. forfeited to them.
3. Their ſtock ſhall not be taxable in any caſe.
4. They may negotiate bills of exchange, and receive or take them for other bills or caſh.
5. The government was to give them a year's notice upon paying them back their 1,200,000l.
6. To counterfeit their notes was made felony.
7. No perſon dealing in this ſtock could be a bankrupt thereby, nor the ſtock liable to foreign attachment.
8. During the continuance of this bank, the time for which was enlarged, no other bank ſhall be erected by parliamentary authority.

The transfer days of the Bank have been various times altered, but at preſent they are as follows:

Bank Stock—Tueſday, Thurſday and Friday.
4 per cent. conſolidated annuities—Tueſday, Wedneſday, Thurſday and Friday.

At the ſouth eaſt corner of St. Bartholomew-lane, ſtands the pariſh church of St. BARTHOLOMEW, Exchange.

So called from its dedication to St. Bartholomew the Apoſtle, and its ſituation near the Royal-Exchange.

This church is of great antiquity; for it was founded before the year 1331, when John de Tyerne was preſented to the living, on the death of John de Aldeburgh, the rector; and, it was become ſo decayed in 1438, as to require rebuilding.

The old church being conſumed in the general conflagration in 1666, the preſent ſtructure aroſe in its place, and conſiſts of a very irregular body, with a tower crowned with arches, ſupported by columns of the Corinthian order.

The living, at the time of the reformation, being in the gift of the abbey of St. Mary of Grace, fell, with the diſſolution of that religious houſe, into the hands of the crown, in whom it has continued to the preſent time. The value of the living, as ſettled by act of parliament, in lieu of tythes, is no more than 100l. per annum: but the value of the glebe, &c. is computed at 300l. more.

The veſtry is general, and the pariſh officers are, two church-wardens, and five auditors of accounts, beſides the common-council-men.

Here is founded a Tueſday's lecture, endowed at 70l. per annum, paid by the company of haberdaſhers. One upon Wedneſdays, at 20l. per annum, paid by the church-wardens for the pariſh. Another upon Fridays, at 25l. only for three quarters of a year, paid by the mercer's company. Another at 12l. per annum, on the laſt Saturday of every month, paid alſo by the mercers; beſides the donation of James Wilford, ſheriff, in 1499, who appointed by his will, a doctor of divinity, every Good-Friday, for ever, to preach a ſermon in the evening at this church, on the paſſion of our Saviour.

A little eaſtward from the Royal Exchange, on the ſouth-ſide of Threadneedle-ſtreet, is ſituate the church of St. BENNET FINK.

This is a curacy, and ſo denominated from its dedication to St. Benedict, an Italian ſaint, and founder of the order of Benedictine monks; and it received the addition of Fink from its rebuilder, Robert Fink. It is of ancient foundation, and was originally a rectory, John de Aneſty being collated rector thereof before the year 1323. The patronage of this church, which was anciently in the family of the Nevils, falling to the crown, king Edward IV. gave it to the dean and chapter of Windſor; and the impropriation being in the ſaid dean and chapter, it is ſupplied by one of the canons of Windſor, or ſuch as they ſhall appoint, to be licenſed by the biſhop of London.

The old church being deſtroyed by the fire in 1666, the preſent ſtructure was erected in 1673. The body is of an irregular form, enlightened by large arched windows, which reach to the roof. This is encompaſſed with a baluſtrade, and crowned with a lanthorn: a dome riſes upon the whole extent of the tower, and on its top riſes a turret.

The church-yard was given for a free burial-place, without any charge to the pariſhioners who uſe it. The veſtry is general, and the pariſh officers are, two church-wardens, and thirteen auditors of accounts.

The curacy is rated by act of parliament, at 100l. in lieu of tythes; beſides which, there is a conſiderable glebe worth near 100l. per annum more.

Near the ſouth-ſide of Pig-ſtreet, on the north-ſide of Threadneedle-ſtreet, ſtands the French and Walloon proteſtant church, founded upon the ruins of the hoſpital of St. Anthony *, which had

* Among other accounts of this hoſpital, a former writer ays, he could remember, that the overſeers of the markets in this city, would take a ſtarved pig from the market people, and having ſlit its ear, would give it to this hoſpital; and that the

had been a Jew ſynagogue, built about the year 1231, and converted into a church, dedicated to the Virgin Mary. This hoſpital flouriſhed, raiſed a large free ſchool, and built alms-houſes at the weſt-end of the church for poor men. Its demolition is attributed to one Johnſon, a ſchool-maſter, who becoming a prebendary of Windſor, firſt diſſolved the choir, then conveyed away the plate and ornaments, then the bells; and laſtly, turned the poor out of the alms-houſes, let out the premiſes for rent, and the church for a place of worſhip to the French proteſtants, who hold it of the dean and chapter of Windſor to this day. They perform divine ſervice in the French tongue, after the manner of the church of England.

The old building being entirely deſtroyed by the fire of London, the preſent church was erected, at the ſole expence of the French proteſtants. It is a ſmall, but neat place of worſhip, with a convenient veſtry at the ſouth-eaſt corner. They have alms-houſes, containing apartments for forty-five poor men and women, who are allowed two ſhillings and threepence, and a buſhel of coals every week, and apparel every other year. They maintain their own poor, and their church is governed by a miniſter, elders and deacons.

At the ſouth-eaſt corner of Threadneedle-ſtreet, is a ſpacious building, called

MERCHANT-TAYLORS HALL.

In the front of this hall, is a large handſome door-caſe, adorned with two demi-columns, whoſe entablature and pediment are of the Compoſite order. The inſide is furniſhed with tapeſtry, containing the hiſtory of their patron, John Baptiſt, and tho' theſe hangings are old, they are curious and valuable. The great hall is ſo capacious, that it is better adapted for the reception of numerous aſſemblies, than any other in the city, and is generally uſed for ſuch purpoſes.

This company, antiently denominated "Tay-"lors and Linen Armorers," was incorporated by letters patent, of the 5th of Edward IV. in the year 1466: but many of the members of the company, being great merchants, and Henry VII. a member thereof, he, by letters patent, of the 18th of his reign, A. D. 1503, re incorporated the ſame, by the name of "The maſter and war-"dens of the Merchant-Taylors, of the frater-"nity of St. John the Baptiſt, in the city of "London." They are governed by a maſter, four wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants. Their livery is very numerous, and their eſtates are very conſiderable; out of which they pay to charitable uſes, purſuant to the wills of the reſpective donors, about two thouſand pounds per annum.

At the ſouth-eaſt angle of Threadneedle-ſtreet, and partly in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, is ſituate the parochial church of St. MARTIN's OUTWICH.

This church was dedicated to St. Martin, biſhop of Tours in France, about the year 376, and receives the addition of Outwich from two brothers of that name, who were ſome time proprietors thereof. The earl of Surry preſented to the living in the year 1325: but he dying without iſſue, and leaving his eſtates to the crown, the advowſon was purchaſed in 1387 by William and John Otewich, who, by licence of king Henry IV. in the ſixth year of his reign, gave the advowſon of this church, four meſſuages, and ſeventeen ſhops, with the appurtenances, in the ſaid pariſh, to the maſter and wardens of the taylors and linen armorers (now the company of Merchant Taylors) and to their ſucceſſors, in perpetual alms, to be employed for the help and relief of the poor brethren and ſiſters of the ſaid company; by virtue of which grant the Merchant-Taylors have the right of patronage. The additional epithet of Otewich or Outwich, might, in all probability, have been given by the above company, in grateful commemoration of their great and generous benefactors.

This church, which was rebuilt about the year 1540, is one of the few that eſcaped the fire in 1666. It is an old gothic ſtructure, of the meaner ſtyle, ſixty-ſix feet long, and forty-two broad; the height of the roof thirty-one feet, and the height of the ſteeple ſixty-five feet. The body is of brick, ſtrengthened at the corners by a maſſy ruſtic. The windows, which are large, are of the coarſe gothic kind, and the top is ſurrounded with plain ſquare battlements. From the tower riſes a turret that is open, arched, and ſupported by four piers; and from the dome riſes a ſane. This church received ſo much damage by the fire in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet in 1765, that the turret, dome and ſane were entirely rebuilt: they are of the ſame principle as before, though the workmanſhip is rather more modern.

The living of this church, which is a rectory, including the parſonage-houſe, is not allowed to be more than 120l. per annum, except the fees. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are two church-wardens.

Oppoſite to this church, at the north eaſt corner of Threadneedle-ſtreet, is ſituate

The SOUTH-SEA-HOUSE.

This building, in which the company's affairs are now tranſacted, is a magnificent ſtructure of brick and ſtone, about a quadrangle, ſupported by ſtone pillars of the Tuſcan order, which form a fine piazza. The front in Threadneedle-ſtreet is beautiful, and of the Doric order. The walls are of a great thickneſs, and the ſeveral offices admirably diſpoſed. The back front, which runs as far as Old Broad ſtreet, facing the church of the proctors of St. Anthony's, having turned it out into the ſtreets, with a bell about its neck, the pig might range about the city without danger. If any perſon gave it bread, or other feeding, the ſubtle creature would watch him, and whine after him for more: from whence aroſe the proverb, that, "he follows me like a Tantony, or St. Anthony's "pig." But he adds, when any of theſe pigs became fit for the ſpit, the proctor took them up for the uſe of the hoſpital.

of St. Peter le Poor, was formerly the Exciſe-office; then the South-Sea company's office; and at this time known by the name of the Old South-ſea houſe.

The origin of the South-ſea company is as follows: In the glorious and ſucceſsful war againſt France, in the reign of queen Anne, the ſeamen employed in the royal navy had tickets granted them inſtead of caſh; which they were frequently obliged to get diſcounted at 40l. and ſometimes 50l. per cent. to avaricious men, who taking advantage of their neceſſities, amaſſed very conſiderable fortunes.

The debt due from the government upon this and other accounts, unprovided for by parliament, amounted to 9,177,967l. 15s. 4d. and theſe people taking it into their hands, were incorporated by act of parliament in the year 1710. The following year the company, after the diſcharge of the debt due to them from the government, was made perpetual; and her majeſty incorporated them by the name of "The governor "and company of merchants of Great Britain "trading to the South ſeas and other parts of "America, and for encouraging the fiſhery." And in 1714, they lending the government an additional ſum of 822,032l. 4s. 8d. the capital of the company was, by act of parliament, enlarged to ten millions; for which the members received ſix per cent. intereſt, or 600,000l. per annum. But in 1720, an act of parliament was paſſed, by which the company were granted the ſole privilege of trading to the South ſeas within certain limits, and enabled to increaſe their capital, by redeeming ſeveral of the public debts; but by the arts uſed on this occaſion by ſome in power, the capital ſtock of the company was raiſed to 33,543,263l. By this iniquitous ſcheme many wealthy perſons loſt their eſtates, and others acquired immenſe fortunes; and a conſiderable number of the directors were obliged by parliament to refund their ill-gotten treaſures. (See p. 282, 283.)

This company, however, was not diſſolved; and in the year 1733, it was enacted by parliament, that the capital ſtock of the South-ſea company, which then amounted to 14,651,103l. 8s. 1d. and the ſhares of the reſpective proprietors, ſhould be divided into four equal parts: three fourths of which ſhould be converted into a joint ſtock, attended with annuities after the rate of four per cent. till redemption by parliament; and ſhould be called the New South-ſea annuities: and the other fourth part ſhould remain in the company as a trading capital ſtock, attended with the reſidue of the annuities or funds, payable at the exchequer to the company till redemption.

It is neceſſary to obſerve with reſpect to this company, that, notwithſtanding the terms of their charter, they have never carried on any conſiderable trade. Indeed, by the aſſiento contract they had, for ſome years, the privilege of furniſhing the Spaniards with negro ſlaves for their mines and plantations in America, and of ſending a large ſhip annually, with European goods, conſiſting chiefly of our woollen manufactures, to the Spaniſh Weſt Indies; and for nine years they annnually ſent a ſmall number of ſhips to fiſh on the coaſt of Greenland. At this time, however, they have no trade: they only receive intereſt for their capital, which is in the hands of the government, and alſo 8000l. a year out of the treaſury, towards the expence attending the management of their affairs.

The buſineſs of this company is managed by a governor, ſub-governor, deputy-governor, and twenty-one directors, annually choſen before the ſixth of February, by a majority of votes. Such members of the company as have 1000l. in the capital ſtock in their own names, having one vote; ſuch as have 3000l. two votes; ſuch as have 5000l. three votes; and ſuch as have 10,000l. ſtock or more, four votes, and none above: but no perſon can be governor, ſub-governor, deputy-governor, or director, while he is governor, deputy-governor, or director of the Bank of England.

The hours of payment of dividends are from nine o'clock to twelve, and the hour of transfer from twelve to one.

The days of transferring South-ſea ſtock are, Monday, Wedneſday and Friday.

Old Annuities, ditto.

New Annuities, Tueſday, Thurſday and Saturday.

3 per cent. 1751, Tueſday and Thurſday. Except on holidays, which are the ſame as at the Bank.

On the north ſide of Throgmorton-ſtreet, nearly oppoſite Bartholomew-lane, is the chief office for the Penny Poſt, which, before the enlargement of the Bank, was kept in St. Chriſtopher's church-yard.

This office is under the direction of the poſtmaſters general; who appoint a comptroller, accomptant, receiver and comptroller's clerk and meſſengers. There are ſix ſorters, and eight ſubſorters of the letters, ſeventy-four meſſengers, or letter carriers, and 334 houſes within the bills of mortality for receiving or taking in letters; which are divided amongſt the ſix following offices:

1. The general office in Throgmorton-ſtreet.
2. The corner of Bull-head court, Newgate-ſtreet.
3. At Lincoln's-Inn.
4. In Weſtminſter.
5. In King-ſtreet, Little Tower-hill.
6. In St. Mary Overies, Southwark.

Each of theſe has a number of villages and places under its particular direction: from and to the moſt diſtant of which letters are carried and returned at leaſt once in the day.

This uſeful method of circulating letters in, and ten miles round the metropolis, was projected by one David Murray, an Upholder, in Paternoſter-Row, in the year 1683, who communicated the ſcheme to Mr. William Dockwra, who carried it on for ſome time with great ſucceſs, till the government laid claim to it as a royal prerogative; Dockwra was obliged to ſubmit, and in return had a penſion allowed him by the king of two hundred pounds per annum, during his life.

It

It was erected to carry any parcel of paper under one pound within a certain circuit for one penny, to be paid by the perſon that ſent it: but in length of time it has been ſo managed as to oblige the party to whom the letter or parcel is directed or delivered, to pay one penny alſo, if that party happens to live out of the bounds of London, Weſtminſter, or their ſuburbs and liberties, or out of the Borough of Southwark. And by a late act of parliament the weight of the parcels to be ſent by penny-poſt is reduced to four ounces.

We ſhall conclude the account of this ward with mention of a free-ſchool belonging to it for the education of fifty boys and thirty girls, ſituate oppoſite the Back-gate of Bethlehem Hoſpital. The houſe was rebuilt in 1763, and the charity is ſupported by private ſubſcription.

CHAPTER VIII.

Of CANDLEWICK WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from a ſtreet formerly called Candlewick, or Candlewright-ſtreet (now Canon-ſtreet) which was principally inhabited by candle-wrights, or candle-makers, both in tallow and wax. It is bounded on the eaſt by Bridge-ward, on the ſouth by Bridge and Dowgate wards; on the north by Langbourn-ward; and on the weſt by Dowgate and Wallbrook wards.

Though this ward is but ſmall, yet it is divided into ſeven precincts; and is governed by an alderman, eight common-council-men, (of whom one is the alderman's deputy) ſeven conſtables, thirteen inqueſt men, ſeven ſcavengers and a beadle.

Great Eaſtcheap, * which is a principal ſtreet in this ward, begins at the top of Fiſh-ſtreet-hill, and runs weſtward to the end of Clement's-lane, where Canon-ſtreet begins. On the ſouth ſide of this ſtreet ſtands the Boar's-head tavern, accounted the oldeſt in London, and the houſe in which Shakeſpear laid ſome of the ſcenes of his Henry IV. where he introduces prince Henry and his companions. And at the upper end of Maidenhead-court is a baptiſt meeting-houſe.

Not far from this ſtreet is St. Michael's-lane, on the eaſt ſide of which ſtands the pariſh church of St. MICHAEL, CROOKED LANE.

So called from its dedication to St. Michael, and its vicinity to the above lane.

This church is of ancient foundation, as appears by John de Borham, who was rector thereof in the year 1304: at which time it was a very ordinary ſmall building, and ſtood amidſt layſtalls and ſlaughter-grounds uſed by the butchers of Eaſtcheap-market. But in 1366 John Lovekin or Loufken, four times Lord-mayor of London, obtained a grant of the ground where the lay-ſtalls were, and built a handſome and capacious church thereon. This church received conſiderable additions from Sir William Walworth, Lord-mayor, who likewiſe founded a college for a maſter and nine prieſts; ſettled his own new built houſe adjoining to the church for an habitation of the ſaid maſter and chaplains, or prieſts, for ever, and was buried in the north chapel by the choir.

This church, however, being entirely deſtroyed by the great conflagration in 1666, the preſent edifice aroſe in its ſtead. It is a plain ſtructure built with ſtone, and enlightened by a ſeries of large arched windows. The Tower, which is at the weſt end, is carried ſquare to a conſiderable height, and the upper-moſt window in the center of each face, is ornamented with a head, and handſome feſtoons. From hence, inſtead of a baluſtrade, is a range of open work of the Gothic kind, with vaſes at the corners. From within this part the tower riſes circular, diminiſhing in three ſtages, with an open buttreſs riſing from each corner of the ſquare tower, to the top of the firſt ſtage; from this buttreſs riſes a large ſcroll to the top of the ſecond, and a ſmaller to the top of the third ſtage, above which riſes a kind of ſhort round ſpire of a peculiar kind; it ſwells out at the bottom, and then rounding off riſes to a ſmall height, where it is terminated by a gilt ball and vane.

The patronage of this church was anciently in the prior and convent of Canterbury, in whom it continued till the year 1408, ſince which time it has been in the archbiſhops of that ſee, and is

* This ſtreet originally took its name from a market kept there, to ſerve the eaſt part of the city; which was afterwards removed to Leadenhall-ſquare. And by the early account we have of Eaſtcheap-market, and its vicinity to the ferry, or Roman trajectus, over the Thames, we have great reaſon to ſuppoſe this to be the firſt, or one of the firſt markets in London, even of a Roman date. In which ſtate it continued for many ages, eſpecially for victuals; as may be collected from the following ſong, called London Lickpenny, made by Lidgate, a monk of Bury, in the reign of Henry V. in the perſon of a countryman coming to London, and travelling through the ſame. In Weſtcheap (ſaith the ſong) he was called on to buy fine lawn, Paris thread, cotton umble, and other linen cloths, and ſuch like; but not a word of ſilks. In Cornhill, to buy old apparel, and houſhold ſtuff, where he was forced to buy his own hood which he had left in Weſtminſter-hall. In Candlewright-ſtreet, drapers proffred him cheap cloth. In Eaſtcheap, the cooks cried, hot ribs of beef roaſted, pieces well baked, and other victuals. There was clattering of pots, harp, pipe and ſawtrie; yea by cock, nay by cock, for other greater oaths were ſpared. Some ſang of Jenkin and Julian, &c. all which melody liked well the paſſenger, but he wanted money to abide by it, and therefore got him into a Graveſend barge and home into Kent.

one of the thirteen peculiars in this city belonging to Canterbury. The rector, in conformity to an act of parliament granted in the reign of king Charles II. receives, beſides his other profits, 100l. per annum in lieu of tythes

The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, and two collectors for the poor.

Among the ſeveral monuments in this church is that of Sir William Walworth, who ſlew Wat Tyler; (ſee page 85,) the inſcription on which is as follows:

Here under lyth a man of fame,
William Walworth callyd by name;
Fiſhmonger he was in life-time here,
And twiſe Lord-mayor as in bookes appere;
Who with courage ſtout and manly might,
Slew Wat Tyler in king Richard's ſight;
For which act done, and trew intent,
The king made him knight incontinent:
And gave him armes, as here may ſee,
To declare his fact and chivalrie.
He left this life the yere of our God,
Thirteene hundryd fourſcore and three od.

Here is alſo a monument erected to the memory of queen Elizabeth; and the following very conciſe inſcription on the tomb of William Wray:

Here lyeth, wrapt in clay,
The body of William Wray,
I have no more to ſay.

In an alley on the other ſide of St. Michael's-lane is an independent meeting-houſe.

On the north ſide, and at the extremity of Great Eaſtcheap, is Clement's-lane; on the eaſt ſide of which is ſituate the pariſh church of St. CLEMENT, EASTCHEAP.

This church is dedicated to St. Clement, diſciple of St. Peter the Apoſtle, and ordained biſhop of Rome in the year 93. It receives the additional epithet of Eaſtcheap, not only on account of its ſituation, but likewiſe to diſtinguiſh it from other churches dedicated to the ſame ſaint. It was founded in or before the year 1332; and before the ſuppreſſion of religious houſes, was in the gift of the abbot and convent of St. Peter's, Weſtminſter. But queen Mary, in the firſt year of her reign, gave the advowſon thereof to the biſhop of London for ever, who is now the patron.

The living of this church is conſiderably augmented by the pariſh of St. Martin's Orgar being annexed to it, which, by act of parliament, makes it of the yearly value of 140l. in lieu of tythes.

This church ſharing the common fate in the year 1666, was rebuilt in 1686; and is a very plain, neat ſtructure, with a tower crowned only by a battlement. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, and two collectors for the poor.

The pariſh of St. Martin's Orgar is a rectory, the church whereof (before the fire of London) ſtood on the eaſt ſide of St. Martin's-lane, near Canon-ſtreet; and is ſo denominated from its dedication to St. Martin aforeſaid: and the additional epithet of Orgars is a corruption of Odgarus, or Ordgarus, who was the founder and patron thereof, who granted the ſame to the dean and canons of St. Paul's about the year 1181. From which time the advowſon has continued in the ſaid dean and chapter.

Since this pariſh has been united to St. Clement's Eaſtcheap, the ſite of the church is made a burial place for the pariſhioners. Part of the ſteeple, however, remains, in which is a dial projecting into the ſtreet; and part of the nave alſo being found repairable, a body of French proteſtants, in communion with the epiſcopal church of England, obtained a leaſe of the tower and ruinous nave from the miniſter and churchwardens, and got it confirmed by parliament: in purſuance of which the purchaſers erected a church for their own uſe; in which they continue to perform divine ſervice according to the rights of the church of England. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, five auditors of accompts, two churchwardens, and a collector for the poor.

On the north ſide of Cannon-ſtreet is another lane, on the weſt ſide of which ſtands the pariſh church of

St. MARY ABCHURCH.

This church owes its name to its dedication to the Virgin Mary; and the additional appellation of Ab or Upchurch, was given it on account of its elevation in compariſon of the neighbouring ground towards the Thames, and to diſtinguiſh it from the many other churches of the ſame name in this city. A church dedicated to St. Mary has ſtood here from very early times; and we find that in the year 1448, it was in the patronage of the prior and canons of St. Mary Overy's; but devolving to the crown in the reign of queen Elizabeth, her majeſty granted the perpetual advowſon to Corpus Chriſti college in Cambridge, in whom it has continued to the preſent time.

The old church being conſumed by the fire in 1666, the preſent one was raiſed in its ſtead; and to which, by act of parliament, is annexed, the pariſh of St. Laurence Poultney, whereby the rectorial profits are greatly augmented, the two together producing the yearly value of 120l. in lieu of tythes. The veſtry is general, and the pariſh officers are only two churchwardens.

This ſtructure is built of brick, ſtrengthened by ruſtic quoins of ſtone at the corners, with three windows on each ſide, of which the middle one is the principal, that riſing higher, and taking up the ſpace above, while the others, which are ſmaller have round windows over them; theſe have all ſtone caſes. The tower riſes ſquare with the corners ſtrengthened with ruſtic; and a large window in the center of each face, ornamented like the reſt. From this tower riſes a kind of dome, dome, and upon its ſummit ſtands a plain ſpire ſupported by a lanthorn baſe.

The church of St. Laurence Poultney, which was a curacy, ſtood on the weſt ſide of Lawrence Poultney-lane, on the ſouth ſide of Cannon-ſtreet; and received the addition of Poultney, from its great benefactor Sir John Poultney, who, about the year 1345, founded in the ancient church, a college of Jeſus and Corpus Chriſti, for a maſter, warden, thirteen prieſts and four choriſters. This living is at preſent abſorbed in the patronage of Abchurch, and the ſite of the old church and college remains only as a burial place for the inhabitants of the pariſh. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are two church-wardens, and two collectors for the poor.

CHAPTER IX.

Of CASTLE-BAYNARD WARD.

THIS ward is bounded on the eaſt by Queenhithe and Broad-ſtreet wards; on the ſouth by the river Thames; and on the weſt and north by the ward of Farringdon within.

It takes its name from an ancient caſtle which ſtood on the bank near the Thames, and was built by one Baynard, a nobleman of great authority who came from Normandy with William the Conqueror. This caſtle, after the deceaſe of the above Baynard, (which happened in the reign of William Rufus) fell into the hands of various people, and at length became the poſſeſſion of Robert Fitz-walter, who was caſtelain and ſtandard-bearer * of London in the reign of king John, A. D. 1213. At which time there aroſe a great

* The great privileges enjoyed by Robert Fitz-Walter, in conſequence of this office, were as follows:

"The ſaid Robert and his heirs ought to be and are chief "banners of London, in fee for the caſtelary, which he "and his anceſtors had by Caſtle-baynard in the ſaid city. "In time of war the ſaid Robert and his heirs ought to ſerve "the city in manner as followeth: that is,

"The ſaid Robert ought to come, he being the twentieth "man of arms, on horſeback, covered with cloth or armour, "unto the great weſt door of St. Paul's, with his banner diſ-"played before him of his arms. And, when he is come to "the ſaid door, mounted and apparelled as before is ſaid, "the mayor, with his aldermen and ſheriffs, armed in their "arms, ſhall come out of the ſaid church of St. Paul unto "the ſaid door, with a banner in his hand, all on foot; "which banner ſhall be gules, the image of St. Paul, gold; "the face, hands, feet, and ſword, of ſilver: and as ſoon "as the ſaid Robert ſhall ſee the mayor, aldermen, and ſhe-"riffs, come on foot out of the church, armed with ſuch a "banner; he ſhall alight from his horſe and ſalute the may-"or, and ſay to him, Sir mayor, I am come to do my ſervice "which I owe to the city.

"And the mayor and aldermen ſhall anſwer, We give to "you, as to our banneret of fee in this city, the banner of this city, "to bear and govern the honour of this city to your power.

"And the ſaid Robert and his heirs ſhall receive the banner "in his hands, and go on foot out of the gate, with the "banner in his hands; and the mayor, aldermen, and ſhe-"riffs, ſhall follow to the door, and ſhall bring an horſe to "the ſaid Robert, worth 20l. which horſe ſhall be ſaddled "with a ſaddle of the arms of the ſaid Robert, and ſhall "be covered with ſindals of the ſaid arms.

"Alſo they ſhall preſent to him 20l. ſterling, and deliver "it to the chamberlain of the ſaid Robert, for his expences "that day. Then the ſaid Robert ſhall mount upon the horſe "which the mayor preſented to him, with the banner in his "hand; and, as ſoon as he is up, he ſhall ſay to the mayor, "that he muſt cauſe a marſhal to be choſen for the hoſt, one "of the city; which being done, the ſaid Robert ſhall com-"mand the mayor and burgeſſes of the city to warn the com-"mons to aſſemble, and all go under the banner of St. Paul; "and the ſaid Robert ſhall bear it himſelf to Aldgate, and "there the ſaid Robert and mayor ſhall deliver the ſaid "banner of St. Paul to whom they think proper. And, if "they are to go out of the city, then the ſaid Robert ought "to chuſe two out of every ward, the moſt ſage perſons, to "look to the keeping of the city after they are gone out. "And this counſel ſhall be taken in the priory of the Tri-"nity near Aldgate. And before every town or caſtle which "the hoſt of London ſhall beſiege, if the ſiege continue a "whole year, the ſaid Robert ſhall have, for every ſiege, of "the commonalty of London, one hundred ſhillings, and "no more."

The rights belonging to him and his heirs in the city of London, in time of peace, were as follow:

"That is to ſay, the ſaid Robert Fitz-Walter had a ſoke "or ward in the city, where was a wall of the canonry of "St. Paul, which led down, by a brewhouſe of St. Paul, "to the Thames, and ſo to the ſide of the mill which was "in the water coming down from Fleet-bridge, and went "by London-wall betwixt the friars preachers and Ludgate, "and ſo returned by the houſe of the ſaid friars to the wall "of the canonry of St. Paul; that is all the pariſh of St. "Andrew, which was in the gift of his anceſtors by the "ſaid ſeniority; and ſo the ſaid Robert had appendant unto "the ſaid ſoke all the things underwritten:

"That he ought to have a ſokeman, and to place what "ſokeman he will, ſo he be of the ſokemanry, or the ſame "ward: and if any of the ſokemanry be impleaded in the "Guildhall of any thing that toucheth not the body of the "mayor that for the time is, or that toucheth the body of no "ſheriff, it is not lawful for the ſokeman of the ſokemanry "of the ſaid Robert Fitz-Walter to demand a court of the "ſaid Robert; and the mayor and his citizens of London "ought to grant him to have a court; and in his court he "ought to bring his judgments, as is aſſented and agreed "upon in the Guildhall, that ſhall be given him.

"If any therefore be taken in ſokemanry, he ought to "have his ſtocks and impriſonment in his ſoken; and he "ſhall be brought from thence to the Guildhall before the "mayor, and there they ſhall provide him his judgment "that ought to be given of him; but his judgment ſhall "not be publiſhed till he come into the court of the ſaid "Robert, and in his liberty.

"And the judgment ſhall be ſuch, that, if he have deſerv-"ed death by treaſon, he to be tied to a poſt in the Thames, "at a good wharf, where boats are faſtened, two ebbings "and two flowings of the water.

"And if he be condemned for a common thief, he ought "to be led to the elms, and there ſuffer his judgment as "other thieves. And ſo the ſaid Robert and his heirs hath "honour, that he holdeth a great franchiſe within the city, "that the mayor of the city and citizens are bound to do "him right; that is to ſay, that, when the mayor will "hold a great council, he ought to call the ſaid Robert "and his heirs to be with him in council of the city; and "the ſaid Robert ought to be ſworn to be of council with "the city againſt all people, ſaving the king and his heirs. "And when the ſaid Robert cometh to the huſtings of the "Guildhall of the city, the mayor, or his lieutenant, ought "to riſe againſt him, and ſet him down near unto him; "and ſo long as he is in the Guildhall, all the judgments "ought to be given by his mouth, according to the record "of the recorders of the ſaid Guildhall: and ſo many "waifes as come ſo long as he is there, he ought to give "them to the bailiffs of the town, or to whom he will, by "the council of the mayor of the city."

a great contention between the king and his barons, on account of Matilda, called The Fair, a daughter of the ſaid Robert Fitz-Walter, whom the king unlawfully loved, but could not obtain; whereupon, and for other cauſes of the like ſort, there enſued a war throughout the realm. The barons, being received into London, did great damage to the king; but in the end the king not only baniſhed the ſaid Fitz-Walter, among others, out of the kingdom, but likewiſe cauſed his caſtle, called Baynard's-caſtle, and two other houſes, to be demoliſhed. (See page 41.) After which a meſſenger was ſent to Matilda the Fair about the king's ſuit; but ſhe, not conſenting to it, was poiſoned.

King John being in France in the year 1214, with a great army, a truce was made between the two kings for five years. There being a river or arm of the ſea between the two armies, a knight among the Engliſh called out to thoſe on the other ſide to challenge any one among them to come and take a juſt or two with him: whereupon, without any delay, Robert Fitz-Walter, who was on the French ſide, ferried over, and got on horſeback, without any one to help him, and ſhewed himſelf ready to the face of this challenger; and at the firſt courſe ſtruck him ſo violently with his great ſpear, that both man and horſe fell to the ground; and, when his ſpear was broken, he went back again to the king of France. King John, ſeeing this, cried out, "By God's tooth, (his uſual oath) he were a "king indeed who had ſuch a knight." The friends of Robert, hearing theſe words, kneeled down, and ſaid, "O king, he is your knight; it "is Robert Fitz-Walter." Whereupon he was ſent for the next day, and reſtored to the king's favour; by which means a peace was concluded, Fitz-Walter was reſtored to his eſtates, and had permiſſion to repair his caſtle of Baynard.

This ward is divided into ten precincts, and is governed by an alderman, ten common-councilmen, (of whom one is the alderman's deputy) nine conſtables, fourteen inqueſt-men, ſeven ſcavengers and a beadle.

We ſhall begin the ſurvey of this ward on the north ſide of Thames ſtreet, where, at the ſouth weſt corner of Bennet's-hill is ſituate the pariſh church of St. BENNET, PAUL'S WHARF.

This church is ſo called from its being conſecrated to St. Benedict, and its vicinity to the above wharf. It is of very ancient foundation, as appears by Dicets, dean of St. Paul's, who has it in his regiſter, under the year 1181. The old church being deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666, the preſent one was erected in its place from a deſign of Sir Chriſtopher Wren. It is a neat ſtructure; the body is well proportioned: the tower has ruſtic corners, and the turret and ſmall ſpire are raiſed from the crown of a dome.

This church is a rectory, the collation to which is in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's. The pariſh of St. Peter, Paul's wharf is united to it, and the rector receives 100l. per annum in lieu of tythes. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens and two overſeers.

On the eaſt ſide of Bennet's-hill, at the ſouth weſt end of St. Paul's Cathedral, ſtands the college or office of arms, commonly called

The HERALDS OFFICE.

This office was deſtroyed by the dreadful fire in 1666, and rebuilt about three years after; the expence of which, at a moderate computation, amounted to 5000l. but the corporation not being able to diſcharge that ſum, petitioned his majeſty for a commiſſion to receive the ſubſcriptions of the nobility and gentry. This petition was referred to the commiſſioners for executing the office of earl-marſhal; and, upon their lordſhip's report, a commiſſion was granted, bearing date the ſixth of December, 1672: but the commiſſion directing the money ſo collected to be paid to ſuch perſons, and laid out in ſuch a manner, as the earl-marſhall ſhould appoint, it diſguſted the officers ſo much, that it cauſed a coldneſs and inactivity in them to promote the ſubſcription; ſo that, although they had reaſon to hope for large contributions, little more than 700l. was raiſed by this commiſſion: what ſums were neceſſary were made up out of the general fees and profits of the office, or by the contribution of particular members. Sir William Dugdale built the north weſt corner at his own charge; and Sir Henry St. George, Clarenceux, gave the profits of ſome viſitations, made by deputies appointed by him for that purpoſe, amounting to 530l. the houſes on the eaſt ſide, and ſouth eaſt corner, were erected upon a building leaſe, agreeable to the original plan; by which means the whole was made one uniform quadrangular building, as it now appears, and is one of the beſt deſigned and handſomeſt brick buildings in London: and the hollow arch of the gateway is eſteemed a curioſity. In November, 1683, the college part of the building being finiſhed, the rooms were divided amongſt the officers according to their degrees, by agreement among themſelves, and afterwards confirmed by the earl-marſhal; which apartments have been ever ſince annexed to their reſpective offices. The inſide of the lodgings were finiſhed, at different times, by the officers to whom they belonged.

It is a ſquare incloſed by regular brick buildings, which are extremely neat, without expenſive decorations. The floors are raiſed above the level of the ground, and there is an aſcent to them by flights of plain ſteps. The principal front is in the lower ſtory, ornamented with ruſtic, upon which are placed four Ionic pilaſters, that ſupport an angular pediment. The ſides which are, conformable to this, have arched pediments, that are alſo ſupported by Ionic pilaſters. Within is a large room for keeping the court of honour, a library, with houſes and apartments for the king's heralds and purſuivants.

This corporation conſiſts of thirteen members, viz. three kings at arms, ſix heralds at arms, and four purſuivants at arms; who are nominated by the earl marſhal of England, as miniſters ſubordinate to him in the execution of their offices, and and hold their places by patent during their good behaviour. They are all the king's ſervants in ordinary, and therefore, in the vacancy of the office of earl-marſhal, have been ſworn into their offices by the lord-chamberlain.

Their meetings are termed chapters, which they hold the firſt Thurſday in every month, or oftener if neceſſary, wherein all matters are determined by a majority of voices of the kings and heralds, each king having two voices.

The kings are Garter, Clarenceux, and Norroy. Garter was inſtituted by king Henry V. in the year 1417, for the ſervice of the moſt noble order of the garter; and, for the dignity of that order, he was made ſovereign, within the office of arms, over all the other officers, ſubject to the crown of England, by the name of Garter, king of arms of England. By the conſtitution of his office he muſt be a native of England, and a gentleman bearing arms. To him belongs the correction of arms, and all enſigns of arms uſurped or borne unjuſtly; and the power of granting arms to deſerving perſons, and ſupporters to the nobility and knights of the Bath. It is likewiſe his office to go next before the ſword in ſolemn proceſſion, none interpoſing except the marſhal, to adminiſter the oath to all the officers of arms; to have a habit like the regiſter of the order; with baron's ſervice in the court, and lodgings in Windſor caſtle; he bears his white rod; with a banner of the enſigns of the order thereon, before the ſovereign: when any lord enters the parliament chamber, it is his poſt to aſſign him his place, according to his dignity and degree; to carry the enſigns of the order to foreign princes, and to do, or procure to be done, what the ſovereign ſhall enjoin relating to the order; for the execution of which he has a ſalary of 100l. a year, payable at the exchequer; and 100l. more out of the revenue of the order; beſides his fees.

The others are called provincial kings, and their provinces together compriſe the whole kingdom of England; that of Clarenceux comprehending all to the ſouth of the river Trent, and that of Norroy all to the north of that river; but, though theſe provincials have exiſted time immemorial, they were not conſtituted to theſe offices by the titles of Clarenceux and Norroy before Edward III.

Clarenceux is thus named from the duke of Clarence, the third ſon of king Edward III. It is his duty, according to his commiſſion, to viſit his province, to ſurvey the arms of all perſons, &c. and to regiſter their deſcents, marriages, &c. to marſhal the funerals of all perſons within his province not under the direction of Garter; and in his province to grant arms, with the conſent of the earl-marſhal. Before the inſtitution of Garter, he was the principal officer of arms, and, in the vacancy of Garter, he excutes his office. Excluſive of his fees he has a ſalary from the exchequer of 40l. per annum.

The duty and office of Norroy, or North Roy, that is, North king, is the ſame on the north of the Trent as that of Clarenceux on the ſouth.

The kings of arms were formerly created by the ſovereign with great ſolemnity, upon ſome high feſtival; but, ſince the ceremonies uſed at the creation of peers have been laid aſide, the kings of arms have been created by the earl-marſhal, by virtue of the ſovereign's warrant. Upon this occaſion he takes his oath; wine is poured upon his head out of a gilt cup, with a cover; his title is pronounced; and he inveſted with a tabart of the royal arms richly embroidered upon velvet; a collar of SS. with two portcullices of ſilver gilt; a gold chain, with a badge of his office; and the earl-marſhal places on his head the crown of a king of arms, which formerly reſembled a ducal coronet; but, ſince the reſtoration, it has been adorned with leaves reſembling thoſe of the oak, and circumſcribed, according to ancient cuſtom, with the words, Miſerere mei Deus ſecundum magnam miſericordiam tuam. Garter has alſo a mantle of crimſon ſattin, as an officer of the order; with a white rod or ſcepter, with the ſovereign's arms on the top, which he bears in the preſence of the ſovereign; and he is ſworn in a chapter of the Garter, the ſovereign inveſting him with the enſigns of his office.

The kings of arms are diſtinguiſhed from each other by their reſpective badges, which they may wear at all times, either in a gold chain or a ribbon, Garter's being blue, and the provincials purple.

The ſix heralds are Windſor, Cheſter, Lancaſter, York, Richmond, and Somerſet; who take place according to ſeniority in office. They are created with the ſame ceremonies as the kings, taking the oath of an herald, and are inveſted with a tabart of the royal arms, embroidered upon ſattin, not ſo rich as the kings, but better than the purſuivants, and a ſilver collar of SS. They are eſquires by creation, and have a ſalary of 26l. 13s. 4d. per annum, and fees according to their degree.

The kings and heralds are ſworn upon a ſword as well as the book, to ſhew that they are military as well as civil officers.

The four purſuivants, who are, Rougecroix, Bluemantle, Rougedragon, and Portcullis, are alſo created by the earl-marſhal, when they take their oath of a purſuivant, and are inveſted with a tabart of the royal arms upon damaſk. They have a ſalary of twenty pounds a year, with fees according to their degree. It is the duty of the heralds and purſuivants to attend in the public office, one of each claſs together, by a monthly rotation.

Beſides theſe particular duties of the ſeveral claſſes, it is the general duties both of the kings, heralds, and purſuivants, to attend his majeſty at the houſe of peers, and, upon certain high feſtivals, to the chapel royal; to make proclamations; to marſhal the proceedings at all public proceſſions; to attend the inſtallation of the knights of the Garter, &c.

All theſe officers have apartments in the college, annexed to their reſpective offices. They have likewiſe a public hall, in which is a court for the earl-marſhal, where courts of chivalry are occaſionally held, and the officers of arms attend in their tabarts, his lordſhip being preſent. Their public library contains a large and valuable collection of original records of the pedigrees and arms of families, funeral certificates of the nobility, and gentry, public ceremonials, and other branches of heraldry and antiquities.

Facing the north weſt corner of the herald's office is a paſſage into

DOCTORS COMMONS.

This is properly a college for ſuch as ſtudy and practice the civil law, and where cauſes in civil and eccleſiaſtical caſes are tried under the biſhop of London, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury. The addition of commons is taken from the manner in which the civilians live here, commoning together, as practiſed in other colleges.

The front of this college is ſituate in Great Knightrider-ſtreet, and conſiſts of two ſquare courts, chiefly inhabited by doctors of the civil law. Here are tried all cauſes by the court of admiralty, and the court of delegates. Here are offices where wills are regiſtered and depoſited, and licences for marriage, &c. are granted, and a court of faculties and diſpenſations. Several other offices are likewiſe kept here, viz. The regiſtry of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the regiſtry of the biſhop of London: in which offices are regiſtered all wills, and other matters done in the eccleſiaſtical courts of thoſe ſees.

The cauſes, whereof the civil and eccleſiaſtical law take cognizance, are theſe: blaſphemy, apoſtacy from chriſtianity, hereſy, ſchiſm; ordinations, inſtitutions of clerks to benefices, celebration of divine ſervice, matrimony, divorces, baſtardy, tythes, oblations, obventions, mortuaries, delapidations, reparation of churches, probate of wills, adminiſtrations; ſimony, inceſts, fornications, adulteries, ſolicitation of chaſtity; penſions, procurations, commulation of penance, right of pews, and other ſuch like, reducible to theſe matters.

The courts belonging to the civil and eccleſiaſtical law are various; ſuch as

1. The Court of Arches. This is the higheſt court under the juriſdiction of the archbiſhop of Canterbury. It takes its name from Bow-church which was originally built upon arches, and in which this court firſt ſat for the diſpatch of buſineſs. Here all appeals are directed in eccleſiaſtical matters within the province of Canterbury. The judge of this court is ſtiled the dean of the Arches, becauſe he holds a juriſdiction over a deanery in London, conſiſting of thirteen pariſhes, exempt from the biſhop of London's juriſdiction. The officers under this judge are, an examiner, an actuary, a beadle or crier, and an apparitor; beſides advocates, and procurators or proctors.

2. The prerogative court. This court is thus denominated from the prerogative of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who by a ſpecial privilege beyond thoſe of his ſuffragans, can here try all diſputes that happen to ariſe concerning the laſt wills of perſons within his province, who have left goods to the value of five pounds and upwards, unleſs ſuch things are ſettled by compoſition between the metropolitan and his ſuffragans; as in the dioceſe of London, where it is ten pounds. To this court belongs a judge, who is ſtiled Judex Curiæ, Prerogativæ, Cantuarienſis; and a regiſter, who hath convenient rooms in his office for the diſpoſing and laying up ſafe all original wills and teſtaments. This regiſter alſo hath his deputy, beſides ſeveral clerks.

3. The court of faculties and diſpenſations. This court can empower any one to do that which in law he could not otherwiſe do, viz. to marry without the publication of banns; to ſucceed a father in an eccleſiaſtical benefice; to hold two or more benefices, incompatible, &c. This authority was given to the archbiſhop by the ſtatute 25 Henry VIII. cap. 21. And the chief officer of this court is called Magiſter ad Facultates; under whom is a regiſter and his clerks.

4. The court of admiralty. This court was erected in the reign of Edward III. and in former times kept in Southwark. It belongs to the lord high admiral of England, and takes cognizance of the death or maihem of any perſon murdered on the high ſeas. Here alſo are cognizable all matters relating to ſeamens wages, &c. The judge of this court muſt be a civilian, and is called Supremæ curiæ admiralitatis angliæ locum tenens judex; under whom is a regiſter and a marſhal, who carries a ſilver oar before the judge; beſides an advocate and proctor. This court is held in the hall of Doctors-commons, where the other civil courts are kept; except in the trial of pirates, and crimes committed at ſea; on which cauſes the admiralty court ſits at the ſeſſions houſe in the Old Bailey.

5. The court of delegates. This is the higheſt court for civil affairs belonging to the church, to which appeals are carried from the ſpiritual courts; for upon the aboliſhing of the papal power within this kingdom by Henry VIII. in the year 1534, it was enacted by parliament, that no appeals ſhould from thence forward be made to Rome; in default of juſtice in any of the ſpiritual courts, the party aggrieved might appeal to the king in his court of chancery upon which a commiſſion under the great ſeal ſhould be directed to ſuch perſons as his majeſty ſhould think fit to nominate. Theſe commiſſioners to whom the king thus delegates his power, generally conſiſt of noblemen, biſhops, and judges, both of the common and civil law; and as this court is not fixed, but occaſionally, theſe commiſſioners, or delegates, are varied at the pleaſure of the Lord chancellor, who appoints them. No appeals lie from this court; but upon good reaſons aſſigned, the lord chancellor may grant a commiſſion of review.

The practiſers in theſe courts are of two ſorts, viz. advocates and proctors.

The advocates are ſuch as have taken the degree of doctor of the civil law, and are retained as counſellors or pleaders. Theſe muſt firſt upon their petition to the archbiſhop, obtain his fiat; and then they are admitted by the judge to practice. The manner of their admiſſion is ſolemn. Two ſenior advocates in their ſcarlet robes, with the mace carried before them, conduct the doctor up the court with three reverences, and preſent him with a ſhort latin ſpeech, together with the archbiſhop's reſcript; and then having taken the oaths, the judge admits him, and aſſigns him a place or a ſeat in the court, which he is always to keep keep when he pleads. Both the judge and advocates, if of Oxford, wear in court ſcarlet robes, and hoods lined with taffaty; but if of Cambridge, white minever, and round black velvet caps.

The proctors or procurators, exhibit their proxies for their clients; and make themſelves parties for them, and draw and give pleas, or libels and allegations, in their behalf; produce witneſſes, prepare cauſes for ſentence, and attend the advocates with the proceedings. Theſe are alſo admitted by the archbiſhop's fiat, and introduced by two ſenior proctors. They wear black robes and hoods lined with fur.

The terms for the pleading and ending of cauſes in the civil courts, are but little different from the term times of the common law. The order as to the time of ſitting of the ſeveral courts, is as follows: The court of arches having the pre-eminence ſits firſt in the morning. The court of admiralty ſits in the afternoon on the ſame day; and the prerogative court ſits alſo in the afternoon.

In the account of this place we muſt not forget its library, which is a ſpacious room, well ſtocked with books of all ſorts, eſpecially in civil law and hiſtory: for which they are greatly indebted to James Gibſon, eſq; and to the benefactions in money given by every biſhop at his conſecration, to purchaſe books for this library.

This learned body were originally ſeated in Pater-noſter-Row, and in the very place where now ſtands the Queen's-head tavern; which aforetime had been a houſe for a reſidentiary of St. Paul's. But that ſituation being found very inconvenient, doctor Henry Harvey, dean of the arches, purchaſed and provided a large houſe in Knightrider-ſtreet which at [illegible] time was an old ſtone building belonging to and let out by the canons of St. Paul's.

The preſent college was built upon the ruins of the houſe, given by the above doctor Harvey, and burnt down in the general conflagration of this city in 1666: on which occaſion the buſineſs of the inſtitution was transferred to, and carried on at Exeter-change, in the Strand, till the new college was finiſhed in a more convenient and elegant manner.

On the north ſide of Knightrider-ſtreet is Bell-yard, which leads into Great Carter-lane, inhabited chiefly by gentlemen belonging to or depending upon the courts of Doctors commons. On the north ſide is Dean's-court, which is but ſmall, but graced with the remarkable buildings, viz. the prerogative court, and a large houſe on the weſt ſide, the ſeat of the deans of St. Paul's ſucceſſively.

On the ſouth ſide of Little Carter-lane is a place called Sermon-lane, corruptly for Sheremonier's-lane, this having once been the place where the ſilver was prepared, cut, and rounded for the coiners in the Old-change. On the weſt ſide of this lane is a ſchool belonging to Caſtle Baynard ward, purchaſed and beautified by alderman Barber, for the education of thirty boys and twenty girls.

In a court near this is the paving office for the city of London's new pavements: and nearer to the Old-change, on the ſouth ſide of Little Carter-lane, is a celebrated Preſbyterian meeting-houſe.

On the north ſide of Knightrider-ſtreet, and at the ſouth-weſt angle of the Old Change, ſtands the pariſh church of

St. MARY MAGDALEN, Old Fiſh-ſtreet,

So called from its dedication to the above ſaint, and its vicinity to Old Fiſh-ſtreet. This was a vicarage in the tenure of the canons of St. Paul's in the year 1181: but now, and for ſome ages, it has been a rectory in the gift of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's. The old edifice was deſtroyed by the fire of London, and the preſent ſtructure aroſe from its ruins, and was built in the year 1685.

It is a ſmall well proportioned church, built with ſtone, ſixty feet in length, forty-eight in breadth, and thirty in height to the roof. It is enlightened by a ſingle ſeries of arched windows, each ornamented with a cherub and ſcrolls, ſupporting a cornice, which runs round the building; but theſe windows are of ſuch an unuſual height from the ground, that the doors, which are low and plain, open completely under them: both theſe and the windows are of the ſame general conſtruction, and the wall is terminated by a baluſtrade. The tower is divided into two ſtages, in the upper of which is a large window on each ſide. From the top of this tower the work ſuddenly diminiſhes in the manner of high ſteps on each ſide, and on the top of theſe is a turret, crowned with a very ſhort ſpire, on which is placed a fane with flames.

This was originally a very poor living, but ſince the pariſh of St. Gregory's has been united to it, and made parochial for both pariſhes, it is raiſed by act of parliament to the value of 120l. per annum, in lieu of tythes. And though St. Gregory's ſtill remains an impropriation to the petty canons of St. Paul's, who are to receive all tythes, oblations, and duties of that pariſh, in as large and beneficial a manner as formerly they have, or lawfully might have done; yet the pariſhioners thereof are obliged to pay their quota of the ſaid 120l. which by act of parliament is to be levied on both theſe pariſhes, in lieu of tythes to the incumbent. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens and two overſeers.

The church of St. Gregory, which was anciently a rectory, was ſituate at the ſouth-weſt angle of St. Paul's cathedral; and took its name from Gregory the Great, biſhop of Rome, who ſent hither Auſtin the monk, to convert the Engliſh nation to chriſtianity.

This is one of the peculiars belonging to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, where they are both patrons and ordinaries; and it is not charged with firſt fruits and tenths, but only with procurations yearly to the dean and chapter aforeſaid. After its union with St. Mary Magdalen's, the ground on which it ſtood was laid open to St. Paul's church yard.

The

The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are two churchwardens, and three overſeers and collectors.

On the eaſt ſide of Puddle-dock-hill, near the wharf, is ſituate the pariſh church of St. ANDREW WARDROBE.

This church is a rectory of very ancient foundation, originally known by the name of St. Andrew near Baynard's caſtle; but that caſtle being afterwards deſtroyed, and the king's wardrobe built near the church, it changed its name from Caſtle-Baynard to that of St. Andrew Wardrobe. It is very probable this church was founded about the ſame time as Caſtle-Baynard was erected, and perhaps by the ſame nobleman: for the patronage deſcended to the noble family of Fitz-Walters, from whom it paſſed into many hands, and at length came to the crown, who have preſented to this living from the reign of king Charles II. by the lord-chancellor, who alternately preſents with the patrons of St. Anne's, Black-friars, annexed to it after the fire of London. And, by the act of their union, the living is made of the value of 140l. per annum, in lieu of tythes.

The old church being deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666, the preſent ſtructure, which was built in 1670, was made the parochial church of this pariſh and that of St. Anne, Black-friars. The body is enlightened by two rows of windows, but the tower has neither turret, pinnacle, nor ſpire. The roof is adorned with fret work of flowers, fruits, &c. the pews are very neat, and the walls well wainſcotted, with two handſome galleries, a carved pulpit, a veneered ſounding board, and a very complete altar-piece. The veſtry is ſelect; and the officers are two churchwardens.

The church of St. Anne, Black-friars, (which was a donative or curacy) ſtood on the eaſt ſide of Church-yard alley, in the precinct of Black-friars; but having ſuffered in the fatal calamity of 1666, and not being rebuilt, the pariſh was annexed to the above mentioned St. Andrew's. The antiquity of this church will appear from the following account: In the year 1276 Gregory Rokeſley, mayor, and the barons of London, granted and gave unto Robert Kilwarby, archbiſhop of Canterbury, two lanes or ways next the ſtreet of Baynard's-caſtle, and the tower of Mountfitchet, to be deſtroyed; on the ſite of which ſtreets the ſaid Robert built the church of Black-friars, with the reſidue of the ſtones that were left of the ſaid tower, which were not uſed by the biſhop of London in the repairs of St. Paul's cathedral.

This priory church was very large, and highly favoured by king Edward I. and his queen Eleanor; and, in proceſs of time, divers parliaments and other great meetings were held here: particularly the tribunal by the cardinals Campejus and Wolſey for annulling the marriage of king Henry VIII. with queen Catharine of Arragon, his royal conſort, and the parliament which ſoon after condemned cardinal Wolſey in a præmunire. This priory enjoyed many and great privileges; but they all fell at once; when this houſe ſurrendered into the king's hands, in the 30th of Henry VIII. and were granted to Sir Thomas Corden, who ſoon demoliſhed both the houſe and church. The pariſhioners, who had been accommodated for their religious rites in the priory church, and now left without a place of worſhip, complained thereof in queen Mary's reign; and Sir Thomas being obliged to find a church for the inhabitants, allowed them a lodging chamber above ſtairs, which, in the year 1597, fell down. After this the pariſhioners purchaſed an additional piece of ground to enlarge their church, which they rebuilt by ſubſcription; and it was conſecrated and dedicated to St. Anne, on December 11. A. D. 1597, and ordained to be thenceforward called "the church or chapel "of St. Anne, within the precinct of Black-"friars." This precinct increaſed ſo much with inhabitants, that, in the year 1613, they found it neceſſary to enlarge their church; and for that purpoſe purchaſed ſo much ground on the ſouth ſide thereof as enlarged the church thirty-five feet, eleven inches in breadth, and fifty-four in length; whereon they built an ayle, as an addition to it, and alſo a vault for a burial place beneath: having before purchaſed the church, church-yard, porch and parſonage houſe, with the right of patronage, from Sir George Moore. But it had no tythes belonging to it.

The ſite of St. Anne's church, at this time, ſerves only as a burial place for the inhabitants of the precinct of Blackfriars. And though the pariſh was annexed to St. Andrew's Wardrobe, yet it is directed by its own officers, viz. two churchwardens and two overſeers of the poor: and they have a general veſtry, in whom centers the election of a miniſter for the united pariſhes alternately with the lord chancellor.

We ſhall leave this ward by the way of St. Paul's church-yard: on the ſouth ſide of which, at the very extremity, is St. Paul's college, or the college or place of reſidence for the petty canons, which is a ſmall court backwards, conſiſting of ſeveral houſes appropriated to each ſtall. And nearly oppoſite this college, at the north weſt corner of the ſaid church, (which is now called London-houſe-yard, and covered with houſes, that pay a ground rent to the biſhop of London) there formerly ſtood the biſhop of London's-palace, a very large and magnificent houſe, which was deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666.

In this palace king Edward V. took up his lodging when he was brought to London to take poſſeſſion of the crown; and under king Edward VI. the Scotch queen was here entertained.

The dean's lodging on the other ſide, directly againſt the palace, was a fair old houſe; and alſo divers large houſes were built on the ſame ſide, which, of old time, were the lodgings of prebendaries and reſidentiaries, who kept great houſholds and liberal hoſpitality.

In the ſouth church-yard of St. Paul's was the ſouth ſide and weſt end of the ſaid church, at which end were three ſtately gates or entries, curiouſly wrought of ſtone: in the center of the middle gate was placed a maſſive pillar of braſs, in which the leaves of the ſaid great gate cloſed, and were faſtened with locks, bolts and bars of iron; iron; notwithſtanding all which, on the twenty-fourth of December, 1565, by a tempeſt of wind, theſe gates were blown open, and the bars, bolts, and locks, broken aſunder, or greatly bent.

At each corner of this weſt end was a ſtrong tower of ſtone, made for bell towers; one of which was called the Lollard's tower, * and uſed as the biſhops priſon, for ſuch as were detected for opinions in religion contrary to the faith of the church.

CHAPTER X.

Of CHEAP WARD.

THIS ward receives its name from the Saxon word Chepe, which ſignifies a market, and was formerly held in this diviſion of the city. This market was peculiarly known by the name of Weſt-cheap from its ſituation, to diſtinguiſh it from the market between Candlewick-ſtreet and Tower-ſtreet, which, from its ſituation alſo, was called Eaſt-cheap.

It is bounded on the eaſt by Broad-ſtreet and Wallbrook wards; on the north by Coleman-ſtreet, Baſſiſhaw and Cripplegate wards; and on the ſouth by Cordwainer's ward. It extends from the entrance of Scalding-alley in the north eaſt to near the eaſt corner of Milk-ſtreet, on the north weſt; and from the weſt corner of the Manſion-houſe on the ſouth eaſt to within thirty-three feet weſt of Bow-lane on the ſouth weſt: within which circuit is encompaſſed the Poultry, the eaſt end of Cheapſide, part of Pancras-lane, Queen-ſtreet and Bow-lane; and on the north ſide, Grocer's-alley, about 136 feet of the ſouth end of the Old Jury, Ironmonger-lane, King-ſtreet, Laurence-lane, and the principal part of Cateaton-ſtreet and Honey-lane market, excluſive of all the courts, alleys, &c. within theſe limits.

This ward is divided into nine precincts; and is under the government of an alderman, twelve common-council-men, (of whom one is the alderman's deputy) eleven conſtables, thirteen inqueſt men, nine ſcavengers, and a beadle.

We ſhall begin the ſurvey of this ward on the north ſide of Cheapſide, where, behind the houſes nearly oppoſite Bow-church is ſituate

HONEY-LANE MARKET.

After the fire of London Honey-lane, and other buildings were converted into this market, among which was the pariſh church of Allhallows, Honey-lane. It is the ſmalleſt market in the city, being but 193 feet in length, from eaſt to weſt, and 97 from north to ſouth. In the middle is a market houſe which ſtands on pillars, has rooms over it, and is crowned with a bell tower. In this market are a number of ſtanding ſtalls for butchers covered over, and alſo ſeveral ſtalls for fruiterers; the paſſages into it are inhabited by fiſhmongers, poulterers, &c. It is famous for the goodneſs of the proviſions ſold there, with which it is well ſupplied on Mondays, Wedneſdays, Fridays, and Saturdays.

From this market we return into Cheapſide, and proceeding more eaſtward on the ſouth ſide, we come to New Queen-ſtreet, which, before the fire of London was called Soper-lane, on the eaſt ſide of which this ward turns down Pancras-lane into Bucklerſbury.

On the north ſide of Pancras-lane were formerly two pariſh churches, viz. St. Pancras Soper-lane, and St. Bennet Sherehog. The former was conſumed in the fire of London, and not rebuilt; the ſite of which, ſince that time has been uſed as a burial place for the inhabitants of the pariſh, which is annexed to St. Mary-le-Bow. And the latter ſharing the ſame fate, the ſite has been likewiſe converted for a burial place to the pariſhioners who are united with the pariſh of St. Stephen, Wallbrook.

Turning to the ſouth eaſt end of Cheapſide you enter Buckleſbury, (corruptly Bucklerſbury) which leads to the head of Wallbrook, and is ſo called from one Buckle, lord of the manor, who reſided and kept his court in a large ſtone houſe that ſtood where now is Barge-yard. This place is ſo called from the barges which were rowed up hither from the Thames when the ſtream of Wallbrook was open for navigation. And where Bucklerſbury meets Cheapſide, viz. at the weſt end of the Poultry, there formerly ſtood the great conduit, which was the firſt erected to convey ſweet water in leaden pipes under ground from Paddington to this place. It was caſtellated with ſtone and ciſterned with lead. But theſe conduits becoming leſs uſeful, as the New-river and Thames water-works improved; and ſuch a large building ſtanding almoſt in the middle of the

* It was in this tower that Richard Hunne, a citizen of London, in the year 1515, a man of fair character, and well beloved, was made priſoner, on pretence of having Wickliffe's bible: but, indeed, the occaſion of his ruin was a diſpute he had with a clerk about a mortuary, which was made the cauſe of the whole clergy. He ſubmitted to the biſhop's correction, upon which he ought to have been enjoined penance, and ſet at liberty; but he was found hanging in his chamber, and his neck broken; which murder, the biſhop's ſumner owned that he, and the chancellor, doctor Horſey, and the bell ringer, had committed: and when the coroners inqueſt proceeded to trial, the biſhop began a new proceſs againſt the dead body for hereſy, which, not contented to have murdered, they afterwards burnt in Smithfield.

the ſtreet, being incommodious for coaches and carts, the magiſtracy did not rebuild it, but removed it quite away after the fire of London.

The Poultry, which begins on the weſt, by the Old Jewry where Cheapſide ends, and reaches to the Manſion-houſe by Cornhill, is not only well built and inhabited by capital tradeſmen, but may be counted the greateſt thoroughfare for carriages and foot paſſengers from the weſtern diviſions of this metropolis; it lying cloſe to the center of buſineſs, for thoſe who frequent the 'Change, the Manſion-houſe, Lombard-ſtreet, the Bank, and other public offices.

In this ſtreet, at the weſt ſide of Scalding-alley, * is ſituate the parochial church of St. MILDRED's POULTRY.

The foundation of this church appears to be very ancient; for ſo early as 18 Edward II. we find it with the chapel of Corpus Chriſti and St. Mary de Coney-hope annexed: which chapel of Corpus Chriſti and St. Mary ſtood at the end of Coney-hope-lane, or the rabbit market, now called Grocer's-alley; and being ſuppreſſed by king Henry VIII. on account of a fraternity found therein, it was purchaſed by one Thomas Hobſon, who converted the chapel into a warehouſe.

The old church which had been rebuilt in 1430, was burnt down in 1666; and when the preſent one was built, the legiſlature annexed thereunto the pariſh of St. Mary Colechurch; and the living was thereby endowed by parliament with 170l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

The patronage of this church, before the reformation, was in the convent and prior of St. Mary Overies; but from the ſuppreſſion of that religious houſe, it fell to the crown, in whom it has continued to the preſent time.

This church is a plain ſubſtantial ſtone building, enlightened by a ſeries of large windows and ſtrengthened with ruſtic at the corners. The tower is crowned with a plain courſe, without pinnacles, turret, or any other ornament; except a clock, whoſe dial projects about half way over the ſtreet. The inſide is paved with purbeck ſtone mixed with black marble; and at the weſt end there is a handſome gallery, and a good pulpit. The veſtry is ſelect, and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, two ſideſmen, and ſix auditors of accounts.

St. Mary Colechurch, whoſe pariſh is annexed to that of St. Mildred's, was ſo called from its dedication to the Virgin Mary; and received the additional epithet of Cole from the name of its founder. It was built upon a vault, after the faſhion of moſt of our modern churches, above ground, ſo that there was an aſcent up to the floor of the church by ſeveral ſteps.

The origin of this church does not plainly appear, but we have reaſon to ſuppoſe it of great antiquity, from the baptiſm of St. Thomas-à-Becket, (as commonly called) and St. Edmund, both archbiſhops, regiſtered in this pariſh. And it is conjectured that the impropriation anciently belonged to the maſter and brethren of the adjoining hoſpital of St. Thomas de Acon Martyr, now called Mercer's chapel; the ſite of which, together with the advowſon of St. Mary Colechurch, was granted by king Henry VIII. in the year 1542, to the company of mercers, in whom it has remained as a donative ever ſince.

When this church was burnt down in 1666, the pariſh was annexed to St. Mildred's Poultry: and the mercers company, empowered by act of parliament, built a free-ſchool and other buildings, on the ſite thereof. In this ſchool twenty-five boys are taught the claſſics, for which the maſter receives 40l. per annum, beſides the uſe of a commodious dwelling-houſe.

The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are two churchwardens.

On the north ſide of the Poultry, a little to the weſtward of St. Mildred's church ſtands

The POULTRY COMPTER.

This priſon is called the compter, from the priſoners being obliged to account for the cauſe of their commitment before they are diſcharged; and the addition of Poultry is to diſtinguiſh it from another compter in Wood-ſtreet. The charge of theſe priſons is committed to the ſheriffs, under whom are the following officers in each compter, who give ſecurity to the ſheriff for the faithful diſcharge of their reſpective truſts.

1. The principal officer, next to the ſheriff, is the ſecondary, whoſe buſineſs is, to return writs, mark warrants, impannel juries, for the courts both above and below, and alſo for the ſeſſions.

2. The clerk of the papers; whoſe office is to impannel juries for the ſheriffs court; and who enters upon judgment, and makes out all proceſſes.

3. Four clerk-ſitters, who enter actions, take bail, receive verdicts after trial, &c.

4. Eighteen ſerjeants at mace, each of whom has his yoeman or follower. Their office is to arreſt perſons for debt, to execute all proceſſes, to ſerve writs, executions upon actions, and ſummonſes from above, as well as from the courts below. Each of theſe ſerjeants gives 400l. ſecurity to the ſheriff, for the due execution of his office. Four of theſe ſerjeants, and as many yoemen out of each compter, wait upon their reſpective ſheriffs daily; and during the time of ſeſſions, double the number. At which time in the morning they bring the priſoners down from Newgate to the Seſſions-houſe; put them in the dock; and after waiting all day, return the priſoners back to the jail at night; they alſo attend at the execution of priſoners. Upon their days of waiting they always wear blue cloth gowns, which are given them annually by the ſheriffs.

* In this alley was formerly a large houſe, known by the name of the Scalding-houſe; for the ſtreet called the Poultry containing a number of Poulterers ſtalls, the fowls they ſold there were firſt ſcalded in this houſe.

MERCERS HALL,
Cheapside.

HABERDASHERS HALL,
Maiden Lane.

London, Published by Vernor Hood & Sharpe, Poultry, Augt 1st 1810.

To each compter alſo belongs a maſter keeper, and under him two turnkeys, and other ſervitors.

The poorer ſort of priſoners, as well in this compter as that in Wood ſtreet, receive daily relief from the ſheriffs table, of all the broken meat and bread; and there are alſo ſeveral benefactions made by charitable perſons, for the releaſement of thoſe, whoſe debts are ſmall, or perhaps have lain a conſiderable time for want of diſcharging the priſon fees.

On the north ſide of the Poultry, and at the farther end of Grocers-alley (formerly called Coney-hope-lane) ſtands

GROCERS HALL.

This building is ſituate on a ſpot of ground purchaſed by the Grocers company in the year 1411, of Robert Fitz-Walter, for three hundred and twenty marks. The building is well deſigned and executed for the purpoſes of a common hall; and is not only a ſtately edifice, but ſo capacious, that for many years it ſerved for the uſes of the Bank of England, which was kept in this hall, till the edifice in Threadneedle-ſtreet was erected for that purpoſe. The ancient ſtone and brick building at the north weſt corner of the garden, inhabited by the beadle of the company, is probably part of the ancient city manſion of the noble family of Fitz-Walter, and conſequently the oldeſt building within the city walls.

The company of Grocers is the ſecond of the twelve principal companies, and was anciently denominated Pepperers; but having changed their name to that of Grocers, were, under that denomination, incorporated by letters patent of Edward III, in the year 1345, by the name of "The wardens and commonalty of the myſtery "of the Grocers of the city of London;" which was confirmed by Henry VI. in the year 1429. Theſe grants were afterwards confirmed by a new charter of Charles I. in the year 1640, with an additional power of ſearching and inſpecting the goods and weights of all Grocers within the city and ſuburbs of London, and three miles round. They had anciently the management of the king's beam in the city, with the right of appointing a maſter-weigher, and four porters to attend it.

This corporation conſiſts of a prime miniſter and three other wardens, with a numerous court of aſſiſtants. It is a livery company; and out of their poſſeſſions they pay about 700l. per annum to the poor.

About the middle of Grocer's-alley, on the weſt ſide is Dove-court, which leadeth into the Old Jewry, * nearly oppoſite, at preſent, (1769)

The EXCISE OFFICE.

This is a large brick building, formerly the dwelling-houſe of Sir John Frederick: and tho' it has nothing to recommend it in its outward appearance, yet it is capacious and well adapted for the particular uſes to which the government have appointed it. It is the principal office of exciſe within his majeſty's dominions, and is managed by nine commiſſioners whoſe appointments are 1000l. per annum each. Under theſe are a great number of officers, both within and without the houſe, viz. five commiſſioners for appeals; a ſecretary with three clerks; five accomptants general; four general ſurveyors; a receiver general; comptroller of the caſh; inſpector general for coffee and tea; an auditor of exciſe; an auditor of hides, and a comptroller, with clerks in each office.

Theſe receive the produce of exciſe on beer, ale, and ſpirituous liquors; on tea, coffee, and chocolate; on malt, hops, ſoap, ſtarch, candles, paper, callicoes, gold and ſilver wire, vellum, parchment, hides and ſkins, plate, and wheels of body carriages, collected all over England, and pay it into the exchequer. And for the collecting, ſurveying, &c. of which monies, and things exciſeable, they have a great number of out-door officers in all parts of the kingdom, regulated within certain diſtricts, or diviſions, both horſe and foot, to gauge, and to prevent frauds and loſs in the duties of exciſe. Before the commiſſioners of exciſe are tried all frauds committed in the ſeveral branches of the revenue under their direction; without any appeal, except to the commiſſioners of appeal for a re-hearing.

This office is intended to be removed, as ſoon as the new ſtructure, now erecting on the ſite of Greſham college, is finiſhed.

On the north of Cheapſide, almoſt in the center between the Old Jewry and Ironmonger-lane, is ſituate

MERCERS HALL and CHAPEL.

On this ſpot, in ancient times, ſtood an hoſpital dedicated to St. Thomas of Acars, or Acons, and was founded by Thomas Fitz-Theobald de Heili, and his wife Agnes, ſiſter to Thomas-à-Becket, who was born on the ſame ſpot in the reign of king Henry II.

Thomas-à-Becket (to whom this hoſpital or chapel was probably dedicated) was the ſon of Gilbert Becket, a citizen of London, and of Matildis his wife, who was the daughter of a pagan prince, under whoſe cuſtody Gilbert being taken priſoner, when he travelled into the Holy Land, was for a year and a half in confinement, and at laſt eſcaping by the help of this Matildis (who fell in love with him, being converted to the chriſtian religion) he came again ſafe into England, whom Matildis, not long after, for love of him, adventured to follow, and getting away from her father, came at laſt to London, where finding Gilbert, he married her, and of her begat this Thomas, who was born in his father's houſe, which was then in the place where Mercerschapel in Cheapſide now ſtands.

* This ſtreet was originally called the Jewry, from its being the reſidence of the Jews in this city; but the Jews being baniſhed by Edward I. they, upon their re-admiſſion into England, ſettled near Aldgate, in a place from them called Poor Jewry-lane; on which occaſion this, their ancient place of abode was called the Old Jewry.

He

He was murdered in his own cathedral church at Canterbury, on Innocent's day, at even, anno 1170, as he was going up the ſteps towards the choir, by four knights, named Reynald Fitz-Urſe, Hugh de Mortenill, William de Tracy, and Richard Briton, none of which (as the report is) lived above three years after, and then died very penitent. And as he ſuffered for his zeal in defence of the papacy, we find him ſoon after canonized, and worſhipped by the pope's command.

Why this chapel was dedicated to St. Thomas-à-Becket, by the name of St. Thomas of Acons, is not perfectly known; but the following account, from the X. Scriptores, ſeems very probable: when the city of Acars, or Acon, in the Holy Land called alſo Ptolematis) was beſieged by the chriſtians, one William, an Engliſhman by nation, being chaplain to Radulphus de Diceto, dean of London, when he went to Jeruſalem, bound himſelf by a vow, that if he ſhould proſperouſly enter Acon, he would build a chapel to St. Thomas the Martyr, at his own charge, according to his ability; and would procure there, to the honour of the ſaid martyr, a church-yard to be conſecrated; which was done. Then many flocking from all parts to ſerve in this chapel, William himſelf, as a token of his chriſtianity, took on him the name of prior; who, whilſt he ſerved bodily as a ſoldier of Chriſt, had an eſpecial care of the poor, and he freely beſtowed all his diligence and labour, in burying the bodies of ſuch as died, as well natural, as of others who were ſlain with the ſword, repreſenting himſelf in man's ſight, the next ſucceſſor of that great Tobias.

There is another teſtimony out of the Theatre of honour, lib. 9. cap. 11. where the author repeating the military orders of the Holy Land, ſaith thus: "The order of St. Thomas was inſtituted by the king of England, Richard, ſurnamed Cœur de Lyon, after the ſurprizal of Acars, and being of the Engliſh nation, they held the rule of St. Auguſtin, wore a white habit, and a full red croſs, charged in the middle with a white ſcallop; they took for their patron the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the metropolitan of England, Thomas-à-Becket, who ſuffered martyrdom (as his favourers ſay) under the king of England, Henry II. of that name. Peter de Rupibus, biſhop of Wincheſter, who had been five years in the Holy Land, removed the church there of St. Thomas the martyr, from an unfit place to a more convenient, and cauſed the patriarch of Jeruſalem to take order, that the brethren of this church, who were before laymen, might be under the order of the Templers, wearing a croſs on their breaſt. He bequeathed alſo to this houſe of St. Thomas of Acons, 500 marks." So much M. Paris in vita Hen. III. p. 472. ſub anno 1238.

Hereby it is clear, that the dedication of this hoſpital, or chapel, to St. Thomas of Acons, or Acars, muſt have relation to the like dedication of the chapel and holy order in the city of Acars, in the Holy land to the ſame archbiſhop; all theſe three dedications being near about one and the ſame time, within few years after the archbiſhop's death. And it is probable, that in imitation of thoſe dedications at Acars, this in London might do the like.

From this St. Thomas anciently was a ſolemn proceſſion uſed by the new mayor; who, the afternoon of the day he was ſworn at the exchequer, met with the aldermen here; whence they repaired together to St. Paul's, and there prayed for the ſoul of the biſhop William at his tomb; who was biſhop of London in the time of William the conqueror. Then they went to the church-yard, to a place where Thomas-à-Becket's parents lay; and there they prayed for all faithful ſouls departed. And then they went all back to St. Thomas of Acons again; and both mayor and aldermen offered each a penny.

This hoſpital, after its ſurrender, 30 Hen. VIII. was purchaſed by the mercers company, and opened by them immediately under the name of Mercer's chapel. They were both deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666; after which the ſchool was re-eſtabliſhed and built over or near the ſite of St. Mary Cole-church, at the ſouth weſt end of the Old Jewry. The hall and chapel were rebuilt upon their former foundation, with one front in Ironmonger-lane, and the other towards Cheapſide; the latter of which is adorned with a very handſome entrance; the door-caſe is enriched with the figures of two cupids mantling the company's arms, and with feſtoons, &c. and over it the balcony is adorned with two pilaſters of the Ionic order, and a pediment; with the figures of Faith, Hope and Charity, and other entablatures.

The inner court is adorned with piazzas, formed of columns of the Doric order; the hall room and great parlour are wainſcoted with oak, and ornamented with Ionic pilaſters; and the ceiling with fret work. The chapel is neatly wainſcoted, and paved with black and white marble.

The company of mercers, which is the firſt of the twelve principal companies, was incorporated by letters patent, granted by king Richard II. in the year 1393, under the title of, "The wardens "and commonalty of the myſtery of the mercers "of the city of London." The members of this company are not only exempt from quarterage, but upon their admiſſion to the livery, pay only a ſmall fine. They are governed by a prime, three other wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants; and pay in charitable benefactions about three thouſand pounds per annum.

More weſtward from this hall is King-ſtreet, at the north extremity of which ſtands

GUILDHALL.

This is the hall in which are kept the nine courts for tranſacting the buſineſs of the city, viz.

1. The court of common-council.
2. The court of Lord mayor and aldermen.
3. The court of huſtings.
4. The court of orphans.
5. The two courts of the ſheriffs.
6. The court of wardmote.
7. The court of hallmote.
8. The court of requeſts, commonly called the court of conſcience.

9. The

9. The Chamberlain's court for binding and apprentices, and making them free.

The Guildhall ſtood formerly in or near Aldermanbury, or Aldermens-court, from which ſituation of this hall the ſtreet is ſaid to take its denomination, and conſequently the hall muſt have been founded before the year 1189; for then we find this ſtreet to have had that name. The old hall, however, being fallen to decay, the preſent ſtructure was begun in the year 1411, upon a larger and more noble plan, and ten years were employed in compleating it; towards the charge whereof the companies gave great benevolences. The executors of Richard Whittington gave a purbeck pavement to the hall, and glazed ſome of the windows, on each of which Whittington's arms were placed; others of the aldermen glazed different windows, and had alſo their arms painted on the glaſs.

The hall being, however, much damaged by the fire of London in 1666, was repaired and beautified three years after, at the expence of two thouſand five hundred pounds, in ſo effectual a manner, that it has ſtood to the preſent time.

The entrance has a ſtately Gothic frontiſpiece, enriched with the king's arms under a cornice, pediment and vaſe, and between two cartouches and the city ſupporters, on acroſters, and theſe between two other vaſes, under which are niches; and in the middle of this front are the following words done in gold: (though ſo obliterated by time as not to be intelligible to the ſpectator)

Reparata et ornata Thoma Rawlinſon, milit. Majore, An. Dom. MDCCVI.

Over the gate is a balcony, above which are placed in niches on each ſide, the figures of Moſes and Aaron; and on the ſides beneath are the four cardinal virtues, over the aperture; and below the balcony are depicted the arms of the twenty-four companies.

On entering this Gothic arch, you come into the hall, which is one hundred and fifty-three feet long, forty-eight broad, and fifty-five feet high. The roof is flat, and divided into pannels; the walls on the north and ſouth ſides are adorned with four Gothic demi-pillars, painted white with blue veins, and gilt capitals, upon which are the royal arms, and thoſe of Edward the confeſſor, who, in all probability, had a conſiderable ſhare in the foundation of this ancient building.

Nearly fronting the gate are nine or ten ſteps, leading to the Lord-mayor's court, over which is a balcony ſupported at each end by four iron pillars in the form of palm-trees; by theſe is a ſmall incloſure on each ſide on the top of the ſteps, uſed on ſome occaſions as offices for clerks to write in, each being juſt ſufficient to hold one perſon. Under theſe are two priſons called Little Eaſe, from the lowneſs of the ceiling, by which priſoners were obliged to ſit on the floor. Theſe priſons are intended for city apprentices, who upon complaint, and a ſtrict examination into the offence, were ſometimes committed thither by the Chamberlain, whoſe office is at the right hand at the head of the ſteps.

In the front of this balcony is a clock, on the frame of which is carved the four cardinal virtues, with the figure of Time on the top, and a cock on each ſide of him. Behind this clock are two giants of an enormous ſize, which ſtand on the outſide of the balcony cloſe to the wall, one on each ſide; they have black and buſhy beards; one holds an halbert, and the other a ball ſet round with ſpikes, hanging by a chain to a long ſtaff. Theſe ornaments are ſuppoſed to repreſent an ancient Briton and a Saxon.

Round the hall, on fourteen demi-pillars, above the capitals, are the king's arms on the north-eaſtward, and the arms of London on the ſouth-eaſtward pillar: and weſtward from them are the arms of the twelve companies.

At the eaſt end are the king's arms, between the portraitures, finely painted, of their preſent majeſties king George III. and queen Charlotte; cloſe by the firſt is the picture of queen Caroline; and by the latter his late majeſty king George II. And at the ſame end of the hall, on the ſouth ſide, are the pictures of king George I. and queen Mary; directly oppoſite to which, on the north ſide, are thoſe of king William III. and queen Anne. The inter-columns are painted in imitation of porphyry, and embelliſhed with the pictures, in full proportion, of twenty-two judges, which were there put up by the city in gratitude for their ſignal ſervices done in determining differences between landlords and tenants, without the expence of law-ſuits, in rebuilding the city, purſuant to an act of parliament, after the fire of London. To theſe the city of London has lately added the picture, in full proportion, of the late chief juſtice Pratt, now lord Camden, and lord-high-chancellor of England.

At the eaſt end of the hall is held the court of huſtings, and occaſionally that of the exchequer; and before the huſtings is held the Court of Conſcience. At the weſt end is held alternately the ſheriffs court for the Poultry and Wood-ſtreet compters. Oppoſite to the Chamberlain's office, already mentioned, is the office of auditors of the city accounts, within which is the Lord-mayor's court office, where the lord chief-juſtice occaſionally ſits in trials by niſi prius. On the weſt ſide of the mayor's court office is the court of Orphans, where the lord chief-juſtice of the common-pleas occaſionally ſits. Adjoining to this court on the north is the Old Council Chamber, now uſed by the commiſſioners of bankrupts; contiguous to which is the New Council Chamber. Beneath the Mayor's court is the Town Clerk's office, where are depoſited the city archieves. To the eaſt and north are the reſidences of the Chamberlain and Town Clerk; near which are two rooms wherein the buſineſs of bankrupts is executed. Adjoining to the north-weſt is the kitchen; in the porch is the Comptroller's office; and over it the Iriſh chamber. And over the piazzas on the weſt, are the offices belonging to the Common Serjeant, Remembrancer, and City Sollicitor.

This hall is generally uſed for the entertainment of our kings, queens, and other potentates, foreign miniſters, &c. and for chuſing the Lord-mayors, ſheriffs, members of parliament, &c.

Guildhall-chapel, which is ſituate between Blackwell-hall and Guildhall, was founded in the year 1299, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalen and All Saints, and called London college. A chauntry was founded in this chapel for four chaplains, and lands and tenements left for their ſupport. It was rebuilt in the reign of Henry VI. and received new endowments: but at the ſuppreſſion of religious houſes it reverted to the crown, and was bought of king Edward VI. with other lands and tenements, for the ſum of 456l. 13s. 4d. And the city holds it in ſoccage of the manor of Greenwich. It was defaced, but not burnt down by the fire of London in 1666, and was afterwards repaired.

This edifice is perfectly in the Gothic taſte. In ſeveral niches are ſet the figures in ſtone of king Edward VI. of queen Elizabeth, with a phœnix under her; and of king Charles I. treading on a globe. The windows are extremely large, and the walls within-ſide are hung with tapeſtry. Over the aldermen's ſeats there is a wainſcot covering, and a particular ſeat for the Lord-mayor, adorned with cartouches. There is a gallery at the weſt end, a handſome wainſcot pulpit and deſk, and a neat altar piece incloſed with rails and baniſters.

The chapel remaineth to the mayor and commonalty, wherein they have ſervice weekly; as alſo at the election of mayor, and at the mayor's feaſts, &c.

On the ſouth-ſide of this chapel was formerly a library belonging to Guildhall and the college. But it is ſaid that in the reign of king Edward VI. Edward duke of Somerſet, then lord protector, ſent for the books with a promiſe of returning them; but that promiſe being never after fulfilled, the room has been long made a ſtorehouſe for cloths.

On the north ſide of Cateaton-ſtreet, and at the ſouth weſt corner of Guildhall-yard, is ſituate the pariſh church of St. LAWRENCE JEWRY.

This church is thus denominated from its being dedicated to St. Lawrence, a native of Hueſca, in the kingdom of Arragon in Spain, who, after having ſuffered the moſt dreadful torments under the emperor Valerian, was cruelly broiled alive upon a gridiron, with a ſlow fire, till he died. And it received the additional epithet of Jewry, from its ſituation among the Jews, who formerly reſided in the ſtreets near that church; to diſtinguiſh it from St. Lawrence Poultney, now demoliſhed.

This church, which was anciently a rectory, being given by Hugo de Wickenbroke to Baliol college in Oxford, anno 1294, the rectory ceaſed; wherefore Richard, biſhop of London, converted the ſame into a vicarage; the advowſon whereof ſtill continues in the maſter and ſcholars of the ſaid college.

This church being burnt, with many others, in the dreadful fire of London 1666, was rebuilt at the pariſh expence, with a very conſiderable benefaction by Sir John Langham; and the pariſh of St. Mary Magdalen, Milk-ſtreet, thereunto annexed.

It is eighty one feet long, ſixty eight broad, forty feet high to the roof, and the ſteeple one hundred and thirty feet high. The body is enlightened by two ſeries of windows, the lower ones large and uniform, and the upper ſmall. At the eaſt end is a pediment with niches, ſupported by Corinthian columns. The tower, which is lofty, is terminated by a baluſtrade with plain pinnacles, and within this baluſtrade riſes a kind of lanthorn, which ſupports the baſe of the ſpire.

The income to the incumbent, for this united pariſh, is ſettled by act of parliament at 120l. per annum, paid by the pariſh in lieu of tythes, and 20l. per annum from Baliol college.

Here is a gift ſermon every Tueſday, Thurſday and Friday, well endowed by lady Cambden. And over the veſtry is a free-ſchool.

It is an impropriation in the gift of Baliol college. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are two churchwardens.

The church of St. Mary Magdalen, Milk-ſtreet, whoſe pariſh is annexed to St. Lawrence Jewry, ſtood on the eaſt ſide and towards the ſouth end of Milk-ſtreet, near Cheapſide, in the milk market, and was in the gift of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, as early as the reign of king Henry I. The ſite of this church, after the fire of London, was laid into Honey-lane market: but the pariſhioners ſtill maintain their own poor, and have one churchwarden.

Having thus arrived at the place from whence we ſet off, we ſhall leave this ward, and proceed to the next chapter.

CHAPTER XI.

Of COLEMAN-STREET WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from the principal ſtreet therein; ſo called from one Coleman, who, in all probability, was either the builder or a principal owner or inhabitant thereof. It is bounded on the north by Cripplegate ward, Upper Moorfields, and Biſhopſgate ward; on the eaſt by Biſhopſgate ward, Broad-ſtreet ward, and Cheap ward; on the ſouth by Cheap ward; and on the weſt by Baſſiſhaw ward. Its extent from eaſt to weſt is, from the grate by Lothbury church, to the ſouth ſide of Ironmonger-lane; but no farther than the ſouth weſt corner of Baſinghall-ſtreet on the north ſide; and, in the other direction it extends ſouth from Moorgate to the garden belonging to Grocers-hall in the Poultry.

This ward is divided into ſix precincts; and is governed by an alderman, ſix common-councilmen, ſix conſtables, thirteen inqueſt men, ſix ſcavengers, and a beadle.

The principal ſtreets in this ward are, Coleman-ſtreet; the north part of the Old Jewry; Lothbury, from Coleman-ſtreet to St. Margaret's church on the north ſide, and on the ſouth to about twenty-ſeven feet beyond Princes-ſtreet; the north ſide of Cateaton-ſtreet, from Baſinghall-ſtreet to Coleman-ſtreet, and the ſouth ſide from Ironmonger-lane.

The moſt remarkable buildings are, the pariſh churches of St. Stephen Coleman-ſtreet, St. Margaret's Lothbury, and St. Olave's Jewry; Founders-hall, and the Armourers and Braziers-hall.

In ſurveying this ward we ſhall begin at that part of it which takes in the Old Jewry; a ſtreet that runs north and ſouth into Cheapſide, and is inhabited by merchants and perſons of repute. It retains the ancient name given to this part of London on account of its being the principal place of reſidence for Jews at their firſt arrival and ſettlement in England after the conqueſt; and before that known by the name of Colechurch-ſtreet, ſo called from the church of St. Mary Colechurch, ſituate at the ſouth end thereof.

Near the center of this ſtreet, on the weſt ſide, is ſituate the pariſh church of

This church is of very ancient foundation, and was originally called St. Olave's Upwell, from its dedication to the ſaint of that name, and probably from a well under the eaſt end, wherein a pump is at this time placed; but that gave way to the name of Jewry, owing to this neighbourhood becoming the principal reſidence of the Jews.

This pariſh was antiently a rectory, the patronage of which was in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, till about the year 1181, when it was transferred by them, with the chapel of St. Stephen, Coleman-ſtreet, to the prior and convent of Butley, in Suffolk: and became a vicarage. At the ſuppreſſion of that convent the impropriation was forfeited to the crown, in which it ſtill remains.

The old church was burnt down in 1666, and made way for the preſent edifice, which is built partly with brick, and ſtone faceas. It is ſeventy-eight feet long, twenty-four broad, thirty-ſix feet high to the roof, and eighty-eight feet to the top of the tower and pinnacles, which are all of ſtone. The door is of the Doric order, well proportioned, and covered with an arched pediment. The tower is very plain; and on the upper part of it riſes a cornice ſupported by ſcrolls; and upon this plain attic courſe, on the pillars at the corners, are placed the pinnacles, upon balls, and each terminated on the top by a ball. It is a well enlightened body. The floor is paved with purbeck, and the walls wainſcotted. The pulpit is enriched with carvings of cherubims; the altar-piece is adorned with the king's arms, and the communion table is ſet upon an anabathrum of black and white marble.

In this church are likewiſe three famous pieces of painting, 1. Of queen Elizabeth, lying on a fine couch with her regalia, under an arched canopy, on which are placed her arms. 2. Of king Charles I. 3. Of the figures of Time, with wings diſplayed, a ſcythe in his right hand, and an hour glaſs in his left: at his foot is a cupid dorment, and under him a ſkeleton eight feet long.

To this church, which is vicarage, is annexed the pariſh of St. Martin, Ironmonger-lane, and both together are of the value of 120l. per annum, as ſettled by parliament, in lieu of tythes. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are two churchwardens.

In this church is a lecture founded at twenty-nine pounds per annum by lady Weld, Mr. Vaughn, and Sir John Frederick, to be preached every Wedneſday, for eight months, to begin on the firſt Wedneſday in October, and to end in the laſt Wedneſday in May, annually.

The pariſh of St. Martin Ironmonger lane (annexed to St. Olave's Jewry) was a rectory, the church whereof ſtood at the corner of church-alley, and on the eaſt ſide of Ironmonger lane; the ſite of which remains now only as a burial place for the inhabitants of this pariſh.

The patronage of this rectory appears anciently to have been in lay hands; for Ralph Tricket, in the reign of Henry III. granted the ſame to the prior and canons of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield, which was confirmed to them by the ſaid king in the year 1233; from which time it continued in the ſaid prior and canons till the diſſolution of their convent by Henry VIII. after which it came to the crown who now preſents to theſe two united livings. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are two church-wardens.

to

Near to the north eaſt corner of the Old Jewry ſtood the firſt ſynagogue of the Jews, which was deſtroyed in the maſſacre of that nation, when ſeven hundred Jews were murdered, and their goods ſpoiled by the citizens of London, in the year 1262. The ſite whereof was given by queen Eleanor to the friars called de penitentia Jeſus, or de Sacca, an order of begging friars, 56 Henry III. After whoſe ſuppreſſion, by a decree of the council of Lyons, king Edward I. in the year 1305, granted leave to the ſaid friars to aſſign unto Robert Fitz Walter their chapel and church, of old time called the ſynagogue of the Jews, which near adjoined with its back front to the manſion place of the ſaid Robert, now Grocer's-hall. The ſite of that ſynagogue, &c. after various alterations is now partly covered with a good private dwelling-houſe in front, and backward with a handſome capacious meeting-houſe of the preſbyterian denomination; and with two alms-houſes in Windmill-court, for nine poor widows of armourers and braziers, founded by Mr. Tindal, and endowed by ſix ſhillings per quarter, and nine buſhels of coals annually; and with twenty ſhillings per quarter to thoſe widows who are incapable of doing any buſineſs.

On this ſpot, in ancient times, ſtood one large building of ſtone, made in the place of the Jews houſes, which reached from the pariſh church of St. Olave to the north end of the Old Jewry, and from thence weſt to the north end of Ironmonger-lane; and from the ſaid corner into Ironmonger-lane, almoſt to the pariſh church of St. Martin; but of what antiquity, or by whom the ſame was built, or for what uſe, is uncertain; more than that king Henry VI. in the 16th of his reign, gave the office of porter or keeper thereof to John Stent, for the term of his life, by the name of his principal palace in the Old Jewry. And king Richard III. committed the keeping of the prince's wardrobe (for ſo it was afterwards called) to his truſty ſervant John Kendall, his ſecretary, by his patent, dated December 12, 1483, and left him to dwell in the ſame. And in the reign of Edward VI. it was aleniated from the crown, being called a great meſſuage, under the name of the prince's wardrobe; to which belonged divers houſes; edifices, gardens, &c. being ſold to Sir Anthony Cope, a privy counſellor in 3 Edward VI. for ſixty pounds, and in conſideration of ſervices; the yearly value being reckoned at ſix pounds twelve ſhillings and four pence.

Nearly oppoſite the north end of the Old Jewry is Coleman-ſtreet, which is a broad ſpacious ſtreet, and well inhabited by eminent merchants, and reputable tradeſmen and ſhopkeepers. Near the north eaſt corner of this ſtreet ſtands

ARMOURERS HALL,

Which is an old pain brick building. The fraternity of armourers were incorporated by king Henry VI. about the year 1423, by the title of, "The maſter and wardens, brothers and ſiſters of "the fraternity of or guild of St. George, of the "men of the myſteries of the armourers of the "city of London." The ſame prince alſo honoured the company by becoming one of their members. To this company, which formerly made coats of mail, is united that of the braziers, who are jointly governed by a maſter, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants.

On the weſt ſide of this ſtreet, and near the ſouth end, ſtands the parochial church of St. STEPHEN, COLEMAN-STREET.

This church is of great antiquity, and was originally a chapel belonging to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, who between the years 1171, and 1181, granted the church of St Olave Jewry, together with this chapel, as an appendage to it, to the prior and abbot of Butley, in Suffolk.

This chapel was made parochial in the year 1456, but continued under the patronage of the prior and canons of Butley, till the ſuppreſſion of that convent, when it came to the crown. However, in the year 1577, queen Elizabeth granted the patronage, together with the church and rectory, to Thomas Paſkins and others, and in 1590 to William Daniel, ſerjeant at law, and other pariſhioners; which rectory impropriate, and right of advowſon, have been held by the pariſh in fee-farm of the crown ever ſince.

The old church ſharing the common fate in the dreadful fire of London in 1666, the preſent ſtructure was erected in its ſtead about four years after. It is a plain, neat, and ſolid building, ſtrengthened with ruſtic at the corners, and enlightened by one ſeries of large windows, with a handſome cornice, and one of the broadeſt ceilings and roofs that can be ſeen, without a pillar to ſupport it. The ſteeple is a ſquare tower, crowned with a lantern, which has four faces, and incloſes the ſacring-bell, to call the pariſhioners to prayers, read twice here every day, for which the pariſh pays the vicar 20l. per annum. The front is adorned with a cornice, two pine-apples, and the figure of a cock handſomely carved. Within it is well wainſcotted and pewed, has a handſome pulpit neatly carved, and an altar-piece adorned with the king's arms, carved, gilt, and depicted, a black and white marble foot piece to the communion table, incloſed with a neat rail and banniſter; and at the weſt end is a commodious wainſcot gallery.

On the north ſide is the green church-yard: on the ſouth is a large pavement that covers a burial vault the whole length of the church: to which pavement you aſcend by ſeveral ſteps, through a gate, over which is cut in ſtone a moſt curious repreſentation of the general reſurrection.

This living is ſettled at 110l. per annum by act of parliament. The advowſon is in the pariſhioners that pay to church and poor. The veſtry veſtry is in ſome caſes ſelect; and the pariſh officers are two churchwardens and four overſeers.

Among the monumental inſcriptions in this church are the following:

1. Our life is all but death; time that enſueth,
Is but the death of time that went before:
Youth is the death of childhood; age of youth.
Die once to God, and then thou dieſt no more.

2. Agnes the wife of Leonard Darr, whoſe ſight,
By ſickneſs much impair'd, in heav'nly light,
Look'd, liv'd and died, as dimneſs her were given;
That her ſoul's eyes might better look to heav'n.

On the eaſt ſide of Coleman-ſtreet, farther north, is Great Bell-alley, which runs eaſt and weſt, and makes an angle with Little Bell-alley, that runs north and ſouth to Thompſon's-rents. The weſt ſide of Little Bell-alley opens into Pitchers-court, Mulberry-court and White's-alley, which is long and narrow, leading into Coleman-ſtreet. In the middle of this alley is a place called Alms-houſe-yard, containing ſix houſes, for ſix poor men and their wives, and the ſurvivors of them, in the gift of the leatherſellers company.

At the north eaſt corner of Lothbury, which is well built and inhabited, ſtands the parochial church of St. MARGARET, LOTHBURY.

This church receives its name from being dedicated to St. Margaret, a virgin ſaint of Antioch, who ſuffered martyrdom in the reign of the emperor Decius; and the additional appellation of Lothbury is to point out its ſituation, and diſtinguiſh it from the other churches in this city of the ſame name. The antiquity of its foundation may be collected from the preſentation of John de Haſlingfield to this rectory, by the abbeſs and convent of Barking in Eſſex, on the ſixteenth of Auguſt, in the year 1303, in whom the advowſon continued, till the convent being ſuppreſſed, it fell to the crown, in whom it ſtill remains.

The old church, which was built in 1440, being deſtroyed by the general conflagration in 1666, the preſent ſtone edifice was erected in its ſtead, and compleated in 1690. It ſtands upon the ancient courſe of Wallbrook, and is a plain, neat building. It is ſixty-ſix feet in length, and fifty-four in breadth: the height to the roof is thirty-ſix, and the height of the ſteeple 140 feet. The body is well enlightened by a row of lofty windows; over which the wall is terminated by a baluſtrade; and the principal door is ornamented with Corinthian columns, which ſupport an angular pediment. The tower has large windows in the uppermoſt ſtage, and is terminated a little above by a plain cornice, upon which is raiſed a ſmall dome that ſupports a ſlender ſpire. Within it is wainſcotted; the floor neatly paved; the pulpit veneered; the altar-piece ornamented; and the font remarkably handſome, the baſon being carved, and repreſenting the garden of Eden, and the Fall of Man; the ſalvation of Noah and his family in the ark; the baptiſm of Jeſus by John baptiſt, and Philip baptizing the eunuch: and the cover is adorned with the figures of St. Margaret, Faith, Hope, and Charity.

On the north ſide of the church, in the churchyard, is a good parſonage-houſe. The value of the living is ſettled by act of parliament at 100l. per annum in lieu of tythes. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, four overſeers, and twelve auditors of accounts.

More weſtward from this church is Founders-court, at the north end of which is ſituate

FOUNDERS HALL.

This hall is not only uſed for tranſacting the buſineſs of the company, but likewiſe let out to a congregation of the Scotch kirk; of which denomination there is but one other in England.

The fraternity of Founders was incorporated by letters patent of the 12th of king James I. in the year 1614, by the name of "The maſter, "wardens, and commonalty of the myſtery of "Founders of the city of London;" and they have power to ſearch all braſs weights, and braſs and copper wares, within the city of London, and three miles thereof. And all makers of braſs weights within that circuit are obliged to have their ſeveral weights ſized by the company's ſtandard, and marked with their common mark: and ſuch of theſe weights as are of avoirdupois, to be ſealed at the Guildhall of this city; and thoſe of troy weight at Goldſmiths-hall.

This company enjoys the privilege of the livery, and is governed by a maſter, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants.

At the north-eaſt extremity of this ward, on the ſouth ſide of Moorfields, is ſituate

BETHLEHEM HOSPITAL.

This hoſpital, as before obſerved in the ſurvey of Biſhopſgate, was founded for lunatics, near the north eaſt corner of Lower Moorfields, in Biſhopſgate pariſh. But that becoming ruinous, and unable to anſwer the ends of that laudable charity, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, granted the governors the piece of ground on which this hoſpital now ſtands; the foundation of which was laid in the month of April 1675. And the expence of erecting this edifice, beſides that of building the wings, amounted to near 17,000l.

This magnificent building, (excluſive of the two wings which were added after its firſt erection) is 540 feet in length, and 40 feet in breadth.

The middle and ends, which project a little, are adorned with pilaſters, entablatures, foliages, and other ornaments, and riſing above the reſt of the building, have each a flat roof with a handſome baluſtrade of ſtone, in the center of which is an elegant turret. That in the middle is adorned with a clock and three dials, a gilt ball, and and a fane at the top.

The entrance is grand, and the figures on the piers, one repreſenting raving, and the other melancholy madneſs, are finely expreſſed, and do honour to their author Mr. Cibber, father of the late poet laureat. Before this fabric is a handſome wall 680 feet in length, which, like the ſtructure itſelf, is built with brick and ſtone. It encloſes a range of gardens neatly adorned with walks of broad ſtone, graſs plats and trees, wherein thoſe of the lunaticks who are well enough to be ſuffered to go about, are allowed to walk there and enjoy the benefit of the freſh air. In the middle of this wall is a large pair of fine iron gates, and by them a ſmall entrance for the admiſſion of thoſe who come out of curioſity to viſit this hoſpital.

The inſide chiefly conſiſts of two galleries one over the other, which croſs the wings, and are 193 yards long, thirteen feet high, and ſixteen feet broad; without including the cells for the patients, which are twelve feet deep. Theſe galleries are divided in the middle by two iron grates, in order to ſeparate the men from the women; the latter being confined to the weſtern part, and the former to the eaſtern part of the hoſpital. At the entrance, between theſe two grates in the lower gallery, and on the right hand cloſe to the porter's lodge, is an handſome apartment for the ſteward, who is the manager, under the direction of the committee. On the left hand is the committee room, where they ſit every Saturday to receive and diſcharge patients; and at each end of this gallery the warder of the diviſion has a particular apartment. Above there are commodious apartments for the porter, matron, nurſe, and ſervants. Below ſtairs there is a good kitchen, and all neceſſary offices for keeping and dreſſing proviſions, waſhing, &c. And at the ſouth eaſt corner there is the ſurgeon's quarter, with a bath for the patients, ſo contrived as to be hot or cold, as occaſion ſhall require.

There are about two hundred cells, or rooms for patients, which are generally full and furniſhed with a bed, when the patient is found capable of uſing one; or with clean ſtraw every day, when the patient is miſchievous, and ſtroys every thing that comes in the way.

The method of obtaining admiſſion into this hoſpital is by petitioning to the committee; the petition to be ſigned by one or more of the governors. Then the committee and phyſician, who always attend on Saturdays, having examined and found the petitioner a proper object of their charity, he is admitted, upon bond given by two houſekeepers in London, to take him away when diſcharged, and to be at the expence of his burial if he dies, and to provide him with cloaths.

When a patient is cured he is called before the committee and phyſicians, who examine him; and, if found fit to be diſcharged, the phyſician gives a certificate to that purport, and the ſteward of the houſe takes care to have him delivered to his friends: at which time the patient is furniſhed with medicines to prevent a relapſe.

The hoſpitals of Bethlehem and Bridewell being made one corporation, they have the ſame preſident, treaſurer, clerk, phyſician, ſurgeon and apothecary; yet each hoſpital has its proper ſteward and inferior officers, and a particular committee is choſen out of the governors for each. Out of that appointed for Bethlehem, there are ſix who meet every Saturday, to examine the ſtewards account of expences for the preceding week, and to ſign it after it is approved: they alſo view the proviſions, examine the patients that are to be received or diſcharged, and have the direction of other affairs belonging to this hoſpital.

Moorfields, in which this hoſpital is ſituate, is divided into four ſquares impaled, and each ſquare planted regularly with elm trees round a graſs plat. Between theſe ſquares, or quarters as they are generally called, are broad gravel walks from eaſt to weſt, and from north to ſouth, which, with the trees on each ſide, form a tolerable viſta, and is ſo well frequented by the citizens of both ſexes in the evenings and fine weather to walk in, that it has obtained the name of the city mall. The houſes on the north and eaſt are occupied principally by brokers, who deal in both new and old houſhold goods. And the ſouth ſide is entirely encloſed by Bethlehem hoſpital.

At the weſt end of this hoſpital formerly ſtood Moorgate; and on the paved ſtones, commonly called Pavement-row, there is a meeting houſe of the independent denomination.

Oppoſite the weſt end of Bethlehem, alias Bedlam hoſpital, is Fore-ſtreet, which is one of thoſe improved by virtue of the late act of parliament. This ſtreet runs in a direct line to Cripplegate church; and from narrow, confined, irregular, and mean buildings, it is become an open, ſpacious ſtreet, accommodated with good houſes, and well inhabited. The city wall from Moorgate to Cripplegate is removed, and the two poſterns, that faced Baſinghall-ſtreet and Aldermanbury have been taken down, and the paſſages into Fore-ſtreet widened, and lined with good and ſubſtantial houſes. Among the various buildings which gave way to this improvement, was Loriners-hall, ſituated upon London-wall, between Moorgate and Baſinghall-ſtreet.

This company of Loriners or bitt-makers were not incorporated till the year 1712, by the appellation of "The maſter, wardens, aſſiſtants, and "commonalty of Loriners, London," They have a livery; and are governed by a maſter, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants, who at preſent tranſact their buſineſs at coach-makers-hall in Noble-ſtreet.

CHAPTER XII.

Of CORDWAINERS-STREET WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from the occupation of its principal inhabitants, who were cordwainers, or ſhoe-makers, curriers, or other workers in leather. It is bounded on the north by Cheap-ward; on the weſt by Bread-ſtreet ward; on the ſouth by Vintry ward; and on the eaſt by Wallbrook ward.

The extent of this ward from the eaſt begins on the weſt ſide of Wallbrook, and runs weſt towards Budge-row, and thence up Watling-ſtreet, as far as Red-lion-court: within which compaſs are theſe principal ſtreets, or parts of them, viz. Watling-ſtreet, Bow-lane, Queen-ſtreet, Pancras-lane, Sithe-lane, Budge-row, Tower-royal, St. Thomas Apoſtles, and Little St. Thomas Apoſtles; excluſive of the courts, alleys, &c. It is divided into eight precincts; and is governed by an alderman, eight common-council-men, eight conſtables, fourteen inqueſt-men, eight ſcavengers and a beadle.

We ſhall begin the ſurvey of this ward at Bow-lane, which begins at Trinity-lane, and falls into Cheapſide by St. Mary-le-Bow-church. That part of it which is in this ward begins about fifty feet from Cheapſide, on both ſides the way; and ſixty feet beyond Baſing-lane; and then on the weſt only to Trinity-lane.

In this lane are the following courts, and places of note, viz.

Half-moon-court, by ſome called Lugg-yard, a place ſomething open but ordinary: it is likewiſe called Whale-bone-court, from its being once inhabited by a perſon who uſed to boil whale-bone.

Taylor's-court, a handſome, open place.

Robinhood's-court, indifferent long, and well built.

New-court, a handſome genteel place, with a door next the ſtreet, to ſhut up on nights.

Gooſe-alley, but ordinary; at the upper end of which is Twelve-bell-court, which is but ſmall and narrow. It hath a paſſage through Compter's-alley into Bow-church-yard; both places of ſmall account.

George-alley, or yard, but narrow, hath a paſſage into New Queen-ſtreet, through Weld-court, which is a handſome ſquare place, with well built and inhabited houſes.

Roſe-court, but mean and ordinary.

New Queen-ſtreet, which is built in the place where (before the fire of London) Soper's-lane ſtood, is a handſome ſpacious ſtreet well inhabited: it fronts King-ſtreet, which is oppoſite to Guild-hall, and runs in a ſtrait line down to the Thames, at the Three-cranes; but that part of it which is in the ward goeth no farther than St. Thomas-Apoſtles.

Pancras-lane comes out of New Queen ſtreet, and falls into Bucklerſbury; but only the ſouth ſide of it is in this ward. On the north ſide of this lane (before the fire in 1666) ſtood two churches, viz. Pancras Soper's-lane, and St. Bennet's Sherehog, both of which have been already mentioned.

Sithe-lane comes out of Pancras-lane, and falls into Budge-row, by St. Anthony's-church, a lane well built and inhabited by merchants.

Budge-row (which is ſo called from the Budge Furr and Skinners dwelling there) takes its riſe from Watling-ſtreet, and runs eaſtward to Canon-ſtreet; from which it is ſevered by Wallbrook on the north, and Dowgate on the ſouth. In this ſtreet is Dodſon's-court, a large place, well built, and inhabited, and hath a paſſage into Cloak-lane. On the ſouth ſide is a paſſage that leads into Tower-royal-ſtreet, which comes out of Budge-row, and falls into St. Thomas Apoſtle. In this ſtreet are two ſmall courts, one of which bears the name of the ſtreet: the other is called Straw-berry-court.

In Little St. Thomas are theſe courts:

Croſs-keys-court, which is but ſmall.

Key-court, likewiſe ſmall and ordinary.

Eagle-court, pretty open, and indifferently well built and inhabited, with a freeſtone pavement.

Having thus ſurveyed the principal ſtreets, lanes, courts, &c. in this ward, we ſhall now proceed to deſcribe the moſt remarkable buildings, beginning with the pariſh church of St. MARY LE BOW.

This church, which is a rectory, and the chief of the thirteen peculiars belonging to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, is ſituate at the north weſt angle of Bow-lane; and is ſo denominated from its dedication to the Virgin Mary, and the arches or bows wherewith the ſteeple was antiently embelliſhed.

Though we cannot aſcertain the time when, or by whom this church was founded, Sir Chriſtopher Wren, the ingenious architect, who rebuilt the churches of this city after the conflagration in 1666, was of opinion that this was an ancient Roman chriſtian church. It may, indeed, reſemble the architecture of that people; but that it was not of their conſtruction is evident from its having been erected in the time of William the Conqueror. And as it was the firſt church in this city, that was built with arches, it was therefore therefore denominated New-May church; which appellation has been ſince converted into that of St. Mary-le-Bow.

In the hiſtory of the ancient edifice, we find, that in the year 1271, a great number of people were deſtroyed, and many more maimed by the falling of the ſteeple*; after which it remained without one till the year 1512, when it was finiſhed upon the old plan, with ſtone brought from Caen in Normandy; and thus continued till it was deſtroyed with the other buildings in the city, by the fire in 1666.

The preſent noble ſtructure, which was built by the great Sir Chriſtopher Wren, † was finiſhed in 1673, and is chiefly admired for the elegance of its ſteeple, which is extremely light in its aſpect, and though very high and full of openings, ſecure from any ſecond fall by the geometrical proportion and lightneſs of its ſeveral parts.

The tower is ſquare from the ground, and in this form riſes to a conſiderable height; but with more ornament as it advances. The principal decoration of the tower part is the entrance, which is a noble, lofty, and well proportioned arch, on two of the ſides faced with a bold ruſtic, and raiſed on a plain ſolid courſe from the foundation. Within the arch is a portal of the Doric order: the frize ornamented in tryglyphs, and with ſculpture in the metopes: over this arch is an opening, with a ſmall balcony, which anſwers to a window on the other face. The firſt ſtage is terminated by an elegant cornice, over which again riſes a plain courſe, where a dial projects. Above this, in each face, is a large arched window, with coupled Ionic pilaſters at the ſides near the corners. The cornice over the windows ſupports an elegant baluſtrade, with attic pillars over the Ionic columns, ſupporting turrets, each compoſed of four handſome ſcrolls, which join at the top, where are placed urns with flames. From this part the ſteeple riſes circular. There is a plain courſe to the height of half the ſcrolls, and upon this are raiſed a circular range of Corinthian columns, while the body of the ſteeple is continued round and plain within them. Theſe ſupport a ſecond baluſtrade, with very large ſcrolls extending from it to the body of the ſteeple. Above theſe are placed a ſeries of compoſite columns, and from the entablature riſes another ſet of ſcrolls, ſupporting the ſpire, which reſts upon four balls, and is terminated by a globe, whence riſes a fane in the form of a dragon.

The author of the Critical Review of the public buildings ſays, "The ſteeple of Bow "church is a maſter-piece in a peculiar ſtyle of "building: it is, beyond queſtion, as perfect as "human imagination can contrive or execute: "and, till we ſee it outdone, we ſhall hardly "think it to be equalled." In this church are twelve bells, whoſe harmony is ſaid to be ſuperior to any other ſet in the kingdom.

After the fire of London, the parliament united to this church the pariſhes of Allhallows Honey-lane, and St. Pancras, whereby the incumbent's profits were conſiderably increaſed; he receiving, beſides glebe, caſualties, and three parſonage houſes, 200l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens and two collectors.

Allhallows Honey lane was a rectory; the church whereof ſtood where the eaſt end of Honey-lane market is now ſituate.

The advowſon of this church was anciently in private hands, as appears by Simon de Crapping, a citizen of London, preſenting William de Coventre thereto in the year 1327. But in the year 1471 it came to the company of Grocers, in whom it ſtill remains. It is united to St. Mary-le-Bow; but preſerves its right as a pariſh to hold a general veſtry, and to chuſe one churchwarden, who is alſo collector for the poor.

The church of St. Pancras, which was a rectory, ſtood, before the fire of London, on the north ſide of St. Pancras-lane, near to Soper's-lane, now called New Queen-ſtreet.

The patronage of this rectory was in the prior and canons of Canterbury, till they granted the advowſon thereof to Simon the archbiſhop in the year 1365; ſince which time it has been in the collation of the archbiſhop of that ſee. At preſent the pariſh being united by act of parliament to St. Mary-le-Bow, the ſite of the church remains only as a burial place for the inhabitants. The veſtry is general, and the pariſh officers are two churchwardens.

Near the middle of Bow-lane, on the eaſt ſide, is ſituate the pariſh church of St. MARY ALDERMARY.

This church, which is a rectory, owes its name to its dedication to the Virgin Mary aforeſaid; and the additional epithet of Aldermary, or Elder Mary, from its being the oldeſt church in this city dedicated to the ſaid virgin. It is one of the peculiars belonging to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and was founded before the conqueſt, under the Saxon kings.

In the year 1510 Sir Henry Keble, Lord-mayor of London, bequeathed 1000l. towards rebuilding this church. And in 1626, William Rodoway gave, towards the building of the ſteeple then greatly decayed, the ſum of 3000l. and Richard Pierſon, about the ſame year, gave 200 marks towards the ſame works, with condition that this ſteeple, thus to be built, ſhould follow its ancient pattern, and go forward, and be finiſhed, according to the foundation of it laid before by Sir Henry Keble, which, within three years after, was ſo finiſhed, that, notwithſtanding the body of the church was burnt in the fire of 1666, the ſteeple remained firm and good. That part of it which was conſumed was afterwards rebuilt in its preſent form by the munificence of Henry Rogers, eſq; as appears by the following inſcription over the weſt door of the church.

* See page 56.

† In digging the foundation for the new ground (the preſent edifice being brought about forty feet more towards the high-ſtreet, ſo as to make it range with the houſes) Sir Chriſtopher, to his great ſurprize, ſunk about eighteen feet deep through made ground, under which he found a Roman cauſeway, four feet thick, of rough ſtone, cloſe and well rammed, with Roman brick and rubbiſh at the bottom; on which cauſeway Sir Chriſtoper laid the foundation of this weighty and lofty tower.

Ædes hæc Deo O. M. jam olim ſacra, quæ communi Urbis Incendis ad Cineres redacta, impenſis Una Manu, ſed larga & ſanctiſſimè prodiga, integre Quinque Librarum Millibus ſurrrexit denus maxime munificentior. D. MDCLXXXI. Memoria Juſti in Benedictione.

This Gothic edifice is very ſpacious, it being an hundred feet in length and ſixty-three in breadth; the height of the roof is forty-five feet, and that of the ſteeple an hundred and thirty-five. The body is enlightened by a ſingle ſeries of large Gothic windows. The wall has well contrived buttreſſes and battlements; theſe buttreſſes run up pilaſter faſhion, in two ſtages, not projecting in the old manner from the body of the building. The tower, which is full of ornament, conſiſts of five ſtages, each of which, except the loweſt, has one Gothic window; and the pinnacles, which are properly ſo many turrets, are continued at each corner down to the ground, divided into ſtages as the body of the tower, and cabled with ſmall pillars bound round it, with a kind of arched work, and ſubdiviſions between.

The pariſh church of St. Thomas Apoſtles being by act of parliament annexed to this church, the profits of the rector are greatly augmented, he receiving 150l. per annum in lieu of tythes, and about 100l. a year by glebe. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens (one of whom is collector) two ſideſmen and four auditors of accounts.

There are two alms-houſes in this pariſh for the poor of the Salters company.

The church of St. Thomas Apoſtles, before the fire of London, ſtood where the burial place now is in Queen-ſtreet. It is a rectory of great antiquity, dedicated to St. Thomas the Apoſtle, and in the gift of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's; ſo that the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the dean of St. Paul's, preſent alternately to this united living.

The veſtry of this pariſh is general; and the officers are two churchwardens and two ſideſmen.

At the ſouth-weſt corner of Sithe-lane, on the north ſide, and near the weſt end of Watling-ſtreet, is ſituate the pariſh church of St. ANTHONY, commonly called St. ANTLIN.

This church, which is a rectory, is ſo denominated from its dedication to St. Anthony, an Egyptian hermit, and founder of the order of Eremites of St. Anthony.

The patronage of this church is in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, who alſo give inſtitution to it. Its foundation is not certainly known; but it was in the gift of the canons of St. Paul's in the year 1181.

The old church was deſtroyed by the fire in 1666, and the preſent edifice finiſhed in 1682. It is built of ſtone, and is of the Tuſcan order, firm and maſſy. The length of the church is ſixty-ſix feet, and breadth fifty-four. The roof is a cupola of an elliptic form, enlightened by four port-hole windows, and ſupported by compoſite columns. The ſteeple conſiſts of a tower, and a very neat ſpire.

The pariſh of St. John Baptiſt is annexed to this by act of parliament, and the rector receives 120l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

There are prayers in this church every morning, and a ſermon preached on the ſix working days by different clergymen, each of whom receives about twelve pounds per annum. Which morning lecture was founded by the contribution of the pariſh, and of divers other pious perſons, who gave in money 593l. 6s. 8d. and in yearly rents ſixty-two pounds. Here is likewiſe a rent charge of ten pounds per annum paid to the rector on St. Thomas's day, left by one Mrs. Parker, who alſo gave five pounds to the clerk, and five pounds to the poor. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are two churchwardens and four auditors of accounts.

The church of St. John Baptiſt, whoſe pariſh is annexed to the above, ſtood ſo near Wallbrook, that it has ſometimes been recorded by the name of St. John upon Wallbrook.

The antiquity of this church may be collected from the mention thereof by Ralph de Diceto, dean of St. Paul's in the year 1181, whoſe canons were the patrons, and gave it to the prioreſs and convent of St. Helen, London, in whom it continued till the ſuppreſſion of their nunnery, when it came to the crown in which it ſtill remains. So that the preſentation to theſe united pariſhes is alternately in the king and dean and chapter of St. Paul's.

The ſite of St. John Baptiſt is converted into a burial place for the inhabitants of this pariſh, who ſtill maintain the form of their own government, in a general veſtry, and two churchwardens.

CHAPTER XIII.

Of CORNHILL WARD.

COrnhill-ward receives its name from the principal ſtreet therein, which was ſo called from a corn market anciently kept there.

This ward is bounded on the eaſt by Biſhopſgate ward; on the north by Broad-ſtreet ward; on the weſt by Cheap ward; and on the ſouth by Langbourn ward. Its extent is very ſmall: for, beginning on the north eaſt, at the ſouth eaſt corner of St. Martin Outwich's church, it runs in ſeveral windings ſouth weſt, to the weſt extent of Cornhill: then beginning again on the north at about fifty feet from the ſouth weſt corner of Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, it runs ſouth to St. Peter's-alley in Gracechurch-ſtreet, and from thence by divers windings to the ſouth weſt corner of Cornhill.

This ward is divided into four precincts, and is governed by an alderman, ſix common-councilmen, four conſtables, ſixteen inqueſt-men, four ſcavengers, and a beadle.

On the north ſide of Cornhill are ſeveral lanes, courts, &c. as Star-court, Weigh houſe-yard, Newman's-yard, Finch-lane, Freeman's-court, Sweeting's-alley, Caſtle-alley, and the opening to the Bank. On the ſouth ſide there are Peter's-alley, Michael's-alley, Birchin-lane, Change-alley, and Pope's-head-alley. There is no more than about 113 feet on both ſides of Finch-lane from Cornhill in this ward; nor any more of Sweeting's-alley than as far as the eaſt paſſage or entrance into the Royal Exchange, and one third at the ſouth end of Caſtle-alley, the whole weſt ſide of which is covered with a new building, erected by the Bank, whoſe front is towards the new opening.

Birchin-lane, corruptly from Burchover-lane, ſo denominated from the builder, has a ſmall part, about 170 feet on both ſides of the way, in this ward; and is chiefly inhabited by reputable tradeſmen.

'Change-alley, ſo called from its vicinity to the Royal Exchange, and the connexion or buſineſs there is between them, is ſituate with its north entrance facing the ſouth gate of the Royal-Exchange. This place is univerſally known throughout the mercantile part of the world, on account of the buſineſs tranſacted there in money affairs; it being the grand market for buying and ſelling ſtocks, lottery tickets, &c. And the coffee-houſes called Jonathan's, Garraway's, Baker's, &c. within this diſtrict, are contrived for the reception and entertainment of merchants, brokers, &c. who aſſemble here daily in great numbers from all parts of the world. But it is to be obſerved that no more of this alley is within Cornhill-ward, than the north paſſage, and the front houſes oppoſite the Royal Exchange.

Pope's-head-alley takes its name from a noted tavern and eating-houſe formerly ſituated therein, whoſe ſign, for ſeveral ages, was the Pope's-head.

This alley is narrow, and leads into Lombard-ſtreet; but well inhabited by thoſe whoſe buſineſs requires their attendance near the Royal Exchange. Only the north entrance and front houſe in Cornhill is in this ward.

The remarkable buildings in this ward conſiſt only of three, viz. St. Michael's church, St. Peter's church, and

The ROYAL EXCHANGE.

Which laſt is ſituate between Sweeting's-alley and Caſtle-alley; and was originally built by Sir Thomas Greſham. See page 205. The old edifice was deſtroyed in the great fire of London in the year 1666: in whoſe place the preſent magnificent ſtructure was raiſed at the expence of 80,000l.

The ground plot of this building is 203 feet in length; 171 feet in breadth, and the area in the middle 61 ſquare perches, and is ſurrounded with a ſubſtantial and regular ſtone building wrought in ruſtic. In each of the principal fronts, which are north and ſouth, is a piazza; and in the center are the grand entrances into the area, under an extreme lofty and noble arch. The ſouth front in Cornhill is the principal, on each ſide of which are Corinthian demi-columns, ſupporting a compaſs pediment; and in the intercolumniation on each ſide, in the front next the ſtreet, is a niche, with the figures of King Charles I. and king Charlrs II. in Roman habits, and well executed. Over the aperture, on the cornice between the two pediments, are the king's arms in relievo; on each ſide of this entrance is a range of windows, placed between demi-columns, and pilaſters of the compoſite order, above which runs a baluſtrade.

The height of the building is fifty-ſix feet; and from the center, in this front, riſes a lanthorn and turret 178 feet high, on the top of which is a fane in the form of a Graſshopper, made of poliſhed braſs, eſteemed a very fine piece of workmanſhip; a Graſshopper being the creſt of Sir Thomas Greſham's arms. This turret and fane has been very lately repaired and beautified.

The north front in Threadneedle-ſtreet is adorned with pilaſters of the compoſite order; but has neither columns nor ſtatues on the outſide; and, inſtead of the two compaſs pediments, has a triangular one.

VIEW of the ROYAL EXCHANGE

Gresham College as it appeared before it was taken Down to Build an Excise Office

The inſide of the area is ſurrounded with piazzas alſo; forming ambulatories for merchants, &c. to ſhelter themſelves from weather, when met there upon buſineſs. Above the arches of this quadranglar piazza is an entablature ſtanding round, and a compaſs pediment in the middle of the cornice of each of the four ſides. Under the pediment, on the north ſide, are the king's arms; on the ſouth the city arms; on the eaſt Sir Thomas Greſham's arms; and on the weſt the mercers arms, with their reſpective enrichments.

There are twenty-four niches in the inter columns, twenty of which are filled with the ſtatues of the kings and queens of England, ſtanding erect in their royal robes, and with the regalia, except three, which are dreſſed like Roman Cæſars. Among theſe has been lately put up the ſtatue of his preſent majeſty king George III.

Within this area, under the piazzas, are twenty-eight niches, which are all vacant but that in which Sir Thomas Greſham's ſtatue is placed in the north weſt angle; and that in the ſouth weſt, where the ſtatue of Sir John Barnard was placed in his life-time by his fellow citizens, to expreſs the true ſenſe of his merit, as a merchant, a magiſtrate, and as a wiſe, active and faithful repreſentative of the city of London.

In the center of the area is erected, on a marble pedeſtal, about eight feet high, another ſtatue of king Charles II. in a Roman habit, erected by Mr. Gibbon, and encompaſſed with iron rails. On the ſouth ſide of the pedeſtal, under an imperial crown, a ſcepter, palm branches, and other decorations, is the following inſcription:

Carolo II. Cæſari Britannico,
Patriæ Patri,
Regum Optimo, Clementiſſimo, Auguſtiſſimo,
Generis humani deliciis,
Utriuſque Fortunæ Victori,
Pacis Europæ abitro,
Marium Dominis ac Vindici,
Societas Mercatorum adventur. Angliæ
Quæ per CCCC jam prope annos,
Regia benignitate floret,
Fidei intemeratæ et gratitudinis æternæ
Hoc teſtimonium
Venerabunda poſuit
Anno ſalutis humanæ M.DC.LXXXIV.

On the weſt ſide of this pedeſtal is cut in relievo, a cupid reſting his hand on a ſhield, containing the arms of France and England quarterd, and holding in his left a roſe.

On the north ſide are the arms of Ireland on a ſhield, ſupported by a cupid.

On the baſe of the pedeſtal on the ſouth ſide is the following inſcription:

"This ſtatue was repaired and beautified by "the company of Merchant adventurers of Eng-"land, anno 1730; John Hanbury eſq; go-"vernor."

And on the eaſt ſide are the arms of Scotland, with a cupid holding a thiſtle; all done in relievo.

In this area merchants, and ſuch as have dealings with them, meet every day, as in the center of mercantile buſineſs, between twelve at noon, and three o'clock: and for the more regular and eaſy diſpatch of buſineſs, they diſpoſe of themſelves in ſeparate walks, adapted to the reſpective places to and from which they trade.

Within the piazzas of the north and ſouth fronts are two ſpacious ſtair-caſes with iron rails, and black marble ſteps; theſe lead into a kind of gallery that extends round the four ſides of the building, and in which were formerly about two hundred ſhops, occupied by milliners, haberdaſhers, &c. and lett from twenty pounds to ſixty pounds a year each: but trade taking another turn, thoſe ſhops have been long deſerted; and the galleries are now let out to the Royal Exchange aſſurance office; the merchants ſeamens office; the marine ſociety, and to auctioneers, &c. And under the area are vaults occupied by the Eaſt-India company as a pepper warehouſe.

In the turret is a good clock, which goes with chimes at three, ſix, nine, and twelve; it has four dials, and is ſo regulated every day, as to become a ſtandard of time to all the mercantile parts of the town.

Within this building, as mentioned above, are kept the three following offices, viz.

1. The Royal Exchange Assurance Office.

This is a corporation eſtabliſhed by act of parliament, for aſſuring houſes and other buildings, goods, wares, and merchandize from fire; ſhips and merchandize at ſea; and for lending money upon bottomry; and to inſure lives. For which charter they agreed to pay 300,000l. into his majeſty's exchequer, for diſcharging the debts of the civil liſt. But this not anſwering at firſt, the crown remitted moſt part of that money, and granted them a new charter to aſſure buildings, houſhold furniture, wearing apparel by ſpecial agreement, goods, wares, and merchandize, except glaſs and china ware not in trade, and all manner of writings, books of accounts, notes, bills, bonds, tallies, ready money, jewels, plate, pictures, gunpowder, hay, ſtraw, corn unthraſhed, from loſs or damage by fire, unleſs any of theſe goods excepted be aſſured by ſpecial agreement.

This corporation has ſeveral engines, and men, with proper tools and inſtruments, to extinguiſh fires; and alſo porters to remove goods when there happens an alarm of fire, who wear a badge on their arm, with the figure of the Royal Exchange upon it; and theſe badges are numbered, in order to aſcertain the perſon who wears it, in caſe of any complaint againſt him.

The management of this corporation is in a a governor, ſub governor, deputy governor, and twenty-four directors; under whom are a treaſurer, a ſecretary, an accomptant, and clerks.

2. The office for ſick and wounded ſeamen in the merchants ſervice.

This corporation was inſtituted for the relief of ſuch ſeamen and their widows as have no right to Greenwich-

Greenwich-hoſpital by ſervitude aboard his majeſty's navy, and are reduced to diſtreſs in the merchant's ſervice. It conſiſts of a number of merchants who were incorporated on the twenty-fourth of June, 1747, and are governed by a preſident, and a council of twenty-one.

3. The MARINE SOCIETY OFFICE.

The original intent of this ſociety was to ſupply the royal navy with ſea-boys and land-men. It was begun by a number of gentlemen, at the beginning of the late war; and had ſo good an effect, that great numbers of the loweſt claſs of people, inſtead of remaining a peſt to ſociety, became uſeful ornaments to their country.

By this conſtitution every man of war, privateer, and merchant ſhip, is obliged to take a certain number of boys, viz. in a ſhip of 60 guns and 400 men, there muſt be thirty ſervants, which are provided and cloathed by the marine ſociety; who give to each boy, to be ſhipped, a felt hat, a worſted cap, a kerſey ſea jacket, a kerſey pair of breeches, a ſtriped flannel or kerſey waiſtcoat, a pair of trowſers, two pair of hoſe, two pair of ſhoes, two handkerchiefs, three ſhirts, a pair of buckles and buttons, thread, worſted, and needles, a knife, a prayer-book and teſtament, and a bag to put their cloaths in. And to each landman ſhipped by them, a felt ſeaman's hat, a kerſey ſea jacket, a waiſtcoat and drawers of the ſame, a pair of drab breeches, a pair of thin trowſers, a pair of worſted hoſe, a pair of yarn hoſe, two ſhirts, two worſted caps, one pair of ſhoes, one pair of buckles, one pair of buttons, a knife, thread, worſted and needles, with a bag for their cloaths.

The charity is managed by a committee, which conſiſts of a conſiderable number. Of this committee not leſs than three perſons act, who meet every Thurſday at eleven o'clock at the above office.

Leaving the Royal Exchange, we now croſs to the other ſide the ſtreet, where, farther to the eaſt, is ſituate the pariſh church of St. MICHAEL, CORNHILL.

This church, which is a rectory, was founded and dedicated to St. Michael the Archangel before the year 1133, and then in the patronage of the abbot and convent of Coveſham, alias Eveſham; but they, in the year 1503, transferred the advowſon to the Drapers company, who, in conſideration thereof, ſettled a perpetual annuity of five pounds, ſix ſhillings and eight-pence upon the ſaid abbot and canons, and their ſucceſſors; beſides an ancient penſion of ſix ſhillings and eight-pence annually paid them out of the ſaid church. By virtue of which contract, the ſaid company of Drapers have been patrons ever ſince.

The old church being deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666, the preſent Gothic ſtructure aroſe in its ſtead: the body of which is 70 feet long, 60 broad, 35 in height, and 130 feet to the top of the tower. The lower part of the tower occupies the center, and on each ſide there is a regular extent of building. The principal door opens in the lower ſtage of the tower, which riſes with angulated corners from the ground, forming a kind of baſe, terminated at the height of the body of the church. The ſecond ſtage, which is plain and lofty, has two tall windows, one over the other, properly ſhaped for the ſtyle of the building; this is terminated with a truly Gothic cornice. The third ſtage is exactly in the form of the two others, only they are plain, and this is covered with ornaments, the angulated corners are fluted, and terminated by cherubims heads under a cornice: the plain face between has four windows in two ſeries. Above the cornice, over the uppermoſt of theſe windows, runs a battlement on the plain faces of the tower, and from the corners are carried up four beautiful fluted turrets, caſed, a part of their height, with Doric turrets; theſe terminate in pinnacle heads, from within which riſes a ſpire at each corner crowned with a fane.

The rector of this church, inſtead of uncertain tythes, has by act of parliament a ſettled ſtipend of 140l. per annum. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, three churchwardens, four overſeers, and four ſideſmen.

Here is a lecture every Sunday morning, and on every holiday, founded by John Rayney, eſq; who left houſes in Gracechurch-ſtreet to the company of Drapers, charged with the payment of forty pounds per annum for the ſupport thereof.

Contiguous to this church, on the ſouth ſide, was anciently ſituate a handſome cloiſter, and a beautiful church-yard, wherein was a pulpit croſs (reſembling that of St. Paul's) erected by Sir John Rudſtone, ſome time mayor of this city; who purchaſing ground in the neighbourhood, not only enlarged the ſaid church yard, but likewiſe erected convenient apartments for the choriſters, who daily officiated in the church: but the choir being ſoon after diſſolved, the apartments were converted into habitations for decayed pariſhioners.

On the ſame ſide of the ſtreet, about 300 feet more to the eaſt, ſtands the parochial church of St. PETER, CORNHILL.

That this church is of great antiquity will appear from the following inſcription, which is engraved on braſs, and hangs up near the font for baptiſm:

"Be hit known to all Men, that the Yeerys of owr Lord God, An. CLXXIX. Lucius, the fyrſt Chriſten King of this Lond, then cally'd Brytayne, fowndyd the fyrſt Chyrch in London, that is to ſey, the Chyrch of Sent Peter apon Cornhyl; and he fowndyd ther an Archbiſhop's See, and made that Chirch the Metropolitant and cheef Chirch of this Kindom, and ſo enduryd the Space of CCCC. Yeerys and more, unto the Commyng of Sent Auſten, an Apoſtyl of Englond, the whych was ſent into the Lond by Sent Gregory, the Doctor of the Chirch, in the Tyme of King Ethelbert, and then was the Archbiſhoppys See and Pol removed from the aforeſaid Chirch of Sent Peters upon Cornhyl unto Dereberna[illegible]m, that that now ys callyd Canterbury, and ther yt remeynyth to this Dey."

" And Millet Monk, whych came into this Lond with Sent Auſten, was made the fyrſt biſhop of London, and hys ſee was made in Powllys Chyrch. And this Lucius, Kyng, was the fyrſt Foundyr of Peter's Chyrch apon Cornhyl; and he regnyd King in thys Ilond after Brut, MCCXLV. Yeerys. And the Yeerys of owr Lord God a CXXIV. Lucius was crownyd Kyng, and the Yeerys of hys Reygne LXXVII Yeerys, and he was beryd aftyr ſum Cronekil at London, and aftyr ſum Cronekil he was beryd at Glowceſter, at that Plaſe wher the Ordyr of Sent Francys ſtandyth."

If we could depend upon the authenticity of this inſcription, it would clearly demonſtrate, that this church was the firſt chriſtian temple erected in Britain; as it is manifeſt, by Bede, that there was no chriſtian church in London at the arrival of Mellitus; for Ethelbert, as an encouragement for him to proceed in the work of converſion, erected a church in this city for the accommodation of him and his proſelytes, and dedicated the ſame to St. Paul. It is hardly, therefore, to be doubted but that this, and all the other ancient churches in London, owe their origin to the Saxons, Danes, and Normans.

The earlieſt authentic account we find of this church is, that William Kingſton, before the year 1298, gave to it his tenement in Graſs ſtreet, called the Horſe-Mill. And that anciently belonged to the ſame a public library well furniſhed with books, which being diſpoſed of in a private manner, the building was converted into a ſchool-houſe for the education of youth.

The patronage of this rectory appears to have been originally in the noble family of the Nevils; for the lady Alice, relict of Sir Hugh Nevil, in the year 1362, made a feoffment thereof to Richard earl of Arundel and Surrey; and paſſing afterwards through various hands it was, in the year 1411, conveyed, by Richard Whittington, and others, to the Lord mayor and commonalty of this city, in whom the right of advowſon ſtill remains.

The old church ſharing the common fate in the year 1666, the preſent edifice was built on its ruins; and is a ſubſtantial ſtructure, eighty feet long, forty-ſeven broad, forty feet high, to the roof, and one hundred and forty feet to the top of the ſteeple. The body is plain, with a ſingle ſeries of windows. The tower is likewiſe plain, with one window in each ſtage, and the dome, which ſupports the ſpire, is of of the lanthern kind. The ſpire is crowned with a ball, on which is a fane in form of a key, alluding to the key of St. Peter.

The rector of this church receives, beſides other profits, 120l. a year by glebe, and 110l. a year in lieu of tythes. The veſtry is ſelect; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, two overſeers, one collector and four ſideſmen.

In the church-yard, on the ſouth ſide is a monumental ſtone, erected at the expence of the pariſh, to the memory of John Butler, who, with unwearied diligence ſerved the office of clerk to this pariſh for twenty-two years; and died the ſixth of November, 1768; on which ſtone is engraved the following epitaph:

Oft have I view'd the gloomy place,
Which claims the relicts of the human race;
And read on the inſculptur'd ſtone,
" Here lies the body of ----------
" ---------- but now my own
" Diſſolves to native duſt, and as you ſee,
" Another here has done the ſame for me."

CHAPTER XIV.

Of CRIPPLEGATE WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from a gate which formerly ſtood in the north weſt part of the city, and which the reader will find particularly deſcribed in page 12.

It is bounded on the eaſt by Little Moorfields, part of Coleman-ſtreet ward, Baſſiſhaw ward, and Cheap ward; on the north by the pariſh of St. Luke's, Old-ſtreet; on the weſt by Alderſgate ward; and on the ſouth by the ward of Cheap.

The extent of this ward reaches from Cheapſide on the ſouth to beyond Bridgewater-ſquare in the north; and from Jewin-ſtreet in the weſt, to Back-ſtreet, or little Moorfields in the eaſt. And is to be taken within the city wall, and without, ſo far as the freedom reaches.

The part of this ward within the wall contains ſeveral ſtreets and lanes, ſome in whole, others in part, viz. Milk-ſtreet on both ſides, and the greater part of Honey-lane market; Cateaton-ſtreet, as far as to St. Lawrence's church, Ladlane, Aldermanbury, Love-lane, Addle-ſtreet, London-wall-ſtreet from Little Wood-ſtreet to beyond the poſtern; Philip-lane; Great Wood-ſtreet, all but ſeventy feet on the weſt ſide towards Cheapſide; Little Wood-ſtreet, Hart-ſtreet, the ſouth ſide thereof; Monkwell-ſtreet the eaſt ſide, Fell-ſtreet, Silver-ſtreet; Maiden-lane the eaſt part thereof; Huggin lane; Goldſmith's-ſtreet, the whole, except 25 feet on the weſt ſide; Gutter-lane, the weſt ſide from Maiden-lane, to over againſt the end of Carey-ſtreet, on the eaſt ſide of the way only; and Cheapſide, on the north ſide one hundred and ſeventy feet from the corner of Wood-ſtreet eaſtward.

The places in this ward without the wall are Fore-ſtreet, and the poſterns leading to Moorfields. Back-ſtreet or Little Moorfields, Moorlane, Grub-ſtreet, the ſouth part to the poſts and chain; Whitecroſs-ſtreet, the ſouth ſide ſo far as the poſts and chain; Redcroſs-ſtreet, about 450 feet ſeet on both ſides; Beech-lane, Golden-lane, the ſouth part to the poſt and chain; Barbican, the eaſt part thereof, on both ſides, for about 450 feet from the corner of Golden-lane; Jewin-ſtreet, the eaſt part thereof, and on both ſides to Redcroſs-ſtreet, for about 450 feet; Brackley-ſtreet, Bridgewater-ſtreet, and Letton ſtreet, all of them built in the place where Bridgewater-houſe formerly ſtood.

This ward is divided into thirteen precincts, viz. nine within the wall, and four without; and is governed by an alderman, twelve common-council-men (two of whom are the alderman's deputies) thirteen conſtables, thirty-four inqueſtmen, ſixteen ſcavengers and three beadles.

We ſhall begin the ſurvey of this ward at the ſouth extremity within the wall, viz. with Milk-ſtreet, which begins from Cheapſide, and terminates in Lad-lane. In this ſtreet, towards Cheapſide, ſtood the pariſh church of St. Magdalen, Milk-ſtreet, which pariſh, after the fire of London, was united to St. Lawrence Jewry, and the ground converted into Honey-lane market.

Lad-lane is between Wood-ſtreet in the weſt, and Milk-ſtreet and Aldermanbury in the eaſt: it is a ſtreet of good trade, and well inhabited.

Aldermanbury is a handſome ſtreet, graced with good buildings, which are well inhabited by merchants, wholeſale dealers, &c.

Between Love-lane and Addle-ſtreet, on the weſt ſide, and in the broadeſt part of the ſtreet, ſtands the pariſh church of

St. MARY ALDERMANBURY.

This church is of very ancient foundation, and was formerly part of the poſſeſſions of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, who, in the year 1331, appropriated it to the hoſpital of Elſing Spital, which, at that time, ſtood near adjoining. It appears at all times to have been no otherwiſe than a donative or curacy; the patronage of which, ſince the diſſolution of the above hoſpital, has been in the pariſhioners.

The old church being deſtroyed by the dreadful fire in 1666, the preſent ſtructure was finiſhed ten years after. It is built of ſtone, and very plain: the body is well enlightened and the corners are wrought with ruſtic. It is ſeventy-two feet long, and forty-five broad; the roof is thirty-eight feet high, and the ſteeple about ninety feet. It has a plain ſolid tower, conſtructed in the ſame manner as the body; and the angles in the upper ſtage are adorned with ruſtic: the cornice is ſupported by ſcrolls, and above it is a plain attic courſe. In this riſes a turret with a ſquare baſe that ſupports the dial. This turret is arched, but the corners are maſſy; and its roof is terminated in a point, on which is placed the fane.

The incumbent receives by act of parliament 150l. per annum, and 16l. from the impropriators. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are two churchwardens, one of which is collector for the poor.

At the north weſt corner of Aldermanbury is ſituate the pariſh church of

St. ALPHAGE.

This church is ſo called from its dedication to St. Alphage, or Elphege, a noble Engliſh Saxon ſaint, and archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was murdered by the Danes at Greenwich in the year 1013.

The firſt church in London dedicated to this ſaint, ſtood adjoining to the city wall near the eaſt ſide of Cripplegate. But at the ſuppreſſion of religious houſes by Henry VIII. the ſame being demoliſhed, and the ſite thereof turned into a carpenter's yard, the ſouth iſle of the church of St. Mary Elſing Spital was converted into the preſent pariſh church.

The advowſon of this church was anciently in the dean and canons of St. Martin's-le-Grand, in whom it continued till Henry VII. annexed it to St. Peter's, Weſtminſter, when it fell to the abbot and convent; but that being diſſolved, Queen Mary, in the year 1553, granted the patronage thereof to Edmund biſhop of London, and his ſucceſſors, in whom it ſtill remains.

This church, which is a rectory, eſcaped the dreadful fire in 1666; but is ſo plain in its building as not to admit of any deſcription.

The tythes paid to the miniſter is about 100l. beſides the glebe and ſurplus fees. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are two churchwardens, and two collectors for the poor.

Adjoining to this church in Londonwall-ſtreet, ſtands

SION COLLEGE.

This building, which is ſituated upon the ruins of the priory of Elſing Spital, was founded and ſet apart for the meetings and improvements of the London clergy, who were incorporated by king Charles I. on the third of July, in the ſixth year of his reign, by the name of "The preſident "and fellows of the college of Sion, within the "city of London." It conſiſted of a college for a warden, four prieſts and two clerks, and an hoſpital for an hundred old blind and poor perſons of both ſexes.

This college owes its foundation to Dr. Thomas White, vicar of St. Dunſtan's in the weſt, who, among other charities, left 3000l. to purchaſe and build the ſame, with alms-houſes for twenty poor people, ten men and ten women. He alſo gave 160l. per annum for ever to the college and alms-houſes; 120l. for the ſupport of the alms-people, and 40l. per annum for the expences of the foundation.

The ground was purchaſed in 1627; but the library was not appointed by the founder; for it being obſerved to Mr. Simſon, one of doctor White's executors, that a convenient library might be erected over the alms-houſe, which was then building, Mr. Simſon took the hint, and erected it at his own expence.

The work being finiſhed, in proſecution of the will, the above incorporation was obtained, by which all the rectors, vicars, lecturers, and curates, are conſtituted fellows of the college; and out of the incumbents are annually to be elected on Tueſday three weeks after Eaſter, as governors, nors, a preſident, two deans, and four aſſiſtants, who are to meet quarterly to hear a latin ſermon, and afterwards to be entertained at dinner in the college-hall, at the charge of the foundation. And in 1632 the governors and clergy being ſummoned, agreed upon a common ſeal, which had the good Samaritan, with the inſcription Vade & fac ſimiliter, and round it Sigillum Collegii de Sion Londini.

The books were given by various benefactors, and particularly a great many were brought thither from the old Cathedral of St. Paul, in the year 1647. But, in 1666, one third part of the books, the alms-houſes, ſeveral chambers for ſtudents, and the apartments reſerved for the governors and fellows to meet in, and for the reſidence of the librarian and the clerk, were deſtroyed by the great fire of London. However, this whole edifice was afterwards rebuilt in that plain manner of brickwork, as it now appears; except the chambers of the ſtudents; their ground being let out on leaſes. And the new library has been from time to time improved by a part of the Jeſuits books ſeized in the year 1679; by the donation of lord Berkley, who gave half of his uncle Cooke's books to the library; by ſeveral legacies, to be laid out yearly in books; by a great number of private benefactors; by the copies of new publications, which bookſellers are obliged, by an act of the tenth of queen Anne, to give to this library, in order to ſecure their own copy right and property; and by the books, which has been ſome time a cuſtom given by every incumbent within the city and ſuburbs, upon his taking poſſeſſion of his living; who preſents a book to this library of at leaſt ten ſhillings value. For the care and preſervation of which library, there is one librarian, who has a genteel apartment at the ſouth ſide of the college, that communicates by a door with the library.

The alms-houſes conſiſt of twenty rooms; for ten men within the college, and ten women without it. Four of whom are nominated by the city of Briſtol, where Dr. White was born; eight by the merchant-taylors company; ſix by the pariſh of St. Dunſtan, where he was miniſter forty-nine years; and two by St. Gregory's pariſh, where he had lived about twenty years: except any of the kindred of either of his wives appeared, who were firſt to be conſidered; but theſe were not to exceed four at a time.

A little to the eaſt from Sion College, at the ſouth-eaſt angle of the new opening which leads from Aldermanbury to Fore-ſtreet, is a very handſome and capacious meeting-houſe, built of brick. And at the ſouth-weſt corner of that opening which leads from Coleman-ſtreet to Fore-ſtreet, is another meeting-houſe of equal beauty and capacity.

Weſtward from Sion-College, and a little beyond Philip-lane, is Curriers-court, at the upper end of which is a neat, handſome building called

CURRIERS HALL.

The fraternity of Curriers appears to be of conſiderable antiquity, by their having founded a guild or religious ſociety in the conventual church of White-friars in Fleet-ſtreet, in the year 1367. And in the year 1605, king James incorporated them by the appellation of "The "maſter, wardens, and commonalty of the art "or myſtery of the Curriers of the city of Lon-"don." It is a livery company, and the twenty-ninth on the city liſt; and is governed by a maſter, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants.

A little farther to the weſt from this hall is Wood-ſtreet, on the eaſt ſide of which, at the ſouth-weſt angle of Love-lane, is ſituated the parochial church of St. ALBAN, WOOD STREET.

This church is a rectory, and takes its name from its dedication to St. Alban, the firſt martyr of Great Britain. It is ſuppoſed to have been founded in the year 930, by king Adleſtan, or Athelſtan, the Saxon, who began his reign in or about the year 924, and was ſo well built, that this original foundation continued, with proper repairs, till the year 1634; when it was taken down, and a new church erected on the ſame ſpot. This church, however, being deſtroyed by the great fire in 1666, the preſent edifice was built from the ſame model as the former, in an entire Gothic ſtyle, conſiſting of a ſpacious body, and a handſome tower with pinnacles.

The patronage of this church was originally in the abbot and convent of St. Alban's, in Hertfordſhire; from whom it paſſed into the hands of the maſter, &c. of the hoſpital of St. James, Weſtminſter, with whom it continued till the founding of Eaton College by Henry VI. who granted the ſame to that college, with whom it ſtill remains.

This church, after the fire of London, was made the pariſh church of St. Alban in Wood-ſtreet, and St. Olave in Silver-ſtreet, by 22 Car. II. And by another act 22 and 23 Car. II. the two livings together were made of the yearly value of 170l. to the incumbent in lieu of tythes.

The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, and four overſeers of the poor.

In the old church, deſtroyed in 1666, were ſeveral very uncommon epitaphs, among which was the following:

Hic jacet Tom Shorthoſe,
Sine tombe, ſine ſheet, ſine riches,
Qui vixit ſine gowne,
Sine cloake, ſine ſhirt, ſine breeches.

The pariſh of St. Olave, Silver-ſtreet, is a rectory, the church whereof ſtood at the ſouth-weſt corner of Silver-ſtreet. It was a ſmall church of ſome antiquity, though we cannot trace it higher than the year 1593. Before the fire of London it was in the gift of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, who ſince that time have alternately preſented to this living, with the provoſt and fellows of Eaton college.

The ſite of this church remains now only as a burying place for the inhabitants of the pariſh, who who ſtill maintain a ſeparate government by a general veſtry, two churchwardens and four overſeers for the poor.

Farther to the ſouth from St. Alban's church, on the ſame ſide, is Wood-ſtreet Compter, or the city priſon; the origin of which the reader will find in page 203; and as to other matters relating to its uſe and offices, ſee Poultry Compter, in the ſurvey of Cheap ward.

St. MICHAEL, Wood-Street.

This church is of ſome antiquity, as appears by John de Eppewell, who was rector thereof in the year 1328. The old church being deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666, the preſent ſtructure was finiſhed a few years after, and the pariſh of St. Mary Staining annexed to it. The eaſt end of this building is ornamented with four Ionic columns raiſed upon a continued pedeſtal, with arches between, and ſupporting a handſome pediment, in the middle of which is a circular window. Between the columns are three upright arched windows that fill the whole ſpace. The reſt of the body is plain, and the windows are raiſed ſo high, that the doors open under them. The tower conſiſts of three plain ſtages with large windows, from the uppermoſt of which riſes a ſmall ſquare courſe, the foundation of the baſe of the turret. The baſe is cut away from the breadth of the tower gradually to the diameter of the turret, which is plain, but handſome; and from its top riſes a ball that ſupports the fane.

The patronage of this rectory was anciently in the abbot and convent of St. Alban's, in whom it continued till the ſuppreſſion of their monaſtery; when, coming to the crown, it was, with the appurtenances, in the year 1544, ſold by king Henry VIII. to William Barwell, who in the year 1588, conveyed the ſame to John Marſh, and others, in truſt for the pariſh, in which it ſtill continues; but being united with the pariſh of St. Mary Staining, which living is in the crown, the pariſhioners preſent twice, and the king once. The rector receives, beſides his other profits, 100l. per annum in lieu of tythes. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh-officers are, two churchwardens and four overſeers.

The church of St. Mary Staining, or Stone church, before the fire of London, ſtood on the north ſide of Oat-lane. The reaſon why it received the additional epithet of Staining is very uncertain; ſome imagining it to be derived from the painter ſtainers, who might probably live near it; while others ſuppoſe that it was originally called Stany or Stony, from its being built with ſtone, to diſtinguiſh it from thoſe in the city built with wood, &c.

The advowſon of this rectory was anciently in the prioreſs and convent of Clerkenwell, in whom it continued till their ſuppreſſion by Henry VIII. when it came to the crown, in whom it ſtill remains.

The ſite of this church is uſed now as a burial place for the pariſhioners, who hold a general veſtry, and have two churchwardens and four overſeers.

On the ſame ſide Wood-ſtreet is Maiden-lane, the north part of which, from the Union Inſurance office, is in Cripplegate ward. In this lane on the north, ſide is ſituate

HABERDASHERS HALL.

This is a good brick building, and the room called the hall is very neat and lofty. It is paved with marble and purbeck ſtone, wainſcoted about twelve feet high; and the ſcreen at the weſt end, where are two arched apertures, is adorned with pilaſters of the Corinthian order. In this hall is kept an independent meeting.

The company of Haberdaſhers, which is one of the twelve principal companies of this city, and the eighth in order of precedency, was anciently known by the name of Hurriers and Milleners, from their dealing principally in merchandize imported from Milan in Italy. They were afterwards incorporated by king Henry VI. in the year 1467, by the ſtyle of "The fraternity "of St. Catherine the Virgin, of the Haber-"daſhers of the city of London," But at preſent they are denominated "The maſter and "four wardens of the fraternity of the art or "myſtery of Haberdaſhers in the city of Lon-"don:" but by what authority does not appear.

This corporation is governed by a maſter, four wardens, and a numerous court of aſſiſtants. It is a livery company; and has at all times been of ſuch repute, that they have been intruſted with the benefactions of many pious perſons, purſuant to the wills and directions of whom, they pay annually for charitable uſes about the ſum of three thouſand five hundred pounds.

Nearer Wood-ſtreet, on the ſouth ſide of Maiden-lane, ſtands

WAXCHANDLERS HALL.

This is handſome building, and well contrived for the buſineſs and entertainment of the company, which was incorporated by Richard III. on the ſixteenth of February 1483, by the ſtyle of "The maſter, wardens, and commonalty of the "art or myſtery of Waxchandlers of London." It is a livery company, the twentieth in the city liſt; and governed by a maſter, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants.

Returning down Wood-ſtreet, towards the north, we come to Addle-ſtreet, near the north eaſt end of which ſtands

BREWERS HALL.

This is a handſome and commodious building, with a genteel entrance into a large court paved with free ſtone, and the building above ſupported by handſome pillars.

This company, which is the fourteenth among the city companies, was incorporated by king Henry VI. in the year 1438, by the name of "The maſter, and keeper or wardens, and com-"monalty of the myſtery or art of Brewers of "the city of London." King Edward IV. not only only confirmed that charter, but granted them a further power to make by-laws.

This corporation anciently bore the arms of Thomas-à-Becket; impaled with their own: but that ſaint's bones being taken up and burnt, and unſainted, by the powers in being, Clarencieux, king at arms, in the year 1544, ſeparated them, and gave the brewers a creſt in lieu thereof. It is now a livery company; and is governed by a maſter, three wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants.

Nearly adjoining to this is ſituate

PLAISTERERS HALL.

This is a very handſome building, and was formerly Pinners-hall. The plaiſterers company is the forty-ſixth upon the city liſt, incorporated on the tenth of March 1501, by king Henry VIII. under the name and ſtyle of "The maſter and "wardens of the guild or fraternity of the bleſſed "Mary of plaiſterers, London." Which charter was confirmed on the eleventh of June, 1667, in the reign of king Charles II. It is a livery company, and is governed by a maſter, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants.

Directly oppoſite to Addle-ſtreet is Silver-ſtreet, formerly the ſituation of working ſilverſmiths, who have now collected themſelves nearer to Goldſmiths-hall. In a court on the ſouth ſide of this ſtreet is a well built independent meeting-houſe.

On the north ſide of Silver-ſtreet, directly oppoſite the ſite of St. Olave's church, is Monkwell-ſtreet, (ſo called from a well belonging to the convent of monks, which once ſtood at the north end of it.

On the weſt ſide of this ſtreet, near the center is ſituate

BARBERS HALL.

This magnificent building conſiſts of a ſpacious hall room, court room, theatre, library, and other commodious offices. The grand entrance from Monkwell-ſtreet is enriched with the company's arms, large fruit, and other decorations. The court room has a fret work ceiling, and is alſo adorned with the pictures of king Henry VIII. and the court of aſſiſtants, in one fine piece; a portrait of king Charles II. and other paintings. The theatre contains four degrees of Cedar ſeats, one above another, in an elliptical form, and the roof is an elliptical cupola: this room is adorned with a buſt of king Charles I. the figures of the ſeven liberal ſciences, and the twelve ſigns of the Zodiac; the ſkins of a man and woman on wooden frames, in imitation of Adam and Eve; the figure of a man flayed, done after the life, all the muſcles appearing in their due place and proportion; the ſkeleton of an oſtrich; an human ſkeleton, with copper joints, and five other ſkeletons of human bodies. But as this furniture was introduced by the ſurgeons, it is now of no uſe, and the theatre is entirely deſerted This hall is one of the works of that great architect Inigo Jones, and is a maſter-piece in its kind; that elegant ſimplicity which characterizes all his works, giving the ſpectator the higheſt ſatisfaction.

The art of ſurgery was anciently practiſed in this city only by the barbers, who were incorporated by letters patent granted by king Edward IV. in the year 1461; and in 1512, an act was paſſed to prevent any perſons beſides the barbers practiſing ſurgery within the city of London, and ſeven miles round. At length ſeveral perſons, who were not barbers, being examined and admitted as practitioners in the art of ſurgery, the parliament united them in the thirty-ſecond year of the reign of king Henry VIII. by the appellation of "The maſter or governors of the myſtery "or commonalty of barbers and ſurgeons of the "city of London;" and by this act all perſons practiſing the art of ſhaving were ſtrictly enjoined not to intermeddle with that of ſurgery, except what belonged to drawing of teeth. Thus this company obtained the name of Barber-ſurgeons, which they continued to enjoy till the eighteenth year of the reign of his late majeſty king George II. when the ſurgeons applying to parliament to have this union diſſolved, were formed into a ſeparate company; though the barbers were left in poſſeſſion of the hall and theatre, and were conſtituted a body politic, under the name of "The "maſter, governors, and commonalty of the my-"ſtery of barbers of London." It is a livery company, and under the direction of a maſter, three other governors, and a court of aſſiſtants.

Farther to the north, on the eaſt ſide are the alms-houſes founded in the year 1575, by Sir Ambroſe Nicholas, knt. Lord-mayor and Salter, for twelve aged people, and endowed at this time with three ſhillings per week in money, and eight ſacks of coals to each yearly.

At the north weſt corner of Monkwell-ſtreet is ſituate Lamb's-chapel; which was founded as early as the time of king Edward I. and dedicated to St. James, and diſtinguiſhed from other cognomical dedications, by the name of James's chapel, or Hermitage on the Wall, becauſe ſituated in or near London-wall. This hermitage belonged to the abbot and convent of Gerondon in Leiceſterſhire, who kept two Ciſtertian monks of their own order here. At the diſſolution it was granted, in the reign of Henry VIII. to William Lamb, a rich clothworker of this city, who bequeathed it, with his houſe and apurtenances, lands and tenements, to the yearly value of thirty pounds per annum to this company, for paying a miniſter to read divine ſervice on Sundays, Wedneſdays and Fridays in the ſaid chapel, and to relieve the poor in the undermentioned manner.

In this chapel the worſhipful company of Clothworkers have four ſermons preached to them upon the four principal feſtivals in the year, viz. upon the feaſt of the annunciation of the Bleſſed Virgin Mary, March 25; on the feaſt of St. John Baptiſt, June 24; on the feaſt of St. Michael the Archangel, September 29; and on the feaſt of St. Thomas the Apoſtle, December 21. On which days the maſter, wardens, and livery of the company meet at ſome convenient place, near unto the chapel, where they go in their gowns and hoods to the chapel and hear a ſermon; after which they relieve twelve poor men, and as many poor women, with twelve pence each in money; and once a year, viz. at Michaelmas, give them a frieze gown, and a lockram ſhift, and a good pair of winter ſhoes fit for their wearing.

Directly oppoſite to Lamb's chapel is Hart-ſtreet; on the north ſide of which is a charitable foundation by Mr. Robert Rogers, leather-ſeller and merchant-adventurer, for ſix ancient couple, who have a room below and another above, and four pounds per annum each, paid by the city of London, in whom is the gift of this charity.

Having thus ſurveyed that part of Cripplegate ward which is within the wall, we ſhall now proceed to that without the wall

This is a large tract of ground, containing many ſtreets, and all crowded with courts and alleys: the principal are Fore-ſtreet, Back ſtreet in Little Moorfields, Moor-lane, Grub-ſtreet, Whitecroſs-ſtreet, Redcroſs-ſtreet, Beech-lane, Golden lane, Barbican and Jewin-ſtreet.

Fore-ſtreet, which runs from the north end of Cripplegate church to Moor-lane, is a large ſpacious ſtreet, and by the late improvements is ornamented, particularly on the ſouth ſide, with new buildings inhabited by reputable tradeſmen.

On the Weſt ſide of Little Moor-fields, otherwiſe called Back-ſtreet to diſtinguiſh it from Little Moor-fields Pavement-row, are many courts and alleys; as Crown-court, Hind-alley, Halfmoon-alley, Angel-alley, Hartſhorn-alley, Butler's-alley, Oyſter's-hall-court, Gun-alley, White's-alley, and Rope-maker's-alley; many of which are tolerable well built and inhabited.

Moor lane is but indifferently built and inhabited; but there are many paſſages from it, viz. Back-alley; Ram's head-court, Sugar-loaf court; Seven-ſtar court; Sugar loaf-alley; Butler's-alley; Cur-yard; Cock-alley; Vine-court, and Maiden-head-court; all which, except the two laſt, are very ordinary places.

Returning down Fore-ſtreet, towards the weſt on the north ſide, we come to Grub-ſtreet, which, as far as Sun-alley, is in Cripple-gate-ward. In this ſtreet are the following courts and alleys, viz. Lun's-alley, Honey-ſuckle-court, well built; Fleur-de-lis-court, Little Bell-alley, Flying-horſe-court, Oakley-court, Butler's-alley, Croſs keys-court, Great-Bell-alley; all very mean. But Haberdaſher's-ſquare is tolerably genteel and well built.

A little further from this is Whitecroſs ſtreet, which is well built and inhabited by conſiderable traders and dealers in various branches. The courts and alleys in this ſtreet are, Cock-alley, King's-arms-yard, King's-head-court, Croſs-keys-court, Halfmoon-alley, Horſhoe-alley, Bowling-alley, Anabaptiſt-court, Caſtle-court, Red-roſe-court, and Fern's-yard; moſt of which are in a mean declining ſituation.

At the ſouth weſt end of Fore-ſtreet, and facing Redcroſs-ſtreet, ſtands the parochial church of St. GILES, CRIPPLEGATE.

This church was dedicated to a ſaint of that name, born at Athens, who was abbot of Niomes in France, and ſaid to be the great patron of the poor and diſeaſed. It was founded about the year 1090, by Alſune, the firſt maſter of St. Bartholomew's-hoſpital.

The patronage of this church, was in private hands, till Aelmund a prieſt, granted the ſame (after his own death, and that of Hugh his only ſon) to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's church, whereby they became not only ordinaries of the pariſh, but likewiſe proprietors of the rectory, and patrons of the vicarage, as they are at this time.

This church which eſcaped the dreadful conflagration in 1666, may be numbered amongſt the beſt of our Gothic buildings. It is 114 feet in length, 63 feet in breadth, 32 feet high to the roof, and the tower, with the turret, 122 feet in height. The tower (in which is a ring of ten bells) is not groſs in proportion to its height, and the turret at the top is light and open. It is built of old ſtone, boulder, and ſome brick finiſhed over. The roof is flat, neatly ceiled, and over the altar painted in clouds.

This church is no more than a vicarage; but it is valued at 500l. per annum, in tythes, caſualties, and vicarage-houſe. The veſtry is ſelect; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, two overſeers, and four ſideſmen.

Here is an endowment for prayers, at eleven o'clock in the morning, and at eight in the evening every day; and for a ſermon at ſix o'clock every Sunday, and at three o'clock every Thurſday, left by Mr. Throckmorton Trottman, and payable by the company of Haberdaſhers. Likewiſe ſix ſermons in Lent, and another gift ſermon on All-ſaints-day. The charitable donations on this day will beſt appear by the following monumental inſcriptions; the two firſt of which are ſituate at the eaſt end of the church, on the north ſide of the altar.

Roger Maſon, of this pariſh, citizen and vintner of London, gave to the poore of the freedome of this pariſh 200l. wherewith an yeerly rent of ſixteen pounds or thereabout, is purchaſed for ever; to be beſtowed on ten gownes of black cloth lined, to be diſtributed yeerly upon tenne poore men of the freedom of this pariſh, upon All-ſaints-day, at the diſcretion of the vicar and churchwardens for the time being. He died the third day of September 1603, Ætat. ſuæ 37, leaving his wife Jane, by whom he had three ſons and three daughters, whereof one only now liveth, named Katherine; which Jane truely paid the above-mentioned two hundred pounds; and joined the erection of this monument; ſet up An. Dom. 1606 May the eighth day.

William Day, citizen and vintner of London, the ſonne of Thomas Day, of Boſeham in Suſſex, gentleman, and Elizabeth, his wife, gave to the poore of this pariſh eighty pounds; which was paid by his brother George Day, wherewith an yeerly rent of ſix pounds, or thereabout, is purchaſed for ever; to be beſtowed on twelve coats of greene cloth, to be diſtributed yeerly upon twelve poor orphans, upon All-ſaints day; at the diſcretion of the vicar and churchwardens for the time being. Hee lyeth buried in his pariſh church of St. Michael in Cornhill, and dyed the twenty-eighth day of September 1603, Ætatis ſuæ 32; ſet up Anno Domini, 1606, May the eighth day.

Near

Near the center of the north iſle is the following:

Within this ile lyeth buried the body of Charles Langley, ſometime of this pariſh, ale-brewer, who was buried the eighth day of June, An. Dom. 1601, and did give bountifully to the poore of this pariſh.

If Langley's life you liſt to know,
  Read on, and take a view;
Of Faith and Hope I will not ſpeake
  His works ſhall ſhew them true.
Who whilſt he liv'd with counſell grave
  The better ſort did guide;
A ſtay to weake, a ſtaffe to poore,
  Without back-bite, or pride.
And when he dyed he gave his mite,
  All that did him befall,
For ever once a year to cloath
  Saint Giles his poor withall.
All-Saints he pointed for the day,
  Gownes, twenty, ready made,
With twenty ſhirts and twenty ſmocks,
  As they may beſt be had.
A ſermon eke he hath ordain'd,
  That God may have his praiſe,
And others might be won thereby,
  To follow Langley's wayes.
On vicar and churchwardens then
  His truſt he hath repos'd,
As they will anſwer him one day,
  When all ſhall be diſclos'd.
Thus being dead yet ſtill he lives,
  Lives never for to dye,
In Heaven's bliſſe, in World's fame;
  And ſo I truſt ſhall I.

The ſite of this pariſh of St. Giles was anciently a fen or moor, and the houſes and gardens thereupon were accounted a village without the wall of London, called Mora; which, in proceſs of time, increaſed greatly in number of buildings, and was conſtituted a prebend of St. Paul's cathedral of that appellation. And now this village is totally ſwallowed up by London; and the prebendary of Mora, or Mora without the wall of London, hath the ninth ſtall on the right ſide of the choir in St. Paul's cathedral: of whom it is ſaid Nigellus Medicus was the firſt prebendary.

A little farther to the north from Cripplegate church is Jewin-ſtreet; * a place well built and inhabited, except at the weſt end which leads into Alderſgate-ſtreet. The moſt remarkable place in this ſtreet is Crowder's-well-alley, which receives its name from a well therein, (made at the expence of Sir Richard Whittington) whoſe water is reputed to be not only exceeding fine and wholeſome, but ſalutary in many diſorders.

Redcroſs-ſtreet, which faces the north end of Cripplegate church, is a noble, wide, and well built ſtreet, and inhabited by conſiderable tradeſmen. In this ſtreet are a great number of courts and alleys on both ſides, but none of them of any eſtimation, either for their buildings or inhabitants: but it is graced, near the middle, on the eaſt ſide, with a library, founded by Daniel Williams, D. D. a preſbyterian miniſter, for the uſe of the diſſenting miniſters of the preſbyterian, independent, and baptiſt perſuaſions. In 1711 this reverend divine bequeathed his valuable collection of books and manuſcripts for the ſaid purpoſe, with a handſome ſalary for a librarian and a houſekeeper: and in purſuance of his will, a neat building was erected in this ſtreet, with a genteel apartment for the librarian, &c. and a ſpacious room, capable of containing 40,000 volumes. In this library is a regiſter, wherein parents may regiſter the birth of their children.

This foundation, which has been greatly augmented ſince its firſt inſtitution, is under the direction of twenty-three truſtees, viz. fourteen miniſters and nine laymen, who muſt be all preſbyterians: under whom there is a ſecretary and ſteward. Here are likewiſe ſome curioſities; as an Egyptian mummy, and a glaſs baſon which held the water wherewith queen Elizabeth was baptized.

At the north end of Redcroſs-ſtreet is Beech-lane,† which is tolerably well inhabited, but in general extreme dirty, and a place of little trade. In this lane are Ship-yard, King's-head court, and Glover's-court: in the latter of which ſtands

GLOVERS HALL.

The company of Glovers, who hold the ſixty-ſecond place amongſt the city companies, were not incorporated till the 14th of Car. I. who, on the fifth of September, in the year 1638, granted them a charter by the name and ſtyle of "The "maſter, wardens, and fellowſhip of the com-"pany of Glovers of the city of London." It is a livery company; and is governed by a maſter, four wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants.

At the north-eaſt end of this lane are a ſet of alms-houſes, built in the year 1540, purſuant to the will of lady Ann Aſkew, widow of Sir Chriſtopher Aſkew, Lord-mayor of London in the year 1533, for eight poor widows of the Drapers company, with an allowance of three pounds per annum, and half a chaldron of coals, in truſt of the Drapers company.

Golden-lane, which runs out of Redcroſs-ſtreet into Old-ſtreet, is but a mean place, and indifferently inhabited. Here are ſeveral courts and alleys, as Jacob's-well-alley, Cook's-head-court, Black-raven-court, Crown-court, Sun-court, Dixon's-rents, and Vine-court; ſome of which are tolerably well built and inhabited. In this lane Richard Gallard, of Iſlington, eſq; citizen and

* This place, with the apurtenances, was anciently called Leyreſtowe; which king Edward I. granted to William de Monte Forte, dean of St. Paul's, London: being a place (as it is expreſſed in a record) without Cripplegate, and the ſuburbs of London, called Leyreſtowe: and which was the burying-place of the Jews, valued at 40s. per annum.

† This lane takes its name from the number of beech trees that formerly grew upon the ſite thereof; amidſt which ſtood a great houſe, the manſion of the abbot of Ramſey, to receive him during his ſtay in London; and was afterwards called Drewrie-houſe.

painter-ſtainer of London, founded thirteen almshouſes for as many poor people, and endowed each with two pence per week, and a load of coals yearly divided amongſt them, charged upon certain lands in Iſlington.

Directly oppoſite the ſouth end of Beech-lane is Barbican; at the eaſt end of which, in ancient days, ſtood a watch tower, called Burgh-kenning, i. e. Barbican, a kind of advanced poſt for Cripplegate, to look out or watch for the ſafety of the city on that ſide. Adjoining to this tower was a palace, or grand houſe called Garter-houſe, built by Sir Thomas Writheſly, Garter principal king at arms; on the top of which was built a chapel, by the name of Sanctiſſimæ Trinitatis in alto.

CHAPTER XV.

Of DOWGATE WARD.

DOwgate ward derives its name from the ancient water-gate called Dourgate, * which was made in the original wall that ran along the north ſide of the Thames, for the ſecurity of the city of London againſt all attempts to invade it by water.

This ward is bounded on the weſt by Vintry ward on the ſouth by the river Thames, on the eaſt by Candlewick and Bridge-wards, and on the north by Wallbrook ward.

The extent of this ward reaches from St. Martin's-lane in the eaſt, to Cloak-lane in the weſt, and from thence both eaſt and weſt to the river Thames, in almoſt a direct line: within which tract are contained, on the ſouth ſide of Thames-ſtreet, between it and the Thames, Old Swan-lane, Cold-harbour, Allhallows-lane, Campion-lane, Friar's-lane, Coſin's-lane, Dowgate-dock, and the Steel-yard; St. Laurence Pountney-hill, almoſt as far as St. Laurence's church-yard; Suffolk-lane, as far as the paſſage into Buſh-lane; Buſh-lane, almoſt the whole; Dowgate-hill, as far as Tallowchandler's-hall northwards; Chequer-yard; Elbow-lane as far as the church-yard, only the ſouth eaſt ſide of the way; Cloak-lane, the ſouth ſide, to 160 feet weſt of Dowgate-hill.

This ward is divided into eight precincts; and is under the government of an alderman, eight common-council-men, (one of whom is the alderman's deputy) eight conſtables, fifteen inqueſtmen, five ſcavengers, and a beadle.

We ſhall begin the ſurvey of this ward at Dowgate-hill, which is a large, open ſtreet, and the houſes, well built and inhabited. On the weſt ſide, near Budge-row, is the Church-yard of St. John the Evangeliſt, where formerly the church ſtood, not being rebuilt ſince the fire of London. Adjoining to the church-yard is Cloak-lane, which runs weſtward to College-hill.

On the weſt ſide of Dowgate-hill is ſituate

TALLOWCHANDLERS HALL,

Which is a ſtately and large building, with piazzas, formed by arches and columns of the Tuſcan order.

This ſociety was incorporated by king Edward IV. in the year 1460, by ſtyle of "The maſter, "and keepers of the art and myſtery of Tallow-"chandlers of the city of London." † It is a livery company, the twenty-firſt in the city liſt, and is governed by a maſter, four wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants.

A little farther from this, on the ſame ſide, ſtands

SKINNERS HALL.

This is a very handſome building, and well provided with apartments to accommodate both the company and their ſervants. The hall room is neatly wainſcotted with oak, and the parlour with cedar.

This fraternity, which is the ſixth of the twelve principal companies, was incorporated by king Edward III. in the year 1327, by the appellation of "The maſter and wardens of the guild or "fraternity of the body of Chriſt, of the Skin-"ners of London;" which was confirmed by Henry VI. in the year 1438, whereby every perſon, upon his being admitted into the freedom of the company, is to be preſented to the Lord-mayor. And by theſe grants the corporation was reſtrained from making bye-laws.

The government of this company is veſted in a maſter, four wardens, and a numerous court of aſſiſtants. The members pay no quarterage, owing to the great eſtate they are poſſeſſed of; out of which, according to the wills of the ſeveral donors, they annually pay to charitable uſes about ſeven hundred pounds per annum.

* This was originally one of the four gates, or the ſouth gate of this city, where anciently was the trajectus, or ferry of the Watling-ſtreet, (See page 18) whoſe direction was towards the north weſt, as was diſcovered in digging the foundation of Bow-church in Cheapſide, and one of the four great Roman military ways.

† The tallow-chandlers of this city, anciently, not only dealt in candles, but likewiſe in oil, vinegar, butter, hops, ſoap, &c. at which time great frauds were committed by adulterating oil; for the preventing of which this company was, by act of parliament, impowered to ſearch the ſame, and to deſtroy all ſuch as ſhould be found bad. But no reward being aſcertained for the ſearchers, it was ſoon neglected.

Near the further end of Dowgate-hill anciently ſtood a caſtellated conduit for Thames water. And lower down was a college called Jeſus commons, for the reception and maintenance of a certain number of poor prieſts. On the eaſt ſide ſtood a royal meſſuage, the great old houſe called the Erber, near to the church of St. Mary Bothaw. It was alienated by king Henry VIII. who gave it to Sir Philip Hoby, who ſold it to one Doulphin a draper, and he ſold it to the drapers company. Sir Edward Pulliſon, lord mayor of London in the year 1584, rebuilt this houſe; in which Sir Francis Drake, who firſt taught the way to ſail round the world, for ſome time reſided.

Chequer-yard is a dirty paſſage on the eaſt ſide of Dowgate-hill, which runs croſs into Buſh-lane; and is chiefly taken up with ſtables and coach-houſes: on the ſouth ſide thereof is Hand-alley, a paved paſſage that leads into Thames-ſtreet; and at the north eaſt angle ſtands

PLUMBERS HALL.

This building is but ſmall, though ſufficiently convenient for the uſes of the company; and is let out for a dancing ſchool.

This company was incorporated by king James I. on the twelfth of April 1611, by the name of "The maſter, wardens, and common-"alty, of the myſtery of plumbers of the city "of London." It is a livery company, the thirty-firſt in the city liſt; and is governed by a maſter, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants.

In that part of Buſh-lane which branches off into Little Buſh-lane, is

The ENGLISH COPPER-OFFICE.

This company was incorporated by charter in the third of William and Mary, September 22, 1692, by the title of "The governor and com-"pany of copper-miners in England." Which was confirmed by queen Anne, in the year 1710. And by ſubſequent grants, their power of working of mines was extended to all parts of Ireland and New England. This company is under the direction of a governor, deputy governor, and eighteen aſſiſtants.

Out of this lane there is a paſſage that leads into Suffolk-lane; on the eaſt ſide of which ſtands

MERCHANT TAYLORS SCHOOL.

This ſchool was founded by the company of merchant taylors, in the year 1658, for the education of boys. It was anciently kept in a houſe which belonged to the duke of Buckingham, and was called the Manor of the Roſe; but that edifice being deſtroyed by the fire in 1666, the preſent ſtructure was erected upon the ſame ſpot, at the expence of the merchant-taylors company.

The ſchool is a long and ſpacious building, ſupported on the eaſt by many ſtone pillars that form an handſome cloiſter, within which are apartments for the three uſhers. Adjoining to which is a library ſupported alſo by ſtone pillars, and well furniſhed with books. And on the ſouth of the library is the part called the chapel. Contigious to theſe is a large houſe appropriated to the uſe of the head maſter.

The ſchool conſiſts of eight forms, in which near three hundred boys have their education; an hundred of whom, according to the conſtitutions of the company, are taught gratis; an hundred more at five ſhillings, and fifty at two ſhillings and ſix pence per quarter.

The head maſter receives from the company a ſalary of ten pounds ſix ſhillings per annum, and thirty ſhillings for water; beſides the quarterage from the ſcholars, which renders his ſalary very conſiderable. The firſt uſher has 30l. per annum, and the two others 25l. all of whom have proper apartments.

Several of the ſcholars are annually ſent to St. John's College, Oxford, which ſeems to have been founded by Sir Thomas White chiefly for their uſe.

For the better inquiry into the proficiency of all the ſcholars, there are four probations in the year performed only by the maſter and uſhers; the firſt on the eleventh of March; the ſecond on the fifteenth of June; the third on the eleventh of September; and the fourth on the eleventh of December, not being Sundays, and then upon the next day following.

For the farther ſatisfaction of the maſter, wardens, and court of aſſiſtants of the merchant-taylors, the probations themſelves undergo an examination twice every year, by two judicious men well learned in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, appointed by the maſter and wardens of the company. Upon theſe days, which are between the eleventh and twenty-firſt of March, and September, the maſter and wardens, or at leaſt two of them are preſent. The examination, which is performed in the chapel, begins at ſix in the morning and ends at eleven. Theſe are called the doctors days. After the examination is finiſhed, the audience, which are generally numerous, return into the ſchool, where certain public exerciſes are performed by the eight ſenior ſcholars, or monitors of the ſchool.

There is yet another public examination of the ſcholars of the upper form, by the preſident and fellows of St. John's college Oxford, annually performed upon the eleventh of June, previous to the election of ſcholars to be made upon that day, to fill up the vacant fellowſhips in that college. And after the public exerciſes are finiſhed, the dean of the college addreſſes himſelf to the ſcholars, out of whoſe number the vacancy is to be filled up, in a latin ſpeech ſuited to the occaſion. At this time an account is uſually printed, containing the names and order of the head ſcholars, their birth, admiſſion, and continuance in the head form; and alſo an account of the ſubjects of the orations.

Suffolk-lane leads into Thames-ſtreet, on the ſouth ſide of which, towards the eaſt extremity of this ward, is Old Swan ſtairs, a very noted landing place for paſſengers above bridge, upon the river river Thames. This is the antient Edgate.

From Old Swan ſtairs we now proceed to the weſt extremity of this ward; and the firſt place is George-alley. This is very narrow and ordinary; from the ſouth end of which to the Steelyard included, the wharfs are occupied chiefly by dyers, diſtillers, brewers, and dealers in iron.

White-cock-alley is likewiſe very narrow; at the ſouth end of which there once ſtood Dyers-hall.

Cold-harbour, corruptly Coal-harbour, is a narrow-lane, inhabited by coopers and others employed in mercantile buſineſs. At the ſouth weſt angle of this lane ſtands

WATERMANS HALL.

This is a handſome brick building, and is ſituated with its front toward the Thames.

The company of watermen do not appear to have had any charter of incorporation before the reign of Philip and Mary; at which time they were eſtabliſhed by parliament, who enacted, that out of the watermen between Graveſend and Windſor, eight overſeers ſhould be choſen by the court of aldermen of the city of London, to keep order over the whole body. And it was farther ordained, that their wherries ſhould be twelve feet and a half long, and four feet and a half broad in the midſhip, or be liable to forfeiture; and that the names of the watermen be regiſtered by the overſeers, and their fares appointed by the court of aldermen, &c. and the Lord-mayor and aldermen, and the juſtices of the peace of the counties adjoining to the Thames, have power to determine offences.

And by another ſtatute made in the reign of king William III. lightermen, &c. on the Thames, between Graveſend and Windſor, are to be of the Society of watermen and wherrymen, who are made a company. The Lord-mayor and court of aldermen ſhall yearly elect eight of the beſt watermen, and three of the beſt lightermen, to be overſeers and rulers; and the watermen ſhall chuſe aſſiſtants, not exceeding ſixty, nor leſs than forty, and the lightermen nine, at the principal ſtairs, for preſerving good government.

On court days the rulers are to appoint a certain number of watermen to ply on Sundays, between Vauxhall and Limehouſe, for carring paſſengers croſs the river, and to pay them for their labour, and apply the overplus of the money for decayed watermen, &c. * No perſon ſhall row or ply on the river except ſuch as have ſerved their time, or are ſervants or apprentices to watermen. And by an order of the rulers, watermen uſing any lewd expreſſions on the river Thames, are to forfeit two ſhillings and ſix-pence for every offence.

By ſtat. 2. George II. c. 26. no waterman on the Thames ſhall take any apprentice or ſervant, unleſs he regiſters the place of his known habitation with the clerk of the company, on pain of forfeiting ten pounds; and if any perſon not having ſerved ſeven years to a waterman, ſhall row any boat for hire, he incurs the like penalty, but gardeners boats, dung boats, lighters, &c. are excepted.

All boats and barges belonging to the ſeveral members of this company, are obliged to be numbered and entered in the company's regiſter. And to prevent any impoſition on paſſengers, the following table of rates have been appointed by the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, to be taken by the reſpective watermen rowing upon the river Thames, between Graveſend and Windſor.

Any waterman that takes more than the above rates is liable to forfeit 40s. and to to ſuffer ſix months impriſonment: and if he ſets up a ſail between Lambeth and London-bridge, on proper complaint made, he forfeits 5s.

It is neceſſary to add, that to prevent the loſing the lives of perſons paſſing on the river, it is enacted in a ſtatute of the 10th of George II. that no tilt-boat, row-barge, or wherry, take at one time more than thirty-ſeven paſſengers, and three more by the way; nor in any other boat or wherry more than eight, and two more by the way; nor in any ferry-boat or wherry, allowed to work on Sundays, any more than eight paſſengers, on pain of forfeiting for the firſt offence 5l. for the ſecond offence 10l. and for the third offence, to be disfranchiſed for twelve months from working on the river, and from enjoying the privileges of the company. And in caſe any perſon ſhall be drowned, where a greater number of paſſengers is taken in than is allowed, the waterman ſhall be deemed guilty of felony, and tranſported as a felon.

It is alſo enacted by the ſame ſtatute, that every tilt-boat be of the burden of fifteen tons, and any other boat or wherry three tons; and that no Graveſend boats or wherries with cloſe decks or bails nailed down, and not moveable, be navigated, tilt-boats only excepted, on the penalty of 10l.

Any watermen or wherrymen who wilfully or negligently loſe their tide from Billinſgate to Graveſend, or from thence to Billinſgate, by putting aſhore for other paſſengers, or by waiting or loitering by the way, ſo that the firſt paſſengers ſhall be ſet on ſhore two miles ſhort of the place to which they are bound; ſuch paſſengers ſhall be diſcharged from paying any thing for their paſſage.

The rules of this company are to appoint two or more officers to attend, one at Billinſgate, at every time of high-water at London-bridge, and the other at Graveſend at the firſt of flood; who ſhall publicly ring a bell for fifteen minutes, to give notice to the tilt-boats and wherries to put off. And if ſuch wherrymen, &c. do not immediately put off on ringing the ſaid bell, and do not effectually proceed on their voyage, but put on ſhore within two miles of Billinſgate or Graveſend, as the caſe may be; or if ſuch boats are not navigated by two ſufficient men, the youngeſt to be eighteen years old at leaſt; in every ſuch caſe the owners of ſuch boats ſhall forfeit 5l. to be levied on the boats or goods of the owners of ſuch boats. And if the company of watermen neglect ſetting up the ſaid bells, and appointing proper perſons to ring them, they ſhall forfeit 50l. as ſhall ſuch perſons appointed to ring the ſaid bells, forfeit 40l. for every neglect.

This company has a court of aſſiſtants, which, by the act of 2 Geo. II. is reſtrained to thirty. It is the ninety-firſt in the liſt of companies; and is ſaid to pay above 800l. per annum to their poor.

Between Campion-lane * and Allhallows-lane, ſtands the parochial church of ALLHALLOWS the Great.

This church, which is a rectory, and one of the thirteen peculiars in London belonging to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, was anciently denominated Allhallows the More, and Allhallows ad Fœnum, in the Ropery, from its vicinity to a hay wharf, and ſituation among Rope-makers. It was founded by the noble family of the Deſpencers, who preſented thereunto in the year 1361. From whom it paſſed with the heireſs to the earl of Warwick and Saliſbury; and at laſt to the crown, by ſettlement from the widow of Richard Nevil, earl of Warwick, upon king Henry VII. After which Henry VIII. exchanged the ſame with Thomas archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the year 1546, in whoſe ſucceſſors it ſtill continues.

This ſpacious and ſtately church, with a large cloiſter on the ſouth ſide thereof, was conſumed in the general conflagration in 1666, and the preſent edifice was finiſhed in 1683; planned by Sir Chriſtopher Wren, but not executed with the ſame accuracy that was deſigned. It is 87 feet long, 60 feet broad, and 33 feet high to the roof: built of ſtone, ſtrong and ſolid. The walls are plain and maſſy: the ornaments are few and ſimple; and the windows, though large, in order to enlighten ſuch a conſiderable breadth, are not numerous. The tower is plain, ſquare, and divided into five ſtages, but terminates abſolutely ſquare and plain, without ſpire, turret or pinnacles. The cornice is ſupported by ſcrolls, and over theſe riſes a baluſtrade of ſolid conſtruction, ſuitable to the reſt of the building. It is well finiſhed, and ornamented within.

After the fire of London the pariſh of Allhallows the leſs was annexed to this church; and the two together were made of the yearly value of 200l. in lieu of tythes. The veſtry is ſelect, and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, two overſeers or collectors, and two ſideſmen.

The church of Allhallows the Leſs was ſituate nearly adjoining to this, and was ſometimes called Allhallows on the Cellars, or ſuper Cellariam, from its ſtanding on vaults let out for cellars.

The advowſon of this church, which was anciently a rectory, was in the biſhop of Wincheſter; in whom it continued till a college was founded

founded in the church of St. Laurence Poulteney, about the year 1347, who purchaſed the patronage, and appropriated the ſame to his ſaid college: from which time it became a curacy or donative: and falling to the crown, at the general ſuppreſſion of religious houſes, queen Elizabeth firſt granted it for twenty-one years to William Verle; and king James I. in the ſecond year of his reign, ſold it to Richard Blake, &c. and their heirs for ever, in free ſoccage. By which means the impropriation is now in the heirs or aſſigns of the right Reverend Dr. Edward Waddington, late biſhop of Chicheſter.

The ſite of this church is now uſed as a burial place for the inhabitants. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, and two collectors for the poor.

More to the weſt, and cloſe to Coſin-lane, is the Steel-yard, corruptly called Still-yard. This was originally the hall of the Almaine, Anſeatic, or German merchants, where they had warehouſes for wheat, rye, and other grain; and for cables, ropes, pitch, tarr, maſts, hemp, flax, linen, cloth, wainſcots, wax, ſteel, &c. It is a large, open place, with two wide paſſages for carts, to the river ſide, where is a crane, and ſtairs for landing iron, of which here are always large quantities kept. In this yard are ſome good houſes for merchants who trade in iron, for which it is of great note, but was formerly of greater, from the merchants of Almaine. Here are likewiſe large warehouſes for depoſiting goods belonging to the Eaſt India company.

Farther to the weſt and near Friars-lane, is ſituate

JOYNERS HALL.

This building is remarkably curious for a magnificent ſcreen at the entering into the hall room, having demi-ſavages, and a variety of other enrichments carved in right wainſcot. The great parlour is wainſcotted with cedar.

The company of joiners was incorporated by queen Elizabeth, on the eighteenth of April 1565, by the by the name of "The maſter and "wardens and commonalty of the faculty of "joyners and cielers of London." It is a livery company, the forty-firſt in the city liſt; and is governed by a maſter, two wardens and a court of aſſiſtants.

The remaining avenues on the ſouth ſide of Thames-ſtreet are Brewer's-lane and Friar's-lane, which are very mean and ſerve chiefly as paſſages to the lay-ſtall at Dowgate-dock.

On the north ſide of Thames-ſtreet is Little Elbow-lane, ſo called from its bending form from St. Michael's Royal, into Thames-ſtreet; both which, and that part of Great Elbow-lane, that lies in this ward, are well inhabited.

On the north ſide of Great Elbow-lane, near the church is a very beautiful and convenient building, called

INNHOLDERS HALL.

This company was incorporated by king Henry VIII. on the twenty-firſt of December, 1515, by the ſtyle of "The maſter, wardens, and com-"pany, of the art or myſtery of innholders of the "city of London. It is a livery company the thirty ſecond on the city liſt; and is governed by a maſter, three wardens and a court of aſſiſtants.

In Little Elbow-lane is ſituate

DYERS HALL.*

This company was incorporated in the ſecond of Edward IV. in the year 1472, by the name of "The wardens and commonalty of the myſtery "of dyers, London; with the privilege of keeping ſwans upon the river Thames. It is now governed by two wardens and a court of aſſiſtants; was anciently one of the twelve companies; but now ranks only in the thirteenth place; and enjoys the privilege of the livery.

CHAPTER XVI.

Of FARRINGDON WARD Within.

THIS ward, as well as that of Farringdon without, takes its name from William Farringdon, citizen and goldſmith of London, who with his ſon Nicholas, were poſſeſſors thereof for a great number of years. Theſe two wards in ancient times, had but one alderman, and that not by election, but by inheritance or purchaſe, as will more fully appear by the following abſtract of a deed made in the reign of king Edward I.

"Thomas de Ardene ſonne and heire to Sir Ralph Ardene, knt. granted to Ralph le Feure, citizen of London, one of the ſheriffs in the year 1277, all the aldermanrie, with the appurtenances, within the city of London and

* The old hall, which formerly ſtood near Old Swan-lane, Thames-ſtreet, being deſtroyed by the dreadful conflagration in 1666, and a number of warehouſes erected in its place, the company thought proper to convert one of their own houſes (the preſent building) into a hall to tranſact their affairs in.

After this, John le Feure, ſon and heir to the ſaid Ralph le Feure, granted to William Farendon, citizen and goldſmith of London, and to his heirs, the ſaid aldermanry, with the appurtenances, for the ſervice thereunto belonging in the ſeventh of Edward I. in the year of Chriſt 1279. This aldermanry deſcended to Nicholas Farendon, ſon to the ſaid William, and his heirs. Which Nicholas, alſo a goldſmith, was four times mayor, and lived many years after. He made his will in the year 1361, which was fifty-three years after his firſt being mayor, and was buried in St. Peter's church in Cheap. So this ward continued under the government of William Farendon, and Nicholas his ſon, the ſpace of fourſcore and two years, and retains their name to this preſent day.

At the firſt nomination or diviſion of this city into wards, it was called the ward Fori; and the addition of Within the wall of London, and Without the wall of London, was in proceſs of time given to each part by act of parliament, when that large poſſeſſion of the Farendons, or Farringdons, was divided into two aldermanries, to be governed by two aldermen, in the choice of the inhabitants.

This ward is bounded on the eaſt by Cheap ward and Caſtle Baynard ward; on the north by Alderſgate and Cripplegate wards, and the liberty of St. Martin's-le-Grand; on the weſt by Farringdon without; and on the ſouth by Baynard-caſtle ward, and the river Thames. It is divided into eighteen precincts, and is governed by an alderman, ſeventeen common-council-men, (of whom one is the alderman's deputy) nineteen conſtables, ſeventeen inqueſt-men, nineteen ſcavengers and two beadles.

This ward begins where once ſtood the great croſs in Weſtcheap, alias Cheapſide; thence it runs on the ſouth ſide from Friday-ſtreet weſtward, including as much of Friday-ſtreet as the north eaſt corner of St. Matthew's church on the eaſt ſide, and till the ſouth corner of the ſaid church on the weſt ſide. From this ſtreet it runs along Cheapſide to the Old Change, which is in this ward on the eaſt ſide, as far as one houſe ſouth of St. Auguſtin's church, adjoining to Watling-ſtreet; and on the weſt ſide to the place where once ſtood the eaſt arch, or gate, built by Nicholas Farendon in 1361, at the entrance into the ſouth church-yard of St. Paul's; and within the ſaid gate, all that part which was formerly called the north church-yard. Then from the north end of the Old change to the ſite of the north gate of St. Paul's church-yard, which opened into Cheapſide; ſo up the ſouth ſide of Pater-noſter-row to within about twelve doors of Avemary-lane, the weſt ſide of which is in this ward: and thence ſouthward, Ludgate-ſtreet, (formerly called Bowyer-row, as far as the ſpot where lately ſtood Ludgate: and on the north ſide, up Pater-noſter-row, beginning where the conduit ſtood, facing the Old Change, to Pannier-alley, Ivy-lane, Newgate-market, and Warwick-lane, the eaſt ſide of which, and the weſt end of Pater-noſter-row, are in Baynard-caſtle ward. But this ward croſſes Ludgate-ſtreet, and takes in the weſt ſide of Creed-lane, and all Black-friars.

From the above great croſs, or the ſite thereof, this ward runs weſtward on the north ſide, and down Gutter-lane, as far as Huggen-lane on the eaſt ſide, and to Kery-lane on the weſt. Then from the ſouth end of Gutter-lane weſtward to Foſter-lane, and down that lane to the north ſide of St. Foſter's church-yard only on the eaſt ſide, and to over againſt the ſouth weſt corner of the ſaid church-yard on the weſt ſide. But from thence to the wall on the weſt ſide of Noble-ſtreet is in Alderſgate ward. Then from the ſaid wall down to Windſor-houſe, or Nevil's-Inn, and down Monkwell-ſtreet, on the weſt ſide, and then by London-wall to Cripplegate, all which is in Farringdon ward. Then from the ſouth end of Foſter-lane weſtward to St. Martin's-le-Grand, and away to Newgate, which includes both ſides of the way in Newgate-ſtreet, and terminates the north ſide of this ward.

We ſhall begin the ſurvey of this ward at the eaſt extremity, which takes in that part of Cheapſide where formerly ſtood the great croſs erected by king Edward I. in the year 1290.

The ſtreet of Cheapſide is ſpacious and large, graced with very lofty buildings, which are well inhabited by goldſmiths, linen-drapers, haberdaſhers, and other noted tradeſmen, being the chief high ſtreet in the city, and of a very great reſort, as leading to and from the Royal Exchange to all parts weſtward.

At the ſouth weſt angle of Wood ſtreet there once ſtood a church dedicated to St. Peter; but of what antiquity we know not, other than that Thomas de Winton was rector thereof in the year 1324. It was ſometimes called by the name of St. Peter's in Wood-ſtreet, and at other times St. Peter of Weſtcheap. The church, however, being deſtroyed by the fire in 1666, the pariſh is united to St. Matthew's, Friday-ſtreet; and the ſite is now uſed as a burying place for the inhabitants.

More weſtward from Wood ſtreet, on the ſame ſide, is Gutter-lane, which is principally inhabited by working ſilverſmiths, and ſuch as are dependent on that trade. In this lane ſtands

EMBROIDERERS HALL.

This building, though ſmall, is very handſome, and conveniently adapted for the management of the affairs of the company, who were incorporated by queen Elizabeth in the year 1591, by the title of "The keepers or wardens and company "of the art or myſtery of the Broiderers of the "city of London." It is a livery company, the 48th in the city liſt; and is under the government of two keepers or wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants.

A little farther to the weſt is Foſter-lane, on the eaſt ſide of which ſtands the parochial church of St. VEDAST, alias FOSTER'S.

This church, which is a rectory, is ſo denominated from its being dedicated to St. Vedaſt, biſhop of Arras; and the additional appellation, either from the place of its ſituation, or the founder or rebuilder. The firſt mention made of this church is, that Walter de London was preſented thereto in the year 1308.

The patronage of this church was anciently in, and continued with the prior and convent of Canterbury, till the year 1352, when coming to the archbiſhop of that ſee, it has been in him and his ſucceſſors ever ſince; and is one of the thirteen peculiars in this city, belonging to the archiepiſcopal ſee.

Though this church was not entirely deſtroyed by the dreadful conflagration in 1666, yet it received very conſiderable damage; and was afterwards repaired for the moſt part upon the old walls. The ſteeple ſtood till the year 1694, when it was found in ſuch a weak condition that the pariſhioners had it taken down and rebuilt, at their own charge, entirely of ſtone. It is ſixty-nine feet long, fifty-one feet broad, and thirty-ſix feet high to the roof; and is well enlightened by a range of windows placed ſo high, that the doors open under them, The tower is plain, and the ſpire, which is ſhort, riſes from a double baſe.

To this pariſh, after the fire of London, was annexed that of St. Michael Querne; both of which are ſettled at the yearly value of 160l. per annum, in lieu of tythes, with the right of preſentation to the archbiſhop, and dean and chapter of St. Paul's alternately. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are only two churchwardens, and ſeven auditors of accounts.

The pariſh of St. Michael Querne is a rectory, the church whereof ſtood at the weſt end of Cheapſide, fronting the ſtreet, the ſite of which after its deſtruction in 1666, was laid into the ſtreet by the act for rebuilding the city.

The earlieſt account we find of this church is in the year 1181, when the ſtate thereof was returned to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's; at which time it appears to have been only a chapel, and as ſuch it continued many years after. It was not made a rectory till poſſeſſed by Thomas Newton, who was buried in the choir in the year 1461. In ancient records it is called St. Michael ad Bladum, i. e. at the corn (which poſterity has corruptly pronounced Querne) becauſe, at the time this church was founded, there was a corn market that reached up from it weſtward to the ſhambles or fleſh market; from which ſituation it was ſometimes called St. Michael de Macello.

At the eaſt end of this church ſtood the Old Croſs in Weſtcheap, which was taken down in the year 1390. And in this church was buried John Leland, or Leyland, the celebrated antiquarian, who was a prieſt in holy orders, and miniſter of Haſeley, in Oxfordſhire, and other churches. He was empowered by commiſſion under the broad ſeal, to ſearch all libraries, &c. for the antiquities of England; and having retired to his houſe in St. Michael's pariſh, to finiſh the books he had promiſed to the king, he fell diſtracted, and died in 1552.

The pariſhioners of St. Michael Querne ſtill preſerve their rights and privileges; they hold a veſtry, which is general, and chuſe their own officers, who are two churchwardens and ſix auditors of accounts.

On the weſt ſide of Foſter-lane, is the ſite of a ſmall ancient pariſh church, which was a rectory, dedicated to St. Leonard, and recorded by the name of Eccleſia Sancti Leonardi in Venella S. Vedaſti, London. It was founded by the dean of St. Martin's-le-Grand for the uſe of the laity in that liberty, in whom the patronage continued till Henry VII. annexed that deanry to Weſtminſter-abbey, ſince which it has remained in the dean and chapter of Weſtminſter, who, in right thereof, preſent alternately to the living of Chriſt-church, Newgate-ſtreet and St. Leonard. The ſite of the church is now a burying-ground for the pariſhioners, who hold a veſtry which is general, and chooſe two churchwardens.

At the ſouth-eaſt angle of Foſter-lane, and facing Cheapſide, ſtands

SADLERS HALL.

This is a very neat building, the inſide of which is adorned with fret work and wainſcot; and though ſmall, yet it exceeds many others both with reſpect to beauty and convenience.

The fraternity of Sadlers appears to be of ſuch antiquity, that there is extant a convention between them and the dean and chapter of St. Martin's-le Grand, about the reign of Richard I. But it does not appear that they were legally incorporated till Edward I. granted them a charter by the ſtyle of "The wardens or keepers, and com-"monalty, of the myſtery or art of Sadlers of "London." It is a livery company, the 25th in the city liſt; and is governed by a prime, three other wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants.

Returning ſome way eaſtward, on the ſouth ſide of Cheapſide, we take in that part of Friday-ſtreet which is in this ward: on the weſt ſide of which, and almoſt at the north end thereof, is ſituate the pariſh church of St.

St. MATTHEW, FRIDAY-STREET.

This church owes its name to its dedication to St. Matthew the Evangeliſt, and its ſituation in the ſtreet of that name.

The patronage of this rectory being anciently in the abbot and convent of Weſtminſter, it continued in them till their ſuppreſſion; when the conventual church being converted into a cathedral, Henry VII. conferred the ſame upon the biſhop. But the new biſhopric being ſoon after diſſolved, Edward VI. in the year 1551, granted the ſame to the biſhop of London, and his ſucceſſors, in whom the advowſon ſtill continues.

The old church being deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666, the preſent ſtructure was erected on its ruins. It is a plain ſtone building, with one ſeries of large arched windows; and at the eaſt end is the ſteeple, which conſiſts of a ſquare brick tower, void of all ornament.

This church not only ſerves for the uſe of its own inhabitants, but likewiſe thoſe of the pariſh of St. Peter's Weſtcheap, whoſe church being deſtroyed in 1666, and not rebuilt, the pariſh is united to this, and both together made of the yearly value of 150l. in lieu of tythes. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens and collectors, and five auditors of accounts.

The church of St. Peter, Cheap, ſtood at the ſouth-weſt corner of Wood-ſtreet; but of what antiquity we know not, other than that Thomas de Winton, was rector thereof in the year 1324. The patronage of this church was anciently in the abbot and convent of St. Alban's; with whom it continued till the ſuppreſſion of their monaſtery, when Henry VIII. in the year 1546, granted the ſame to the earl of Southampton, in which family it continued till the year 1667, when, by the death of Thomas, earl of Southampton, it deſcended to one of his daughters, by which means it came to the Montague family; ſo that the right of preſentation to St. Matthew Friday-ſtreet and St. Peter Cheap united, is alternately in the biſhop of London and the Montague family.

This pariſh holds a general veſtry, and is governed by two churchwardens or overſeers, and ſeven auditors of accounts.

Farther to the weſt, on the ſame ſide, is the ſtreet called the Old Change, which leads into Watling-ſtreet: at the weſt end of which, on the north ſide, is ſituate the pariſh church of St. AUGUSTIN, OR AUSTIN.

This church, which is a rectory, is ſo called from its dedication to Auſtin or Auguſtin the monk, and firſt archbiſhop of Canterbury. It was anciently denominated Eccleſia Sancti Auguſtini ad Portam, from its vicinity to the ſouth-eaſt gate of St. Paul's church-yard, The patronage of this living is, and always has been in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's.

The old church was burnt down in 1666, and afterwards rebuilt very ſubſtantially with ſtone. It is well pewed and wainſcotted; and the altar-piece is ſpacious and beautiful, having, peculiar to it, a winged heart aſpiring towards glory, with theſe words in gold on a blue ground, Surſum corda, i. e. lift up your hearts.

After the fire of London this church was made parochial for St. Auſtin's and St. Faith's annexed to it; and the living of both united was made of the yearly value of 172l. in lieu of tythes. The veſtry is ſelect, and the pariſh officers are only two churchwardens.

The church of St. Faith, * when in being, was only a kind of chapel within the cathedral church of St. Paul. It was dedicated to St. Faith, a holy virgin of Agen, in Aquitain in France, who ſuffered martyrdom for the chriſtian faith under Diocleſian the emperor, becauſe ſhe would not offer ſacrifices to the idol gods; and it was called Eccleſia ſanctæ Fidei in cryptis, or the church of St. Faith in the vaults underground; being ſituated at the weſt end of Jeſus chapel, under the choir of the cathedral church of St. Paul; which chapel being ſuppreſſed by king Edward VI. the pariſhioners of St. Faith were, in the year 1551, permitted to remove into the ſame, which continued as a pariſh church till the cathedral was demoliſhed by the great fire in 1666. It is a rectory, and one of the peculiars belonging to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, where they are both patrons and ordinaries. The veſtry is general, and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, and four auditors of accounts.

In leaving the eaſt extremity of this ward, we proceed from the north weſt corner of Cheapſide into Newgate-ſtreet, which takes its name from the gate at the weſt end, and is a place of good trade and well inhabited. On the north ſide of this ſtreet is Butcher-hall-lane, which in former times was known by the name of Stinking-lane, on account of the naſtineſs of the place, occaſioned by the ſlaughter-houſes in it. Since the removal of which it has been well built and inhabited. The lane runs, through ſeveral turnings, on the eaſt into St. Martin's-le Grand, and to Alderſgate; on the north through a broad paved paſſage into Town-ditch; and on the weſt into Chriſt-church hoſpital.

Farther to the weſt from Butcher-hall-lane, on the ſame ſide, is a paſſage which leads to CHRIST-CHURCH, Newgate-ſtreet.

This church, which is dedicated to the name and honour of Our Saviour, originally belonged to the convent of Grey Friers, or Franciſcans, which falling to the crown at the diſſolution of that religious houſe, king Henry VIII. gave it to the mayor, commonalty and citizens of London,

* This church was originally a diſtinct building from St. Paul's, at the eaſt end of the cathedral; but that building was demoliſhed to make way for the enlargement of St. Paul's church, in the year 1251 or 1256. In lieu whereof a conveniency was made under the choir, and on the ſpot where St. Faith's church had ſtood, as a place of worſhip for the pariſhioners.

to make a pariſh church thereof, in lieu of the two churches of St. Ewen, in Newgate-market, near the north corner of Eldeneſs (now called Warwick lane) and of St. Nicholas in the Shambles, on the north ſide of Newgate-ſtreet, where there is now a court. Both which churches and their pariſhes were thereupon demoliſhed; and as much of St. Pulchre's pariſh as laid within Newgate, was added to this new erected pariſh church, which was then ordered to be called by the name of Chriſt-church. From which time it was made a vicarage and pariſh church, in the patronage of the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of the city of London, governors of the poor, called the hoſpital of Little St. Bartholomew's, alſo of the foundation of Henry VIII.*

The Old church being deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666, only the choir or eaſt end thereof has been rebuilt, with a tour added to it, having none before. This edifice, however, is built of ſtone, very ſtrong, ſpacious, and beautiful.

The tower is ſquare, and of a conſiderable height, crowned with a light handſome turret, adorned with vaſes. The inſide is neatly ornamented; the walls and pillars are wainſcoted; and there are very large galleries on the north, weſt, and ſouth ſides. The pulpit is veneered and carved with the figures of our Saviour and his twelve apoſtles, ſitting at the laſt ſupper, and the four Evangeliſts. The altar is ſpacious; and the communion table ſtands on a foot-piece of black and white marble, encompaſſed with handſome rails and banniſters; and the front is made of white marble, neatly carved in relievo.

After the fire of London it was made the parochial church for the inhabitants of this, and the pariſh of St. Leonard Foſter-lane, which is annexed to it; and both together are made of the yearly value of two hundred pounds in lieu of tythes.

This living is alternately in the gift of the governors of St. Bartholomew's hoſpital, who, being impropriators, appoint a vicar; but the pariſh of St. Leonard is a rectory in the gift of the dean and chapter of Weſtminſter, ſo that they preſent alternately. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are two church-wardens and four collectors for the poor.

Here are ſeveral gift ſermons, viz. one on St. Matthew's day; on the fifth and ſeventeenth of November; on St. Stephen's day; on the firſt Sunday in lent; on the Sunday after aſcenſion-day; on Chriſtmas-day and Midſummer-day.

Facing the weſt end of the church, acroſs the public paſſage is the old church-yard, and the remaining ſite of the old church.

Adjoining to this church, at the north weſt corner we enter

CHRIST's HOSPITAL.

This hoſpital was founded by king Edward VI. (See page 201) for the maintenance and education of poor fatherleſs children, † to be virtuouſly brought up, and fitted for trades.

This pious example of the young king was from time to time improved by his royal ſucceſſors. King Charles II. founded a mathematical ſchool and ward, lying on the weſt part of the hoſpital, for the inſtruction of forty boys in the mathematics, eſpecially in that part of it that reſpects navigation; and liberally endowed it with 1000l. per annum, paid out of the exchequer for ſeven years, for the founding thereof.

Sir William Cheſter, knt. and aldermen of London, and John Calthorp, citizen and draper of the ſame city, at their own proper coſts and charges, made the brick walls and way on the back ſide, which leadeth from the ſaid hoſpital to the hoſpital of St. Bartholomew; and alſo covered and vaulted the Town ditch, from Alderſgate to Newgate; which before was very loathſome, and infectious to the ſaid hoſpital.

This hoſpital being thus erected, and put into good order, there was one Richard Caſtel, alias Caſtellar, ſhoe-maker, dwelling in Weſtminſter, a man who was very aſſiduous in his faculty with his own hands; and ſuch a one as was named the Cock of Weſtminſter, becauſe both winter and ſummer he was at work by four o'clock in the morning. This man thus truly and painfully labouring for his living, God bleſſed and increaſed his labours ſo abundantly, that he purchaſed lands and tenements at Weſtminſter, to the yearly value of 44l. and, having no child, with the conſent of his wife, who ſurvived him, and was a virtuous good woman, gave the ſame lands wholly to Chriſt's-hoſpital aforeſaid, to the relief of the innocent and fatherleſs children; and for the ſuccour of the miſerable, ſore and ſick, harboured in the other hoſpitals about London.

By the conſtitution of this hoſpital the mathematical maſter muſt be thus qualified: he muſt be a ſober, diſcreet, and diligent perſon, of good life, a good ſcholar, very well underſtanding the latin and greek languages, a very good mathematician, well knowing and ready in the theory and practice of all its parts; to the end boys may be furthered in the latin tongue, and the maſter able to anſwer ſtrangers, if need be; and that they and others may find his abilities to ſatisfaction.

* The king gave five hundred marks per annum in land, for ever, for the maintenance of the ſaid church, with divine ſervice, repairs, &c. In conſideration whereof, the mayor, commonalty, and citizens, did covenant and grant (inter alia) to find and ſuſtain one preacher at this church, who was to be from time to time vicar thereof; giving unto him yearly for his ſtipend 16l. 13s. 4d. to the viſitor (now called the ordinary of Newgate) 10l. and to the other five prieſts in Chriſt's-church, all to be helping in divine ſervice, miniſtering the ſacrament and ſacramentals, 8l. each; to two clerks 6l. each; and to a ſexton 4l. yearly.

† In the year 1552 began the repairing of the Greyfriers houſe, for the poor fatherleſs children; and, in the month of November the children were taken into the ſame, to the number of almoſt 400. On Chriſtmas day in the afternoon, while the Lord-mayor and aldermen rode to St. Pauls, the children of Chriſt's hoſpital ſtood from St. Laurence's-lane end in Cheap, towards St Paul's, all in one livery of ruſſet cotton, 340 in number; and the Eaſter following they were in blue, and ſo have continued ever ſince.

VIEW of S.T BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL.

Ten boys are to be put forth yearly apprentices to maſters of ſhips; to the end that they may be fit in time to do ſervice in the navy royal, and ten more to be received in their rooms. Theſe youths, who are choſen out of the reſt of the blue coat boys, are to be the moſt acute, and of the readieſt wits, that they may be fit for mathematical ſtudies. Theſe, as a badge of diſtinction, wear on their breaſts, faſtened to their coats, a plate of ſilver, with ſome figures engraven, the dye whereof is kept in the Tower, where they are all ſtamped. The chief figures are three liberal ſciences, viz. arithmetic with a ſcroll of accounts in one hand, and laying her other hand upon a blue coat boy's head, having his cap under his arm. The next figure repreſents Geometry, with a triangle in her hand. The third aſtronomy, with a quadrant in one hand, and a ſphere in the other. There is alſo the figure of a ſhip or two under ſail, with a wind from heaven, blowing as it were upon it a proſperous gale. There are alſo in the clouds two angels, one of them a Mercury; and theſe words wrote round, declaring the royal founder, and the year when this ſchool commenced, viz. Auſpicio Caroli Secundi Regis, 1673. This badge they wear conſtantly, not only in the hoſpital, and about the town, but when they are put forth; which, when ſeen, ſecureth them from being preſſed.

There have been ſometimes 1000 poor children, and more, maintained here at one time.

There is a great and ſpacious hall, built after the great fire by Sir John Frederick, alderman of London, the expence of which amounted to five thouſand pounds. In this hall at the upper end is a large picture, that covereth all the wall of the north end, and ſtretcheth on the eaſt and weſt walls, repreſenting king James II. but intended for king Charles II. had he lived but a little longer, ſitting there, and his nobles, and the governors, and treaſurer, and others in great numbers ſtanding about him, with the pictures of king Edward VI. and king Charles II. as founders, drawn half way, painted as hanging up in the ſame table. And there is a particular repreſentation of the mathematical ſchool; it is done by Vario, and reckoned worth 1000l. There is likewiſe at the other end of this hall, a large picture more ancient of king Edward VI. the firſt founder, delivering his royal charter for this hoſpital to the mayor, who kneeleth with the aldermen behind him; a biſhop, which we ſuppoſe is Ridley, with many others ſtanding about; an ancient and a fine piece: nor muſt we forget the fine piece of the pool of Betheſda, very large, and painted in a maſterly ſtile by Mr. Hogarth.

In this hall is a good organ, that oftentimes plays, when the boys alſo ſing their pſalms or anthems on Sundays and other ſpecial days.

There are eight wards where the children's beds are, and where they lodge and harbour: in each of theſe wards are harboured above fifty odd, one with another.

The girls have a ward alſo by themſelves, which is ſituated paſſing out of the great hall on the eaſt. It is fair and handſome, and indeed, the beſt ward of all. It was built at the coſt of Mr. John Morice and Sir Robert Clayton, the former giving a 1000l. the other much more.

There is another convenient ward apart by itſelf, for the ſick, where they that fall into any diſtempers are removed, and due care taken of them. It conſiſts of a room for the lodging of the ſick, a kitchen, a conſultation chamber, and other convenient places; with a proper nurſe.

Of the ancient buildings remaining, there is an old cloiſter of the Grey-friars, and was part of the old priory. It ſerves for a thoroughfare, and a place of recreation for the boys, eſpecially in rainy weather: but, being gone to decay, it was repaired, by the direction of that excellent architect Sir Chriſtopher Wren, knt.

For ſchools, there are theſe: a grammar ſchool, a mathematical ſchool, a writing ſchool, and a ſchool for the girls, where they learn to read, to ſew and to mark.

The grammar ſchool is ancient; the other more modern, and ſet up ſince the great fire.

The writing ſchool is a very fair ſtructure, at the end of the great hall, lofty and airy; founded by Sir John Moore, knt. ſometime one of the aldermen of the city, and preſident of this houſe. It containeth long writing boards, ſufficient for three hundred boys to ſit and write at. It coſt the builder 5000l. whoſe ſtatue, in white marble, at full proportion, is placed at the upper end, with this inſcription:

" Anno Dom. 1694.
" This writing ſchool, and ſtately building,
" was begun, and compleatly finiſhed, at
" the ſole charge of Sir John Moore, knt.
" and Lord-mayor of the city, in the year
" MDCLXXXI; now preſident of this " houſe; he having been otherwiſe a liberal
" benefactor to the ſame."

The maſters of theſe ſchools are four, viz. a grammar maſter, who hath alſo an uſher to aſſiſt him; a mathematical maſter; and a writing maſter; who have 100l. per annum each, for their ſalaries, beſides houſes.

There are alſo two ſchool miſtreſſes that teach the girls, who alſo have ſufficient ſalaries, and houſes to dwell in.

The grammar maſter hath alſo an addition of twenty pounds yearly, for catechiſing the boys; and his uſher fifty pounds a year beſides. In ſhort twelve or thirteen hundred pounds per annum is expended in ſalaries to the officers, clerks, and ſervants; all of whom are choſen by the governors.

This hoſpital has been further improved, by entertaining a maſter to teach the boys drawing. Some ſkill in which art is ſo very uſeful to many, or moſt mechanical trades; as, beſides painters, thoſe of ſeamen, carpenters, joiners, plumbers, carvers, maſons, bricklayers, &c.

The governors are many, and commonly perſons that have been maſters or wardens of their companies, or men of eſtates, or from whom there are expectations of charity. Out of theſe, one is preſident, and he commonly is ſome ancient alderman that hath paſſed the chair; and another is treaſurer, who takes care of the affairs of the whole houſe, and of the revenues, and therefore is commonly reſident, and hath a good houſe to dwell in, but without any ſalary: and ſuch an one is choſen by the governors for this great truſt, who is of note for his ability, integrity, and charity: and according to the repute he hath, ſo the hoſpital uſually flouriſheth, and the benefactions come in plentifully.

Every governor, when he is admitted into this ſociety, hath this charge ſolemnly given him, in the preſence of the preſident or treaſurer, and other governors aſſembled in court:

" Worſhipful,

" The cauſe of your repair hither at this preſent " is, to give you knowledge, that you are elected " and appointed, by the Lord-mayor and court " of aldermen, to the office, charge, and govern- " ance of Chriſt's-hoſpital.

" And, therefore, this is to require you, and " every of you, that you endeavour yourſelves, " with all your wiſdom and power, faithfully " and diligently to ſerve in this vocation and " calling, which is an office of high truſt and " worſhip: for ye are called to be the faithful " diſtributors and diſpoſers of the goods of Al- " mighty God to his poor and needy members. " In the which office and calling if you ſhall be " found negligent and unfaithful, ye ſhall not " only declare yourſelves to be the moſt unthank- " ful and unworthy ſervants of Almighty God; " being put in truſt to ſee the relief and ſuccour " of his poor and needy flock; but alſo ye ſhall " ſhew yourſelves to be very notable and great " enemies to that work, which moſt highly " doth advance and beautify the common " wealth of this realm, and chiefly of this city " of London.

" Theſe are therefore to require you, and every " of you, that ye here promiſe before God, and " this aſſembly of your fellow-governors, faith- " fully to travail in this your office and calling, " that this work may have its perfection, and " that the needy number committed to your " charge be diligently and wholſomely provided " for, as you will anſwer before God, at the " hour and time when you and we ſhall ſtand be- " fore him, to render an account of our doings. " And, promiſing this to do, you ſhall be now " admitted into this company and fellowſhip."

Beſides the chief governors, they have divers officers that receive ſalaries, viz. four clerks, a ſteward and a matron; for every ward, a nurſe and her maid; a porter and four beadles.

They have alſo three ſervants, which they call ſtreet-men, that ſee to the well government of the carts of London. Likewiſe certain clerks for Blackwell-hall; whence are certain duties coming to the houſe.

The beer provided by this great family is ſupplied by two brewers, and the bread by three bakers.

There are two of the governors that are called almoners, who for a month, or more, take care to buy and lay in butchers meat, that is, beef and mutton; the ſteward attending them.

Every morning the children have for their breakfaſt bread and beer, at half an hour paſt ſix in the morning in the ſummer time; and at half an hour paſt ſeven in the winter. On Sundays they have boiled beef and pottage for their dinners; and for their ſuppers bread and butter.

On Mondays milk-pottage, Tueſdays roaſt mutton, Wedneſdays rice-milk, Thurſdays boiled beef and broth, Fridays boiled mutton and broth, and on Saturdays peaſe pottage.

Their ſupper is bread and cheeſe, or butter for thoſe that cannot eat cheeſe.

They have roaſt beef about twelve days in the year, by the kindneſs of ſeveral benefactors; who have left, ſome three pounds, ſome thirty ſhillings per annum for that end and purpoſe.

To ſupport all this, the hoſpital has a great annual revenue in houſes and lands; the benefit of licenſing and looking after the four hundred and twenty carts allowed by the city, each of which pays a certain ſum for ſealing; and the the duty of about three farthings upon every piece of cloth brought to Blackwell-hall.

This hoſpital alſo provides for a conſiderable number of younger children at Ware and Hertford; at each of which places there is a ſchoolmaſter, with a ſalary of fifty pounds each, to teach thoſe children to read. At Ware, the hoſpital ſchool is built like a college, making a large quadrangle, for boys: conſiſting of a ſchoolhouſe, the maſter's houſe, and thirteen houſes for nurſes to keep the children. At Hertford, there is a ſchool-houſe, a maſters houſe, and twenty others, with two rooms on a floor, and gardens belonging.

On the north ſide of the cloiſters are two doors: one opens into Town ditch, which is now a fine open area, with ſeveral good houſes built, and well inhabited: the other opens a way into St. Bartholomew's-hoſpital and Smithfield. And cloſe to this door or gate, on the weſt ſide is a burial ground, in which are interred ſuch as die in Newgate, &c.

The principal gate into this hoſpital is on the weſt, and almoſt at the ſouth weſt corner of the old building, from the court which to this day is called the Grey-friars.* In queen Mary's days there

* Theſe were a ſociety or religious order founded by St. Francis of Aſſiſi, canonized by pope Gregory IX. in 1228. Of whom a detached body of nine brethren, five whereof were prieſts, and four lay brothers, were ſent from Italy to ſettle and propagate their order in England. The prieſts placed themſelves at Canterbury, in the year 1224. The lay-brothers came to London, and were entertained by the Friars Preachers in Oldborn for about fifteen days, or till they could be accommodated with a convenient houſe for themſelves, which they ſoon obtained of John Travers, one of the ſheriffs in 1224. In which houſe they made themſelves cells, and continued till their numbers, in a few years, there was in this place a ſtinking loathſome dungeon, where it had been uſual to confine and puniſh vagabonds; and in the Marian perſecution it ſerved for the impriſonment of ſuch as fell under the diſpleaſure of the popiſh miniſtry; amongſt whom we read of one Thomas Green, ſervant to John Wayland, a printer, who was confined and cruelly whipped in this dungeon, for being concerned in printing a book called Antichriſt.

At the weſt extremity of Newgate-ſtreet ſtands Newgate; the origin and deſcription of which the reader will find in page 13, &c.

On the ſouth ſide of Newgate ſtreet is Warwick-lane, on the weſt ſide of which, near to the north end, is ſituate

The COLLEGE of PHYSICIANS.†

This is a very noble edifice built with brick and ſtone. The entrance, which is grand, is under an octangular theatre, finiſhing in a dome, with a cone on the top, making a lantern to it. The inſide is elegant, finely enlightened and very capacious; deſigned by Sir Chriſtopher Wren. The central building, which contains the library and other rooms of ſtate and convenience, was the deſign of Inigo Jones. The aſcent to the door is by a flight of ſteps, and in the under part is a baſement ſtory. The whole front is decorated with pilaſters of the Ionic and Corinthian orders; and on one ſide, over the door caſe, is the ſtatue of king Charles II. placed in a niche, and in the other ſide that of Sir John Cutler. The buildings at the two ſides of the court are uniform, and have the window caſes handſomely ornamented. The orders are well executed, and the whole edifice both beautiful and commodious.

Here is a hall in which the phyſicians ſit to give advice to the poor gratis; a committee room; a library, furniſhed with books by Sir Theodore Mayern and the marquis of Dorcheſter, who was one of the fellows; a great hall for the quarterly meetings of the doctors, adorned with pictures and ſculpture; a theatre for anatomatical diſſection; a preparing room, where there are thirteen tables, containing all the muſcles in the human body; and over all, garrets to dry the herbs for the uſe of the diſpenſatory.

The phyſicians were incorporated in the tenth of Henry VIII. who, on the twenty-third of September, granted a charter to incorporate certain phyſicians in one body, and perpetual commonalty or fellowſhip of the faculty of phyſic; and to have a perpetual ſucceſſion, and a common ſeal; and to chooſe yearly a preſident, to overſee, rule and govern the ſaid fellowſhip in all even of the ſame faculty. By virtue whereof they were enabled to purchaſe and poſſeſs, in fee and perpetuity, lands, tenements and rents, and any other poſſeſſion; that they might make ſtatutes and ordinances for the wholeſome government and correction of the college, and of all perſons practiſing phyſic within ſeven miles of the city; and, within that compaſs, none to practiſe, as well as in the city, unleſs firſt allowed by the preſident and fellowſhip, upon pain of forfeiting five pounds for every month; that four be choſen yearly by the preſident and college, who ſhall have the ſuperviſing, ſearch, examination, and government of all the phyſicians of the city and ſuburbs within ſeven miles; with an exemption that no phyſician ſhall be liable to ſerve any offices in wards or pariſhes, or be put upon juries, inqueſts, &c.

By a ſtatute made in the thirty ſecond of Henry VIII. the phyſicians of this college were exempt from keeping watch and ward, and from ſerving other offices within the city and ſuburbs; and they were empowered to chuſe four phyſicians yearly to ſearch the apothecaries wares, drugs, and ſtuffs. This charter was confirmed by queen Mary I.

Queen Elizabeth gave them another charter to take four human bodies, executed at Tyburn, to anatomize. king James I. and king Charles II. each of them granted them a charter.

By the power granted them by theſe and other their charters, they have called before them the preſident, or, in his abſence, the vice preſident, and the cenſors, the ſurgeons, apothecaries, and other perſons, that have practiſed phyſic without their allowance; and have ſometimes warned them to forbear, and ſometimes impoſed pecuniary penalties or impriſonment upon them. For they may convene any phyſician or practiſer before them, and examine them concerning their ſkill in the faculty of phyſic; and if they ſhall not appear to their ſummons, or appearing refuſe to anſwer, or to be examined, the college may aſſeſs a penalty or fine upon them for every default of appearance, or refuſal to anſwer; the fine, for one default, not exceeding forty ſhillings, or, if any adminiſter unwholeſome and noiſome medicines, he may be fined according to their direction, not exceeding ten pounds, or impriſonment, not exceeding fourteen days, unleſs for non-payment of fine, when it ſhall be lawful to detain them in priſon till it be diſcharged.

On a complaint made, about the latter end of queen Elizabeth's reign, by Jenkins and Read, againſt the college, which had uſed ſome puniſhment towards them for evil practice of phyſic, years, required a more commodious convent. For which purpoſe John Ewen purchaſed a vacant piece of ground near St. Nicholas ſhambles, and, with proper aſſiſtants, built a houſe thereon for the ſaid friars; and, having appropriated the ſame to the commonalty of London, he himſelf became a lay brother in the ſaid houſe; which in proceſs of time was greatly augmented by the benevolence of queen Margaret, ſecond wife to Edward I. and other benefactors; amongſt whom we find Sir Richard Whittington, who founded a library in the Grey-friars convent, 129 feet long and thirty-one broad, and furniſhed it well with books.

† The firſt college belonging to this ſociety was ſituate in Knight-rider-ſtreet, and given them by doctor Linacre, phyſician to Henry VIII. They afterwards removed to a houſe which they purchaſed in Amen-corner, where doctor Harvey, who found out the circulation of the blood in 1652, built a library and a public hall, which he granted for ever to the college, and endowed it with his eſtate, which he reſigned to them in his lifetime. Part of which they aſſigned for an annual oration in commemoration of their benefactors, and to provide a good dinner for the ſociety. This building periſhed in the flames in the fire of London.

and exerciſing that art without the licence, after a long and careful hearing on both parts, Popham, lord-chief juſtice, in the year 1602, gave his judgment, the ſum of which was in theſe particulars:

1. That there was no ſufficient licence without the college ſeal.

2. That no ſurgeon, as a ſurgeon, might practice phyſic, no, not for any diſeaſe, though it was the great pox.

3. That the authority of the college was ſtrong, and ſufficient to commit to priſon.

4. That the cenſure of the college, riſing from leſſer mulcts, to greater, was equal and reaſonable.

5. That it were fit to ſet to phyſicians bills the day of the month, and the patient's name.

6. That the lord-chief-juſtice could not bail or deliver the college's priſoner, but was obliged by law to deliver him up to the cenſure of the college.

7. That a freeman of London might lawfully be impriſoned by the college.

8. That no man, though ever ſo learned a phyſician or doctor, might practice in London, or within ſeven miles, without the licence of the college.

October 12, 1747, Mr. Mead read the draught of a new ſtatute, forbidding any member of the college to meet or conſult, in any caſe of phyſic, with perſons prohibited from practice. Which ſtatute was ordered to be engroſſed, in order to be read at the next college meeting. And

On the fourth of April 1748, the following ſtatute, prohibiting any fellow, candidate, or licentiate, to conſult, in any caſe of phyſic, with perſons prohibited by the college from the practice thereof, was read the ſecond time, and approved by the majority of the college.

A ſtatute againſt conſulting with any perſon prohibited to practiſe phyſic.

Ordered that the college ſeal be put to the ſaid ſtatute next Comitia majora.

The officers of this college are, a preſident, eight electors, four cenſors, a regiſter, and a treaſurer, annually choſen the firſt week in October.

Near the north eaſt corner of Warwick-lane formerly ſtood the pariſh church of St. Ewen, whoſe pariſh was diſſolved to make way for the eſtabliſhment of Chriſt-church.

Farther to the eaſt is a paſſage which leads into

NEWGATE MARKET.*

This is a handſome, commodious ſquare piece of ground, meaſuring 194 feet from eaſt to weſt, and 148 feet from north to ſouth. In the middle is a market-houſe, under which are vaults or cellars, and the upper part of the building is employed as a kind of warehouſe for the fruiterers, and the keepers of green-ſtalls by night. In the ſhops under this building tripe and other things are ſold, and in the middle, near the market-houſe, are ſold fruit and greens. At a convenient diſtance are ſhops for butchers, the ſellers of butter, &c. and the houſes beyond theſe, which extend along the ſides of the market, are alſo taken up by butchers. The paſſages to the market from Pater-noſter-Row and Newgate ſtreet, are occupied by poulterers, fiſhmongers, cheeſemongers, and dealers in bacon.

Farther to the eaſt from this market we paſs Ivy-lane, and come to Pannier-alley, the north end of which almoſt faces St. Martin's-le-Grand. In this alley is a ſtone pedeſtal, ſupporting a pannier, with a figure of a boy upon it, and this inſcription:

When you have ſought the city round,
Yet ſtill this is the higheſt ground.

Returning a little to the weſt, on the ſouth ſide of Pater-noſter-Row, is Canon-alley, (commonly called King's-head alley) which leads into St. Paul's church-yard, in the center of which is ſituate the cathedral church of St. Paul.†

About the middle of this church-yard formerly ſtood the pulpit croſs, ‡ where ſermons were preached every Sunday forenoon to the populace, and many public notices were uſually iſſued out from the Lord-mayor and from the king. This croſs was made of timber covered with lead, mounted upon ſteps of ſtone; and was ſupported by as many donations as amounted to 1814l. 6s. 8d. and the preachers were appointed by the biſhop of London, and had 45s. for each ſermon, and four days diet and lodging at ſuch houſe as the ſaid biſhop ſhould appoint, and was on that account called the Shunamite, and allowed 15s. per week. The preachers are now appointed to preach in the church, and are allowed 35s. by the city, and 5s. only by the church.

The government of St. Paul's cathedral is in a biſhop, a dean, a precentor, chancellor, treaſurer, five archdeacons, thirty prebendaries, twelve petty canons, or minor canons, ſix vicars coral, and ſeveral other inferior officers. All the prebends, or canonries are in the collation of the biſhop of the dioceſe; and out of theſe thirty canons, there are three reſidentiaries, beſides the dean; ſo called from their continual reſidence in the church, to tranſact the buſineſs of the church in the chapter, and daily to take care of the concerns of the church.

On the north ſide of St. Paul's church-yard § ſtands

The CHAPTER HOUSE.

This is a handſome building, belonging to St. Paul's, in which the convocation of the province of Canterbury ſat to conſult about eccleſiaſtical affairs, and to form canons for the government of the church: but though the upper and lower houſe are called by the king's writ at every ſeſſion of parliament, they are now conſtantly prorogued, and diſmiſſed by his majeſty's authority.

On the eaſt ſide of St. Paul's church-yard is ſituate

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL.

This was founded by Dr. John Colet, dean of St. Paul's, in the year 1507, for 153 children to be taught free by three maſters: the particulars and origin of which will beſt appear from the fol-

* Before the fire of London this market was kept in Newgate-ſtreet, where there was a market-houſe for meal, and a middle row of ſheds, which were afterwards converted into houſes, inhabited by butchers, tripeſellers, &c. while the country people, who brought proviſions to the city, were forced to ſtand with their ſtalls in the open ſtreet, where their perſons and goods were expoſed to danger by the paſſage of coaches, carts, and cattle that paſſed through the ſtreets. At that time Butcherhall-lane was filled with ſlaughter-houſes for the uſe of this market; and Blowbladder-ſtreet was rendered remarkable by blown bladders hanging in the windows of the ſhops where bladders were ſold.

‡ Facing this croſs ſtood the charnel, in which the bones of the dead were decently piled together, a thouſand loads whereof were removed to Finſbury fields, in the reign of Edward VI. and there laid in a mooriſh place, with ſo much earth to cover them as raiſed the ground for three windmills to ſtand upon. The charnel itſelf, together with a chapel called Sheryngton's chapel, the library which belonged to the old Chapter-houſe, and other chapels adjoining, were at the ſame time pulled down, and their materials, by order of Edward duke of Somerſet, converted to the building of Somerſet houſe in the Strand.

§ At the eaſt end of this church-yard formerly ſtood the clochier, or bell-tower, in which were four great bells called Jeſus Bells, becauſe they actually belonged to Jeſus chapel in St. Faith's church; but theſe, together with the fine image of St. Paul on the top of the ſpire, being won by Sir Miles Partridge, knt. of king Henry VIII. at one caſt of the dice, were, by that gentleman, taken down and ſold.

lowing piece, wrote by the founder himſelf, and delivered to Mr. Lilly, on the 18th of June, in the year 1518.

" John Colet, ſon of Henry Colet, dean of St. Paul's, deſiring nothing more than education, and bringing up children in good manners and literature, in the year of our Lord 1512, built a ſchool [not fully finiſhed till that year] at the eaſt end of St. Paul's church, for 153 boys, to be taught free in the ſame.

" And ordained there a maſter, a ſur-maſter, and a chaplain, with ſufficient and perpetual ſtipends ever to endure; and ſet patrons, defenders, governors and rulers of the ſame ſchool, the moſt honeſt and faithful fellowſhip of the Mercers of London.

" And, for becauſe nothing can continue long and endure in good order without laws and ſtatutes, I, the ſaid John Colet, have expreſſed my mind, what I would ſhould be duly and diligently obſerved and kept of the ſaid maſter, ſur-maſter and chaplain, and of the Mercers, governors of the ſchool: that in this book may appear to what intent I founded this ſchool."

Then follow his ordinances: " That he founded the ſchool in the honour of Chriſt Jeſu in pueritia, and of his bleſſed mother Mary. That the high maſter ſhould be choſen by the wardens and aſſiſtants of the Mercers. That he be a man whole in body, honeſt, virtuous, and learned in clean Latin literature, as alſo in Greek, if ſuch might be gotten; a wedded man, a ſingle man, or a prieſt that hath no benefice with cure or ſervice. His wages to be a mark a week, and a livery gown of four nobles delivered in cloth. His lodgings to be free; and to have the tenement of Stebbonhith to reſort unto. That the ſur-maſter be verſed in learning, and well lettered, to teach under the maſter; either ſingle man, wedded, or prieſt that hath no benefice with cure or ſervice: to be whole in body. The high maſter to chuſe him, as the room ſhall be void: and to be confirmed by the ſurveyors of the ſchool. Lodgings to be aſſigned him in the Old Change. His wages to be 6s. 8d. per week, and a livery gown of four nobles delivered in cloth. That there ſhall be in the ſchool a prieſt daily, as he could, to ſing maſs in the chapel of the ſchool, and to pray for the children to proſper in good life and in good letters. That he was to be ſome honeſt, good, and virtuous man; to be choſen by the wardens and aſſiſtants of the Mercery. To learn himſelf, or, if learned, to help to teach the ſchool, if it ſeemed convenient to the high maſter. To have no benefice with cure of ſouls, nor no other office or occupation. To teach the children the catechiſm, and inſtruction of the articles of faith and the ten commandments in Engliſh. His wages to be 8l. by the year, and a livery gown of 26s. 8d. delivered in cloth. His chamber and lodging to be in the new houſe in the Old Change, or the maſter's lodging.

" Children of all nations and countries indifferently to be taught, to the number of 153. The maſter to admit theſe children as they be offered; but firſt to ſee that they can ſay the catechiſm, and alſo read and write competently; and to pay four pence for writing their name: which money the poor ſcholar that ſwept the ſchool was to have. Thrice a day, viz. morning, noon, and evening, proſtrate to ſay the prayers contained in a table in the ſchool. No tallow candles, but only wax to be uſed, no meat, drink, or bottles, to be brought; nor no breakfaſts nor drinkings in the time of learning. That the ſcholars uſe no cock-fighting, nor riding about of victory, nor diſputing at St. Bartholomew's; which are but fooliſh babbling, and loſs of time. That they have no remedies [i. e. that is play-days begged] except the king, an archbiſhop, or a biſhop, preſent in his own perſon, deſired it. The children every Childermas-day to go to Paul's church, and hear the child biſhop ſermon, and after to be at the high maſs, and each offer a penny to the child biſhop; and with them the maſters and ſurveyors of the ſchool. In general proceſſions, when warned, they ſhall go two and two together ſoberly; and not ſing out, but ſay devoutly ſeven pſalms with the litany. That if any child admitted here, go to any other ſchool to learn there, ſuch child for no man's ſuit be again received into the ſchool.

" To be taught always in good literature both Latin and Greek, and good authors, ſuch as have the very Roman eloquence joined with wiſdom; eſpecially chriſtian authors, that wrote their wiſdom with clean and chaſte Latin, either in verſe or proſe. But, above all, the catechiſm in Engliſh; after that the accidence. Then Inſtitutum Chriſtiani hominis, which Eraſmus made at my [i. e. Colet's] requeſt; the Copia Verborum of the ſame author. Then other chriſtian authors; as Lactantius, Prudentius, and Proba; Sedulius, Juvencus, and Baptiſta Mantuanus; and ſuch other as ſhall be thought convenient for the true Latin ſpeech.

" The honourable company of Mercers of London to have all the charge, and care, and rule of the ſchool. They to chuſe every year of their company, two honeſt, ſubſtantial men to be the ſurveyors of the ſchool, who, in the name of the whole fellowſhip, ſhould take all the care and buſineſs of the ſchool for that year. They to come into the ſchool ſix days before Chriſtmas, and ſo many days before eaſter, St. John Baptiſt, and Michaelmas; and pay the maſters and chaplains their quarterly wages; and at the latter end of the year their liveries in cloth. And once in the year to give up their accounts to the maſter, wardens, and aſſiſtants; and that to be about Candlemas, three days before, or three days after. Then a little dinner to be made; and to call to account the receiving of all the eſtate of the ſchool: and the maſter warden to receive a noble, the two other wardens five ſhillings; the ſurveyors two ſhillings; and for their riding to viſit the lands eleven ſhillings, the clerk of the Mercery three ſhillings and four-pence with ſome other gifts. That which was ſpared that day in rewards and charges to be put into the treaſury of the ſchool. What remained to be given to the fellowſhip of the Mercery, to the maintaining and repairing all belonging to the ſchool from time to time. The ſurpluſage, above repairs and caſualties, to be put into a coffer of iron, given by Colet, ſtanding in their hall. And there, from year to year, to remain apart by itſelf, that it might appear how the ſchool of itſelf maintained itſelf. And at length, over and above the whole livelihood, if the ſaid ſchool grow to any further charge to the Mercery, that then alſo it might appear, to the laud, and praiſe, and mercy of the ſaid fellowſhip.

"Laſtly, that he left it to the ſaid company to add and diminiſh to and from this his book, and to ſupply it in every default, and alſo to declare in it, as time, place, and juſt occaſion ſhould require."

The original building was conſumed by the fire of London in 1666, ſoon after which the preſent edifice aroſe in its place; with the addition of a library, and an houſe on the ſouth end thereof for the ſecond maſter; whoſe dwelling before, and from the firſt founding of the ſchool, was in the Old Change. This houſe hath a very handſome front, anſwerable to the high maſter's at the north end of the ſchool; on which is engraven, ÆDES PRÆCEPTORIS GRAMMATICES.

St. Paul's ſchool is a very ſingular and at the ſame time a very handſome edifice. The central building, in which is the ſchool, is of ſtone; it is much lower than the ends, and has only one ſeries of windows, which are large, and raiſed a conſiderable height from the ground. The center is adorned with ruſtic, and on the top is a handſome pediment, in which are the founder's arms placed in a ſhield; upon the apex ſtands a figure repreſenting Learning. Under this pediment are two windows which are ſquare, and on each ſide are two circular windows crowned with buſts, and the ſpaces between them are handſomely ornamented by work in relievo. Upon a level with the foot of the pediment runs on either ſide a handſome baluſtrade, on which is placed on each ſide a large buſt with a radiant crown, between two flaming vaſes.

The ſchool-houſe is large and ſpacious. It conſiſteth of eight claſſes, or forms; in the firſt whereof children learn their rudiments; and from thence, according to their proficiency, are advanced unto the other forms, till they riſe to the eighth. Whence, being commonly made perfect grammarians, good orators and poets, well inſtructed in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and ſometimes in other oriental languages, they remove to the univerſities; and many of them enjoy exhibitions, ſome of ten pounds a year for ſeven years, if they continue ſo long, towards their maintainance there. The ſchool is governed and taught by two maſters, viz. an high maſter, and a ſur-maſter, and a chaplain, whoſe cuſtomary office was to read the Latin prayers in the ſchool, framed for the peculiar uſe thereof, and to inſtruct the children of the two firſt forms in the elements of the Latin tongue, and alſo in the catechiſm and chriſtian manners; for which there is a room, called the Veſtibulum, being the anti-room to the ſchool, where the youth are to be initiated into the grounds and principles of chriſtian knowledge, as a good and proper introduction into other human learning.

We now leave St. Paul's church-yard and enter Ludgate-ſtreet, on the north ſide of which is Ave-mary-lane. This lane is well built, and principally inhabited by bookſellers, printers, and other tradeſmen. On the weſt ſide is an open ſquare court, with good houſes, called ſtationer's-rents: out of which is a paſſage into Amen-corner, and another that leads to

STATIONERS HALL.*

This is a ſpacious brick building; and though it hath not many ornaments, yet it is well deſigned and fitted for buſineſs. There is an aſcent to it by a flight of ſteps, and the light is thrown in by two ſeries of windows; the lower large and upright, and the upper of an elliptical form. Underneath it, and at the north end, are warehouſes for the company's ſtock.

This fraternity (which includes printers, bookſellers, ſtationers, or dealers in paper, &c. and book-binders) was incorporated by Philip and Mary in the year 1556. By which their majeſties did give and grant to ninety-ſeven printers, bookſellers, ſtationers, &c. freemen of the myſtery or art of a ſtationer of the city of London, and ſuburbs thereof, that they may be one body of itſelf for ever, with one maſter, and two keepers or wardens, by the name of "The maſter, and "keepers or wardens, and commonalty, of the "myſtery or art of a ſtationer of the city of "London." And that the ſame maſter, and keepers or wardens, and commonalty, and their ſucceſſors, may from time to time make and ordain, and eſtabliſh for the good and well ordering and governing of the freemen of the aforeſaid art or myſtery, and of the aforeſaid ſociety, ordinances, proviſions, and laws, as often as they ſhall ſee proper and convenient; provided that theſe ordinances, proviſions and laws, be in no wiſe repugnant or contrary to the laws and ſtatutes of this our kingdom of England, or in prejudice to the common-weal of our ſaid kingdom.

And that the ſame, and their ſucceſſors for ever, are enabled, and may lawfully and faithfully, without moleſtation or diſturbance of us, or the heirs or ſucceſſors of our foreſaid queen, or of any other perſon, hold, as often as they pleaſe, lawful and honeſt meetings of themſelves, for the enacting ſuch laws and ordinances, and tranſacting other buſineſs for the benefit of the ſame myſtery or art, and of the ſame ſociety, and for other lawful cauſes in the manner aforeſaid.

And that the foreſaid maſter, and keepers or wardens, and the commonalty of the ſaid myſtery or art of a ſtationer of the foreſaid city, and their ſucceſſors, or the greater part of them, being aſſembled lawfully and in a convenient place, may

* This hall was a great houſe, built of ſtone and timber, of old time, pertaining to John Duke of Britain, earl of Richmond, as appeareth by the records of Edward II. Since that, it was Pembroke's-inn, near unto Ludgate, as belonging to the earls of Pembroke, in the time of Richard II. the eighteenth year, and of Henry VI. in the fourteenth year. It was afterwards called Burgavenny-houſe, and belonged to Henry late lord of Burgavenny.

It then ordained, that no perſon within the kingdom of England, or dominions thereof, either by himſelf or by his journeymen, ſervants, or by any other perſon, ſhall practice or exerciſe the art or myſtery of printing or ſtamping any book, or any thing to be ſold or to be bargained for within this our kingdom of England, or the dominions thereof, unleſs the ſame perſon is or ſhall be one of the ſociety of the foreſaid myſtery or art of a ſtationer of the city aforeſaid at the time of his foreſaid printing or ſtamping; or has for that purpoſe obtained our licence or the licence of the heirs and ſucceſſors of our foreſaid queen.

And to impriſon ſuch as ſhall diſturb, refuſe or hinder them.

In which charter there is no mention of a court of aſſiſtants, which was firſt conſtituted by that charter of the 36 Charles II. contrived to pave the way to arbitrary power, the court finding it more eaſy to bias the few in a court of aſſiſtants, than the many which compoſe the whole commonalty. But the additions made by that charter of 36 Charles II. to the charter of Philip and Mary, were afterwards repealed and declared null and void; and this, and all other companies, were reſtored to their original rights by an act of parliament in 2 William and Mary; of which the following is an abſtract:

Item. It was this day ordered and agreed, at the earneſt ſuit and prayer of John Cawood, and divers other ſaid perſons, being freemen of this city in the fellowſhip of the Stationers, that the ſame fellowſhip from henceforth ſhall be permitted and ſuffered to have, uſe and wear, a livery and livery-hood, in ſuch decent and comly-wiſe and order as the other companies and fellowſhips of this citie, after their degrees, do commonly uſe and wear; and that they the ſaid Stationers ſhall cauſe all ſuch, and as many of their ſaid fellowſhip as conveniently may be able, to prepare and make ready the ſame liveries with ſpeed, ſo that they may henceforth attend and wait upon the Lord-mayor of this citie at all common ſhews hereafter to be made by the cityzens of this cytie, in ſuch and lyke manner and ſorte as the other cityzens of the ſayd cytie, for the honour of the ſame cytie, of long tyme paſt have done and yet dayley do, as occaſion ſhall require.

JACKSON.

On the twenty-ninth of October 1603, king James I. did, by his letters patent, grant unto the company of Stationers the privilege of the ſole printing of almanacks, primers, pſalters, and pſalms, in metre or proſe, with muſical notes, or without notes. And by his letters patent, dated the eighth of March 1615, his ſaid majeſty confirmed the ſaid grant for the ſole printing of primers, pſalters, pſalms, and almanacks in the Engliſh tongue; and did further grant to the company of Stationers the ſole right to print the A. B. C. the little catechiſm, and the catechiſm in Engliſh and Latin by Alexander Nowell; for the help and relief of the maſter, keeper or wardens, and commonalty or freemen of the myſtery or art of Stationers of the city of London, and their ſucceſſors.

The company of Stationers is at this time governed by a maſter, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants; not choſen by the commonalty, but by and amongſt themſelves.

With reſpect to the produce of the ſole printing of almanacks, &c. it is made a joint ſtock, with a capital of about 15000l. which is divided into twenty whole ſhares of 320l. each, poſſeſſed by thoſe who are of the court of aſſiſtants; for which depoſit they each receive 40l. per annum dividend:

dividend: then into forty half ſhares, at 160l. each; for which depoſit they each receive 20l. per annum dividend: then into eighty quarter ſhares, at 80l. each; for which depoſit they each receive 10l. per annum dividend: and then into 160 half quarter ſhares at 40l. each; for which depoſit they receive 5l. per annum dividend; out of the profits ariſing from the printing ſtock engrafted upon the ſaid grants by king James I. for the help and relief of the maſter, wardens, and commonalty; but theſe ſhares are all divided amongſt thoſe who have fined for, or ſerved the office of maſter-warden.

When a married ſtockholder dies, the profits ariſing from his ſhare devolve to his widow; which ſhe enjoys during her widowhood, or life: but if ſhe marry again, or die, another perſon is choſen to enjoy the profits of her ſhare; who, at his election, pays the depoſit money, not to the company, but to the late widow, her huſband's or her executors. The maſter and wardens are always in the direction of the ſtock, to whom are joined ſix other members from the court of aſſiſtants annually; who adjuſt all accounts relating to it, and at Chriſtmas report the ſtate thereof to the board. There is a ſtock-keeper, which is a place of very conſiderable profit and great truſt.

The Stationers have ſeveral very extenſive eſtates in truſt, out of which they pay, in penſions and other charities, upwards of 400l. per annum.

At the upper end of Amen-corner was originally ſituated the College of Phyſicians, deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666; on the ſite of which ſtand three good houſes, now the habitations of the reſidentiaries of St. Paul's.

Between Stationer's-alley and the new buildings at the north-eaſt corner of the Old Bailey, is ſituate the pariſh church of St. MARTIN, LUDGATE.

This is a rectory of very great antiquity, and is ſaid to have been founded by Cadwallo, the valiant king of the Britons, who reigned forty-eight years, and died the twentieth of November, in the year 677, and was buried in this church.

The patronage of this rectory was in the abbot and convent of Weſtminſter, till the ſuppreſſion of their monaſtery by Henry VIII. who erecting Weſtminſter into a biſhopric, conferred the ſame upon the new biſhop. But that ſee being diſſolved by Edward VI. queen Mary, in the year 1553, granted the advowſon thereof to the biſhop of London and his ſucceſſors, in whom it ſtill continues.

The old church was deſtroyed by the fire in 1666, and when rebuilt was enlarged with the ſite of the parſonage houſe; in conſideration of which the parliament ſettled the value of the living at 160l. in lieu of tythes; 30l. of which is in lieu of the parſonage houſe.

The preſent edifice is tolerably well enlightened; the ſteeple conſiſts of a plain tower and pretty lofty ſpire, raiſed upon a ſubſtantial arcade.

Here are four gift ſermons in the year, and daily prayers at eleven in the morning and ſix in the evening. The veſtry, in chuſing pariſh-officers is general, but in making rates it is ſelect; the officers are, two churchwardens and four ſideſmen.

Adjoining to the ſouth-weſt corner of this church formerly ſtood Ludgate; the origin and deſcription of which the reader will find in page 15.

Directly oppoſite the church of St. Martin is a gateway that leads into the precinct of Black-friars, ſo named from the religious foundation of Friars-preachers, or Black-friars; in whoſe convent was held that which was called the Black Parliament. And in this houſe king Edward I. had his charters and records kept: at which time this precinct was crowded with the habitations of noblemen and gentlemen. In ancient times, during the exiſtence of the priory of Black-friars, this was maintained as a liberty without the juriſdiction of the city of London. But, as ſoon as the priory was diſſolved, and the records of that religious place loſt or embezzled, the mayor pretended a title to their liberties: but king Henry VIII. being informed thereof, ſent to him to deſiſt from meddling with the liberties, ſaying, "He "was as well able to keep the liberties as he "friars were." Wherefore the mayor no further meddled, and Sir John Portynaire had the keys of the gates delivered to him, and a fee for keeping the ſame.

At this time there were four gates and a wall to encloſe this liberty, and a porter to keep the ſaid gates; within which artificers and tradeſmen, though not free of the city, might exerciſe their arts and buſineſs without controul.

In queen Mary's reign the city applied to parliament to grant them juriſdiction over Black-friars precinct, but in vain. Nevertheleſs the ample privileges which the inhabitants of Black-friars did enjoy, have been for many years loſt; ſo that now the ſheriffs officers can arreſt there; the ſhopkeepers are obliged to be free of the city; and two common-council-men are annually elected out of it, and added to the number that uſed to ſerve for this ward of Farringdon within.

Proceeding farther to the ſouth, we come to a narrow ſtreet called Water-lane; on the weſt ſide of which are ſeveral paſſages that lead to Fleet-ditch. In this diviſion is ſituate that laudable foundation called

SCOTS HALL.

This corporation was inſtituted for the relief of the poor and neceſſitous people of Scotland, that reſide within the cities of London and Weſtminſter. It owes its origin to James Kinnier, a Scotſman, and merchant of this city: who, on his recovery from a long and dangerous illneſs, reſolved to give part of his eſtate towards the relief of his indigent countrymen; for which purpoſe having prevailed with a ſociety of Scotſmen, who compoſed a box club, to join their ſtock, he obtained a charter, by which he and his co-adjutors were, in the year 1665, conſtituted a body politic and corporate, with ſeveral privileges, which king Charles II. confirmed the following year by letters patent, wherein are recited the privileges granted in the former charter, with the addition of ſeveral new ones, viz. That they might erect an hoſpital within the city or liberties of London and Weſtminſter to be called, "the Scots hoſpital of king Charles II." to be governed by eight Scotſmen, who were to chuſe from among themſelves a maſter, who, together with theſe governors were declared to be a body politic and corporate, and to have a common ſeal. They were alſo empowered to elect thirty-three aſſiſtants, and to purchaſe in mortmain 400l. per annum over and above an annual ſum mentioned in the firſt charter; the profits ariſing from theſe purchaſes to be employed in relieving poor old Scotſmen and women, and inſtructing and employing poor orphans, the deſcendants of Scotſmen within this city.

This humane foundation had like to have been cruſhed in its bud by two very dreadful events, the plague and the fire of Lodon, which happened in the very years when the charters were granted. However, thoſe who had the direction of the work began in the year 1670 to proſecute it with vigour; and found themſelves not only in a condition to provide for their poor, but took a leaſe of a piece of ground in Black-friars, to build upon, for the term of a thouſand years, at a ground rent of 40l. and by charitable contributions were enabled to erect their hall, with two houſes at Fleet-ditch, and four in Black-friars, which were ſoon after finiſhed at the expence of 4450l.

All matters belonging to this corporation are managed by the governors without fee or reward; for they not only, upon all ſuch occaſions, ſpend their own money, but contribute quarterly for the ſupport of the ſociety, and the relief of the poor; they provide for the ſick; they grant penſions to the reduced and aged; they bury the dead, and give money to ſuch as are diſpoſed to return to Scotland. The ſums diſburſed by the ſociety amount to about 600l. per annum.

The officers belonging to this corporation are, a treaſurer, a regiſter, two ſtewards and a beadle.

Black-friars ſchool was founded by Peter Joy, eſq; citizen of London, in the year 1716, who endowed the ſame with a perpetual fund of 160l. 17s. 3d. per annum, for the educating and cloathing of poor children; out of which the maſter receives a ſalary of forty, and the miſtreſs of 30l. yearly, for inſtructing forty boys and thirty girls in reading, writing and accounts. This ſchool Mr. Joy left in truſt with the governors of Sion college.

On the eaſt ſide of Water-lane ſtands

APOTHECARIES HALL.

This is a beautiful edifice, and has a pair of gates leading into an open court, handſomely paved with broad ſtones; at the upper end of which you aſcend by a grand flight of ſtairs into the hall room, built with brick and ſtone, and adorned with columns of the Tuſcan order. The ceiling of the court room and of the hall are elegantly ornamented with fretwork; and the wall is wainſcotted fourteen feet high, and adorned with the buſt of doctor Gideon Delaun, apothecary to king James I. and with ſeveral pieces of good painting; amongſt which is the portraiture of king James I. and of the gentleman who procured their charter, and had been obliged to leave France for religion, after he had ſuffered ſeveral trials and perſecutions.

In this building are two large laboratories; one chemical and the other for galenical preparations; where great quantities of the beſt medicines are prepared, after the drugs have been expoſed a conſiderable time for the inſpection of ſuch of the faculty of phyſic as chuſe to view them, for the uſe of apothecaries and others; and particularly for the ſurgeons of the royal navy, who here furniſh their cheſts, with all uſeful and neceſſary medicines.

This company was incorporated at firſt with the grocers in the year 1606; but ſuch a connexion not anſwering the purpoſes of their incorporation, they were ſeparated by another charter granted by king James I. in the year 1617, and incorporated by the name of "The maſter, wardens, and ſociety of the art and myſtery of apothecaries of the city of London:" at which time there were no more than one hundred and four apothecaries ſhops within the city and ſuburbs of London.

The members of this company, who by divers acts of parliament are exempt from ward and pariſh offices, are governed by a maſter, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants. It is a livery company, and the fifty eighth on the city liſt.

Farther to the ſouth is printing-houſe-lane, which leads up to, and takes its its name from, the King's printing-houſe; ſituate in a court at the eaſt end thereof; where, by patent from the crown are to be printed the bible and common-prayer books, acts of parliament, proclamations, king's ſpeeches, &c. It is a handſome brick building, and very commodiouſly adapted for the execution of buſineſs.

Before we leave Black-friars, and this ward, we muſt mention a memorable circumſtance that happened after the fire of London. Some workmen digging in a place there, where the convent was, to clear it from the rubbiſh, by the appointment of Mr. William Bradford, in order to building, they came to an old wall in a cellar, of great thickneſs, where appeared a kind of cupboard; which being opened, there was found in it four pots or caſes of fine pewter, very thick, with covers of the ſame, and rings faſtened on the top, to take up, or put down at pleaſure. The caſes were flat before and round behind. And in them were repoſited four human heads, unconſumed, reſerved, as it appeared by art; with their teeth and hair, the fleſh of a tawny colour, wrapped up in black ſilk, almoſt conſumed. And a certain ſubſtance, of a blackiſh colour, crumbled into duſt, lying at the bottom of the pots.

Who theſe were, there is no record as we hear of; but they appear to have been ſome zealous prieſts or friars, executed for treaſon; whereof there were many in the rebellion in Lincolnſhire in the year 1538, or for denying the king's ſupremacy; and here privately depoſited by theſe Black-friars.

CHAP.

CHAPTER XVII.

Of FARRINGDON WARD Without.

THE ward of Farringdon without is the fartheſt in the weſt of this city, and was originally a part of the ward of Farringdon within, till divided by act of parlialiament, 17 Richard II. from which time this part has been diſtinguiſhed by the addition of without, i. e. without the city walls.

It is bounded on the eaſt by the ward of Farringdon within, the precinct of the late priory of St. Bartholomew near Smithfield, and the ward of Alderſgate; on the north by the Charterhouſe, the pariſh of St. John's Clerkenwell, and part of St. Andrew's pariſh without the freedom; on the weſt by High-holbourn, and St. Clement's pariſh in the Strand; and on the ſouth by the river Thames.

The extent of this ward may be gathered from the bounds without Newgate, and the ſpot where Ludgate ſtood: for on the eaſt part thereof is the whole precinct of the late priory of St. Bartholomew, and a part of Long-lane, on the north, towards Alderſgate-ſtreet; and all Smithfield, to the bars in St. John's-ſtreet. Then out of Smithfield, Chicken-lane, towards Turnmill-ſtreet. Back again by the pens in Smithfield to Cow-lane, which turns towards Holbourn; and Hoſier-lane out of Smithfield; alſo toward Holbourn, till it meets with a part of Cow-lane. Cock-lane, out of Smithfield, over againſt Pie-corner. Giltſpur-ſtreet, out of Smithfield to Newgate. Then from Newgate, weſt by St. Sepulchre's-church, to Turnagain-lane on Snow-hill. From the place where the conduit ſtood on Snow-hill to Holbourn-bridge up Holbourn-hill, to the bars on both ſides.

At the bottom of Holbourn-hill, on the north ſide is Gold-lane, commonly called Field-lane, remarkable for ſhops that ſell offal of beaſts and baked ſheeps heads. Farther from this is Hatton-garden-ſtreet, Leather-lane, and Brook-ſtreet.

From Newgate, on the ſouth ſide, lieth the Old Bailey, which ſtretches down by the wall of the city to Ludgate-hill. On the weſt ſide of which ſtreet breaks out another lane, called St. George's-lane, till you come unto the ſouth end of Seacoal-lane; and then turning towards Fleet-market, it is called Fleet lane.

Out of the high-ſtreet from Newgate, turning down ſouth, is the Little Old Bailey, which runs down to the eaſt of St. George's-lane. Then is Seacoal-lane, which turns down into Fleet-lane. Near unto this Seacoal-lane, in the turning towards the conduit on Snow hill is another lane, called in record Windagain-lane, for that it turned down to Turnmill-brook, and from thence back again; it being impaſſable. Beyond Holbourn-bridge is Shoe-lane, which runs out of Holbourn unto the place where the conduit ſtood in Fleet-ſtreet.

Next to Shoe-lane in Holbourn, on the ſame ſide is Bartlet's buildings, a kind of ſquare, well built and inhabited; and Paul's-head-alley, which leads into Fetter-lane; this lane ſtretcheth ſouth into Fleet-ſtreet, near the eaſt end of St. Dunſtan's church. Beyond which weſtward is Chancery-lane; and further on near the bar, is Shire-lane, ſo called becauſe this lane divides the city liberties on this ſide from the ſhire or county. From whence to the bars are the bounds without Newgate, including the north ſide of Fleet-ſtreet.

This ward runs up from the ſite of Ludgate to Temple-bar, and hath on the north ſide the ſouth end of the Old Bailey. Then it proceeds down Ludgate-hill to Fleet ſtreet, and from thence to Temple-bar, leaving the market on the north. From Ludgate again, on the ſouth, we have Bride-lane, which runs ſouth by Bridewell; Dorſet-ſtreet; Saliſbury-court; and Water-lane, which runs down to the Thames; then White-friars and the Temple. So that Temple-bar is the extent of this ward.

It is governed by an alderman, ſixteen common-council-men (two of whom are the alderman's deputies) twenty three conſtables, forty-eight inqueſt-men, twenty-four ſcavengers, and four beadles.

We ſhall begin the ſurvey of this ward nearly adjoining to that part where we finiſhed the preceding, viz. Ludgate-hill. This is a handſome, ſpacious ſtreet, well built, and principally inhabited by ſilk-mercers of great eminence; between which and Fleet-ſtreet, on the north ſide, is ſituate

FLEET MARKET.

This market is erected on the very place where once ran the united ſtreams of the river of Wells, the Oldbourne, and the river Fleet, and fell into the Thames. It is now arched over, upon which are built two rows of ſhops, with a handſome walk paved with rag ſtones between, almoſt the whole length; into which cover there is light conveyed by windows from the roof. In the center is a neat turret with a clock. At the ſouth end the fruiterers have ſtands on each ſide, under a kind of piazzas, where are convenient places for depoſiting their ſtock. And at the north end is a large area for all ſorts of vegetables.

On the eaſt ſide of this market, and a little to the ſouth of Fleet-lane, is ſituate the FLEET PRISON.

This was a priſon in the reign of Richard I. It is a general court for debtors, and ſuch as are in contempt of the courts of Chancery and Common-mon-Pleas. And any priſoner for debt may be removed by Habeas Corpus from any priſon in England to the Fleet; and enjoy the rules, or liberty to walk abroad, and to keep a houſe within the liberties of this priſon, provided he can give ſecurity to the warden for his forth coming.

The rules or liberties of the Fleet are, all the north ſide of Ludgate-hill, and the Old Bailey up to Fleet-lane; down that lane into the market, and then turning the corner on the left, all the eaſt ſide along by the Fleet priſon to the bottom of Ludgate-hill,

The priſon itſelf is a large brick building of conſiderable length, with galleries in each ſtory, which reach from one end of the houſe to the other; and on the ſides of theſe galleries are rooms for the priſoners. All manner of proviſions are brought into this priſon every day, and cried as in the pubic ſtreets. It has the benefit of an open yard, which is encloſed with a high wall.

It is properly the priſon belonging to the court of Common-Pleas. The keeper is called Warden of the Fleet, and is a place of very great profit as well as truſt; being allowed conſiderable fees from the priſoners for turning the key, for chamber rent, &c. and endowed with the rents of the ſhops in Weſtminſter-hall.

Directly oppoſite the ſouth end of the Fleet-market, is a large ſpacious opening that leads to the new bridge now building at Black-friars; which bridge is in ſuch forwardneſs as to be opened for carrriages the nineteenth of November 1769.

On the weſt ſide of this opening lies Bridewell precinct, in which ſtands the hoſpital called

BRIDEWELL.

This building is ſituated on the ſpot where once ſtood a royal palace, even before the conqueſt: and which continued, with ſome little intermiſſion, in that royal ſtate till the reign of king Edward VI. It was rebuilt by king Henry VIII. in the year 1522, for the reception of the emperor Charles V. who gave it the name of Bridewell; on account of a remarkable well thereunto adjoining, and its vicinity to St. Bride's church.

In the year 1553 king Edward VI. gave this royal palace to the mayor, commonalty and citizens of London, to be a working-houſe for the poor and idle perſons of the city, and to be a houſe of correction, with ſeven hundred marks land, formerly of the poſſeſſions of the houſe of Savoy, and all the beddings and other furniture of the ſaid houſe, towards the maintenance of Bridewell, and the hoſpital of St. Thomas in Southwark. But king Edward dying ſoon after this grant was made, prevented the city's entering upon the premiſes and taking poſſeſſion, till it was confirmed two years after by queen Mary. After which Gerard the mayor entered and took took poſſeſſion thereof: and in order to forward ſo good a work, the following act of common-council was made the laſt day of February, in the ſecond and third years of Philip and Mary:

"Foraſmuch as king Edward VI. has given "his houſe of Bridewell unto the city, partly for "the ſetting of idle and lewd people to work, "and partly for the lodging and harbouring of "the poor, ſick, weak, and ſore people of this "city, and of poor way-faring people, repair-"ing to the ſame; and has for this laſt purpoſe "given the bedding and furniture of the Savoy: "therefore in conſideration that very great "charges will be required to the fitting of the "ſaid houſe, and the buying of tools and bed-"ding, they ordered the money to be gotton up "amongſt the rich people of the companies of "London, &c."

In the following reigns, granaries and ſtore-houſes for coals were erected at the expence of the city within this hoſpital, and the poor were employed in grinding corn with hand mills; which were greatly improved in the reign of queen Elizabeth, when a citizen invented a mill, by which two men might grind as much corn in a day, as could be ground by ten men with the other mills, and being to be worked either by the hands or feet, if the poor were lame in the arms, they earned their living with their feet, and if they were lame in their legs, they earned their living with their arms.

The old building was entirely deſtroyed by the dreadful fire in 1666, together with all the dwelling-houſes in the precinct of Bridewell, from whence had ariſen two thirds of its revenue; the hoſpital, however, was rebuilt in 1668, in the manner it at preſent appears.

It conſiſts of two courts; in which the buildings are convenient and not very irregular, deſigned not only for priſons and places of hard labour and puniſhment, but for indigent citizens; for arts-maſters in ſeveral branches of trade, as flax-dreſſers, taylors, weavers of all ſorts, ſhoemakers, pin-makers, &c. who together retain one hundred apprentices, cloathed in blue doublets, and breeches, and white hats, who are entitled to the freedom of the city, and to 10l. each after they have ſerved ſeven years.

This hoſpital is likewiſe uſed as a houſe of correction for all ſtrumpets, night-walkers, pick-pockets, vagrants, and incorrigible and diſobedient ſervants, who are committed by the Lord-mayor and aldermen; as are alſo apprentices by the chamberlain of the city, who are obliged to beat hemp, and, if the nature of their offence requires it, to undergo the correction of whipping.

Here is likewiſe a chapel, with a ſquare roof, and two galleries at the north and weſt ſides, ſupported by columns of the Tuſcan order: at the weſt end are places for the hoſpital boys; and others for the priſoners. The walls are brick; and the wainſcot and finiſhing very neat. The altar piece conſiſts of two pilaſters, with their entablature and circular pediment of the Corinthian order; between which are the commandments done in gold on black, and the Lord's prayer and creed in gold on blue in gilt frames, and farther inriched with gilt cherubims, leaves, fruits, &c. carved in relievo. The whole chancel is neatly paved with black and white marble.

To

To this chapel and precinct belong a preacher, chosen by the governors; a reader, chosen also by the governors, two chapel-wardens, one in the house, the other in the precinct; and one constable living within the house, who is generally the porter.

The court-room is adorned with columns of the Composite order, a gallery, &c. but the most valuable embellishments are the several handsome tables, wherein the names of the benefactors are depenciled in gold letters. In this room is a chair for the president, and convenient seats for the governors.

All the affairs of this hospital are managed by governors, who are above three hundred besides the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen, all of whom are likewise governors of Bethlehem-hospital; for these hospitals being one corporation, they have the same president, governors, clerk, physician, surgeon, and apothecary. This hospital, has, however, its own steward, a porter, a matron, and four beadles, one of whom has the task of correcting the criminals.

Opposite the east gate of this hospital lately stood a handsome stone bridge over Fleet-ditch, which communicated with Black-friars; but the bridge has been taken down, and the ditch arched over and made level with the street on each side, to improve the avenue to the new bridge that is building at Black-friars.

Proceeding up Fleet-street, on the south side, we come to Salisbury-court, (alias Dorset-court) so called from the house and gardens which were once the residence of the earls of Dorset. This Dorset or Salisbury-court claimed a peculiar liberty to itself, and to be exempt from the city government; and the inhabitants would not admit of the city officers to make any arrest. And at this time any person may open shop in this liberty, though he be not a freeman of the city of London.

On the east side of this court is a paved free-stone passage, which leads to the parish church of St. BRIDGET, alias St. BRIDE.

Though the origin of this church is unknown, yet it appears not to be of a late date, by its having had three rectors before the year 1362. It was originally a very small church, till about the year 1480, when it was greatly enlarged by William Venor, warden of the Fleet prison, who caused a spacious fabric to be erected at the west end thereof consisting of a middle and two side isles; to which the old church served as a choir. There was a vicarage also here, ordained and endowed about the year 1529; and king Henry VIII. after the dissolution of the convent of Westminster, having given this rectory and parish church of St. Bride to the collegiate church of Westminster, founded by him, this church has continued a vicarage ever since. In 1610 the earl of Dorset gave a parcel of ground, on the west side of Fleet-ditch, for a new church-yard, which was consecrated the second of August that same year, by doctor George Abbot, bishop of London.

The old church being destroyed by the fire of London, the present edifice arose in its stead. It was designed by Sir Christopher Wren, and by him compleated within fourteen years, in such a masterly and elegant manner, as to exceed most of our parish churches in delicacy and beauty. It is one hundred and eleven feet long, eighty-seven broad, and the steeple two hundred and thirty-four feet high. It has a plain and regular body, the openings all answering one another: the roof is raised on pillars: and the altar-piece is very magnificent. The circular pediment over the lower part is supported by six Corinthian columns. The steeple is a spire of extreme delicate workmanship, raised upon a solid, yet light tower; and the several stages by which the spire gradually decreases are well designed, and executed with all the advantage of the orders.

The vicar, according to act of parliament, receives 120l. which is paid quarterly by the church-wardens. The tythe roll is about 270l. per annum, which the parish hold by lease from the dean and chapter of Westminster.

The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two church-wardens, four overseers, four sidesmen, and three collectors.

Within the steeple of this church there hang one of the most melodious ring of bells in and about London.

Nearly opposite Salisbury-court is Shoe-lane, which is remarkable for the habitation of artists in several branches of Watches, clocks, toys, gilding, chasing, &c. and many eminent printers have their offices in the adjacent courts, &c.

More to the west is Water-lane, which divides White-friars from Salisbury-court. Though this lane is tolerably well built, yet it is very indifferently inhabited, by reason of its being greatly annoyed by the carts which are continually going to and from the lay-stall and wharfs at the bottom of it.

After the dissolution of the priory of White-friars, * the church and buildings, in process of time, became ruinous and were pulled down; afterwards converted into buildings, and now contain several courts, lanes and alleys; as Dog-well-court, Essex-court, Ashen-tree-court; Davis's-yard, which is converted into a glass-house for making flint glasses; Waterman's-lane, as leading to the river Thames, where there is a pair of stairs to take water at; all places of indifferent account.

In the year 1608, the inhabitants of White-friars obtained several liberties, privileges and exemptions by a charter granted them by king James I. which rendered the place an asylum for insolvent debtors, cheats and gamesters, who gave to this diſtrict the name of Alſatia; but the inconveniences the city ſuffered from this place of refuge, and the riotous proceedings carried on there, at length induced the legiſlature to interpoſe; and to deprive them of privileges ſo pernicious to the community.

* This place took its name from the White Friars, or Carmelites, who had their house next to Fleet-street, and their garden probably extended from thence to the water-side. They were cloathed in white, and having made a vow of poverty, lived by begging. Their convent was founded by Sir Richard Gray, knt, ancestor to the lord Gray of Codner in Derbyshire, in the year 1241, and was afterwards rebuilt by Hugh Courtney, earl of Devonshire, about the year 1350. In the conventual church were interred many persons of distinction.

The inhabitants of White Friars, or Carmelites, maintain their own poor, collect their taxes, have no church-wardens, but two collectors, and chuſe their own officers.

More to the weſt, on the ſame ſide of Fleet-ſtreet, and nearly oppoſite the ſouth end of Chancery-lane, is a handſome arched gateway which leads into

The TEMPLE.

This place is thus denominated from the edifice being founded by the Knights Templars in England, who had firſt a houſe in Holbourn, and afterwards ſettled here in the reign of Henry II. when it was dedicated to God and the Bleſſed Virgin in the year 1185, by Honorious patriarch of the church of the holy reſurrection in Jeruſalem.

The origin of theſe Knights Templars was as follows: ſeveral of the cruſaders having ſettled at Jeruſalem about the year 1118, formed themſelves into an uniform militia, under the name of Templars, or knights of the Temple, a name they aſſumed from their being quartered near a church built on the ſpot where Solomon's temple had ſtood. Theſe firſt guarded the roads, in order to render them ſafe for the pilgrims who came to viſit the holy ſepulchre; and ſome time after they had a rule appointed them by pope Honorious II. who ordered them to wear a white habit; after which they were farther diſtiſtinguiſhed by having croſſes made of red cloth on their upper garments. In a ſhort time many noblemen in all parts of Chriſtendom, became brethren of this order, and built themſelves temples in many cities and great towns in Europe, and particularly in England, where this was the principal.

Theſe Templars were in ſo flouriſhing a ſituation in the thirteenth century, that they frequently entertained the nobility, the pope's nuncio, foreign ambaſſadors, and even the king himſelf; and many parliaments and great councils have been held in this place.

In the year 1308 all the Templars in England, as alſo in other parts of Chriſtendom, were apprehended and committed to divers priſons; and three years after king Edward II. gave Aimer de la Valence, earl of Pembroke, this houſe of the Templars, with all their poſſeſſions within the city of London. At his death it reverted to the crown; and in 1324 was given to the knight's hoſpitallers of the order of St. John of Jeruſalem, who had driven the Turks out of the iſle of Rhodes, and had their chief houſes where St. John's-ſquare is now ſituated. Theſe knights, ſoon after, let this edifice to the ſtudents of the common-law, in whoſe poſſeſſion it has continued to this day.

The Temple which contained all that ſpace of ground from the White-friars weſtward to Eſſex-houſe, is divided into two inns of court, viz. the Inner Temple, and the Middle Temple. Theſe inns have ſeparate halls, but both houſes reſort to the Temple church.

In the year 1684 was built the Middle Temple-gate, next Fleet ſtreet, which is a fine ſtructure, in the ſtile of Inigo Jones. It has a graceful front of brick-work, with four large ſtone pilaſters of the Ionic order, and a handſome pediment, with a round in the middle of it, having theſe words inſcribed in large capitals: SURREXIT IMPENSIS SOCIETAT. MED. TEMPLI, MDCLXXXIV. and beneath, juſt over the arch, is the figure of a holy lamb.

Over the colonade at the end of Pump-court, is the following inſcription in memory of a fire that happened there ſome years ago:

In the treaſury chamber of the Middle Temple is preſerved a great quantity of armour, which belonged to the Knights Templars, conſiſting of helmets, breaſt and back pieces, together with ſeveral pikes, a halberd, and two very beautiful ſhields, with iron ſpikes in their centers, of the length of ſix inches in diameter, and each of about twenty pounds weight. They are curiouſly engraved, and one of them richly inlaid with gold: the inſides are lined with leather ſtuffed, and the edges adorned with ſilk fringe; and broad leathern belts are fixed to them, for the better convenience of their being ſlung on the ſhoulders.

In garden court, in the Middle Temple, is a library founded by the will of Robert Aſhley, eſq; in the year 1641, who bequeathed his own library for that purpoſe, and three hundred pounds to be laid out in a purchaſe, for the maintenance of a librarian, who muſt be a ſtudent of the ſociety, and be elected into that office by the benchers.

This library is regularly kept open (except in the time of the long vacation) from ten in the morning till one in the afternoon, and from two in the afternoon till ſix in the ſummer, and four in winter.

The Inner Temple is ſituated to the eaſt of Middle Temple-gate, and has a cloiſter, a large garden, and more ſpacious walks than the other. This ſociety conſiſts of benchers, barriſters, and ſtudents; the former of whom, as governors at commons have their table at the upper end of the hall, and the barriſters and ſtudents in the middle.

All the members of this ſociety who have chambers, are obliged to be in commons a fortnight every term, for which they pay about ten ſhillings per week. Sixteen of theſe terms, with a regular courſe of ſtudy, qualifies a ſtudent for the bar.

The fees of the houſe, on the admiſſion of a member, are three pounds, ſix ſhillings and eightpence, which, with other diſburſements, amount to four pounds and two-pence.

The

The parliament, wherein the affairs of the ſociety are treated is generally held twice every term.

The officers and ſervants of the houſe are, a treaſurer, a ſub-treaſurer, a ſteward, a chief and three under butlers, an upper and under cook, a pannier-man, a gardener, and two porters.

The Middle Temple, which joins to the Inner Temple on the weſt, is thus denominated from its having been the middle or central part of the ancient temple or priory of Knights Templars. The chief officer of this houſe, like the other, is a treaſurer, who is annually choſen from among the benchers, and whoſe office is to admit ſtudents; to aſſign them their chambers, and to receive and pay all the caſh belonging to the ſociety. The officers and governors of this inn, are in all reſpects like that of the Inner Temple, except the charge of admiſſion, which is five pounds; and the time to qualify a ſtudent for the bar is twenty-eight terms inſtead of ſixteen.

The moſt remarkable building in the Temple is the old church which belonged to the Knights Templars of Jeruſalem, and was originally founded in the year 1185. The old ſtructure was taken down in 1240, and another erected after the ſame model. The preſent edifice was one of thoſe that eſcaped the fire of London in 1666; but in 1695 the ſouth weſt part was new built, and in 1706 the whole was thoroughly repaired.

This beautiful gothic ſtructure is built of ſtone, firmly put together, and enriched with ornaments. It conſiſts of a long body with a turret, and a round tower at the weſt end, that has much the air of a piece of fortification. The length of the church from the altar to the ſcreen is eighty-three feet, its breadth ſixty feet, and the height of the roof thirty-four. The round tower is forty-eight feet high; its diameter at the floor fifty-one feet, and its circumference one hundred and ſixty feet.

The windows which enlighten the body of the church are large and well proportioned. They are compoſed of three Gothic arches, a principal, and a lower on either ſide. Theſe window ſtand ſo cloſe that there are but very ſlender piers left between them to ſupport a heavy roof; they are therefore ſtrengthened with buttreſſes; but theſe buttreſſes, as in moſt other Gothic ſtructures, exclude more light than the piers would have done, had they been larger, and the windows conſiderably leſs. The tower, which is very maſſy, has few windows, and thoſe ſmall, yet there are buttreſſes carried up between them; the top is crowned with plain ſquare battlements, and from the center riſes a ſpire.

The turret upon the body of the church is ſmall and plain, and ſerves to receive a bell. In ſhort, what can be ſeen of the outſide has a venerable aſpect, but the principal beauties are within.

On entering the round tower, you find it ſupported with ſix pillars, wainſcotted with oak ſix feet high, and adorned all round, except the eaſt part, which opens into the church, with an upper and lower range of ſmall arches, and black apertures; but what is moſt remarkable in this part is, the tombs of eleven of the Knights Templars who lie interred here; eight of which are covered with the figures of armed knights, five lying croſs legged, as men vowed to the Holy Land againſt the infidels and unbelieving Jews; the other three ſtrait-legged; the reſt are coped ſtones, all of grey marble. The firſt of the croſs-legged was William Marſhall the elder, earl of Pembroke, who died in the year 1219. William Marſhall, his ſon, earl of Pembroke, was the ſecond; he died in 1231. And Gilbert Marſhall, his brother, earl of Pembroke, ſlain in a tournament at Hertford, near Ware, twenty miles from London, who died in the year 1241.

This tower is divided from the body of the church by a very handſome ſcreen in the modern taſte; on paſſing which we find the church has three roofs ſupported by tall and ſlender pillars of Suſſex marble. The windows are all adorned with ſmall neat pillars of the ſame ſtone, and the floor paved with black and white marble. The iſles are five in number, three, as uſual, running eaſt and weſt, and two croſs iſles. The walls are neatly wainſcotted with oak above eight feet high, and the altar-piece which is of the ſame wood, is much higher, finely carved, and adorned with four pilaſters and two columns of the Corinthian order: it is alſo ornamented with cherubims, a ſhield, feſtoons, fruit and leaves. The pulpit, which is placed near the eaſt end of the middle iſle is finely carved and veneered; the ſounding board is pendant from the roof, and enriched with ſeveral carved arches, a crown, feſtoons, cherubims and vaſes.

The ſcreen at the weſt end of the iſles is like the altar piece, of wainſcot, and adorned with ten pilaſters of the Corinthian order, with three portals and pediments. The organ gallery is ſupported by two fluted Corinthian columns, and ornamented with an entablature and a compaſs pediment, with the king's arms well carved. Near the pediment, on the ſouth ſide is an enrichment of cherubims and a carved figure of a Pegaſus, the badge of the ſociety of the Inner Temple; and in the pediment on the north ſide an enrichment of cherubims, and the figure of a Holy Lamb, the badge of the ſociety of the Middle Temple: for though theſe two houſes have one church, they ſeldom ſit promiſcuouſly there; but the gentlemen of the Inner Temple on the ſouth, and thoſe of the Middle Temple northward from the iſle. In the church are the tombs of many judges, maſters in chancery and eminent lawyers.

Since the reign of Henry VIII. there has been a divine belonging to this church named a maſter or cuſtos, who is conſtituted by his majeſty's letters patent, without inſtitution or induction. Beſides the maſter there is a reader, who reads divine ſervice every day, at eight o'clock in the morning, and at four in the afternoon. Formerly they had a fixed lecturer for Sundays in the afternoon, who had eighty pounds a year from each houſe, convenient lodging, and his diet at the benchers table; but of late the lecture is carried on by various preaches appointed and paid by the treaſurers of the two houſes.

TEMPLE BAR.

This is a very handſome gate, where anciently were poſts, rails, and a chain, as in other places where the city liberties terminated. Afterwards a houſe of timber was erected acroſs the ſtreet, with a narrow gateway, and an entry through the ſouth ſide of it. But ſince the fire of London the preſent ſtructure was erected, and is the only gate at the extremity of the city liberties.

This gate is a very noble one, and has two poſterns, one on each ſide, for the advantage of foot paſſengers. It is built entirely of Portland ſtone, of ruſtic work below, and of the Corintian order. Over the gateway, on the eaſt ſide, in two niches, are ſtone ſtatues of queen Elizabeth and king James I. with the king's arms over the key-ſtone, and on the weſt ſide are the ſtatues of king Charles I. and king Charles II. in Roman habits.

This is the gate, which of late years the ſtate has appointed to be the place to fix, on its ſummit, the heads of ſuch as have been executed for high treaſon.

Returning from Temple-bar, on the north ſide of Fleet-ſtreet, is Chancery-lane; on the eaſt ſide of which are Serjeant's-inn, Simond's inn, the Rolls chapel, and the Curſitor's-office. And on the weſt ſide are, Lincoln's-inn, the Six Clerks office, the examiner's-office, the Maſters in Chancery's-office, &c. But they are all out of the city liberty, except Serjeant's-inn; where judges and ſerjeants have their ſeveral chambers, not dwelling-houſes, as in the other that goes by the ſame name in Fleet-ſtreet.

Farther to the eaſt from Chancery-lane, and on the ſame ſide, ſtands.

CLIFFORD's-INN.

This is one of the inns of chancery, and has three courts and a garden adorned with rows of lime-trees ſet round graſs-plots, and with gravel walks which are kept in good order. It was formerly lord Clifford's manſion; but now the habitation of gentlemen in the law, chiefly attornies and officers belonging to the Marſhal's-court.

Adjoining to this inn is ſituate the pariſh church of ST. DUNSTAN, in the Weſt.

This church is ſo called from its dedication to Dunſtan aforeſaid, and the epithet of Weſt, to diſtinguiſh it from another church of the ſame name, ſituated in the eaſt. It is a very ancient foundation, in the gift of the abbot and convent of Weſtminſter, who, in the year 1237, gave it to king Henry III. towards the maintenance of the foundation of the houſe called the Rolls, for the reception of converted Jews. It was afterwards converted to the abbot and convent of Alnwick, in Northumberland, in which patronage it continued till that religious houſe was ſuppreſſed by king Henry VIII. And Edward VI. granted the advowſon of this church, under the name of a vicarage, to lord Dudley. Soon after which the rectory and vicarage were granted to Sir Richard Sackvill, whoſe deſcendants alienated the impropriation to George Rivers, 22 Jac. I. but they kept the vicarage in their preſentation till the year 1631. The impropriation and vicarage are both at this time in the heirs of Mr. Taylor, late clerk of Bridewell. The impropriation is valued at 300l. per annum; and the vicar receives 240l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

This church eſcaped the fire of London in 1666, but has been repaired ſeveral times at a very great expence. It conſiſts of a large body, and a ſmall tower, every way diſproportionate. And what renders this edifice ſtill more diſagreeable is, its being covered with a number of ſmall ſhops or ſheds, that not only add to its deformity, but makes it project into the ſtreet, ſo as to be an incumbrance in the public way. The clock projects to the ſouth near the weſt end, and for the amuſement of the gaping vulgar, two human figures are placed in a kind of Ionic loggia, and by means of clock-work, ſtrike two bells hung over them, and declare the hour and quarters.

Here are ſeveral gift ſermons, viz. on the thirtieth of January, twenty-ninth of May, Good-friday, &c. And a lecture every Sunday and Thurſday in the afternoon, from the beginning of Michaelmas term to the end of trinity term, founded by Dr. White.

Here are two charity ſchools, one for fifty boys, four of whom are taught navigation: the other for forty girls, who are educated, cloathed, and put out to ſervice.

The veſtry is ſelect; and the pariſh-officers are two churchwardens, two overſeers, and two collectors.

A little farther to the eaſt from this church, and near Fetter-lane, is Crane-court, at the upper end of which ſtands the ſeat of

THE ROYAL SOCIETY.

This ſociety, which took its riſe from a private body of learned and ingenious men, was founded for the improvement of natural knowledge. It was begun in the chambers of biſhop Wilkins, then no more than a member of Wadham College, Oxon, about the year 1650; and in 1658 they hired an apartment in Greſham-college, and formed themſelves into a body, under lord Brounker, their firſt preſident. Their reputation was ſo well eſtabliſhed at the time of the reſtoration, that king Charles II. incorporated them by a charter, in which his majeſty was pleaſed to ſtile himſelf their founder, patron, and companion, which gave them the name of the Royal Society. By which charter the corporation was to conſiſt of a preſident, a council of twenty-four, and as many fellows as ſhould be found worthy of admiſſion; with a treaſurer, ſecretary, curators, &c.

No ſooner was this Royal Society thus incorporated by king Charles II. than that prince made them a preſent of a fine ſilver mace gilt, to be carried before the preſident; and, as a farther mark of favour, their royal patron, by his letters patent of the eighth of April, 1667, gave them Chelſea-college with its appurtenances, and twenty-ſix acres of land ſurrounding the ſame. But afterwards wards the ſociety neglecting to convert a part of it into a phyſic garden, as was intended, and the king being reſolved to erect an hoſpital for old and maimed ſoldiers, thought no place more proper for ſuch a deſign than this college; he therefore purchaſed it again of them for a conſiderable ſum.

A little before the ſociety received theſe letters patent from his majeſty, the honourable Henry Howard, afterwards duke of Norfolk, made them a preſent of a very valuable library, which conſiſts of 3287 printed books in moſt languages and faculties; chiefly the firſt editions ſoon after the invention of printing; and a valuable collection of manuſcripts in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and Turkiſh, amounting to 554 volumes, which, together with the former, are thought to be of ſuch value, as not to be paralleled.

Excluſive of this library, which takes up a large room, another curious and valuable collection was left the ſociety in the year 1715, by their ſecretary Francis Aſton, eſq; which, together with the numerous benefactions of the works of the learned members, in all faculties, but more eſpecially in natural and experimental philoſophy, amount to above 3600, and are placed in glaſs caſes in another room.

The muſeum belonging to the ſociety was founded by Daniel Colwall, eſq; in the year 1677, who gave his great and curious collection of natural and artificial rarities, which compoſe the greateſt part of the catalogue, publiſhed anno, 1681, by doctor Grew, under the title of Muſeum Regalis Societatis. But theſe curioſities, by the generous benefaction of other curious perſons, are now increaſed to above ſix times the number of thoſe mentioned in the catalogue.

Upon the ſociety's removal from Greſham-college to their houſe in Crane-court, in Fleet-ſtreet, Richard Waller, eſq; one of the ſecretaries of the incorporation, at his own expence, in the year 1711, erected the repoſitory in the garden for the reception of the ſaid rarities, which are beautifully diſpoſed therein for the entertainment of the curious. It abounds with a great variety of the following ſpecies of rarities, viz. human, quadrupedes, birds, fowls, palmipedes, eggs, neſts, fiſhes, viviparous, oviparous, exanguious, ſcaled and ſhelled, double and multiple, inſects, reptiles, woods, ſtalks and roots, fruits of all ſorts, moſſes, muſhrooms, plants, ſpunges, &c. animal and vegetable bodies petrified, corals and other marine productions, foſſils, gems, ſtones irregular, metals, antimony, mercury and other metallic bodies, ſalts, ſulphurs, oils and earths, philoſophical and mathematical inſtruments, Indian, American, and other weapons, with a variety of apparel, &c.

This ſociety, by the above-mentioned royal and other benefactions, the admiſſion money, and annual contribution of its members, was in ſo flouriſhing a condition, that they applied to his majeſty king George the firſt, for an additional privilege to purchaſe, in mortmain, 1000l. inſtead of 200l. per annum, which he was pleaſed to grant by his letters patent, in 1725. Among the fellows of this ſociety was his late majeſty king George II. and many of the greateſt princes in Europe.

The officers choſen from among the members, are, the preſident, who calls and diſſolves the meetings, propoſes the ſubjects of conſultation, puts queſtions, calls for experiments, and admits the members that are from time to time received into the ſociety.

The treaſurer, who receives and diſburſes all the money.

The two ſecretaries who read all letters and informations; reply to all addreſſes or letters from foreign parts, or at home; regiſter all experiments and concluſions, and publiſh what is ordered by the ſociety.

The curators, who have the charge of making experiments, receive the directions of the ſociety, and at another meeting bring all to the teſt.

Every perſon to be elected a fellow of the Royal Society, muſt be propounded and recommended at a meeting of the ſociety, by three or more members; who muſt then deliver to one of the ſecretaries a paper ſigned by themſelves with their own name, ſpecifying the name, addition, profeſſion, occupation, and chief qualifications; the inventions, diſcoveries, works, writings, or other productions of the candidate for election: as alſo notifying the uſual place of his abode, and recommending him on their own perſonal knowledge. A fair copy of which paper, with the date of the day when delivered, ſhall be fixed up in the common meeting-room of the ſociety, at ten ſeveral ordinary meetings, before the ſaid candidate ſhall be put to the ballot: but it ſhall be free for every one of his majeſty's ſubjects, who is a peer, or the ſon of a peer, of Great Britain or Ireland, and for every one of his majeſty's privy-council of either of the ſaid kingdoms, and for every foreign prince or ambaſſador, to be propounded by any ſingle perſon, and to be put to the ballot for election on the ſame day, there being preſent a competent number for making elections. And at every ſuch ballot, unleſs two thirds at leaſt of the members preſent give their bills in favour of the candidate, he cannot be elected a fellow of the Royal Society; nor can any candidate be balloted for, unleſs at leaſt twenty-one members are preſent.

After a candidate has been elected, he may, at that, or the next meeting of the ſociety, be introduced and ſolemnly admitted by the preſident, after having previouſly ſubſcribed the obligation, whereby he promiſes, "that he will endeavour "to promote the good of the Royal Society of "London, for the improvement of natural "knowledge."

When any one is admitted, he pays a fee of five guineas, and afterwards 13s. a quarter, as long as he continues a member, towards defraying the expences of the ſociety; and for the payment thereof he gives a bond; but moſt of the members on their firſt admittance chuſe to pay down twenty guineas, which diſcharges them from any future payments.

Any fellow may however free himſelf from

theſe obligations, by only writing to the preſident, that he deſires to withdraw from the ſociety.

When the preſident takes the chair, the reſt of the fellows take their ſeats, and thoſe who are not of the ſociety withdraw: except any baron of England, Scotland, and Ireland, any perſon of a higher title, or any of his majeſty's privy council of any of his three kingdoms, and any foreigner of eminent repute, may ſtay, with the allowance of the preſident, for that time; and upon leave obtained of the preſident and fellows preſent, or the major part of them, any other perſon may be permitted to ſtay for that time: but the name of every perſon thus permitted to ſtay, that of the perſon who moved for him, and the allowance, are to be entered in the journal book.

The buſineſs of the ſociety in their ordinary meetings, is, to order, take account, conſider and diſcourſe of philoſophical experiments and obſervations: to read, hear, and diſcourſe upon letters, reports, and other papers containing philoſophical matters; as alſo to view and diſcourſe upon the rarities of nature and art, and to conſider what may be deduced from them, and how far they may be improved for uſe, or diſcovery.

No experiment can be made at the charge of the ſociety, but by order of the ſociety or council. And in order to the propounding and making experiments for the ſociety, the importance of ſuch experiment is to be conſidered with reſpect to the diſcovery of any truth, or to the uſe and benefit of mankind.

The philoſophical tranſactions are printed at the charge of the ſociety, and the clerk delivers gratis one of the copies to every fellow of the ſociety who ſhall demand it, either in perſon, or by letter under the hand of ſuch fellow, within one year after the clerk has begun to deliver ſuch copies.

The meetings of the Royal Society are on Thurſdays, at five o'clock in the afternoon. The members of the council are elected out of the fellows, upon the feaſt of St. Andrew in the morning, when, after the election, they all dine together.

Eleven of the old council are elected for the enſuing year, and ten are elected out of the other members. Then the preſident, treaſurer, and ſecretary are elected out of theſe. But the ſame perſons are uſually re-choſen into theſe offices.

In Chancery-lane is a place for keeping the records of chancery, called

The ROLLS, or Chapel for the cuſtody of Rolls or Records in Chancery.

This houſe was founded by king Henry III. in the place where ſtood a Jew's houſe forfeited to that prince in the year 1233. In this chapel all ſuch Jews and infidels as were converted to the chriſtian faith, were ordained, and in the buildings belonging to it were appointed a ſufficient maintenance; by which means a great number of converts were baptized, inſtructed in the doctrines of chriſtianity, and lived under a learned chriſtian appointed to govern them: but in the year 1290, all the Jews being baniſhed, the number of converts decreaſed, and in the year 1377, the houſe, with its chapel, was annexed by patent to the keeper of the Rolls of Chancery.

The chapel, which is of brick, pebbles and ſome free-ſtone, is ſixty feet long, and thirty-three feet in breadth; the doors and windows are Gothic, and the roof covered with ſlate. In this chapel the rolls are kept in preſſes fixed to the ſides, and ornamented with columns and pilaſters of the Ionic and Compoſite orders. Theſe rolls contain all the records, as charters, patents, &c. ſince the beginning of the reign of Richard III. thoſe before that time being depoſited in the Record Office in the Tower; and theſe being made up in rolls of parchment, gave occaſion to the name.

At the north-weſt angle of this chapel is a bench where the maſter of the rolls hears cauſes in chancery. And attendance is given in this chapel from ten o'clock till twelve, for taking in and paying out money, according to order of court, and for giving an opportunity to thoſe who come for that purpoſe to ſearch the rolls.

The miniſter of the chapel is appointed by the maſter of the Rolls, and divine ſervice is performed there on Sundays and holidays at about eleven and three.

On the walls are ſeveral old monuments, particularly at the eaſt end is that of Dr. Young, maſter of the Rolls, who died in the year 1516. In a well-wrought ſtone coffin lies the effigy of Dr. Young in a ſcarlet gown; his hands lie acroſs upon his breaſt, and a cap with corners covers his ears. On the wall juſt above him, Our Saviour is looking down upon him, his head and ſhoulders appearing out of the clouds, accompanied by two angels.

The office of the Rolls is under the government of the Maſter of the Rolls, whoſe houſe is by the chapel.

The place of Maſter of the Rolls is an office of great dignity, and is in the gift of the king, either for life or during pleaſure. He is always the principal maſter in chancery, and has in his gift the office of the Six Clerks in Chancery, of the two Examiners of the ſame court, and of the Clerk of the Chapel of the Rolls, who acts immediately under him in that office. He has ſeveral revenues belonging to the office of the Rolls, and by act of parliament receives a ſalary of 1200l. per annum out of the hanaper.

Nearly oppoſite Crane court is

SERJEANTS INN.

This inn conſiſts of a court ſurrounded with handſome new buildings, among which are the ſociety's chapel and hall; and a very handſome edifice belonging to the Amicable ſociety. The officers belonging to this Inn are, a ſteward, a maſter cook, and a chief butler.

On the eaſt ſide of Fetter-lane is Nevil's-alley, in which is ſituate the epiſcopal church of the Moravians, properly called the Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren; an ancient German epiſcopal church, who claim their ſucceſſion from John Hus and Jerome of Prague. They came into England about the year 1737, and have been inſtrumental inſtrumental in propagating the goſpel in our plantations on the continent of North America, where their ſettlements are reported to be an example to all others for their induſtry, ſobriety, and chriſtian conduct both in faith and practice.

The north end of Fetter-lane leads into Holbourn, where, turning to the weſt, are the bars that in this quarter divide the city liberty from the county; and cloſe within theſe bars, on the ſouth ſide of Holbourn, is

STAPLES INN.

This is one of the inns of Chancery, and conſiſts of two large courts, ſurrounded with very good buildings.

More to the eaſt, on the north ſide of Holbourn, ſtands

FURNIVAL's INN.

This ſo called from its founder Sir William Furnival, knt. and is likewiſe one of the inns of Chancery. It is a handſome old building, which you enter by a large gate; and behind there is a pleaſant garden.

Proceeding ſtill eaſtward, on the ſouth ſide of Holbourn, we come to

BERNARD's INN.

This is that inn of Chancery formerly called Markworth's-inn. The ſociety is governed by a principal and twelve ancients, who, with the other members, are obliged to be in commons a fortnight in two terms, and ten days in each of the other, on penalty of forfeiting five ſhillings per week.

Bartlet's-buildings is a very handſome ſpacious place, graced with good houſes of brick, with gardens behind them, and is principally inhabited by gentlemen.

A little farther from this on the ſame ſide is

THAVIE's INN.

This is likewiſe an inn of Chancery, and was founded by John Thavie, eſq; who lived in the reign of Edward III. It is governed by a principal and eleven ancients, who, with the reſt of the members, are to be ten days in commons in iſſuable terms, and a week in every other term.

Adjoining to this inn, and at the north weſt angle of Shoe-lane, is ſituate the pariſh church of St. ANDREW, Holbourn.

This church, which is a rectory, was originally in the gift of the dean and canons of St. Paul's London, who transferred it to the abbot and convent of Bermondſey; and they continued patrons thereof till their convent was diſſolved by Henry VIII. His majeſty granted this church to Thomas lord Wriotheſley, afterwards earl of Southampton, from whom it deſcended by marriage to the late duke of Montague, in whoſe family the patronage now remains, and is ſaid to be worth 600l. per annum.

The preſent edifice was finiſhed in 1687, and is 105 feet in length, 63 in breadth, 43 in height, and a tower 110 feet high, erected in 1704. It has a conſiderable ſpace before it, which is entered by an elegant pair of iron gates. It is a neat building with two ſeries of windows, and a handſome baluſtrade round the top. The tower, which riſes ſquare, conſiſts only of two ſtages, and round the top is a baluſtrade with a pinacle at each corner; on the crown of each is placed a pine apple, from which riſes the fanes; and the inſide is extremely neat and well finiſhed.

Nearly oppoſite this church ſtands

ELY HOUSE.

This is the ancient manſion-houſe fro the city reſidence of the biſhops of Ely. The buildings belonging to it are very antique, conſiſting of a large hall, ſeveral ſpacious rooms, and a good chapel. Here is alſo a fine capacious court-yard, and a conſiderable extent of garden ground; though it is at this time greatly run to decay. It was originally given to the biſhops of Ely by William de Luda, biſhop of that ſee in the reign of Edward I. by the name of the manor of Ouldborne, with the appurtenances; on the ſpecial condition that his next ſucceſſor ſhould beſtow 1000 marks to provide maintenance for three chaplains, to ſerve in the chapel there. But this edifice is not the original building. Thomas Arundel, biſhop of Ely, in the reign of Edward III. and Richard II. rebuilt it, with a large gateway and front towards the ſtreet.

At this time there was a very large piece of ground, the quantity of forty acres, or thereabouts, of orchard and paſture, incloſed with a wall, belonging to it, which falling to the crown at the death of biſhop Cox, queen Elizabeth gave that incloſed land to lord chancellor Hatton and his heirs for ever. The chancellor built a large houſe upon the premiſes; which being removed, the ground was afterwards laid out into ſtreets, and covered with very good and genteel buildings; among which that called Hatton-garden is reputed one of the handſomeſt in or about London. In this ſtreet is a mathematical ſchool founded for charity children.

Leaving St. Andrew's church, and paſſing by the north end of Shoe-lane and the Fleet-market, we aſcend Snow-hill, where, turning to the right, on the north ſide, is ſituate the parochial church of St. SEPULCHRE.

This church, which is ſo dedicated in commemoration of Our Saviour's ſepulchre or grave at Jeruſalem, is now a ſpacious building, but not ſo large as of old time, part of the ſite of it being let out upon a building leaſe, and for a garden plot. It is ſuppoſed to have been founded about the year 1100, at which time a particular devotion was paid to the Holy Sepulchre. And it was ſo decayed in the reign of Edward IV. as to require rebuilding. Roger, biſhop of Saliſbury, in the reign of Henry I. gave the patronage of this church to the prior and convent of St. Bartholomew tholomew in Weſt Smithfield, who eſtabliſhed a perpetual vicarage in this church, and held it till their diſſolution, when it fell to the crown. King James I. in the ſeventh year of his reign granted the rectory and its appurtenances, and advowſon of this vicarge, to Francis Philips, &c. after which the pariſhioners purchaſed the rectory and its appurtenances, and held them in fee-farm of the crown. And the advowſon of the vicarage was purchaſed by the preſident and fellows of St. John Baptiſt College, Oxon, who continue patrons thereof.

The preſent ſtructure was much damaged by the fire of London in 1666. The outward walls and the tower were capable of reparations; and the middle iſle of the church was at the ſame time made with an arched roof, which was not ſo originally.

This church, in its preſent ſituation, meaſures 126 feet in length, excluſive of the broad paſſage at the weſt end; the breadth, excluſive of the north chapel, is 58 feet. The height of the roof in the middle iſle is 35 feet; and the height of the ſteeple, to the top of the pinnacles, is 146 feet. The body of the church is enlightened with a row of very large Gothic windows, with buttreſſes between, over which runs a ſlight cornice; and on the top a plain and ſubſtantial battlement work, in the ſtyle of the public buildings in the reign of Edward IV. And the ſteeple is a plain ſquare tower, crowned with four pinnacles.

The church-yard, which lies ſouthward, and reaches quite up to the pavement of the ſtreet, was formerly incloſed with a high brick wall, without allowing any footway for paſſengers on the outſide; but this wall was removed in the year 1760, and the church-yard laid entirely open.

There is another church-yard or burial ground belonging to this pariſh in Chick-lane, given by Sir William Selby for the uſe of the poor for ever. And in the ſame lane is a work-houſe for the poor of the pariſh.

In the year 1636 the impropriation of this church, held in fee-farm, was worth 440l. and the vicarage, endowed with a third part of the tythes, &c. was worth 179l. 14s. 6d. At preſent the vicar receives 200l. per annum, in lieu of tythes, as ſettled by act of parliament.

The donations to the poor of this pariſh for ever amount to 250l. beſides which Mr. Cooper gave fifteen ſacks of charcoal; and Sir Richard Reeves left to this pariſh 100l. per annum for ever.

The ſtock of money given to the poor by eight charitable perſons amounts to 500l. and eight others gave 128l. 15s. per annum to provide coals and fuel for the poor.

They have alſo two alms-houſes for their poor; one founded on Snow-hill, a little eaſtward of Cock-lane, by Edmund Hammond, eſq; in 1651, for ſix unmarried men, who endowed them with 7l. 10s. per annum each, to be paid by the company of Haberdaſhers. The other is on the ſouth ſide of Gooſe-alley, near the middle, for eight poor people, who receive from 5s. to 15s. quarterly from the Armourers company.

There are ſeven gift ſermons on ſet days, a parſonage-houſe, and ſome glebe and perquiſites, which conſiderably increaſe the value of the living.

The ſexton of this pariſh is the perſon, mentioned before, that gives an admonition to the condemned criminals in Newgate the night before their execution; which he repeats next morning, as they are carried by St. Sepulchre's church-yard; and the great bell tolls, by way of a paſſing bell, from ſix to ten o'clock in the morning on the day of execution.

The government of this pariſh is in a veſtry, that conſiſts of all who have paſſed the office of conſtable; and being divided into four precincts Within the liberty and one Without, that part Within the liberty has four churchwardens, five overſeers, and four ſideſmen; that Without the liberty has no more than one churchwarden, four overſeers, and two ſideſmen.

Oppoſite St. Sepulchre's church is Angel-court, in which ſtands

The Hand-in-Hand Fire-Office.

This office was erected in the year 1696 for inſuring only houſes. Every inſurer ſigns a deed of ſettlement, by which he is not only inſured, but inſures all that have ſigned that deed, from loſſes in their houſes by fire. So that every perſon thus inſured, is admitted into joint partnerſhip, and becomes an equal ſharer in the profits and loſs, in proportion to their reſpective inſurances.

The conditions of inſurance are 2s. per cent. premium, and 10s. depoſit on brick houſes, and double thoſe ſums on timber houſes. No more than 2000l. to be inſured in one policy.

The buſineſs of this office is managed by twenty-four directors, who are choſen by the perſons inſured, in rotation, and ſerve the office three years without any ſalary or reward. And this office keeps in its ſervice thirty fire-men, who are protected from a preſs, and are annually cloathed, and wear a ſilver badge, with two hands joined, and over them a crown.

Oppoſite the ſouth front of St. Sepulchre's church-yard is an opening that leads into the Old Bailey; on the eaſt ſide of which ſtands

JUSTICE-HALL, commonly called the SESSIONS-HOUSE.

This is a plain brick edifice that has but little to recommend it. A flight of plain ſteps lead up into the court-room, which has a gallery at each end for the accommodation of ſpectators. The priſoners are brought to this court from Newgate, by a paſſage backwards which leads to that priſon; and there are two places where they are kept till called to their trials; one for the men, and the other for the women. There are alſo rooms for the grand and petty jury, and other accommodations.

A court is held here eight times a year by the king's commiſſion of oyer and terminer, for the trial of priſoners for crimes committed within the city of London, and county of Middleſex. The judges are, the Lord-mayor, the aldermen paſt the chair, and the recorder, who, on ſuch occaſions, ſions; are attended by both the ſheriffs, and by one or more of the national judges. The offences in the city are tried by a jury of citizens, and thoſe committed in the county by one formed of the houſe-keepers in the county.

The crimes tried in this court are high and petty treaſon, murder, felony, forgery, petty larceny, burglary, cheating, libelling, the uſing of falſe weights and meaſures, &c. the penalties incurred by which are, the loſs of life, corporal puniſhment, tranſportation, amerciaments, &c.

Farther to the ſouth, on the ſame ſide, is ſituate

SURGEONS HALL.

This building, which is extremely elegant, was erected by the ſurgeons, after their ſeparation from the barbers. It has a baſement ſtory, with ſquare windows. The principal floor is raiſed conſiderably above the level of the ſtreet, and there is an aſcent to it by a double flight of ſteps; under which is a door, level with the ground, for the convenience of bringing in dead bodies, executed at Tyburn, for diſſection. The face of this part is ruſtic work. At the height of the ſteps is a range of Ionic pilaſters, within the height of which there are two ſeries of windows, a row of large ones, with ſquare ones above. The entablature of the Ionic pilaſters ſupports a plain attic courſe, crowned with vaſes.

The ſurgeons, under their ancient incorporation, authorized ten of their body examiners of the ſurgeons of London during life. And it was ordained, that no perſon ſhould practiſe ſurgery in and within ſeven miles of London, before they had been examined and licenced by the ſaid company; and all thus licenced might practiſe ſurgery in any part of England. Which authorities and privileges, and ſeveral others, were confirmed to the company of ſurgeons by the act of parliament in 1745, which made them a ſeparate body, and did incorporate them by the name of "the maſter, governors, and commonalty, of "the art and ſcience of ſurgery of London." And by the ſaid act they were empowered to chuſe a principal, maſter or governor, two other governors or wardens, ten examiners of ſurgeons, and to have a court of twenty-one aſſiſtants.

Oppoſite the north end of the Old Bailey is Gilt-ſpur-ſtreet, which leads to Pye-corner. And further to the weſt is Cow-lane, a broad and good ſtreet for carts, &c. out of which comes Hoſier-lane, that runs into Smithfield, alias Weſt-Smithfield.

This place is ſo called from there being another of the ſame name in the eaſtern environs of London. It was anciently a much larger open field, and perhaps ſo called from one Smith, the owner thereof, or becauſe it was level and ſmooth, which by corruption might be called Smith, inſtead of Smooth field.

This place was uſed in very early time for juſts and tournaments: as appears in the 48th of Edward III. when dame Alice Perrars or Pierce, the king's concubine, as lady of the Sun, rode from the Tower of London, through Cheap, accompanied by many lords and ladies; every lady leading a lord by his horſe's bridle, till they came into Weſt-Smithfield; and then began a great juſt, which laſted for ſeven days.

Alſo in the 9th of Richard II. was the like great riding from the Tower to Weſtminſter, and every lord led a lady's horſe's bridle; and in the morning began the juſts in Smithfield, which laſted three days. Henry of Darby, the duke of Lancaſter's ſon, the lord Beaumont, Sir Simon Burley, and Sir Paris Courntney, all behaved well.

In the year 1393, the 17th of Richard II. certain lords of Scotland came into England to get worſhip by force of arms. The earl of Mar challenged the earl of Nottingham to juſt with him; and ſo they road certain courſes, but not the full challenge: for the earl of Mar was caſt, both horſe and man, and two of his ribs broken with the fall; ſo that he was conveyed out of Smithfield, and ſo towards Scotland, but died by the way at York.

Looſe ſerving-men would commonly meet here, and make uproars and quarrels; inſomuch that it was many years called Ruffians-hall, being the uſual rendezvous of ruffians and quarrellers, during the time that ſwords and bucklers were uſed; when every ſerving-man carried a buckler at his back, which hung by the hilt or pommel of his ſword hanging before him.

Between Hoſier-lane and Cow-lane, in Smithfield, anciently was a large pool of water, called Smithfield-pond, or horſe pool, from the watering of horſes there; and to the ſouth weſt of which, in Cow-lane, where St. John's-court is ſituate, ſtood the gallows, or public place of execution, denominated the elms, from the great quantity of ſuch trees growing in that neighbourhood. But, the gallows being removed to the weſt end of the ſuburbs, this part of Smithfield was ſoon erected into ſtreets, lanes, &c. among the firſt of which buildings was that ſpacious and lofty wooden edifice, denominated High-hall, formerly ſtanding in the ſaid St. John's court. This ancient ſtructure of wood and ſtone was the city reſidence of the prior of Sempringham in Lincolnſhire, as is evident by the writings thereunto belonging, in the cuſtody of Sir Harry Featherſtone, wherein the ſaid houſe is denominated Sepringham head-houſe.

In latter times, when the ſpirit of reformation in religion began to appear in this metropolis, Smithfield became the Aceldema, or field of blood. In the center of the ſpace now incloſed with rails many were burnt for their ſteady adhering to the principles of the goſpel, and oppoſing the doctrines peculiar to the church of Rome.

At the ſame time, and all the time of which we have any mention of Smithfield, it was, and has been, and now is, a market-place for cattle, hay, ſtraw, and other neceſſary proviſions; and once in the year at Bartholomew tide, for a general fair, commonly called Bartholomew-fair.

This privilege was granted to the prior of St. Bartholomew by king Henry II. for a fair to be kept yearly at Bartholomew-tide three ſucceſſive days, viz. the eve, the day, and the morrow; to which the clothiers of England and drapers of London repaired, and had their booths and ſtandings within the church-yard of this priory, cloſed in with walls and gate, locked every night, and watched, for the ſafety of men's goods and wares. A court of pye-powder was daily, during the fair, holden for debts and contracts.

The fair kept here, inſtead of three days, was at length prolonged to a fortnight; and became of little other uſe than for idle youth and looſe people to reſort to, and to ſpend their money in vanity; and (which was worſe) in debaucheries, drunkenneſs, whoredom, and in ſeeing and hearings things not fit for chriſtian eyes and ears; many of the houſes and booths here ſerving only to allure men and women to ſuch purpoſes of impiety. Therefore the magiſtracy, often intending, at laſt fully reſolved, in the year 1708, to reduce the fair to that ſpace of time only, according to which it was firſt granted, that is, to three days; and accordingly an order was made: and at a court of common-council in June, the ſaid year, the order was confirmed; whereby the fair was to be kept for three days only, for ſelling of merchandizes, according to the original grants from the crown; which regulation, though it has been ſometimes broke, the chief magiſtrate of late years has ſtrictly obſerved.

Though Smithfield is a very handſome ſquare, ſurrounded by many good buildings; yet the great number of cattle, horſes, ſheep, &c. which are brought to this market every Monday and Friday, and the want of proper care and regulation, has made the area a ſcene of filth and naſtineſs. But it muſt be allowed, to be the greateſt market in Europe for black cattle, horſes and ſheep.

On the eaſt ſide of this ſquare is ſituate the magnificent building of St. BARTHOLOMEW's HOSPITAL.

This hoſpital was erected for ſick and maimed people; where great care is taken of them, and all neceſſaries for food, lodging, attendance, phyſic and medicaments, proper for their cure, adminiſtered; for they have good able phyſicians and ſurgeons provided, belonging to the hoſpital, who give their conſtant attendance, as occaſion requires; and they have matrons and nurſes to look to the patients, and to ſee that they have what is convenient, and what is preſcribed for their health.

The ancient hoſpital, which eſcaped the fire of London, becoming ruinous, it was found abſolutely neceſſary in the year 1729 to rebuild it. A plan for that purpoſe was formed, and a grand edifice erected, by ſubſcription, which was deſigned to be only one out of four noble detached piles of building, to be afterwards raiſed, about a court or area 250 feet in length, and 60 in breadth.

The original deſign has been ſome time completed, and this hoſpital altogether forms a very elegant building, or rather buildings; for the ſides which compoſe the quadrangle do not join at the angles, as is uſual, but by four walls, each having a large gateway which admits you into the area. Here is a ſtair-caſe painted and given by the late Mr. Hogarth, containing two pictures, repreſenting the good Samaritan and the pool of Betheſda, which, for truth of colouring and expreſſion may vie with any thing of its kind in Europe. And the frontiſpiece of this hoſpital, towards Smithfield, is adorned with pilaſters, entablature, and pediments, of the Ionic order, with the figure of king Henry VIII. ſtanding in full proportion in a niche; and the figures of two cripples on the pediment.

To this hoſpital belongs an apothecary who provides and prepares what the phyſicians direct; and the diſeaſed are duly viſited by them in their wards, where they are lodged, every morning and evening, as there is need, each having a bed to himſelf; and, by the care of the matrons, the wards are always kept neat and clean.

From the time this hoſpital was firſt incorporated it began to flouriſh under the government of the Lord-mayor, four aldermen, and eight commoners; who had under them an hoſpitaller, renter-clerks, butler, porter, matrons, twelve ſiſters, and eight beadles; beſides three ſurgeons in wages, and a miniſter.

Although the old hoſpital eſcaped the dreadful fire in 1666, yet, a great part of its revenues being in houſes in London, ſuffered much thereby. Notwithſtanding which, ſuch hath been the care of the governors, the diligence and induſtry of the phyſicians and ſurgeons, and the ſupplies of ſeveral good benefactors, that there have been yearly received many maimed and ſick ſeamen and ſoldiers, with other diſeaſed perſons, from divers parts of the kingdom, and many cured, and relieved with money and other neceſſaries, at their departure, beſides their diet and lodging during their cure.

One of the piles of this building contains a large hall, for the reſort of the governors at general courts; a compting-houſe for the meeting of the committees of governors, for the diſpatch of the buſineſs of the hoſpital: ſeveral rooms for examining, admitting, preſcribing for, and diſcharging the patients; and other neceſſary offices. The other piles contain wards for the reception of the patients and their nurſes only.

Within the precinct of this hoſpital, at the north-weſt angle, ſtands the parochial church of St. BARTHOLOMEW the Leſs.

This church was founded in 1102 by the original founder of the hoſpital for a chapel to it; but, at the diſſolution of the priory of St. Bartholomew the Great, it was converted into a pariſh church for the inhabitants of the precinct of the ſaid hoſpital.

This church is an old fabrick of 99 feet in length, 42 in breadth, 34 in height, and 74 in the height of the ſteeple. It is a vicarage in the patronage of the Lord mayor, aldermen, and citizens of London: and as this building eſcaped the great fire in 1666, it is very ancient. The value of this living is about 120l. per annum, ariſing from the Chamber of London, which pays the vicar 13l. 6s. 8d. and from caſualties, and the allowance paid by the hoſpital.

The

The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are only two churchwardens.

At the north eaſt corner of Duck-lane ſtands the remains of the ancient priory of St. Bartholomew, which is now a parochial church, and a rectory, known by the name of

ST. BARTHOLOMEW the Great.

This was originally a pariſh church, and ſtood next adjoining to the priory church: but when the priory church was pulled down to the choir, that part, by the king's order, was annexed for the enlargement of the ſaid old pariſh church thereunto adjoining; in which manner it was uſed till queen Mary gave the remnant of the priory church to the Black-friars, who uſed it as their conventual church till the firſt year of queen Elizabeth, when the friars were turned out, and all the ſaid church, with the whole pariſh church, was wholly, as it ſtood in the laſt year of Edward VI. given by parliament to remain for ever a pariſh church to the inhabitants within the cloſe called great St. Bartholomew's; and ſo it remains and is the ſame ſtructure as then exiſted, except the ſteeple, which was then timber, and was pulled down and rebuilt in 1628, of brick and ſtone.

This church is a ſpacious old edifice, of the Gothic and Tuſcan orders, 132 feet long, 57 broad, 47 high, and 75 the height of the ſteeple. The patronage is in the earl of Holland; and is valued at no more than 60l. per annum. The veſtry conſiſts of the miniſter, churchwardens, ſuch as have ſerved churchwarden, and thoſe who have fined for all offices and are choſen by the veſtrymen. Here are two churchwardens, two collectors for the poor, and two ſideſmen.

Within this liberty is the ſtreet called Cloth-fair, noted for woollen-drapers and mercers. And any perſon, though not a freeman of London, may keep a ſhop and exerciſe any trade or calling within this pariſh.

On the eaſt ſide of Smithfield runs Long-lane which communicates with all the eaſtern parts through Cripplegate; but is very badly built, and indifferently inhabited by inferior ſorts of tradeſmen and publicans.

On the north ſide of Smithfield is the great opening called Smithfield-bars, becauſe the city bars, that ſever the city liberty from the county on that ſide, are ſet up there. And on the north weſt corner are the ſheep-pens; from whence are the ſeveral ſtreets and lanes that communicate with Holbourn, Snow-hill, and the Old-baily.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Of LANGBOURN WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from a rivulet or long bourn of ſweet water, which anciently broke out of a ſpring near to the place where Magpye-alley adjoining to St. Catharine Coleman's church now ſtands, which ran down the ſtreet weſtward, and through Lombard-ſtreet as far as the weſt end of St. Mary Woolnoth's church, where turning ſouth, and dividing itſelf into ſeveral ſhares, rills or ſtreams, it gave name to Sharebourn-lane, called alſo Southbourne-lane, from its running ſouth to the river Thames; and by its ſpreading near the ſpring head, the contigious ſtreet became ſo ſwampy, mooriſh or fenny, eſpecially about the church, which ſtood in the broad way between Mincing-lane and Rood-lane, that it was thence called Fenchurch-ſtreet. The ward alſo partook of the ſame name, and was enrolled in the city records by the appellation of Langbourne and Fenny about.

It is bounded on the eaſt by Aldgate ward, and on the north by Aldgate and Lime-ſtreet wards; on the ſouth by Tower-ſtreet, Billingſgate, Bridge, and Candlewick wards; and on the weſt by Wallbrook ward.

The eaſt and weſt limits of this ward are taken at 100 feet from the weſt corner of the north ſide of Lombard-ſtreet to 35 feet of the weſt ſide of Gracechurch-ſtreet; and from that ſtreet to Smith's buildings on the north ſide of the eaſt end. And at 125 feet from the weſt corner of the ſouth ſide of Lombard-ſtreet, acroſs Gracechurch-ſtreet, and up the ſouth ſide of Fenchurch-ſtreet, as far as the north weſt end of Mark-lane.

This ward is divided into twelve precincts; and is governed by an alderman, ten common-council-men, one of whom is the alderman's deputy, ſeventeen inqueſt-men, nine ſcavengers, eleven conſtables and a beadle.

The two principal ſtreets in this ward are Lombard-ſtreet and Fenchurch-ſtreet; beſides which are the following lanes and alleys: St. Swithin's-lane, Abchurch-lane, St. Nicholas-lane, St. Clement's-lane; all which are on the ſouth ſide of Lombard-ſtreet: and on the north ſide are Pope's-head-alley, Exchange-alley, Birchin-lane, and George-yard. On the ſouth ſide of Fenchurch-ſtreet are Philpot-lane, Rood-lane, Mincing-lane, and Mark-lane; and on the north ſide, Lime-ſtreet, Cullum-ſtreet, and Smith's-buildings.

We ſhall begin the ſurvey of this ward in Lombard-ſtreet, ſo called from the Lombards, or Italian bankers, who ſettled there. This ſtreet is throughout graced with good and lofty buildings, among which are many that ſurpaſs thoſe in other other ſtreets; and is generally inhabited by goldſmiths, bankers, and other eminent tradeſmen. At the eaſt end whereof, on the north ſide, near Gracechurch-ſtreet, is ſituate the parochial church of

This church, which is a rectory, is of very ancient foundation, the advowſon whereof appears to have been anciently in lay hands; for Brihtmen, a citizen of London, with the approbation of Stigand the archbiſhop, and Godric the dean, gave the ſame, with an adjoining meſſuage, to the church of Canterbury about the year 1053. By virtue of which donation the right of patronage ſtill remains in the dean and chapter of that metropolitan church.

The preſent building is neat, plain, and well-proportioned, and was erected on the ruins of that conſumed by the dreadful fire in 1666. The body is enlightened by a ſingle ſeries of large windows, and the tower is terminated by a plain battlement.

The veſtry is general; and the rector, beſides glebe, donations, and caſualties, receives 110l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

Leaving this church, and proceeding to the weſt, we paſs through Ball-alley into George-yard, chiefly inhabited by warehouſemen and office-keepers. And this leads us to the parochial church of St. EDMUND the King.

This church is ſo called from its dedication to St. Edmund king of the Eaſt Angles, who was barbarouſly murdered by the pagan Danes in the year 870, for his ſtedfaſt adherence to the chriſtian religion. It was originally called St. Edmund Graſs-church, becauſe of its vicinity to the Graſs-market, at that time held there.

The firſt edifice in this place, and of this name, was built under the Saxon heptarchy; but the laſt old church was deſtroyed in the fire of 1666, and the preſent ſtructure finiſhed in 1690. The length of it from north to ſouth is 69 feet, and the breadth from eaſt to weſt 39 feet. The altar is placed at the north end. It has a ſquare tower, upon which a ſhort ſpire riſes, with its baſe fixed on a broad lanthorn.

This rectory, the patronage of which is in the archbiſhop of Canterbury, is united with that of the next pariſh, called St. Nicholas Acons, whoſe church, before the fire of London, ſtood on the weſt ſide of Nicholas-lane; and was a rectory in the gift of the abbot and convent of Malmſbury in the year 1084, dedicated to a Syrian ſaint, biſhop of Myrea.

Theſe united livings were ſettled by parliament at 180l. per annum in lieu of tythes. The ſite of St. Nicholas church remains as a burial place for the pariſhioners; and adjoining, on the weſt ſide thereof, ſtands a well-built parſonage-houſe leaſed by the rector to the Society for Equitable Aſſurances on Lives and Survivorſhips.

The veſtries of theſe pariſhes are general: and the pariſh officers in St. Edmund's are, two churchwardens, two collectors and two ſideſmen: and thoſe of St. Nicholas, two churchwardens and one collector.

The next opening on the north ſide of Lombard-ſtreet, proceeding to the weſt, is Birchin-lane, principally inhabited by reputable tradeſmen, office-keepers and bankers. On the eaſt ſide of this lane ſtands a building called

The LONDON ASSURANCE OFFICE.

This office was erected for aſſuring houſes and other buildings, houſhold furniture, goods, wares, and merchandize, from loſs or damage by fire: except glaſs and china ware, not in trade, and all manner of writings, books of accompts, notes, bills, bonds, tallies, ready money, jewels, plate, pictures, gunpowder, hay, ſtraw, and corn unthraſhed; and for aſſurance of lives.

This ſociety was incorporated by letters patent granted by king George I. for aſſuring ſhips and merchandize at ſea; and for lending modey upon bottomry; in conſideration of which grant the corporation were to advance his majeſty 300,000l. without intereſt, for the term of thirty years: towards the raiſing of which, and paying the juſt demands that might be made upon their reſpective policies, the company were empowered to raiſe a ſum, not exceeding 1500,000l. to be called the ſtock of the corporation. And by a ſecond charter granted to this corporation in the the year 1721, they were empowered not only to inſure ſhips, but houſes, goods, and even lives.

This ſociety is under the direction of a governor, ſub-governor, deputy-governor and twenty-four directors.

For the timely aſſiſtance of ſuch as are aſſured by this corporation, they have ſeveral engines and watermen, with proper inſtruments to extinguiſh fires, and porters for removing goods, all cloathed in green; each having a badge, with the figure of Britannia holding a harp, and ſupported by the London arms, to diſtinguiſh them from ſervants belonging to other offices, and the badges are all numbered. The ſame figure is affixed on buildings, &c. aſſured by this corporation.

More to the weſt on the ſouth ſide of Lombard-ſtreet, and at the corner of Sherborn or Sherbourn-lane ſtands the pariſh church of

ST. MARY WOOLNOTH.

This church is ſo called from its dedication to the above virgin, and its primitive ſituation near the wool ſtaple, noth ſignifying neah, nigh or near. It is of ſome antiquity, as appears by John de Norton who was rector thereof in the year 1355. And from various circumſtances it is reaſonably ſuppoſed that here was originally a heathen Roman temple, perhaps the temple of Concord. For in digging the foundation of the preſent edifice in the year 1716 (which is one of the fifty new churches appointed by parliament to be erected within the bills of mortality) there were found a conſiderable number of tuſks and bones of boars and goats; ſeveral pieces of metal, ſome teſſelated work, part of an aqueduct, and a great variety of Roman earthen veſſels. They alſo found a well, full of dirt, which was no ſooner removed, than a fine ſpring aroſe, in which is placed a pump, with an iron baſon, and produces remarkable good water.

The advowſon of this church was in the prioreſs and convent of St. Helen's in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, till, at the diſſolution, it fell to the crown; when king Henry VIII. granted it to Sir Martin Bowes, in whoſe family it has ever ſince continued.

The old church was not entirely deſtroyed by the fire of London: the ſteeple eſcaped the flames, and all the walls, except the north ſide, were repaired. But in length of time falling to decay, it was thought neceſſary to pull it down, and it was rebuilt in the year 1719, in a very handſome manner with ſtone.

The ornaments and beauties of this fine ſtructure are ſo covered and ſhut from the ſight, by the neighbouring houſes, that the very tower can ſcarce be ſeen, except from the roofs of houſes, and the oppoſite garret windows. On the eaſt ſide are three very large and lofty niches, adorned with Ionic columns, and ſurrounded with bold ruſtic: over theſe is a large cornice, upon which is placed a baluſtrade. The entrance is at the weſt end, by a lofty ruſtic arch, over which riſes an oblong tower, ornamented with ſix compoſite columns in the front, and two on the ſides: upon this is raiſed a leſſer tower of the ſame form, crowned with a baluſtrade; from the center of which riſes a flag-ſtaff, with a fane. The windows are on the ſouth ſide, where the edifice is entirely ſurrounded with houſes.

This living was conſiderably improved by having the pariſh of St. Mary Woolchurch annexed to it; for the benefice was raiſed from 80l. to 160l. per annum, in lieu of tythes, beſides 12l. per annum glebe and caſualties.

The veſtry is general in both pariſhes; and each has two churchwardens, two collectors for the poor and two ſideſmen.

Adjoining to this church, and oppoſite the ſouth end of Pope's-head-alley is ſituate

The GENERAL POST-OFFICE.

Of what antiquity the poſt is in this kingdom cannot eaſily be determined. Anciently the management of the foreign mails was under the direction of a ſtranger, who by the permiſſion of the government was choſen by the foreigners dwelling in the city, who even pretended to have a right by preſcription of chuſing their own poſtmaſter. However, in the year 1568 a difference ariſing between the Spaniards and Flemings in London, each choſe their ſeparate poſt-maſter; and this conteſt occaſioned a repreſentation from the citizens to the privy-council, to beſeech her majeſty queen Elizabeth, to fill that important poſt with one of her Engliſh ſubjects.

By the firſt accounts we find of the poſts eſtabliſhed for the convenience of this kingdom it appears to have been managed by ſeveral private officers who had their reſpective diſtricts. But great inconveniences ariſing from their different methods of proceeding, they were ſuppreſſed, and a certain number of public offices erected in their ſtead; but theſe alſo not anſwering the end propoſed, a general poſt office was erected by act of parliament on the 12th of king Charles II. in the year 1660, to be kept within the city of London, under the direction of a poſt-maſter appointed by the king.

By this act the general poſt-maſter was empowered to appoint poſt houſes in the ſeveral parts of the country hitherto unprovided, both in poſt and bye-road: the poſtage of letters to and from all places therein mentioned was not only aſcertained, but likewiſe the rates of poſt horſes to be paid by all ſuch as ſhould ride poſt.

At length, upon the union of the kingdom of England and Scotland, another act of parliament paſſed in the year 1710, whereby the general poſt office was eſtabliſhed not only for the united kingdom of Great Britain, but likewiſe for that of Ireland, and our plantations in north America and the Weſt Indies.

Rates for carrying letters to and from the ſeveral places hereunder-mentioned.

☞ Double letters to be paid for twice as much as ſingle; treble letters three times as much and the ounce four times as much.

The office of poſt-maſter is at preſent under the direction of two commiſſioners who have 2000l. per annum, and are aſſiſted by a ſecretary at 200l. per annum, who has four clerks. Here are alſo a receiver general, a comptroller of the inland office, and his deputy; a ſolicitor, a reſident-ſurveyor, two inſpectors of the miſſent letters; ſix clerks of the roads, and an aſſiſtant to each. There is likewiſe a court-poſt, who has 40s. per diem, and a deliverer of letters to the houſe of commons, at 6s. 8d. per diem; a clerk of the bye nights, and his aſſiſtants; ten ſorters, and ſeven ſupernumerary ſorters; a window man and alphabet keeper; ſixty ſeven letter carriers, and ſeveral other officers and ſervants. In the foreign office there is alſo a comptroller, an alphabet keeper, a ſecretary and ſix clerks.

The court in which this office ſtands is ſmall, neat, and the building itſelf is large, handſome and commodious.

Proceeding to the eaſt from the poſt office we come to Abchurch-lane, Nicholas-lane, Clement's-lane, Nag's-head-court, Plough-yard, and White-hart-court; all of which are well built, and inhabited by people in the mercantile way, and that have the buſineſs at the 'Change. White-hart-court is remarkable for conſiderable dealers, who are moſt of them quakers; and here they have their principal meeting houſe.

Fenchurch-ſtreet is large and open, well built, and inhabited by merchants and others. In the middle of the ſtreet, before the fire of London, ſtood the ſmall church of St. Gabriel Fenchurch, corruptly Fenchurch, not rebuilt, but the pariſh united to St. Margaret Pattens.

Here is an entry called Fenchurch-alley, at the upper end of which is the church-yard. And at the ſouth weſt corner of this ſtreet is the church of St. Bennet Grace-church, but not in this ward.

On the north ſide of Fenchurch-ſtreet is Lime-ſtreet, about the middle of which, on the weſt ſide, ſtands

PEWTERERS HALL.

The fraternity of pewterers was incorporated by letters patent of the thirteenth of Edward IV. in the year 1474. by the title of "The maſter, "wardens, and commonalty of the art or myſ-"tery of Pewterers of the city of London." And in the year 1534 the wardens of this company or their deputies, were empowered by act of parliament to have the inſpection of pewter in all parts of the kingdom, in order to prevent the ſale of the baſe pewter, and the importation of pewter veſſels from abroad. And as a farther encouragement to this company, all Engliſhmen are by the ſaid act ſtrictly enjoined not to repair to any foreign country to teach the art or myſtery of Pewterers, on pain of diſfranchiſement. And for the more effectual preventing the art from being carried abroad, no pewterer ſhall take as an apprentice the ſon of an alien.

This corporation is governed by a maſter, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants; and is the ſixteenth in the city liſt of companies.

At the ſouth-weſt corner of Lime-ſtreet ſtands the pariſh church of St. DIONIS Backchurch.

This church is a rectory, dedicated to St. Dennis, or Dionyſius, the Athenian aneopagite, or judge, and now the patron of France. It receives the additional epithet of Backchurch from its ſituation backwards, or behind a row of houſes, to diſtinguiſh it from St. Gabriel's church, which formerly ſtood in the middle of Fenchurch-ſtreet.

The

The patronage of this church was anciently in the gift of the abbot and convent of Canterbury, but is now in the dean and chapter of that church. The old edifice was burnt down in 1666, and the preſent fabrick of ſtone was erected in its ſtead. Since which time the rector, by act of parliament, has received 120l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

The veſtry is general; and the pariſh-officers are, two churchwardens, two ſideſmen, and two collectors for the poor.

On the ſame ſide of Fenchurch-ſtreet, and near the north extremity of this ward, is a very fine brick building, adorned with pilaſters, architraves, &c. and is the hall wherein the buſineſs is tranſacted belonging to

The HUDSON's-BAY COMPANY.

This company was incorporated by king Charles II. in the year 1670, by the name and title of "The governor and company of the adventurers of England trading into Hudſon's Bay." And the ſaid charter granted them, and their ſucceſſors for ever, all the ſtreights, bays, ſeas, rivers, lakes, creeks, iſlands, ſhores, lands, territories, and places whatſoever, within Hudſon's-ſtreights and Hudſon's-bay.

This corporation carry on a conſiderable trade to the above places by a joint ſtock, and have ſettled ſeveral ſmall factories, to which the natives repair with their furrs, ſkins, and other commodities of the country, which they exchange for thoſe of England. The company is under the direction of a governor, deputy-governor, and ſeven aſſiſtants.

On the ſouth ſide of Fenchurch-ſtreet is Mark-lane, on the weſt ſide whereof, near the north end, ſtands the parochial church of

ALLHALLOWS STAINING.

This church is a very ancient foundation, dedicated to All-ſaints, and is ſaid to have obtained the name of Staining, from the corruption of the word ſtoney, becauſe built at firſt of ſtone, when the other churches dedicated to all the ſaints were of wood. It was anciently a rectory in the patronage of the de Walthams and others, till it was annexed to the abbey of Graces, near the Tower of London. With which abbey this church fell to the crown, and was ſold to George Bingley and others, who, on October 7, 4 Jac. I. had a grant of this rectory and pariſh church to be held of the crown in ſoccage: from which time it became a lay-impropriation, and in the patronage of the Grocers company, in whom it ſtill continues. And though it is no more than a donative or curacy, under this impropriation, it is a rectory in its nature, the tythes (which are 100l. per annum) being paid, according to act of parliament, to the incumbent.

This church eſcaped the fire in 1666; but it was ſo old, that the body of it fell down ſuddenly a few years after, and was rebuilt by the pariſhioners. The body is well illuminated with Gothic windows, and the ſquare tower is crowned with a ſmall turret.

The veſtry is ſelect; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, two ſideſmen, and two collectors for the poor.

CHAPTER XIX.

Of LIME-STREET WARD.

THIS ward is very ſmall, and takes its name from the above ſtreet, which in ancient times was the place where lime was either made or ſold in public market.

The body of this ward is from the north end of Lime-ſtreet, to the weſt ſide of Leadenhall-ſtreet, on the ſouth ſide: and from the ſouth-weſt corner of St. Mary-ax-ſtreet to another corner facing Leadenhall. From the north corner of Lime-ſtreet to the middle thereof is in Aldgate ward; and the ſouth end, on both ſides is in Langbourn-ward.

This ward is bounded on the weſt by Biſhopſgate ward; on the eaſt and north by Aldgate ward; and on the ſouth by Langbourn ward. It is divided into four precincts; and is under the government of an alderman, four common-council-men, one of whom is the alderman's deputy, four conſtables, thirteen inqueſt-men, four ſcavengers and a beadle.

It is very obſervable, that though this ward runs through ſeveral pariſhes, yet there is no church, nor whole ſtreet throughout it. And the only things worthy remark are two; the firſt of which is

LEADENHALL MARKET.

This is the largeſt and moſt general market for all kinds of proviſion within the city of London, or perhaps in Europe. Beſides the principal entrance out of Leadenhall-ſtreet, there are ſeveral others, three out of Lime-ſtreet, and the reſt out of Gracechurch-ſtreet. The market conſiſts of three courts or yards; the firſt of which is that at the north-eaſt corner of Gracechurch-ſtreet and opens into Leadenhall-ſtreet.

This court or yard contains in length from north to ſouth one hundred and ſixty-four feet, and in breadth from eaſt to weſt eighty feet. Within this court or yard, and round about the ſame, are about an hundred ſtanding ſtalls for butchers, for the ſelling of beef, and therefore this court is called the Beef-market; many of which which ſtalls are eight, ten, or twelve feet long, and four, five, or ſix feet broad, with racks, hooks, blocks, and all other conveniences for the ſale of their meat; all which ſtalls are either under warehouſes above head, or ſheltered from the weather by roofs over them. This yard is on Tueſdays a market for leather, to which the tanners do reſort. On Thurſdays the waggons from Colcheſter and other parts come with baize, &c. and alſo the ſelmongers with their wool; and on Fridays it is a market for raw hides, beſides Saturdays for beef, as alſo other proviſions.

The ſecond market-yard is called the Green-yard, as being once a green plot of ground; afterwards it was the city's ſtore-yard for materials for building and the like, but now a market only for veal, mutton, lamb, &c. This yard is an hundred and ſeventy feet in length from eaſt to weſt, and ninety feet broad from north to ſouth It hath in it an hundred and forty ſtalls for the butchers, all covered over, and of the bigneſs of thoſe in the Beef-market. In the middle of this Green-yard market, north to ſouth, is a row of ſhops, with kitchens or rooms over them for Fiſhmongers; and alſo on the ſouth ſide and weſt end are houſes and ſhops for fiſhmongers. Towards the eaſt end of this yard is erected a fair market-houſe, ſtanding upon columns, with vaults underneath and rooms above, with a bell-tower. and a clock, and under it are butchers ſtalls. The tenements round about this yard are for the moſt part inhabited by cooks, victuallers, and ſuch like; and in the paſſages leading out of the ſtreets into this market are fiſhmongers, poulterers, cheeſmongers, and ſuch like traders for proviſion.

The third market belonging to Leadenhall is called the Herb-market, for that herbs, roots, fruit, &c. are only there ſold. This market is about one hundred and forty-feet ſquare. The weſt, eaſt, and north ſides have walks round them, covered over, for ſhelter, and ſtanding upon columns; in which walks there are twenty-eight ſtalls for gardeners, with cellars under them.

Being rebuilt in the year 1730, it is now called New Market, or Naſhe's Rents, and hath ſhops in it chiefly for butchers, and a new paſſage into Lime-ſtreet. There is alſo in this yard one range of Stalls, covered over, for ſuch as ſell tripe, neats feet, ſheeps trotters, &c. And, on the ſouth ſide, the tenements are taken up by victuallers, poulterers, cheeſemongers, butchers, and ſuch like. Beyond this are likewiſe ſome ſhops, built in the year 1730, in that part called the Old Bacon-market, which are chiefly occupied by poulterers, and ſuch as deal in bacon.

Lime ſtreet is a place well inhabited by merchants and others of repute. About the middle of the ſtreet is a place called Queen's-ſquare, or Queen's-ſquare-paſſage, as leading into Leadenhall-market, a well-built place, with a free ſtone pavement, On this ſpot formerly ſtood a large houſe, the habitation of a merchant, and anciently ſuppoſed to belong to the kings and queens.

St. Mary-ax goes out of Leadenhall-ſtreet, and runs northwards to Camomile-ſtreet by London-wall. It is a ſtreet graced with good buildings, and much inhabited by eminent merchants.

Leadenhall-ſtreet is large, populous and well inhabited; but the houſes eſcaping the great fire in 1666, are not ſo elegant and uniform as thoſe of a more modern building. At the ſouth ſide of this ſtreet, at about 100 feet weſt of Lime-ſtreet corner, is ſituate

The EAST-INDIA HOUSE.

This building was anciently the ſite of a city manſion belonging to the earl of Craven, and his anceſtors. The front next the ſtreet is very magnificent, being a ſtrong ſtone building, with pilaſters and entablature of the Doric order; the reſt of it is very ſpacious, having large rooms for the directors, and offices for the clerks. It hath a large hall and court yard, for the reception of people who have buſineſs here, to attend on the company on their court days, which are every Wedneſday and Friday. To this building belongs likewiſe a garden, with warehouſes on the back part towards Lime-ſtreet, into which there is a back gate for the entrance of carts to bring in their goods. Theſe warehouſes were rebuilt in the year 1725, and have been greatly enlarged.

The firſt Eaſt India company was eſtabliſhed by charter in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and ſince confirmed ſeveral times, under the title of "The governor and merchants trading into the "Eaſt-Indies.

In 1698 another company was eſtabliſhed by act of parliament, and called, "The Engliſh "company of merchants trading to the Eaſt "Indies," who, upon their ſettlement, advanced two millions of money to the government, for which they received eight per cent. intereſt.

On the twenty-ſecond of July, in the year 1702, for the mutual advantage and ſatisfaction of both companies, an expedient was found out for the uniting of them, and a charter was granted for that purpoſe. And by order of a court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, held the twenty-fourth of April, in 4 Edward VI. the chamberlain of London was yearly to pay unto the ſcavenger of Lime-ſtreet ward 20s. by even portions, out of the profits ariſing from the butchers ſtalls in Leadenhall market, to keep the ſaid ward clean.

Beſides the warehouſes belonging to this building, the company have likewiſe others in Seething-lane, Fenchurch-ſtreet, Leadenhall-ſtreet, the Steel-yard, Billiter-lane, the Royal Exchange, under the laſt of which they have cellars entirely for pepper, and ſome now building near Whitechapel.

CHAPTER XX.

Of PORTSOKEN WARD.

THE word Portſoken ſignifieth the franchiſe or liberty at the gate. It was ſometime a guild, and had its beginning in the reign of king Edgar, between ſeven and eight hundred years ago, when thirteen knights, well-beloved of the king and realm, for ſervices by them done, requeſted to have a certain portion of land on the eaſt part of the city, left deſolate and forſaken by the inhabitants, by reaſon of too much ſervitude. They beſought the king to have this land, with the liberty of a guild, for ever. The king granted their requeſt on the following conditions, to wit, that each of them ſhould victoriouſly accompliſh three combats, one above the ground, one under ground, and the third in the water: and after this, at a certain day, in Eaſt Smithfield, they ſhould run with ſpears againſt all comers; all which was glorioufly performed; and the ſame day the king named it Knighten Guild, and ſo bounded it from Aldgate, to the place where the bars now are, toward the eaſt, on both ſides of the ſtreet, and extended it towards the north, and the gate, now ſince called Biſhopſgate, unto the houſe then of William Preſbyter, after of Jeffry Tanner, and then of the heirs of Colver; after that of John Eaſeby; but ſince of the lord Bouchier, &c. And again towards the ſouth, unto the river Thames, and ſo far into the water, as a horſeman entering the ſame, might ride at low water, and throw his ſpear: ſo that all Eaſt Smithfield, with the right part of the ſtreet that goeth to Dodding Pond into the Thames, and alſo the hoſpital of St. Catharine, with the mills that were founded in king Stephen's days, and the outward ſtone wall, and the new ditch of the Tower, are of the ſaid fee and liberty: for the ſaid wall and ditch were made in the time of king Richard I. when he was in the Holy Land, by William Longchamp, biſhop of Ely.

In the year 1115, certain burgeſſes of London, of the progeny of thoſe Engliſh knights, coming together into the chapter-houſe of the church of the Holy Trinity, gave to the ſame, and canons ſerving God therein, all the lands and ſoke, called in Engliſh, Knighten Guild, which lieth to the wall of the city without the ſame gate, and ſtretcheth to the river Thames; they gave it (taking upon them the brotherhood and participation of the benefits of that houſe) by the hands of prior Norman.

This ward is ſituate entirely without Aldgate, and contains all Whitechapel as far as the bars, Petticoat-lane, Houndſditch, and the Minories.

It is bounded on the eaſt by the pariſhes of Spitalfields, Stepney, and St. George's in the Eaſt; on the ſouth by Tower-hill; on the weſt by Aldgate ward; and on the north by Biſhopſgate ward.

It is divided into five precincts, and is governed by an alderman and five common-council-men, including the alderman's deputy; twenty-two inqueſt-men, five ſcavengers, five conſtables, and a beadle.

In ſurveying this ward we ſhall begin at Whitechapel high-ſtreet, which for its dimenſions is to be numbered among the beſt in London. There is, on the ſouth ſide, the greateſt market for carcaſes of beef, mutton, veal and lamb, in the world. And in the part beyond the bars is a great market for hay and ſtraw three times a week. The remainder of this ſtreet is principally taken up with large inns, for the entertainment of travellers, and the reception of coaches, waggons, &c. this being the great thoroughfare to the Eſſex road, from whence the country people ſupply this market.

Houndſditch runs out of the high-ſtreet northward unto Biſhopſgate church; and takes its name from its ancient ſtate, a ditch, into which dead dogs, carrion, and all manner of filth uſed to be thrown. On the eaſt ſide of this ſtreet, fronting the Minories, is ſituate the pariſh church of ST. BOTOLPH, Aldgate.

This church is of very ancient foundation; the advowſon of which was originally in the proprietors of the ward of Portſoken, who, in the year 1115, gave it, together with the whole ward, to the prior and canons of Holy Trinity. Which grant was not only ſoon after confirmed by Henry I. but likewiſe by the pope and biſhop of London. But no ſooner was it appropriated to the trinity convent, than the cannons, inſtead of appointing a curate, reſolved to ſerve the cure alternately themſelves; which they regularly performed till the diſſolution of their monaſtery, when the ſame coming to the crown, queen Elizabeth, in the year 1577, granted this church and curacy to Robert Halywell, for a certain term of years; and in the year 1588, to George Puttenham, for another term of years; ſince which time the impropriation has been held in fee of the crown.

The old church eſcaped the fire in 1666, and ſtood till the year 1741, when it was taken down, and the preſent edifice finiſhed in 1744. It is built with brick, and is a plain maſſy, and yet elegant ſtructure. It conſiſts of a body of a regular ſhape, and a lofty and well proportioned ſteeple, formed of a tower, and ſpire. But its greateſt ornament is the bold ruſtic at the corners.

This church is a donative or curacy; the produce of which is accounted to be worth 700l. per annum in tythes only.

The veſtry is neither ſelect nor general, all being admitted who have either ſerved or fined for offices. And the pariſh officers are two churchwardens, and five overſeers of the poor, for that part of the pariſh within the freedom; and two churchwardens and four overſeers for that part out of the freedom.

Here are two charity ſchools; one in the freedom, founded by Sir John Caſs, alderman for fifty boys and forty girls. The other in Eaſt Smithfield for forty boys and thirty girls, founded by Sir Samuel Stirling, knight and alderman of the city of London; who, by his laſt will and teſtament, bearing date the ſeventh day of Auguſt, A. D. 1673, gave certain copyhold lands and tenements, lying in Eaſt Smithfield, in the pariſh of St. Mary Whitechapel, belonging to the manor of Stepney, in the county of Middleſex, the rents amounting to the value of 22l. yearly, as a foundation of a charity-ſchool, for the better education of the poor youths of the pariſh of St. Botolph's without Aldgate; which lands and tenements he ſurrendered for the uſe of his will to Mr. Corſellis, brewer; Mr. John Parſons, brewer; and Thomas Heath, Scrivener; truſtees of the ſaid charity. The ſchool maſter to be a batchelor of arts of the univerſity of Cambridge, and to teach ſchool in a brick houſe, which he, the ſaid Sir Samuel Sterling, built at his own charge at the eaſt end of the town houſe, or queſt-houſe, upon Little Tower-hill, in the manor of Eaſt Smithfield. The ſchool-maſter to be choſen by the inqueſt of the ward of Portſoken, and the leet-jury of the manor of Eaſt Smithfield.

Leaving Houndſditch we paſs eaſtward through Gravel-lane into Petticoat-lane, formerly called Hog-lane. The alleys and courts that branch out of theſe lanes, and Houndſditch, are in general very narrow, meanly built, and occupied by Jews and inferior artificers.

Petticoat lane runs from Whitechapel bars northward as far as the ground called St. Mary Spital. On both ſides this lane in ancient times, were hedge rows and elm trees, with pleaſant fields to walk in; and at that time the habitation of great men. Among whom, ſo lately as in the reign of king James I. we find Gondomar, the Spaniſh ambaſſador. In this lane is a French chapel; and at the Boar's-head is kept a baptiſt meeting.

Oppoſite the front of the pariſh church of St. Botolph is a ſpacious, broad and long ſtreet, called the Minories, which is inhabited by conſiderable tradeſmen in moſt branches, but particularly gunſmiths. The weſt ſide of this ſtreet is almoſt entirely rebuilt, and ſeveral new ſtreets opened croſs Vine-ſtreet, which lead into Crutched-friars; and on the eaſt ſide is an arch or gate-way into a diſtrict called Little Minories. In this diſtrict is ſituate the pariſh church of TRINITY in the Minories.

This church ſtands on the ſpot where was anciently an abbey of nuns of the order of St. Clare, called the Minoreſſes, founded by Edmund earl of Lancaſter, brother to king Edward I. in the year 1293; but being ſuppreſſed in the year 1539, a number of houſes were erected in its ſtead, and a ſmall church was built for the inhabitants, and dedicated to the Trinity, whence it received its preſent appellation; and the additional epithet of Minories was added from the above monaſtery.

The preſent church is a ſmall brick edifice, with a low tower crowned with a turret.

The patronage of this church has been all along in the crown; but the income of the curate is ſaid to be ſo ſmall, as to amount to no more than 25l. per annum, beſides ſurplus fees.

The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, and one overſeer of the poor.

From the little Minories is a narrow foot-way into Heydon-yard, on the eaſt ſide of which is a narrow entry into Manſel-ſtreet, Goodman's-fields, ſo called from one Goodman, the land holder of that ground, were, about eighty years ago laid into four principal ſtreets, viz. Manſel-ſtreet on the weſt, Ailoff-ſtreet on the north, Lemon-ſtreet on the eaſt, and Preſcot-ſtreet on the ſouth, with a ſquare piece of land in the middle, uſed as a tenter ground. The buildings in theſe fields are in general very good, commodious, and high brick houſes.

Near the ſouth weſt angle of Ailoff-ſtreet is a Preſbyterian meeting-houſe. And in Preſcot-ſtreet is a plain neat building, inſtituted in the year 1758 for the reception of penitent proſtitutes, and founded by the name of

The MAGDALEN-HOUSE.

The objects of this foundation are women, who, having been ſeduced and plunged into ruin by temptations, to which their youth, and perſonal advantages had expoſed them, repent of their lewd way of life. The ſupport of it is by voluntary ſubſcriptions; and it is governed by a preſident, four vice-preſidents, a treaſurer, and committee of twenty one; five of whom conſtitute a quorum. The number of governors are not limited; but the ſubſcriber of five guineas is governor only for a year, whereas they who ſubſcribe twenty guineas are governors for life. Ladies that ſubſcribe are permitted to vote at all elections, &c. by proxy. There is a chaplain who is to reſide in the houſe, to read prayers, to preach on Sunday mornings, to attend the ſick, and inſtruct the family in the principles and duties of the Proteſtant religion as by law eſtabliſhed. There is likewiſe another preacher who officiates on Sunday evenings; on which occaſion there is always a collection for the penitents.

To this charity belong two phyſicians, two ſurgeons, and three apothecaries, who are required to behave with the utmoſt humanity and prudence. One of each is to attend the committee, and make weekly reports. They are all to attend in their own perſons, and no pupil, apprentice, or ſervant, ſhall at any time be admitted into the wards; and even when the phyſicians, ſurgeons, and apothecaries viſit the wards, they ſhall be attended by the matron.

The matron is to direct the œconomy of the houſe, and conſtantly to reſide in it. She is to ſee that all the women are neat and decent in their cloaths and perſons, and properly employed; that they diſcharge their duty, and conſtantly attend divine ſervice: ſhe is to receive from the ſteward the materials for their work, and deliver it back to him. She is to take care of the houſehold linen, and what belongs to the cloathing; to require from the ſteward ſuch proviſions as are neceſſary for the houſe, and to ſee that they are not given away or waſted. She is to keep the keys of the outward doors, which are to be delivered into her hands after the doors are locked, at ſeven in the winter, and nine in the ſummer; and ſhe is to take care that the rules of the houſe be ſtrictly obſerved, with regard to the time of reſt, diet, hours of devotion, and every thing that relates to good order.

The ſecretary is to keep the books, take minutes at all meetings, to collect the annual ſubſcriptions, and to give notice to ſuch ſubſcribers who are more than one year in arrears, &c.

The ſteward is to reſide conſtantly in the houſe, and to follow no other employment than what relates to this charity. He is to receive the reſpective proviſions and materials for the employment of the women, ordered by the committee, and inſpect the weight, meaſures, and quality thereof, and to make regular entries of them; to keep an exact account of all the work done by every reſpective woman, as the matron ſhall deliver it to him.

The porter is not to receive any letter, meſſage, or other thing into the houſe, or ſend out any thing, without the knowledge or inſpection of the matron: he is to reſide in the houſe, and ſtrictly to obſerve the inſtructions that ſhall be given him, in regard to viſitors, letters, &c.

The meſſenger is alſo to dwell in the houſe, and to be employed in errand and out-door buſineſs: but he is not to bring any letter, verbal meſſage, or other thing into the houſe, or to carry out any meſſage or other thing, without the knowledge or inſpection of the matron.

Neither the ſteward, porter nor meſſenger ſhall have any communication with the wards.

No officer, nor ſervant of the houſe ſhall, receive any money, fee, gratuity, or reward, beſides their wages.

Rules and regulations relating to the penitents.

1. That the method of admiſſion be by petition to the committee, the printed form of which, with proper blanks to be filled up, may be had gratis by application at the houſe. That every petitioner be examined as to her health, by the phyſician, ſurgeon, and matron. When any petition is approved, it ſhall be wrote upon Found proper, and ſigned by the chairman. Every perſon, upon admiſſion, ſhall ſubſcribe to the rules of the houſe, and alſo enter into an agreement to pay the ſum of ten pounds per annum for her board, lodgings, and neceſſaries, which is to be void, provided ſuch perſon continues in the houſe three years, or leſs time, at the option of the committee. No perſon admitted ſhall be allowed to go out of the houſe without ſpecial leave in writing, ſigned by the treaſurer or chairman, and two of the committee.

2. One or more wards are to be allowed for perſons newly admitted, where they are to remain ſome time for a trial of their behaviour. There ſhall be a ſuperiority of wards, according to the education or behaviour of the perſons admitted; and the inferior wards ſhall conſiſt of meaner perſons, and of thoſe degraded for miſbehaviour. In each ward they ſhall be claſſed, and one appointed to preſide and be accountable for the conduct and behaviour of the reſt; and they ſhall, by rotation, do the neceſſary offices in their reſpective wards, excepting the perſon appointed to preſide. They are alſo to perform the neceſſary offices of the houſe, as they ſhall be directed by the matron; and an allowance ſhall be made to ſuch as perform theſe offices, out of the general produce of the work done in the houſe, according to the proportion of the value of their duty and labour.

3. Each perſon is to lie in a ſeparate bed, and have a cheſt for her cloaths and linen, under lock and key to be kept by herſelf; and, where the room will admit of it, a ſmall cloſet or apartment is to be provided for the retirement of the moſt ſerious and beſt behaved, in the intervals of their employment, and theſe alſo conſidered as the reward of good conduct.

4. Their true names muſt be regiſtered; but, if deſirous of concealing themſelves, they may have liberty to aſſume a feigned name. As no reproaches muſt be made for paſt irregularities, under the ſevereſt injunctions; neither ſhall there be any inquiries made into the name of families; but all poſſible diſcouragement given to every kind of diſcovery that the parties themſelves do not chuſe to make.

5. Upon their admiſſion, if their apparel is in any tolerable condition, it is to be cleaned, ticketed, and laid by, in order to be returned them whenever they leave the houſe: but if ſuch apparel be too fine for their ſtation, it ſhall be ſold, and the produce brought to their account. They are to wear an uniform of light grey, and in their whole dreſs to be plain and neat.

Each ward is to dine at a ſeparate table. The matron is to dine at the head of the table of the ſuperior ward; and the head of each ward is to dine at the upper end of each table, and to ſay grace.

7. Each perſon is to be employed in ſome work or buſineſs according to her ability, and have ſuch part of the benefit ariſing from her labour and ingenuity as the committee ſhall judge ſhe deſerves; which ſum may be increaſed by the bounty of the houſe, as favourable opportunities may offer for eſtabliſhing them in the world. The articles propoſed for their employment are, making their own cloaths, both linnen and woollen; knitting, ſpinning, making bone lace, black lace, artificial flowers, childrens toys, winding ſilk, drawing patterns, making women and childrens ſhoes, mantuas, ſtays, coats, &c. but no part of their labour is to be ſold in the houſe, houſe, but at ſome other place appointed by the committee. In their work, as in every other circumſtance, the utmoſt care and delicacy, humanity and tenderneſs will be obſerved, that this eſtabliſhment may not be thought a houſe of correction, or even of hard labour, but a ſafe retreat from their diſtreſsful circumſtances.

8. From Lady-day to Michaelmas they are to riſe at ſix and be in bed at ten; and from Michaelmas to Lady-day are to riſe at ſeven and be in bed at nine; and after that time no fire or candle ſhall be allowed, except in the ſick ward.

9. They are to breakfaſt at nine o'clock, and be allowed half an hour; and are to dine at one o'clock, and be allowed an hour; they may leave off work at ſix in the winter, and ſeven in ſummer.

10. No governor, or any other perſon, ſhall be permitted to viſit the wards, or any of the women, without leave in writing firſt obtained from the treaſurer or chairman, and two of the committee, except in caſes provided for; and in all caſes the matron to attend them.

11. Abuſive or reproachful language, inſolence or diſobedience to the officers, indecent or profane expreſſions, and ſuch kind of turbulent conduct, ſhall ſubject them to confinement in a room ſix hours for the firſt offence. For the ſecond offence they ſhall be admoniſhed publicly by the chaplain and the matron; and the reſt of their own ward may be alſo appealed to for their diſapprobation of ſuch conduct. The third offence ſhall ſubject them to be confined for twelve hours, and to have but one ſpare meal during the whole day, and if found to be incorrigible, then to forfeit a certain proportion, or the whole, of what hath been acquired by their labour, at the diſcretion of the committee, and be ſubject to the conſequences of their diſagreement; and to be diſmiſſed the houſe, and never re-admitted.

12. After the continuance of any woman in the houſe three years, upon the modeſt and virtuous demeanor and induſtrious conduct of ſuch woman, or upon application of her parents or friends, or any houſekeeper of ſufficient credit, if ſuch friends declare they will forgive the paſt offences of ſuch woman, and will provide for her; or if ſuch houſekeeper will receive ſuch woman as a ſervant; in either of theſe caſes the governors may diſcharge ſuch woman with her conſent.

13. Upon the diſcharge of ſuch woman, her cloaths, or, if ſold, the produce of them, ſhall be returned to her, together with whatever may be due upon her account, and a certificate given her, under the hands of the treaſurer, or the preſident, and two or more of the committee, of her conduct and behaviour during the time of her being in the houſe.

14. Every woman who ſhall be placed in a ſervice from this houſe, and ſhall continue one whole year in ſuch ſervice, to the entire approbation of ſuch maſter or miſtreſs, upon its being made appear to the ſatisfaction of the committee, they may give the woman a gratuity not exceeding two guineas, as a reward for her good behaviour.

15. The committee will, upon the good behaviour of the women, intereſt themſelves to obtain a reconciliation with their parents and friends, when their contract will be cancelled.

16. Beſides the vouchers abovementioned, and the advantages ariſing from their labour, a bounty may be given, at the diſcretion of the committee, to ſuch as ſhall be properly diſcharged. This gift ſhall be preſented not only to thoſe who marry in a manner ſatisfactory to the committee, but alſo to ſuch as ſhall ſet up trades in whatever way they ſhall have gained a proficiency: ſo that nothing ſhall be omitted which can promote the great ends of preſerving life, of rendering that life uſeful, and of recovering thoſe who are now loſt to the community.

The weſt end of Preſcot-ſtreet opens towards the ſouth with a paſſage into Roſemary-lane, in which is a Baptiſt meeting-houſe; and at the ſouth-weſt corner of Lemon-ſtreet, in Roſemary branch-alley, is another of the ſame denomination.

On the north ſide of Roſemary-lane, and at the weſt end, ſtands a good ſet of alms-houſes lately built at the expence of the Merchant-taylors company, for fourteen poor old women, who receive 16d. per week, by the founder's will, and 8l. 15s. annually from the company. On the ſouth ſide of this lane lies the ground called Eaſt Smithfield, now divided into a great number of alleys, lanes, courts, &c. but in the reign of king Henry III. was an open field, on which was held a fair, by royal grant, for fifteen days, viz. from the eve of Penticoſt to the octaves of Trinity. And the ſaid king ſent his briefs to the ſeveral ſheriffs of Lincoln, Glouceſter, Kent, Worceſter, York, Norfolk and Suffolk, and to the mayor and ſheriffs of London, to proclaim the ſame. "And therefore we command you, that you cauſe to be proclaimed the beforeſaid fair throughout the whole bailiffwick, as is aforeſaid; cauſing all merchants of your bailiffwick to know, that they may ſecurely come to the fair. Witneſs the king at Weſtminſter, the eighth day of February." 13 Henry III.

Between Eaſt Smithfield and Tower-hill once ſtood a religious foundation, called by the ſeveral names of the New Abbey, the Abbey of Graces, and Eaſtminſter, founded by king Henry III. On the ſite of this abbey, diſſolved by king Henry VIII. is founded and built the king's VICTUALLING OFFICE.

This building, which ſtands on the upper part of Little Tower-hill, near the end of King-ſtreet, contains houſes for the lodging of certain officers, ſeparate apartments for offices, ſtore-rooms, ſlaughter-houſes for oxen and hogs, a brewhouſe, and a houſe for ſalting and barrelling proviſions.

The buſineſs of this office is under the direction of ſeven commiſſioners who have each 400l. per annum, and a ſeparate department; under whom is a ſecretary, accomptants, clerks, ſurveyors, and other officers and ſervants. In this office all purſers, and others intruſted with the public ſtores of proviſions, or contract for them, are to paſs their accounts. Farther matters reſpecting Tower-hill will be deſcribed in their proper place.

CHAPTER XXI.

Of QUEENHITHE WARD.

THIS ward receives its name from the hithe or harbour for large boats, barges, or lighters, and even for ſhips, which in ancient times anchored at that place, as they do now at and near Billingſgate. It bears the additional epithet of queen, from the queens of England uſually poſſeſſing the tolls and cuſtoms of veſſels that unloaded goods there, which were very conſiderable; and all veſſels laden with corn and fiſh were obliged to unload at this hithe, and no where elſe. It is now a great meal-market, well furniſhed with conveniences to depoſit goods brought hither by water to be ſold; and with a commodious market-houſe.

This ward is bounded on the eaſt by Dowgate-ward, on the north by Bread-ſtreet and Cordwainers wards, on the ſouth by the Thames, and on the weſt by Caſtlebaynard ward. It is divided into nine precincts; and is governed by an alderman, ſix common-council-men including the alderman's deputy and nine conſtables.

The extent of this ward beginneth on the ſouth ſide of Knightrider-ſtreet, and runneth weſt to a lane called Lambert-hill; out of Knightrider-ſtreet are divers lanes running ſouth to Thames-ſtreet. The firſt is Trinity-lane, which runneth down by the weſt end of Trinity-church. There is Spuren-lane, or Spooners-lane, now called Huggen-lane: then Bread-ſtreet-hill: then St. Mary Mounthaut; out of which lane, on the eaſt ſide thereof, is one other lane, turning eaſt through St. Nicholas Olave's church-yard to Breadſtreet-hill. This lane is called Finimore-lane or Five-foot-lane, becauſe it is but five foot in breadth at the weſt end. In the middle of this lane runneth down one other lane, broader, ſouth to Thames-ſtreet, called Deſborne-lane. On the north ſide, coming from Knightrider-ſtreet, it takes in all the eaſt ſide of Lambert-hill, and ſo much of the weſt ſide as from the north end of Blackſmith's-hall to Thames-ſtreet, and ſo much of Thames-ſtreet as three doors weſt from the Old-Swan brewhouſe, in the eaſt unto Huntingdon-houſe, over againſt St. Peter's church in the weſt, near unto Paul's-wharf, and on the lane ſide from the Blue-boar to the weſt end of St. Peter's-church, and up St. Peter's-hill two houſes north above the ſaid church.

We ſhall begin the ſurvey of this ward at Old-Fiſh-ſtreet, (otherwiſe called Labour-in-vain-hill, from the difficulty of carriages aſcending it) at the north weſt angle of which is ſituate the pariſh church of ST. NICHOLAS Cole-Abbey.

This church is ſo denominated from its dedication to the above-mentioned ſaint; but the reaſon of the additional epithet is not known, ſome conjecturing it to be a corruption of Golden-Abbey, and others that it is derived from Cold-abbey, or Coldbey, from its cold or bleak ſituation. It is known that there was a church in the ſame place before the year 1383: but the laſt ſtructure being conſumed in the great conflagration in 1666, the preſent church was built in its place, and the pariſh of St. Nicholas Olave united to it.

This edifice conſiſts of a plain body well enlightened by a ſingle range of windows decently ornamented. It is ſixty-three feet long, and forty-three feet broad; thirty-ſix feet high to the roof, and one hundred and thirty-five to the top of the ſpire. The tower is plain, but ſtrengthened with ruſtic at the corners; and the ſpire, which is of the maſſy kind, has a gallery and many openings.

The advowſon of this rectory was antiently in the dean and chapter of St. Martin's-le-Grand; but upon the grant of that collegiate church to the abbot and canons of Weſtminſter, the patronage devolved to that convent, in whom it continued till the diſſolution of their monaſtery; when coming to the crown it remained therein, till queen Elizabeth, in the year 1560, granted the patronage thereof to Thomas Reeve and George Evelyn, and their heirs in ſoccage, who, conveying it to others, it came at laſt to the family of the Hackers; one whereof was colonel Francis Hacker, commander of the guard that conducted king Charles I. to and from his trial, and at laſt to the ſcaffold; for which, after the reſtoration, he was executed as a traitor, when the advowſon reverted to the crown, in whom it ſtill continues. The rector, beſides his other profits, receives 130l. a year in lieu of tythes. The church of St. Nicholas Olave ſtood where the church yard is now, on the weſt ſide of Bread-ſtreet-hill; the advowſon of which is in the crown and the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, who preſent alternately. The veſtries of theſe pariſhes are general; and each has two church-wardens and two collectors or overſeers of the poor.

Thames-ſtreet runs through the heart of this ward, and contains, on the ſouth ſide, ſeveral lanes that lead down to Wood-wharf, Broken-wharf, Brooker's wharf, Brook's-wharf, Queenhithe, and other places on the Thames ſide; on which account this diviſion is greatly thronged with carts employed in carrying goods and merchandize.

In this ſtreet, oppoſite Broken-wharf, is ſituate the pariſh church of St. MARY SOMERSET.

This church takes the additional epithet of Somerſet from its vicinity to Sumnor's het, or hithe, a ſmall port or haven reſembling that of Queenhithe. A church was ſituated in this place before the year 1335; but the old edifice ſharing the fate of moſt of the other public buildings, in the fire of London, the preſent ſtructure was erected in its ſtead.

The body of this edifice is enlightened by a range of lofty arched windows, and the wall is terminated by a baluſtrade. A well proportioned ſquare tower riſes to a conſiderable height, and is crowned with a handſome vaſe at each corner, ſupported on a very ornamental pedeſtal, with a handſome turret between in the form of an obeliſk, each ſupported on the ſame kind of pedeſtal as the vaſes, and crowned with a ball.

This church is in the gift of a lay patron, and being united to St. Mary Mounthaw, which is in the gift of the biſhop of Hereford, they preſent alternately to this living, which is rated by act of parliament at 110l. per annum, in lieu of tythes, and 30l. in glebe.

The veſtry of St. Mary Somerſet is ſelect, conſiſting of about twenty; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, four overſeers, two collectors, and two ſideſmen,

The veſtry of St. Mary Mounthaw is general, and there are only two churchwardens. It was called Mounthaw, or Mountauts, or Montalto, from the founder, belonging to a family in Norfolk of that name. The ſite of the church, which is on the eaſt ſide of Fiſhſtreet-hill, is at this time uſed only as a burial place for the inhabitants.

On the north ſide of Thames-ſtreet, at the ſouth-weſt angle of Little Trinity-lane, is ſituate the pariſh church of St. MICHAEL, Queenhithe.

About the year 1181 this church was denominated St. Michael de Cornhithe, which may lead us to the origin of the name by which we at preſent call that wharf, and this church from its ſituation near it; as the quantities of corn brought thither down the Thames might occaſion the original name, and Queenhithe be only a corrupt way of ſpeaking it.

The old church being conſumed by the dreadful fire in 1666, the preſent ſtructure was erected in its ſtead. It conſiſts of a well proportioned body, enlightened by two ſeries of windows, the firſt a range of tall arched ones, and over theſe a range of large port-hole windows, above which are cherubims heads, and underneath feſtoons, that adorn the lower part, and fall between the tops of the under ſeries. The tower is plain but well proportioned, and is terminated by a ſpire crowned with a fane in the form of a little ſhip.

This church has all along been in the gift of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, and is ſubject to the archdeacon. On its being rebuilt the pariſh of the Trinity was united to it, by which the rector's fees were conſiderably augmented, he receiving, beſides other advantages, 160l. per annum, in lieu of tythes.

Trinity church was ſituate at the north-eaſt corner of Trinity-lane, where at preſent ſtands the Sweediſh, otherwiſe called the Lutheran church. It was in the gift of the dean and chapter of Canterbury, ſo that the living of the united pariſhes is alternately in the gift of thoſe two patrons.

On the weſt ſide of Trinity-lane, at the corner of Huggen-alley, ſtands

PAINTER STAINERS HALL.

This hall is adorned with a handſome ſcreen, arches, pillars, and pilaſters of the Corinthian order, painted in imitation of porphyry, with gilt capitals. The pannels are of wainſcot, and the ceilings are embelliſhed with great variety of hiſtory and other paintings, exquiſitely performed; amongſt which are the portraits of king Charles II. and his queen Catherine, by Mr. Houſeman.

In this court room are ſome fine pictures, moſt of which are portraits of the members of the company; and in the front of the room is a fine buſt of Mr. Thomas Evans, who left five houſes in Baſinghall-ſtreet to the company.

Mr. Camden, the famous antiquarian, gave the Painter Stainers company a ſilver cup and cover, which they uſe every St. Luke's day at their election; the old maſter drinking to the one then elected, out of it. On this cup is the following inſcription: Gal. Camdenos Clarenceux filius Sampſoris pictoris Londinenſis dono dedit.

This company was incorporated by letters patent granted by queen Elizabeth in the year 1582, by the name of "The maſter, wardens and com-" monalty of the freedom of the art and myſ-" tery of painting, called painter-ſtainers, within " the city of London;" and is governed by a maſter, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants, who have a conſiderable livery, and is numbered the twenty-eighth in the city liſt of companies.

Lambert-hill is well built, and inhabited by private families. On the hill ſtands a handſome building called

BLACKSMITHS HALL.

The company of Blackſmiths is very ancient by preſcription, but was not incorporated till the reign of queen Elizabeth, in the year 1571, by the title of "The keepers or wardens and ſociety " of the art and myſtery de les Blackſmiths." It is a livery company, the 40th in the city liſt, and is governed by a maſter, three wardens and a court of aſſiſtants.

CHAP.

CHAPTER XXII.

Of TOWER-STREET WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from the principal ſtreet therein, which leadeth out of the city in a direct line to the grand entrance into the Tower of London, and is the firſt ward in the ſouth eaſt part of the city.

It is bounded on the eaſt by Tower-hill and part of Aldgate ward, on the north by Langbourn ward, on the weſt By Billingſgate ward, and on the ſouth by the river Thames. It extends from the Tower of London in the eaſt, to the middle way between Great Dice-key and Smart's key in the weſt; and from the weſt corner of Tower-dock in the ſouth, to within ſeventy-feet of the north end of Rood-lane in the north, in which are contained a great number of ſtreets, lanes, &c. as, part of Thames-ſtreet, Seething-lane, Mark-lane, Mincing-lane, Hart-ſtreet, Idle-lane, St. Dunſtan's-hill, Harp-lane, Beer-lane, &c.

This ward is divided into twelve precincts; and is governed by one alderman, twelve common-council-men, (one of whom is the alderman's deputy) twelve conſtables, thirteen inqueſt-men, twelve ſcavengers and a beadle.

We ſhall begin the ſurvey of this ward at Thames-ſtreet, which is a place of conſiderable trade, and occupied by great dealers as well wholeſale as retail. Though this ſtreet is very broad, yet the inhabitants are greatly annoyed with carts, employed by the merchants to carry their goods to and from the keys. That part of Thames-ſtreet which is in this ward goeth not ſo far as Billingſgate, and contains the following keys or wharfs, viz. the Tower-dock, Brewers-key, Galley-key, Cuſtom-houſe-key, Potters-key, Wiggins-key, Ralphs-key, Temple-key, Little Dice key, Great Dice-key, Smarts-key; all which are uſed for the lading and unlading merchandize, &c.

The firſt avenue at the weſt end of Thames-ſtreet, on the north ſide, is Idle-lane, between which, and Dunſtan's-hill, ſtands the beautiful church of ST. DUNSTAN in the Eaſt.

This church is dedicated to St. Dunſtan archbiſhop of Canterbury, an implacable enemy and cruel perſecutor of the ſecular clergy, in favour of the regulars; and the additional epithet, the Eaſt is given it, to diſtinguiſh it from St. Dunſtan's in Fleet-ſtreet. It ſuffered greatly by the fire of London in 1666, but was thoroughly repaired in eighteen months after, though the ſteeple was delayed ten years longer.

It is built in the modern Gothic ſtile, eighty-ſeven feet in length, ſixty-three in breadth, and thirty-three in height to the roof. It is well lightened, and agreeably diſpoſed within. The ſteeple is 125 feet high, and well conſtructed in the Gothic manner. The tower is light, ſupported by outworks at the angles, and divided into three ſtages, terminating at the corners by four handſome pinnacles; in the midſt of which riſes the ſpire, on the narrow crowns of four Gothic arches, a bold attempt in architecture, and is one proof, among many, of the great geometrical ſkill of the architect, Sir Chriſtopher Wren, who built this light and elegant tower.

The patronage of this rectory was anciently in the prior and canons of Canterbury, who in the year 1365 granted the ſame to Simon their archbiſhop, and his ſucceſſors, in whom it ſtill remains, and is one of the thirteen peculiars in this city belonging to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury.

The value of this living is ſettled by act of parliament, at 240l. per annum, in lieu of tythes. The veſtry is ſelect, and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens and two overſeers.

On the north ſide of this church is the COAL-METERS OFFICE.

In this office are entered all ſhips that arrive in the port of London with coals; and to which belong fifteen maſter-meters, who appoint a ſufficient number of perſons to meaſure the coals brought by the ſaid ſhips, to prevent impoſitions, which would otherwiſe happen both to the king and ſubject, in reſpect to the duty and meaſure.

Theſe maſter-meters have each four deputies or under coal-meters, who muſt be approved of by the Lord-mayor and aldermen, as upon them the care of weighing and meaſuring coals, principally depends; their buſineſs being to attend each ſhip, to top the vats, and to return an account of the coals meaſured to the coal-office, in order to aſcertain and collect the duties. For which trouble they receive one penny per chaldron for all coals meaſured, and two pence per ton for all coals weighed. Both the principal and under-meters take an oath, at their admiſſion into office, to give a juſt meaſure to rich and poor, without partiality or favour; to buy no coals except for his own uſe, nor to ſell any coals while in that office, nor to take any more for their trouble than was anciently allowed.

Farther to the eaſt is Harp-lane, a great thoroughfare for carts from the keys: on the eaſt ſide of which ſtands

BAKERS

BAKERS HALL.

This is a plain edifice, and was originally the dwelling-houſe of John Chicheley, chamberlain of London.

The fraternity of Bakers appears to be of great antiquity; for in the year 1155, it was charged in the great roll of the exchequer, with a debt of one mark of gold, for their guild; by which it ſeems as if the ancient guilds had held their privileges in fee farm of the crown. This company, however, was not incorporated till about the year 1307, which charter was renewed by Henry VII. and confirmed by divers of his ſucceſſors. But when, or by whom their arms were at firſt granted does not appear; though it muſt have been before the year 1590, becauſe in that year their creſt and ſupporters were granted by Clarencieux king at arms.

This company is incorporated by the name of "The maſter and wardens of the myſtery or art "of Bakers of the city of London;" and is governed by a maſter, four wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants. It is a livery company, and is numbered the nineteenth in the city liſt.

Near the ſouth-eaſt angle of Thames-ſtreet, fronting the wharfs and river, is ſituate

The CUSTOM HOUSE.

This is a commodious building, erected for the receipt of his majeſty's cuſtoms on goods imported and exported. In ancient times the buſineſs of the Cuſtom-houſe was tranſacted in a more irregular manner at Billingſgate: but in the year 1559, an act being paſſed that goods ſhould be no where landed, but in ſuch places as were appointed by the commiſſioners of the revenue, this was the ſpot fixed upon for the entries in the port of London, and here a cuſtom-houſe was ordered to be erected. It was, however, deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666, and was rebuilt with additions two years after by king Charles II. in a much more magnificent and commodious manner, at the expence of 10,000l. but that being alſo deſtroyed in the ſame manner in 1718, the preſent ſtructure was erected in its ſtead.

This edifice is built with brick and ſtone, and is calculated to ſtand for ages. It has underneath, and on each ſide, large warehouſes for the reception of goods on the public account, and that ſide of the Thames, for a great extent is filled with wharfs, keys, and cranes for landing them. It is one hundred and eighty-nine feet in length; the center is twenty-ſeven feet deep, and the wings conſiderably more. The center ſtands back from the river; the wings approach much nearer to it, and the building is judiciouſly and handſomely decorated with the orders of architecture: under the wings is a colonade of the Tuſcan order, and the upper ſtory is ornamented with Ionic columns and pediments. It conſiſts of two floors, in the uppermoſt of which is a magnificent room fifteen feet high, that runs almoſt the whole length of the building: this room is called the Long Room, and here ſit the commiſſioners of the cuſtoms, with their officers and clerks. The inner part is well diſpoſed, and ſufficiently enlightened; and the entrances are ſo well contrived, as to anſwer all the purpoſes of convenience for the tranſaction of ſuch extenſive buſineſs.

The government of the Cuſtom-houſe is under the care of nine commiſſioners, who are intruſted with the whole management of all his majeſty's cuſtoms in all the ports of England, the petty farms excepted, and alſo the overſight of all the officers belonging to them. Each of theſe commiſſioners has a ſalary of 1000l. per annum, and both they, and ſeveral of the principal officers under them, hold their places by patent from the king. The other officers are appointed by warrant from the lords of the treaſury.

It is obſervable that in the year 1590 the cuſtoms and ſubſidies in the port of London inwards, were let to farm to Mr. Thomas Smith, for 20,000l. per annum, when it was diſcovered that they amounted annually to 30,309l. ſo that queen Elizabeth loſt every year 10,309l. but by the vaſt increaſe of commerce ſince that time, they at preſent bring in above one hundred times as much, the cuſtoms now annually amounting to above two millions; and yet this immenſe buſineſs is tranſacted with as much order and regularity, as the common affairs of a merchant's compting-houſe.

Oppoſite Cuſtom-houſe key is Water-lane, which leads up a winding hill to Tower-ſtreet. About the middle of this lane, on the weſt ſide, is a handſome and large building, called the

TRINITY-HOUSE OF DEPTFORD STROND.

This ſociety was founded in the year 1515, by Sir Thomas Spert, knt. commander of the ſhip Henry Grace de Dieu, and comptroller of the navy to Henry VIII. for the regulation of ſeamen and convenience of ſhips and mariners on our coaſt; and incorporated by the abovementioned prince, who confirmed to them not only the ancient rights and privileges of the company of mariners of England, but their ſeveral poſſeſſions at Deptford; which together with the grants of queen Elizabeth and king Charles II. were alſo confirmed by letters patent of the firſt of James II. in 1685, by the name of "The "maſter, wardens and aſſiſtants of the guild or "fraternity of the moſt glorious and undivided "Trinity, and of St. Clement in the pariſh of "Deptford Strond in the county of Kent.

This corporation is governed by a maſter, four wardens, eight aſſiſtants, and eighteen elder brethren. The inferior members are called younger brethren; into which number any maſter or mate ſkilled in navigation may be admitted; which excuſes him from ſerving pariſh and ward offices, and entitles them to be pilots.

The maſter, wardens, aſſiſtants, and elder brethren are by charter inveſted with the following powers.

1. That of examining the mathematical children of Chriſt's-hoſpital.

2. The examination of the maſters of his majeſty's ſhips; the appointing pilots to conduct ſhips in and

and out of the river Thames; and the amercing all ſuch as ſhall preſume to act as maſter of a ſhip of war or pilot, without their approbation, in a pecuniary mulct of twenty ſhillings.

3. The ſettling the ſeveral rates of pilotage and erecting light-houſes, and other ſea marks upon the ſeveral coaſts of the kingdom, for the ſecurity of navigation; to which light-houſes all ſhips pay one half penny a ton.

4. The granting licences to poor ſeamen, not free of the city, to row on the river Thames for their ſupport, in the intervals of ſea-ſervice, or when paſt going to ſea.

5. The preventing of aliens from ſerving on board Engliſh ſhips, without their licence, upon the penalty of five pounds for each offence.

6. The puniſhing of ſeamen for deſertion, or mutiny in the merchants ſervice.

7. The hearing and determining the complaints of officers and ſeamen in the merchants ſervice; but ſubject to an appeal to the lords of the admiralty, or the judge of the court of admiralty.

To this company belongs the ballaſt office, for clearing and deepning the river Thames by taking from thence a ſufficient quantity of ballaſt, for the ſupply of all ſhips that ſail out of that river; in which ſervice ſixty barges, with two men in each, are conſtantly employed, and all ſhips that take in ballaſt pay them one ſhilling a ton, for which it is brought to the ſhips ſides.

In conſideration of the great increaſe of the poor of this fraternity, they are by their charter empowered to purchaſe in mortmain lands, tenements, &c. to the amount of 500l. per annum and alſo to receive charitable benefactions of well diſpoſed perſons, to the like amount of 500l. per annum clear of reprizes.

There are annually relieved by this company about 3000 poor ſeamen, their widows and orphans, at the expence of about 6000l. They generally meet to chuſe their maſter at their houſe at Deptford, though they are not obliged to do it there. Their meetings are generally on Wedneſdays and Saturdays, but their courts are not conſtantly fixed to a ſet time.

Their houſe in Water-lane has been twice burnt down, once at the fire of London, and the laſt time in the year 1718. Among the curioſities preſerved in the hall of this building is a flag taken from the Spaniards, by the brave Sir Francis Drake, whoſe picture is alſo there. A large and exact model of a ſhip entirely rigged, and two large globes; and in the parlour are five large drawings, curiouſly performed by the pen, of ſeveral engagements at ſea, in the reign of king Charles II.

On the north ſide of Tower-ſtreet is Mincing-lane, which is handſomely built, and well inhabited. Near the north eaſt end of which is ſituate.

CLOTHWORKERS HALL.

This is a neat brick building, with fluted columns of the ſame, crowned with Corinthian capitals of ſtone. The hall is a lofty room adorned with wainſcot to the ceiling, where is curious fret work. The ſcreen at the ſouth end is of oak, adorned with four pilaſters, their entablature and compaſs pediment of the Corintian order, enriched with their arms and palm branches. The weſt end is adorned with the figures of king James and king Charles I. richly carved, as big as life, in their robes, with Regalia, all gilt with gold, and highly finiſhed, where is a ſpacious window of ſtained glaſs, and the king's-arms; alſo thoſe of Sir John Robinſon, knt. and bart. his majeſty's lieutenant of the Tower of London, Lord-mayor of the city in the year 1663, and preſident of the artillery company.

This company was incorporated by king Edward VI. in the year 1482, by the name of "The fraturnity of the aſſumption of the Bleſſ-"ed Virgin Mary, of the ſhearmen of L'ndon." But being incorporated by queen Elizabeth, her majeſty changed their firſt appellation to that of "The maſter, wardens, and commonalty of "freemen, of the art and myſtery of Cloth-"workers of the city of London." It is now a livery company and the laſt of the twelve companies of London; and is governed by a maſter, four wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants. They have large annual eſtates, both in their own right and in truſt for charities; out of which they pay to the poor upwards of 1400l. per annum.

Mark-lane, which opens into Fenchurch-ſtreet, is well built, and principally inhabited by merchants and others of opulence. It was anciently called Mart-lane, from a mart or free market kept there. On the eaſt ſide of this lane, near Tower-ſtreet, ſtands

The CORN EXCHANGE

This building which is very handſome, is adapted for tranſacting buſineſs in the corn and meal way. Next the ſtreet is an aſcent of three ſteps to a range of eight lofty Doric columns, thoſe at the corners being coupled: between them are iron rails and three iron gates. Theſe columns, and two others on the inſide, ſupport a plain building two ſtories high, which contains two coffee-houſes, to which they aſcend by two flights of handſome ſtone ſteps, on each ſide underneath the edifice. On entering the iron gates you paſs forwards into a ſmall ſquare, paved all over with broad ſtones. This is ſurrounded by a colonade, compoſed of ſix columns on each ſide, and four at the ends, reckoning the corners twice. Above the entablature is an handſome baluſtrade, ſurrounding the whole ſquare with an elegant vaſe placed over each column. The ſpace around, within the colonade, is very broad, with ſaſh windows on the top to convey the greater light to the corn factors, who ſit round the court below. Each has a kind of deſk before him, on which lie ſeveral parcels of corn; and from theſe ſmall ſamples are every market day ſold many thouſand quarters.

Seething lane goes out of Tower-ſtreet, near the north eaſt angle into Hart-ſtreet and Crutched-friars. At the ſouth eaſt corner of this lane ſtands the pariſh church of ALLHALLOWS Barking.

This chureh is ſo denominated from its being dedicated to all the ſaints, vulgarly called All-hallows, and its anciently belonging to the abbeſs and convent of Barking in Eſſex. It eſcaped the fire in 1666, and carries about it the marks of that period when architecture was not well underſtood in England. That this church is of great antiquity will appear from a chapel which king Richard I. founded therein upwards of five hundred years ago; and in which ſome writers affirm his heart was buried under the high altar. This chapel was confirmed and augmented by king Edward I. Edward IV. gave licence to his couſin John, earl of Worceſter, to found there a brotherhood for a maſter and brethren. And he gave to the Cuſtos of that fraternity, which was Sir John Scot, knt. Thomas Colt, John Tate, and John Croke, the priory of Totingbroke, and the advowſon of the pariſh church of Stretham in the county of Surry, with all the members and appurtenances, and a part of the priory of Okeborne in Wiltſhire, both priors aliens, and appointed it to be called the king's chapel or chantry, In capella beatæ Mariæ de Barking.

King Richard III. new built this chapel, and founded therein a college of prieſts, conſiſting of a dean and ſix cannons: all which that king placed there. The deanry he gave to Edmund Chaderton, a great favourite of his. The canonries he diſpoſed, at the time that Chaderton was made dean, to theſe perſons following, viz. Mr. Thomas Cowton, a cannon there; Richard Baldry another; Mr. Jane another; James Molineux another; Richard Selſie another; Maculin Coſin another. Hamond de Lega was buried in that chapel. Robert Tate, mayor of London 1488, and others, were there buried.

This college was ſuppreſſed and pulled down in the year 1548, the ſecond of king Edward VI. The ground was employed as a garden-plot during the reigns of king Edward, queen Mary and part of queen Elizabeth, till at length a large ſtrong frame of timber and brick was ſet thereon, and employed as a ſtorehouſe of merchants goods brought from the ſea by Sir William Winter, &c.

This church is of conſiderable extent, and the ſteeple is a plain tower with its turret. It is a vicarage in the patronage of the archbiſhop of Canterbury; and the vicar beſides other advantages, receives about 126l. per annum in tythes.

The veſtry is ſelect; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, four collectors for the poor, two ſideſmen and four auditors of accounts.

From thence we paſs on to Tower hill, which is a very ſpacious area to the north, eaſt and weſt, of the Tower-ditch, and divided into Great and Little Tower-hill. The former is all that ſpace between the Thames on the ſouth weſt, and the houſes called Poſtern-row on the eaſt. At the north weſt part of this angle which is well built and inhabited, is the back entrance into the Navy-office: and at the north eaſt angle is the Sick and wounded office. Under Poſtern-row is a ſpring of excellent water; and in the middle of Great Tower-hill, facing the Sixpenny-office, or Catharine-court, is the place where ſcaffolds have been uſually erected for the beheading of criminals condemned by the ſtate.

Little Tower-hill is all that vacant ſpace of ground which runs from Poſtern-row along the Tower-ditch to Irongate; and, except the Victualling-office, it is very badly furniſhed with houſes for reputable inhabitants, moſt of the buildings on the eaſt ſide being greatly decayed. At the ſouth end of this hill is a landing-place called Irongate, ſo named from an iron gate, which formerly ſhut up the eaſt entrance into the Tower.

One half of the Tower, the ditch on the weſt ſide, and bulwarks adjoining, ſtand within that part where the wall of the city of old time went ſtraight from the Poſtern-gate ſouth to the river of Thames, before the Tower was built. This wall extends from the poſtern acroſs Tower-ditch, and, encompaſſing the Tower-chapel, goes along under the old houſes, where its remains are to be ſeen, that go to the parade from Traitor's-bridge.

We have now no other remarkable in this ward, except the Tower itſelf; a particular deſcription of which the reader will find in page 89, &c.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Of VINTRY WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from a part thereof called the Vintrie by the ancients, occupied by Vintners or Wine-merchants from Bourdeaux, ſettled on the bank of the river Thames; at which place they landed their wines, and were obliged to ſell them in forty days, till the twenty-eighth of Edward I.

It begins in the eaſt at the weſt end of Dowgate ward, as the water-courſe of Wallbrook parteth them, to wit, at Grantham's-lane on the Thames ſide, and at Elbow-lane on the land ſide: it runneth along in Thames-ſtreet weſt, ſome three houſes beyond the Old Swan, a brewhouſe on the Thames ſide, and on the land ſide ſome three houſes weſt beyond St. James's at Garlick-hithe. It ſtretcheth from the Vintry north, to the wall of the weſt gate of the Tower-royal. It is bounded on the north by Cordwainers ward, on the ſouth by the Thames, on the eaſt by Dowgate ward, and on the weſt by Queenhithe ward.

This

This ward is divided into nine precincts, and is governed by an alderman, nine common-councilmen including the alderman's deputy, nine conſtables, thirteen inqueſt-men, three ſcavengers and a beadle.

We ſhall begin the ſurvey of this ward with that part of Thames-ſtreet which runs eaſt and weſt through the heart of it, and reaches from the weſt end of Dowgate ward to Townſend-lane, where Queenhithe ward begins.

In this part of Thames-ſtreet, on the ſouth ſide, are Black Swan-alley and Shepherd's-alley, which are narrow, long, and indifferently well built for buſineſs at the waterſide. Emperor's-head-court narrow and ordinary. Brickhill-lane, well built and open. Three-crane-lane, crooked, long and narow, chiefly occupied by coſtermongers. Church-lane is alſo long and narrow.

New Queen ſtreet, otherwiſe called the Three-cranes in the Vintry, is a good open ſtreet, eſpecially that part next Cheapſide, which is beſt built and inhabited; but it hath no more in this ward than a little beyond St. Thomas Apoſtles, the reſt of this ſtreet being in Cordwainers ward and Cheap-ward. At the ſouth end of this ſtreet, next the Thames, is a pair of ſtairs, or landing-ing-place, called the Three-cranes, which is the uſual place for the Lord-mayor to take water at to go to Weſtminſter, to be ſworn into his office. And theſe ſtairs are much frequented by coſtermongers, who have large warehouſes near them to depoſit their fruit, &c.

The north ſide of Thames-ſtreet hath theſe places: Little Elbow-lane, which falls into Great Elbow-lane, and ſo into College-hill; both which lanes are indifferent.

College-hill comes out of St. Thomas Apoſtles and falls into Thames-ſtreet; a place well built and inhabited by merchants and others. On the weſt ſide is Maiden-lane, which croſſeth New Queen-ſtreet, and falls into Garlick-hill. Out of this lane is a paſſage into Thames-ſtreet, and another into Maidenhead-court, which is but ordinary. On the eaſt ſide of College-hill is ſituate the pariſh church of St. MICHAEL ROYAL.

This church, which is a rectory, is thus denominated from its being anciently ſituate near the Tower Royal. It was a pariſh church before the year 1285, when it was under the patronage of the prior and canons of Canterbury, in whom it continued till it was converted into a college; and even then the ſaid monks ſo far continued patrons thereof, as to preſent a perſon nominated by the maſter and wardens of the mercers company.

This church was new builded, and made a college of St. Spirit and St. Mary, founded by Richard Whittington, mercer, four times mayor, for a maſter, four fellows, maſters of arts, clerks, conducts, choriſts, &c. and alms-houſe, called God's-houſe or hoſpital, for thirteen poor men: one of them to be tutor, and to have 16d. the week; the other twelve each of them to have 14d. the week, for ever, with other neceſſary proviſion.

The ordinances or orders to be obſerved in this college are as follow:

"To be twelve pouer folks alonely of men or women togidre: after the ſad diſcretion and good conſcience of the overſeers underwrit, and conſervators of the ſame houſe, to be provided and admitted.

"The which every day, when due and convenient time is, ſhall pray for evermore for al the now being alive, and alſo for the by-paſt, to God: whoſe names of great ſpecialty been expreſſed in theſe ſtatutes under-writ.

"To be one principal, which ſhal pas all other power and reverence, and be called tutor. The office and charge of him ſhal be goods of the alms-houſe, which ſhal come to his hands, well and truly to miniſter; the goods diſſevered to gather again togidre, to the uſe of the alms-houſe; and the huſbandry of the ſame houſe, in as much as he may goodly overſee, diſpoſe, and ordain; inforcing himſelf to edifie and nouriſh charity and peace among his felawes.

"The pouer folks unto the ſaid tutor evermore ſhall obey.

"The thirteen pouer folke to be hable in converſation, and honeſt in living.

"The ſame houſe to be called for ever God's houſe, or Almes-houſe, or the hoſpital of Richard Whittington.

"The L. Maior to be overſeer of the ſaid Almes-houſes; and the keepers of the commonalty of the craft of Mercers to be called evermore Conſervators of the foreſaid houſe.

"The tutor to have a place by himſelf, that is to ſay, a cell, or little houſe, with a chimney and a prevy, and other neceſſaries, in the which he ſhal lyegge and reſt; and that he may aloon and by himſelf, without let of any other perſoon, intend to the contemplation of God, if he woll.

"That the ſeid tutor and pouer folke, whan they be in the aforeſaid houſes and cells, and alſo in the cloiſters, and other places of the foreſaid almes houſes, have hemſelfe quietlie and peſably, without noiſe or diſturbance of his felawes; and that they occupy himſelf in prayer or reading, or in labour of her hondes, or in ſome other occupation, &c."

It endeth thus:

"In witneſs we have put to our ſeals. Gyven at London, the xxi day of Decemb. in the yere our lord a thouſand CCCC xxiii. and the yere of king Henry VI. after the conqueſt the thrydde.

"Go litel boke, go litel tregedie,—
"Thee lowly ſubmytting to al correction
"Of theym being maſters now of the Mercery,
"Olney, Felding, Boleyne, and of Burton:
"Herteley theym beſeyking with humble ſalu-
"tation
"Thee to accept, and thus to take in gre,
"For evre to be a ſervant withyn yeare commi-
"naltie."

But further, for the direction of their daily devotion, votion, of their eating, and their habit, theſe were the appointments and ordinances:

" Every tutor and pouer folk every day firſt whan they riſe fro their bedds, kneeling upon their knees, ſey a Pater Noſter and an Ave Maria, with ſpecial and herty recommendation making of the foreſaid Richard Whyttington and Alice to God, and our bleſſed lady maidyn Mary: and other times of the day, whan he may beſt and moſt commody have leiſure thereto, for the ſtaat of al ſouls aboveſaid, ſay three or two ſauters of our lady at the leaſt; that is to ſay, threis ſeaven Ave Marias, with xv Pater Noſters, and three Credes: but if he be letted with feblenes, or any other reaſonable cawſe, one in the day at leaſt, in caſe it may be; that is to ſay, after the meſſe, or when Complyn is don, they come togidder within the college about the tomb of the aforeſaid Richard Whyttington and Alice, and they that can ſey ſhall ſey, for the ſoules of the ſeid Richard and Alice, and for the ſoules of all chriſten people, this pſalm, de profundis, with the verſicles and orioſons that longeth thereto. And they that can ſhal ſey three Pater Noſters, three Ave Marias, and one crede. And, after this doon, the tutour, or oon of the eldeſt men of theym, ſhal ſey openly in Engliſh, " God have mercy on our founders ſoules, and " al chriſtens;" and they that ſtond about ſhal aunſwer and ſey, Amen.

" That they be bound to dwell and abide continewally in the ſeid almes houſe, and bounds thereof; and that every day, both at meet and ſoupier, they eet and be fed within the ſaid almeshouſe; and while they be at meet or ſoupier, they abſteyn thanne from veyn and ydel words; and if they wol any thyng talk, that it be honeſt and profitable.

" That the overcloathing of the tutour and pouer folk be derk and brown of colour, and not ſtaring ne blaiſing, and of eaſy priſed, according to their degre."

The executors of the will of Richard Whyttington conſtituted five chaplains in his college founded in this church; which were confirmed by the king in the third of Henry VI.

This Richard Whyttington was (in this church) three times buried; firſt by his executors, under a fair monument; then in the reign of Edward VI. the parſon of that church, thinking ſome great riches, (as he ſaid) to be buried with him, cauſed his monument to be broken, his body to be ſpoiled of his leaden ſheet, and again the ſecond time to be buried; and in the reign of queen Mary, the pariſhioners were forced to take him up to lap him in lead, as afore, to bury him a third time, and to place his monument, or the like, over him again; which remained, and ſo he reſted, till the great fire of London violated his reſting place again.

This church being conſumed with the other public buildings by the fire of London, the preſent ſtructure was erected in its ſtead, and the pariſh of St. Martin Vintry united to it. It is a plain, decent and ſubſtantial ſtone building, enlightened by a ſingle ſeries of large arched windows, placed ſo high that the doors open under the level of their bottoms. The tower conſiſts of three ſtages, and at the top is ſurrounded with carved open work inſtead of a baluſtrade: from hence riſes a light and elegant turret adorned with Ionic columns, and ending in a fine diminution, which ſupports the fane.

It is one of the thirteen peculiars belonging to the archbiſhop of Canterbury; and the rector, beſides his other profits, receives 140l. a year, in lieu of tythes. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, one collector, and one overſeer.

The church of St. Martin Vintry formerly ſtood near the ſouth-eaſt corner of Queen-ſtreet; the ſite of which is uſed as a burial place for the inhabitants. The pariſh, however, ſtill maintain a veſtry, which is general, maintain their own poor, and have two churchwardens, one collector for the poor, and one overſeer.

The Tower Royal, formerly ſituate at the upper end of the ſtreet now ſo called, was a great place, pertaining to the kings of this realm; but by whom the ſame was built, or of what antiquity continued, is uncertain, any more than that in the reign of king Edward I. the ſecond, fourth, and ſeventh years, it was the tenement of Simon Beawnies; alſo that, in the thirty-ſixth of Edward III. the ſame was called the Royal, in the pariſh of Michael de Pater-noſter; and that, in the forty-third of his reign, he gave it by the name of his Inne called the Royal, in his city of London, in value twenty pounds by the year, unto his college of St. Stephen at Weſtminſter. Notwithſtanding, in the reign of Richard II. it was called the Queen's Wardrobe, as appeareth by the following circumſtance:

" King Richard having in Smithfield over-
" come and diſperſed the rebels, he, his lords,
" and all his company entered the city of Lon" don with great joy, and went to the lady prin-
" ceſs his mother, who was then lodged in the " Tower Royal, called the Queen's Wardrobe,
" where ſhe had remained three days and two " nights, right ſore abaſhed. But when ſhe ſaw
" the king her ſon, ſhe was greatly rejoiced, and " ſaid, Ah, my ſon, what great ſorrow have I
" ſuffered for you this day! The king anſwered
" and ſaid, Certainly, Madam, I know it well,
" but now rejoice and thank God, for I have
" this day recovered mine heritage, and the " realm of England, which I had near hand
" loſt."

This tower ſeemeth to have been (at that time) of good defence; for when the rebels had beſet the Tower of London, and got poſſeſſion thereof, taking from thence whom they liſted, the princeſs being forced to fly, came to this Tower-royal, where ſhe was lodged and remained ſafe, as ye have heard; and it may be alſo ſuppoſed, that the king himſelf was at that time lodged there.

of king Stephen, againſt Maud the empreſs, in the year 1138, grew ſo far in favour with the ſaid king for his ſervice, that he built a houſe near the Tower-royal, in which tower it ſeemeth the king was then lodged, as in the heart of the city, for his greater ſafety. This proves the great antiquity of the Tower-royal.

St. Thomas Apoſtles of which there are two, viz. Great St. Thomas Apoſtles, which is in this ward; and Little St. Thomas Apoſtles, which is in Cordwainer's ward. This great St. Thomas Apoſtles is a handſome ſtreet, and well inhabited: on the north ſide of which, before the fire of London, was ſituate the church of St. Thomas Apoſtles; but that not being rebuilt, the pariſh is united to St. Mary Aldermary. In this ſtreet are the following places: Black-lion-inn, but indifferent; Baldwin's yard, a handſome open court, with tolerable good buildings; Blunderbuſs-alley, on the eaſt ſide of St. Thomas's church-yard, very ſmall. Dodſon's court, a pretty large open place, with a freeſtone paſſage into Budge-row, well built and inhabited; nearly oppoſite which, in Cloak-lane, is a neat and convenient building called

CUTLERS HALL.

This company was incorporated by king Henry V. in the year 1417, by the ſtyle of "The "maſter, wardens, and commonalty of the my-"ſtery of cutlers of London." And they were afterwards united to the Belt and Sheath-makers. It is a livery company, and is governed by a maſter, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants; and is numbered the eighteenth in the city liſt.

Anchor-lane in Thames-ſtreet, is long and narrow; adjoining to which ſtands

VINTNERS HALL.

This is a handſome building, ſituate on the ſpot where once ſtood the houſe of Sir John Stody, who gave it the company; and was at that time called the Manor of the Vintry. The preſent building encloſes a ſquare court, with a large handſome iron gate in the front next the ſtreet, hung upon columns wreathed with grapes and leaves, and a Bacchus upon three tons, on each pillar. And behind the hall is a garden, with a paſſage to the Thames.

This is one of the twelve principal companies, and were anciently denominated merchant wine tunners of Gaſcoyne, and were of two ſorts, the Veneatrii, who imported the wine, and the Tabernarii who ſold it by retail, and kept either taverns or wine cellars. The vintners, however, were not incorporated till 15 Henry VI. who granted them a charter to make them a body politic, by the ſtyle of "The maſter, wardens, and "freeman and commonalty of the myſtery of "Vintners of the city of London;" but without a power to make bye-laws.

This company is governed by a maſter, three wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants. And the freemen belonging to it have the privilege of retailing wine without a licence from the Wine-office. They have conſiderable poſſeſſions, out of which they pay to charitable uſes about 600l. per annum.

Worceſter-place runs parallel with Anchor-lane, but is not remarkable on any other account than its being built upon the ſite of the manſion belonging to the earls of Worceſter.

Proceeding from the weſt, by the north ſide of Thames-ſtreet, we come to Garlick-hill. At the ſouth eaſt angle of which ſtands the pariſh church of St. JAMES Garlick-hill, or Garlickhithe.

This church is thus denominated from its dedication to St. James one of the apoſtles, and its vicinity to a garlic market, anciently held in this neighbourhood.

The old church being deſtroyed by the fire of London, the foundation of the preſent edifice was laid in the year 1676, and the church was finiſhed in 1682. It is built of ſtone, 75 feet long, 45 feet broad, 40 feet high to the roof, and the ſteeple 98 feet. The tower is divided into three ſtages. In the loweſt is a very elegant door, with coupled columns of the Corinthian order. In the ſecond is a large window, with the form of a circular one not opened over it. In the third ſtory is a window larger than the former; and the cornice above this ſupports a range of open work in the place of battlements, on a baluſtrade. From hence riſes the turret, which is compoſed of four ſtages, and decorated with columns, ſcrolls, and other ornaments.

The patronage of this rectory appears to have been in the abbot and convent of Weſtminſter, till the ſuppreſſion of their monaſtery; when coming to the crown, queen Mary, in the year 1553, granted the ſame to the biſhop of London and his ſucceſſors, in whom it ſtill continues. The rector receives, by act of parliament, 100l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens and four overſeers of the poor.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Of WALLBROOK WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from a ſtreet which runs up from Cannon-ſtreet, near London-ſtone, to the ſouth weſt corner of the Manſion-houſe; and is called Wallbrook, from a brook which formerly ran down on the weſt ſide thereof.

It is bounded on the eaſt by Langbourn ward, on the ſouth by Dowgate ward, on the weſt by Cordwainers ward, and on the north by Cheap ward. It is divided into ſeven precincts, and is governed by an alderman, eight common-councilmen, including the alderman's deputy, ſeven conſtables, thirteen inqueſt-men, ſix ſcavengers, and a beadle.

The ſtreets and lanes in this ward are, Wallbrook, as far as Bucklerſbury on both ſides. Bucklerſbury, the eaſt end on both ſides, about 80 feet. Budge-row, the eaſt end on both ſides for about 70 feet. Dowgate, the north end on the weſt ſide as far as Cloak-lane, and on the eaſt ſide as far as againſt Tallowchandlers-hall, Cannon ſtreet, on both ſides as far as Green Lettice-lane on the ſouth ſide, and to Abchurch-lane on the north ſide. St. Swithin's-lane on both ſides the way almoſt as far as Bearbinder-lane. The whole of Bearbinder-lane, except about 35 feet at the eaſt end. Lombard-ſtreet, about 175 feet on both ſides of the weſt end next the Manſion-houſe. Sherborne-lane, the ſouth end on both ſides for about 120 feet. Buſh-lane from Cannon-ſtreet ſouthwards on both ſides as far as Croſs-lane, which hath the north ſide in this ward. Suffolk lane, the weſt ſide at the north end for about 85 feet downwards. Green-Lettice-lane, only the weſt ſide. Abchurch-lane, the weſt ſide as far as the church.

The firſt principal building in this ward is the Lord-mayor's manſion houſe; a particular deſcription of which has been already given in page 305, &c.

This great building is ſituate on the ſpot where once ſtood Stocks-market; the origin of which market will beſt appear from the following account. About the year of Chriſt 1282, Henry Wallis, mayor, cauſed divers houſes in this city to be built towards the maintenance of London-bridge; namely, one void place near unto the pariſh church called Woolchurch, on the north ſide thereof, where ſome time (the way being very large and broad) had ſtood a pair of ſtocks for puniſhment of offenders. This building took name of thoſe ſtocks, and was appointed by him to be a market-place for fiſh and fleſh in the midſt of the city. And it was ordained, A. D. 1322, that none ſhould ſell fiſh or fleſh out of this and the other markets, upon pain to forfeit ſuch fiſh and fleſh for the firſt offence, and to loſe their freedom for the ſecond offence.

This Stocks-market was ſome time belonging to the keepers of the bridge of London, and they let the ſhops for term of their lives to the butchers and fiſhmongers at certain rents, which were appropriated for the uſe of the ſaid bridge. But afterwards, John de Giſors, mayor, 1312, it was concluded, that no keeper of the bridge ſhould let the ſaid ſhops for life, without the concurrence of the mayor and commonalty.

On the eaſt ſide of Wallbrook, about twenty feet from the ſouth end of the manſion-houſe, ſtands the pariſh church of

We read of a church near this ſpot dedicated to the ſame patron ſo early as the year 1135; but it then ſtood on the other ſide of the ſtreet. However, about the year 1428, Robert Chichely, mayor of London, purchaſed the ground of the preſent church and cemetry of the Grocers company, and the firſt ſtone of the new ſtructure was laid in 1429; but the work advanced ſo ſlowly, that it was not finiſhed till the year 1439.

The old ſtructure was deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666, and the preſent noble edifice was erected in its place by the great Sir Chriſtopher Wren. The ſteeple riſes ſquare to a conſiderable height, and is then ſurrounded with a baluſtrade, within which riſes a very light and elegant tower in two ſtages; the firſt adorned with Corinthian, and the ſecond with Compoſite columns, and covered with a dome, whence riſes the fane.

The principal beauties of this juſtly admired edifice are on the inſide; where the dome, which is ſpacious and noble, is finely proportioned to the church, and divided into ſmall compartments decorated with great elegance, and crowned with a lanthorn, while the roof, which is alſo divided into compartments, is ſupported by very noble Corinthian columns, raiſed on their pedeſtals. It has three iſles, and a croſs iſle; is 70 feet in length, and thirty-ſix in breadth; the height of the middle roof is thirty four feet, and of the cupola and lanthorn 58 feet. On the ſides under the lower roofs are only circular windows, but thoſe which enlighten the upper roof are ſmall arched ones; and at the eaſt end are three very noble arched windows.

In the opinion of ſome perſons this is Sir Chriſtopher Wren's maſter piece. It is even thought that Italy itſelf cannot produce any modern ſtructure equal to it in taſte, proportion, elegance and beauty. It has a very ſtriking effect at entering, every part at once attracting the eye, except the the baſes of the columns, which are injudiciouſly eclipſed by the carving on the top of the pews, which was not the deſign of the architect.

This church is a rectory, dedicated to St. Stephen the martyr, in the gift of the Grocers company; and being united with St. Bennet Sherehog, is worth one hundred pounds per annum in lieu of tythes. There is a good parſonage houſe adjoining to the ſouth ſide, worth forty pounds per annum. The veſtry is ſelect; and the pariſh officers are only two churchwardens.

St. Bennet Sherehog, the church of which was burnt down in 1666, was a rectory, and originally dedicated to St. Oſyth, or corruptly St. Syth; from whence we derive the name of Syth-lane; and the church ſtood near St. Syth's-lane, at the eaſt end of Needler's-lane, Cheapſide. Edward Hall, who wrote the chronicle from Richard II. to the end of Henry VIII. was buried in this church; the ſite of which is now uſed as a burial place for the inhabitants, who have a general veſtry, and two churchwardens. The addition of Sherehog was given to this church frome the name of its builder or great benefactor, Benedict Shorne, citizen and ſtock-fiſhmonger, in the reign of Edward II. which in time was corruptly pronounced Shrog, and more corruptly Sherehog, or Shornehog.

At the ſouth weſt angle of St. Swithin's-lane in Cannon-ſtreet, is ſituate the pariſh church of St. SWITHIN.

This church is thus denominated from its dedication to St. Swithin, chancellor to king Egbert and biſhop of Wincheſter, who died in 806. We read of a church in the ſame place dedicated to the above ſaint before the year 1331, but how long it was ſtanding before that time is uncertain: however, the old ſtructure was deſtroyed by the fire of London, and the preſent edifice aroſe in its ſtead.

It is a plain, ſolid, and ſtrong building of ſtone, 61 feet long, and 42 broad; the roof is 40 feet, and the ſteeple 150 feet high. The body is well enlightened, and the windows are arched and pell proportioned.

The advowſon of this church appears anciently to have been in the prior and convent of Tortington, in the dioceſe of Chicheſter, in whom it continued till the diſſolution of their monaſtery; when coming to the crown, Henry VIII. in the year 1540, granted the ſame, together with a ſtately manſion on the north ſide thereof, to John earl of Oxford, who ſoon after diſpoſing of the ſame, it paſſed through ſeveral hands, and was at length purchaſed by the company of Salters, in whom the advowſon ſtill remains.

To this pariſh is united that of St. Mary Bothaw; whoſe church before the fire of London, ſtood on the eaſt ſide, and about the middle of Turnwheel-lane, between London-ſtone and Wallbrook corner near Dowgate-hill, and took its additional name from its vicinity to a Boat-Haw, or boat-builder's yard, in that neighbourhood.

That this church was of great antiquity is manifeſt, from Wibert, the prior, and convent of Chriſt's-church in Canterbury having in the year 1167 granted certain lands and houſes on the north ſide thereof to one Ernis and his heirs; who, in conſideration thereof, was annually to pay the ſum of ten ſhillings in money; a towel of the value of eight-pence, two pitchers, at ſix pieces of money; and a ſalt-cellar at four; which were to be delivered to the prior's ſteward for the uſe of his houſe. It was a rectory, and a peculiar to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, but is now united to St. Swithin's. In this church were buried divers noblemen, and perſonages of great diſtinction, among whom was Sir Henry Fitz-Alwin, firſt Lord-mayor of London.

The living of theſe united pariſhes is ſettled by act of parliament at 140l. per annum in lieu of tythes. The veſtry for both is general; and the pariſh officers are two churchwardens.

Cloſe under the ſouth wall of St. Swithin's church ſtands a great ſtone called

LONDON STONE.

This is a very great piece of antiquity, which has been carefully preſerved from age to age, and is mentioned by the ſame name ſo early as in the time of Ethelſtan, king of the weſt Saxons. It formerly ſtood a little nearer the channel facing the ſame place; and being fixed very deep in the ground, was ſo ſtrongly faſtened by bars of iron, as to be in no danger from the carriages.

It ſeems very ſurpriſing that ſo great a piece of antiquity has been conſtantly preſerved with ſuch care, and yet ſo little has been ſaid of it, that the original cauſe of its erection, and the uſe for which it was intended, is quite uncertain. Moſt authorities give it a Roman erection, and place it in the center of that city burnt by Boadicea, and to ſerve for the place from whence the Romans meaſured their miles, which they reckoned from all great towns and places; by ſtones pitched; and perhaps this might be the ſtone for London, from which preciſe place to meaſure their miles from this city towards the other parts of the land. And this ſtreet in former times being the chief ſtreet of London, as Cheapſide now is, this London-ſtone ſeems to have been the place (and likely enough upon this ſtone) whence proclamations and public notices of things were given to the citizens. There is a paſſage in our chronicles that favours this conceit. In Henry VI's time, Anno 1450, when Jack Cade, the Kentiſh rebel, who feigned himſelf the lord Mortimer, came through Southwark into London, he marched to this ſtone, where was a great confluence of people, and the Lord-mayor among the reſt: Here he ſtruck his ſword upon it, and ſaid, "Now is "Mortimer lord of this city:" and there making a formal, but lying declaration to the mayor, departed back again to Southwark.

Others have ſaid the ſame to be ſet for the tendering and making of payment by debtors to their creditors, at their appointed days and times, till of latter time payments were more uſually made at the font in St. Paul's church, and at the Royal Exchange.

At

At the north-weſt corner of St. Swithin's church ſtands.

SALTERS HALL.

This is a plain brick building, the principal entrance to which is out of Swithin's-lane; and is commodiouſly adapted for tranſacting the buſineſs of the company. The hall room is let out for a diſſenting meeting of the preſbyterian denomination.

That the company of Salters is of conſiderable antiquity will appear from the grant of a livery by Richard II. in the year 1394; but we cannot learn that they were incorporated till the 1ſt. of Elizabeth A. D. 1558, when, by letters patent, they were ſtiled "The maſter, wardens, "and commonalty of the art or myſtery of Sal-"ters of London."

This company, which is the ninth among the twelve principal companies, is governed by a maſter, two wardens, and a court of aſſiſtants. They have a very conſiderable eſtate, out of which they pay to charitable uſes about five hundred pounds per annum.

CHAPTER XXV.

Of the ward of BRIDGE WITHOUT, the BOROUGH of SOUTHWARK, and the ſeveral pariſhes and remarkable buildings contained therein; with a liſt of the Lord-mayors of London, from Fitz-Alwyn to the preſent time.

BRidge-ward without, contains the whole Borough of Southwark, extending ſouthward from London-bridge to Newington; to the ſouthweſt almoſt to Lambeth; and to the eaſt to Rotherhithe. The principal ſtreets are, the Borough, or High-ſtreet, Blackman-ſtreet, Long-lane, Kent-ſtreet, Tooley-ſtreet, or St. Olave's-ſtreet, and Bermondſey, corruptly, Barnaby-ſtreet.

This ward is at preſent only nominally governed by an alderman and three deputies, and has twenty wardmote inqueſt-men, ſixteen conſtables, a ſteward and a bailiff.

The Borough of Southwark contains divers ſtreets, ways and lanes; many of which are well built and inhabited by tradeſmen and manufacturers of reputation and property. It conſiſts of the pariſhes of St. Olave, St. Saviour, St. George, and St. Thomas; which, together with the adjacent pariſhes, compoſe that part of the diſtrict within the bill of mortality, ſituate ſouth of the river Thames, in the hundreds of Kingſton and Brixton, and county of Surrey; which is in length ſix miles, twenty-three poles, and two feet, viz. from Vauxhall-bridge to Stangate, one mile; to within three doors of the ſign of the Earl of Warwick in Upper-ground-ſtreet, one mile; to four doors eaſt of the Maze gateway in Tooley-ſtreet, one mile; to within nine doors of Blackman's-alley on Rotherhithe-wall, one mile; to within three doors of the Bull's-head in Brimſtone-ſtreet, one mile; and from thence to the eaſt end of Holding-ſtreet, one mile, twenty-three poles, and two feet.

The firſt mention we find of Southwark in hiſtory is in the year 1052, when earl Godwin arrived there with a powerful fleet, and having caſt anchor till the return of tide, paſſed London-bridge without oppoſition, in order to engage the royal navy, which conſiſted of fifty ſhips of war, and then lay oppoſite to Weſtminſter; but matters being accommodated between the king and earl Godwin, the latter returned, and repaſſed the bridge, which was then of wood.

Notwithſtanding the river Thames ſeparates this ward from the city of London, yet it does not deprive the inhabitants therein of their freedom, rights and privileges of that city. For, the Borough of Southwark falling totally into king Henry the VIII's hands by the diſſolution of the religious houſes, the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, purchaſed the ſaid lordſhip and manor of Southwark from the crown, for the ſum of 647l. 2s. 1d. By which purchaſe they obtained a grant of all waſtes and eſtrays, treaſure trove, traitors goods, &c.

In the year 1327, the citizens finding themſeves greatly infeſted by felons, thieves, and diſturbers of the peace, who eſcaped to and took ſhelter in Southwark, petitioned king Edward III. and his parliament, for a grant of juriſdiction over the ſaid village of Southwark: and their petition appeared ſo juſt, that his majeſty, with conſent of his parliament, granted to the ſaid citizens, for himſelf and his heirs the ſaid village of Southwark, with the appurtenances, to have and to hold, to them, and their heirs and ſucceſſors citizens of the ſaid city, of the crown for ever, paying at the exchequer the farms due and accuſtomed.

In conſequence of the beforementioned grant and purchaſe confirmed to the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, a court was held about a month after before Sir Rowland Hill, knt. then Lord-mayor of London, and the aldermen of the ſame city, in Guildhall; and the ſaid town or borough of Southwark was admitted into the Freedom of the city of London, and named the ward of Bridge-without; and the ſaid court of Lord-mayor and aldermen did then and there nominate and appoint Sir John Ayliffe, citizen and barber ſurgeon, the firſt alderman of the ſaid ward of Bridge without, namely, of the borough of Southwark, to be numbered as one of the the aldermen of the ſaid city; and to have the rule and government of the inhabitants of the ſaid borough, admitted by that court into the freedom of the city of London.

Thus the borough of Southwark was made part of the city of London, though lying in the county of Surry, with a juriſdiction as ancient as the firſt of king Edward III. confirmed, ſtrengthened, enlarged, and fully eſtabliſhed by the late grant of king Edward VI. Nevertheleſs, we find that the magiſtracy of the city of London have adopted this ward only as a fine cure for the ſenior alderman for the time being; and neglected the more eſſential intereſt of the inhabitants of ſaid ward; and the juſtices of the county of Surry have not failed to take the advantage of their indifference and neglect of their juriſdiction within the borough of Southwark, and now have ſo far encroached upon the chartered rights and privileges of the city of London, confirmed by parliament, as to contend with the citizens for their juriſdiction within the ſaid borough; even ſo far as to take upon them, without interruption, to exerciſe the power of a juſtice of the peace within the ſaid borough, and to appoint conſtables, to licence victuallers, and to exerciſe other powers, as juſtices of the peace for the county of Surry in the borough of Southwark, to the great inconvenience and hardſhip of the inhabitants, who are entitled to the freedom and privileges of the city of London; as may be more fully ſeen in the following abſtract of the memorial of H. Williams, one of the conſtables of the ſaid borough.

An abſtract of a memorial preſented to the right honourable the Lord-mayor, and as a petition to the court of common-council, to deſire the aid of that court in ſupport of the ancient rights of the Borough of Southwark.

Southwark, 14 Feb. 1761.

To the right honourable the Lord-mayor.

Your lordſhip being now entered on the high and important office, ſo honourably conferred on you by almoſt the unanimous ſuffrages of one of the fulleſt aſſemblies ever held on that occaſion, it need not be ſaid that it becomes your duty, as it is doubtleſs your intention to be the guardian and protector of all thoſe ancient rights and privileges carefully handed down by their anceſtors to the citizens of London.

It is with concern obſerved, that there ſhould be ſo ſoon an occaſion to trouble your lordſhip with recent inſtances, in which it is apprehended, theſe ancient rights have been invaded in the proclamation of his preſent majeſty.

Firſt, in that ancient franchiſe granted to the city of London in the borough of Southwark, which without enumerating former grants, was, by the great charter of confirmation, to lately as the 15th year of king Charles II. fully confirmed to the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London.

By this grant, which has received a parliamentary ſanction, the ſaid corporation are inveſted with all manner of royal rights and prerogatives, in and over the town and borough of Southwark, in as full a manner, as if the ſame were in the king's hands. In particular, to have all manner of liberties, cuſtoms, treaſures, waifs, eſtrays, eſcheats, fines and forfeitures, view of frankpledge, &c. Alſo to have all goods, chattels of traitors, felons, fugitives, &c. together with all manner of ſuits, perſonal actions, &c. and the execution of all writs, commands, attachments, warrants, &c. by their ſheriffs and other officers. The ſerjeants at mace for the city to arreſt for debt in the borough, in the ſame manner as they do in London.

The city magiſtrates to have the aſſay and aſſize of wine, bread, beer, victuals, and every thing ſet to ſale, together with the puniſhment and correction of all perſons dealing therein. Alſo to take and arreſt all thieves, felons, and other criminals, found in the borough, and to commit them to Newgate, until delivered by due courſe of law.

The mayor, recorder, and aldermen, who are juſtices in London, are alſo conſtituted the juſtices for the borough, where they are to exerciſe the ſame juriſdiction as they do in London. And all and ſingular the inhabitants of the ſaid borough to be under the magiſtracy and government of the mayor and officers of London, in the ſame manner as the inhabitants of the ſaid city be. And laſtly, the ſheriff of Surry, and all others the king's officers and miniſters, are expreſsly prohibited from any ways intermeddling in the ſaid borough.

It it not intended to ſhew the impropriety, as well as inconvenience, that the conſtables and other inhabitants of this city franchiſe are under, by their being ſubject to two ſeparate unconnected juriſdictions, each of which may aſſume to command their attendance at different places at the ſame time; nor yet to expatiate on the hardſhips of their being ſummoned to attend out of their borough, the commands of ſuch, as they have at ſeveral quarter ſeſſions held by your predeceſſors, been informed had no ſort of authority over them.

The particular indignity offered to the city of London, now to be pointed out, is that whereas, when the preſent conſtables were ſworn in, under the authority of the city of London, they had an aſſurance given them, that country-officers had no juriſdiction over them; nevertheleſs they were all ſummoned, under large penalties, the firſt of this month, to attend the county ſheriff to proclaim the king through the boroughwick.

As there is a bailiff appointed by the city, under the Lord-mayors, for the government of the borough (which officer, who is now living, it is known, proclaimed his late majeſty, it is ſubmitted to your lordſhip's judgment) whether ſuch officer was not the proper perſon to perform this duty, as well as he preſides at the elections for members of parliament, or executes the other duties appertaining to that important office? For by what legal power can an officer execute any part of his office in a place the law expreſsly declares he ſhall no ways intermeddle; or how can he aſſume an authority to ſummon, under great penalties, conſtables, or any inhabitants of ſuch a place, not only to attend in, but to follow him, to their great trouble and expence, to a conſiderable diſtance from their habitations, if he is expreſsly prohibited from exerciſing any kind of juriſdiction over them?

It has been ſaid, that ſuppoſing the city of London hath not hitherto exerciſed an excluſive juriſdiction in the borough, they cannot, for that reaſon, maintain ſuch a power; even although it ſhould appear that, by the original grants, they are inveſted therewith. This objection, it is preſumed, is anſwered by that part of the city charter, which declares they ſhall loſe no privilege for non uſe or even abuſe. Lord Coke in his 4th inſtitute, ſays, "There is a moſt beneficial ſtatute made for the preſervation of the liberties and franchiſes of the city of London, that they ſhall enjoy their whole liberties, with this clauſe, Licet non fuerent, vel abuſi fuerent, and notwithſtanding any ſtatute to the contrary." On this principle Black-friars precinct was lately reſtored to the city freedom, which had, time immemorial, claimed and maintained that exemption.

Therefore, as there are many citizens that are inhabitants in the borough, who particularly think themſelves injured by being ſubject to two ſeparate juriſdictions, may it not be ſaid, it becomes the city's duty, in ſupport of the citizens rights, to fulfil the intentions of their charters, which ſo expreſsly prohibits the county ſheriff from any ways intermeddling in this city franchiſe: more eſpecially if it be a fact, that this officer has, on a legal trial, been proved to have no right to exerciſe any juriſdiction therein.

The following are part of the encroachments on the city juriſdiction, and the privileges of the inhabitants of the borough of Southwark, referred to in their petition.

1ſt. The licencing public houſes by the county magiſtrates.

2d. Their acting as magiſtrates of the borough, and holding ſeſſions in the town-hall.

3d. Their interfering in the government of the borough fair, granted by royal charter to the city of London.

4th. Their exerciſing juriſdiction over the borough conſtables, and taking upon them to ſwear them into that office a ſecond time, and alſo ſwearing in conſtables by their own authority, upon deaths or removals.

5th. The ſheriff of Surry exerciſing juriſdiction in the ſaid borough, and ſummoning the conſtables and other inhabitants to attend (contrary to the royal charters) the reſpective ſeſſions held by the county magiſtrates, at different parts of the county.

6th. The ſheriff and marſhal court officers arreſting for debt in the borough.

7th. The compelling the inhabitants of the borough to contribute towards the county rate, to pay the county coroner, who is prohibited any juriſdiction in the borough, and to repair bridges, gaols, &c. all of which are upheld and repaired by the city of London.

8th. The quartering ſoldiers in the borough, which, as a franchiſe and one of the city wards, it is preſumed ought to be exempted from that burden.

9th. The king's miniſters and officers of the county of Surry, taking upon them the power of ordering and governing the borough militia, which, it is alſo preſumed, ought to be ſolely ſubject to the Lord-mayor, as chief magiſtrate of this ancient city franchiſe.

We ſhall begin the ſurvey of this ward or borough at the ſouth end of London-bridge, and proceed eaſtward down Tooley, or St. Olave's-ſtreet; on the north ſide of which, and near the bridge, ſtands the pariſh church of St. OLAVE.

Though the time when a church was firſt erected in this place cannot be diſcovered, yet it appears to be of conſiderable antiquity, ſince it is mentioned ſo early as the year 1281. However, part of the old church falling down in 1736, and the reſt being in a ruinous condition, the pariſhioners applied to parliament for a power to rebuild it, which being granted, they were thereby enabled to raiſe the ſum of 5000l. by a rate of 6d. in the pound, to be levied out of the rents of all lands and tenements within the pariſh; accordingly the church was taken down in the ſummer of the year 1737, and the preſent ſtructure finiſhed in 1739.

It conſiſts of a plain body ſtrengthened with ruſtic quoins at the corners; the door is well proportioned without ornament, and the windows are placed in three ſeries; the loweſt is upright, but conſiderably broad; thoſe above them circular, and others on the roof are large and ſemicircular. The tower conſiſts of three ſtages, the uppermoſt of which is conſiderably diminiſhed: in this is the clock, and in the ſtages below are large windows. The top of the tower is ſurrounded by a plain ſubſtantial baluſtrade, and the whole has an air of plainneſs and ſimplicity.

This church is a rectory in the gift of the crown; and the incumbent's profits are ſaid to amount to about 400l. yer annum.

The veſtry is general; and here are five churchwardens, and eight overſeers of the poor and collectors, who are called the pariſh officers; and nine conſtables, nine ſcavengers, and two ſurveyors of the highway, who are called ward officers.

The remarkable places in this pariſh are, the Borough compter, the Bridge-houſe, and the Anabaptiſt dipping-place; and another meeting houſe of the the like denomination. A charity ſchool for forty boys; another for ſixty girls; and a free-ſchool founded by queen Elizabeth, who incorporated ſixteen pariſhioners to be governors thereof. The lands and revenues with which this ſchool is endowed, were purchaſed by the pariſh, and lie chiefly in Horſleydown, for the benefit of the pariſh. The firſt maſter has a ſalary of 60l. per annum, the ſecond 40l. the writing-writing-maſter ditto, and the Engliſh maſter only 20l. per annum.

Oppoſite St. Olave's church formerly ſtood a ſpacious ſtone building, the city manſion of the prior of Lewes in Suſſex; and contiguous to the Bridge-yard was ſituate a large houſe of ſtone and wood, the city reſidence of the abbot of St. Auguſtin's in Canterbury; which coming afterwards to Sir Anthony Sentlegar, the ſite thereof was converted into a quay, which, by an eaſy tranſition, is now called Sellenger's wharf.

On the eaſt ſide of the Bridge-yard was ſituate the manſion of the abbot of Battle in Suſſex, the name whereof is partly preſerved in that of Battle-bridge; oppoſite to which, on the ſouth, lay its fine and ſpacious garden, wherein was a maze, or labyrinth, the name whereof is ſtill preſerved in the ſtreets, &c. built thereon.

Bridge-yard-houſe is a receptacle for timber, ſtone, and other materials for repairing London-bridge, and ſeems to have been eſtabliſhed at the time that bridge was firſt built of timber, and endowed with conſiderable eſtates for that purpoſe. It ſtands upon a large ſpot of ground, and contains many extenſive buildings for that uſe. In former times here were ſeveral granaries for wheat and divers ſorts of grain for the ſervice of the city; and ten ovens, and a large brewhouſe, to ſupply the poor citizens with bread and beer in times of ſcarcity. Proceeding eaſtward we come to the pariſh of Horſley-down; a plot of ground ſo called, corruptly from Horſe-down, it having been originally a grazing ground for horſes. It is now, however, well covered with brick and wood buildings, erected into a pariſh, the church of which, as well as the pariſh is called

St. JOHN the EVANGELIST.

This church, like ſeveral others in the ſuburbs, owed its riſe to the great increaſe of buildings and inhabitants, and is one of the fifty new churches ordered to be built by act of parliament. It was finiſhed in 1732, and the diſtrict of Horſley-down being ſeparated from St. Olave's, was by act of parliament conſtituted its pariſh. The ſum of 3500l. was alſo granted by parliament to be laid out in lands, tenements, &c. in fee ſimple; and as a farther proviſion, the churchwardens were to pay the rector the additional ſum of 60l. to be raiſed from the fees ariſing from burials.

The body of the church is enlightened by two ranges of windows, with a venetian in the center. The tower riſes ſquare, with a baluſtrade on the top; from whence riſes a ſpire which is very properly diminiſhed, and well wrought. It is ſituate near the lower end of Fair-ſtreet, and the pariſh being taken out of St. Olave's it is likewiſe in the gift of the crown.

The veſtry is neither ſelect nor general, all being admitted that rent 10l. per annum, or upwards. They have three churchwards, four overſeers of the poor, four conſtables, four ſcavengers, two ſurveyors of the highways, one beadle, and eight watchmen.

About the middle of Tooley ſtreet, on the ſouth ſide, is Barnaby or Bermondſey-ſtreet. This is a ſpacious ſtreet, and inhabited by reputable tradeſmen, eſpecially in the hat manufactory At the ſouth eaſt extremity of this ſtreet ſtands the pariſh church of St. MARY MAGDALEN, Bermondſey.

This church ſtands on the ſite of part of the religious foundation for monks that was ſuppreſſed by king Henry VIII. It was dedicated to Mary the ſiſter of Lazarus, called Magdalen, from Magdala, the place of her birth or reſidence; and it was founded under the Saxon government, as appears in the ſurvey made by William the Conqueror. It received the addition of Bermondſey from its ſituation in or near the royal manor called Bermond's-eye, corruptly Bermondſey; on which there ſtood a royal manſion in the reign of Henry VIII. the remains of which are ſtill to be ſeen in the gateway that leads into a court at the ſouth end of the church-yard. This was a priory or abbey, dedicated to St. Saviour, when refounded by Alwin Child, citizen of London, for Chiniac monks, in the year 1081. In 1094, William Rufus endowed it with the manor of Bermond's-eye, which was confirmed by Henry I. in 1127, who at the ſame time gave unto this priory the manor of Rotherhithe and Dulwich: and William Maminot gave them a moiety of the manor of Greenwich. In 1159 king Henry II. confirmed to them the donation of the church of Camberwell, and others. And king Henry III. granted theſe monks a market every Monday at their market of Charlton, in the county of Kent; and a fair on Trinity Sunday yearly. The manor of Bermond's-eye was an ancient demeſne of the crown, and all the lands and tenements belonging to it, among which were Camberwell, Rotherhithe, the hide of Southwark, Dulwich, Waddon, and Reyham, with their appurtenances, and were impleadable in the court of this manor only, and not at the common law: though this houſe was no more than a call to the priory of Charity in France; and therefore accounted a priory alien till the year 1380, when Richard II. in conſideration of two hundred marks paid into his exchequer, made it a denizen; when it was alſo made an abbey, and Attleborough became firſt abbot. This abbey was granted by king Henry VIII. to Sir Thomas Pope, who pulled down the church and built a large houſe upon its ſite, which afterwards became the poſſeſſion and reſidence of the earls of Suſſex, who were obliged to build a place for public worſhip, which was done in or near the place where the church now ſtands.

The preſent edifice was built in 1680, at the charge of the pariſh; and is a plain ſtructure, 76 feet long, 61 feet broad, 30 feet high to the roof, and 87 feet to the top of the ſteeple. The walls are brick, covered with ſtucco, and the door-caſes and arched windows are caſed with ſtone. The advowſon of this church is in lay hands; and the rectory is valued at 200l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

Here is an organ and eight bells; five gift ſermons; twelve poor men and twelve poor women are cloathed on the fifth of November, by the legacy of Mr. John Wright, or Wrig.

There

There is a charity-ſchool for fifty boys, and another for twenty girls, ſupported by voluntary ſubſcriptions and collections at charity ſermons; and on the ſouth ſide of the Grange road is a free-ſchool for fifty boys founded by Joſias Bacon, eſq;

This pariſh is governed by a general veſtry; and has four churchwardens, four overſeers and collectors for the poor, two conſtables, four headboroughs, two ſurveyors of the highways, four ſcavengers, and two ale-conners. It is divided into two precincts, viz. the Land-ſide and the Water-ſide.

In the Land-ſide are part of Barnaby-ſtreet, Sun-alley, Hedge-alley, part of Cruciſix-lane, part of Five Foot-lane, Clare's-yard, May's-yard, Trotter-alley, Snow's-fields, Swan-alley, Black-boy-alley, Parker's-alley, White lion-yard, part of Long lane, ſouth-weſt to Lord-mayor's ſtone, part of Kent-ſtreet, Grange-yard and road, and Court-yard.

In the Water-ſide are, part of Five Foot-lane, Dock-head, Mill-ſtreet, Hickman's-court and Folly, London-ſtreet, Water-lane, Jacob's-ſtreet, Rotherhithe-wall, Neckinger-corner, Saliſbury-lane and ſtreet, Eaſt-lane, part of Weſt lane, Marigold ſtreet, Cherry garden-ſtreet, Croſs ſtreet, Bowling-green, Saliſbury-down, and Blue-anchor-road.

Returning to London-bridge we proceed again from thence directly ſouthward up the High-ſtreet or Borough, which conſiſts of a fleſh-market on the weſt ſide, and of hop-merchants and reputable tradeſmen and inn-keepers on the eaſt. On the former ſide are ſeveral paſſages that lead to a cloſe, in which is ſituate the pariſh church of St. SAVIOUR.

On the ſpot where this church is ſituate, anciently ſtood a priory of nuns, which was founded by one Mary, a virgin, the owner of a ferry over the river Thames, before the building of London-bridge. Some time after the priory was converted into a college of prieſts; but that eſtabliſhment, as well as the former, proving of no long duration, it was in the year 1106 founded by two Norman knights, and the biſhop of Wincheſter, for canons regular, and from its dedication to the Virgin Mary, and its ſituation, was called St. Mary Overie, that is, St. Mary over the river.

This edifice was deſtroyed by fire about the year 1207; but it being ſoon after rebuilt, Peter de Rupibus, biſhop of Wincheſter, added to it a ſpacious chapel, which he dedicated to St. Mary Magdalen; and this being afterwards appointed for the uſe of the inhabitants, it at laſt became their pariſh church.

This monaſtery, together with its fine church (as it at preſent appears) which was rebuilt in the reigns of Richard II. and Henry IV. was, at the general ſuppreſſion of religious houſes, ſurrendered to Henry VIII. in the year 1539, when the revenues thereof amounted to 624l. 6s. 6d. per annum. Whereupon the inhabitants of the pariſhes of St. Mary Magdalen and St. Margaret, by the aſſiſtance of Stephen, biſhop of Wincheſter, purchaſed of king Henry the ſtately conventual church; which pariſhes, in the year following, were united by act of parliament by the new appellation of St. Saviour's, and the churchwardens conſtitute a body politic and corporate. And the churches of St. Mary Magdalen and St. Margaret, being laid aſide, this has ever ſince been uſed as the united pariſh church.

In the year 1611, king James I. for a valuable conſideration, granted by letters patent to the churchwardens and pariſhioners, in free ſoccage, the rectory and pariſh church of St. Saviour, together with all the glebe lands, tythes, tenths, oblations, profits, &c. with all thoſe that belonged to the rectories of St. Mary Magdalen and St. Margatet. In conſideration of which the ſaid churchwardens and pariſhioners are obliged to provide a fit houſe, for a grammar-ſchool, and to keep a good maſter to teach the children of the pariſh, paying to the ſaid maſter 20l. and to an uſher 10l. per annum, and alſo, to provide two able chaplains to preach in the church, and to pay them 30l. per annum each. Theſe conditions were performed till the year 1672, when the ſaid ſums were found inſufficient to maintain the ſeveral officers aforeſaid; wherefore their reſpective ſtipends were by act of parliament advanced, thoſe of the chaplains to 100l. per annum each; and thoſe of the ſchool-maſters to 30l. each. For the paying of which ſums, and the repairs of the church, the churchwardens, &c. were empowered to raiſe upon the inhabitants, in lieu of tythes, the ſum of 350l. per annum clear of reprizes.

Both the conſtruction and extent of this Gothic ſtructure reſemble a cathedral more than a pariſh church. The length is 260 feet, and that of the croſs iſle 109; the breadth of the body is 54 feet, and the heighth of the tower, including the pinnacles, is 150 feet. The conſtruction of the windows, entrances, and every other part, is purely in the Gothic ſtile, except a modern door, which is neither Gothic nor agreeable to the rules of any other architecture. The tower, which is ſquare, and well proportioned, is ſupported by maſſy pillars over the meeting of the middle and croſs iſles; it is crowned with battlements, and has a pinnacle at each corner.

In a chapel at the eaſt end of the church is the monument of biſhop Andrews, who was interred there; and in another part of the church is that of the biſhop of Wincheſter; but the moſt remarkable monument is that of the family of the Auſtins, erected in the laſt century, and repaired, new painted, and gilt by the relations in 1706.

this firſt figure is a rock, upon which is written, Petra erat XTS. that is, the rock was Chriſt. Down this rock runs a ſtream of water; and out of it glides a ſerpent, his ſkin being ſtripped off by the rock, which is ſeen hanging on that part of his back that is not yet got through. At the foot of the rock there grows ſtanding corn, on which is a label with theſe words, Si non moriatur, non reviviſcit, that is, If it dieth not, it liveth not again. Underneath the corn is this motto. Nos ſevit fovit, lavit, coget, renovabit, i. e. He hath ſown, cheriſhed, waſhed us, and ſhall gather us together, and renew us.

On

On the top of the rock ſtands an angel, holding a ſickle in his left hand, and with his right pointing to the ſun, which ſhines, and on its lower rays is a label, upon which is written Sol juſticiæ, i. e. The ſun of righteouſneſs.

On the ſides of the monument are ſcythes, flails, ſhepherds crooks, rakes, plows, harrows, and other inſtruments of huſbandry hanging out of a death's head; and above them, Vos eſtis agricultura, i. e. Ye are God's huſbandry.

On the outſide of theſe a harveſt man with wings is ſeated on each ſide, one with a fork behind him, and the other with a rake. They have ſtraw hats, and lean their heads upon their hands, their elbows reſting upon their knees, as if fatigued with labour, and under them are theſe words, Meſſores congregabunt, i. e. The reapers ſhall gather. Under all is a winnowing fan, upon which is ſtretched a ſheet of parchment bearing a long inſcription in Latin.

Though the name of this church has been changed from St. Mary Overies to that of St. Saviour, yet the former ſtill prevails. It is a rectory in the gift of the pariſh, and the profits ariſing to the two chaplains are at this time ſaid to amount to above 300l. per annum.

This pariſh is divided into two liberties, viz. the Borough and the Clink. The officers for the Borough liberty are, ſix conſtables and five ſcavengers. Thoſe for the Clink liberty are, ſix churchwardens, choſe out of the veſtry, which is ſelect, eight overſeers and collectors for the poor, three conſtables, three headboroughs, four ſcavengers and twenty-three inqueſt men.

The remarkable places and things are, the Town-hall on St. Margaret's-hill; the Clink priſon; the dock; a good market; and the lord Montague's-houſe in Montague-cloſe, where was alſo the lord Mounteagle's houſe, now, or late, part of the eſtate of——Overman. eſq; In this cloſe it is ſaid Gunpowder-plot was diſcovered by the miſcarriage of a letter, to one of which lords it was delivered by a miſtake inſtead of delivering it to the other; for which happy diſcovery Montague cloſe enjoyed ſeveral privileges, particularly one, viz. that whoever dwelled there was exempted from having any actions of debt, treſpaſs, &c. ſerved on them. But this privilege, as alſo thoſe of other places, has been ſuppreſſed by act of parliament.

On the weſt of St. Saviour's church, fronting the river Thames, was ſituate Wincheſter-houſe, which was at firſt erected by William Gifford, biſhop of that ſee, about the year 1107, for his city manſion and that of his ſucceſſors; but this houſe having been long diſuſed by the ſaid biſhops, it is now converted into warehouſes and apartments for the poor.

Adjoining to Wincheſter-houſe, on the ſouth, was ſituate that belonging to the biſhop of Rocheſter, but when, or by whom erected, is unknown.

A little weſtward from theſe houſes is the Bank-ſide, ſo denominated from its ſituation on the ſouthern bank of the river Thames; which place was anciently very notorious for its being the ſeat of the ſtews or licenſed bawdy-houſes, wherein whores were publickly tolerated to act according to their vicious and depraved inclinations.

The firſt mention we find of theſe houſes is in the reign of Henry II. A. D. 1162, when they were eighteen in number, under the juriſdiction of the biſhop of Wincheſter; wherefore they were commonly called Wincheſter Geeſe; for whoſe regulation certain conſtitutions were publiſhed by the ſaid biſhop, which were confirmed by parliament; among which were the following, viz.

That no ſtewholder ſhall moleſt, or obſtruct any ſingle woman from having acceſs to, and liberty to withdraw from his houſe at pleaſure.

That no ſtew-keeper permit any woman to board in his houſe.

To take no more for a woman's apartment, than fourteen pence per week.

Not to keep open his doors on holidays.

Not to detain any ſingle woman, that is willing to reform.

Not to receive any woman that is devoted to religion, nor any man's wife.

No woman to take money for lying with a man, unleſs it be for a whole night.

No man to be artfully deluded into a ſtew.

That the ſeveral ſtews be ſearched weekly, by the bailiff, conſtables, &c.

That no ſtewholder entertain any woman that has the perilous infirmity of burning, (the venereal diſtemper) nor to ſell bread, fleſh, ale, nor any other ſort of proviſions.

Theſe and divers other orders were to be obſerved by the ſaid ſtewholders, upon very ſevere penalties. And for ſecuring all perſons that were accuſed of crimes committed in this diſtrict, a priſon was erected, denominated the Clink, which is ſtill in being, and the place where the biſhop of Wincheſter, by his ſteward and bailiff, holds pleas for debt, damages, &c.

Theſe ſtews, or bawdy-houſes, in the year 1381, were plundered by Wat Tyler; at which time it appears they were kept by Flemiſh bawds. ſee page 83. And in the year 1506, they were, by order of Henry VII. ſhut up; but, being reopened ſoon after, their number was reduced from eighteen to twelve. And in the year 1546 they were, by proclamation of Henry VIII. entirely ſuppreſſed.

Oppoſite the ſouth ſide of St. Saviour's church, in the church-yard, is a free grammar ſchool, founded at the charge of the pariſh, by patent granted by queen Elizabeth, conſtituting ſix governors, choſen out of the veſtry. To this ſchool belong two maſters, the firſt of whom has 30l. and the ſecond 20l. per annum

In the ſame place, adjoining to this, is a free Engliſh ſchool, founded by Dorothy Applebee, about the year 1681, for thirty poor boys of this pariſh, to be taught reading, writing, and arithmetic; for the maintenance of which ſhe appropriated 20l. per annum out of an eſtate in Fiſhmonger-alley, by St. Margaret's-hill; to be under the inſpection of the governors of the grammar ſchool.

In Three-ton-alley is a free-ſchool for fifty girls, that are taught and cloathed by ſubſcription.

In angel-court is a free-ſchool for eighty boys of this pariſh, who are educated and cloathed; to which belongs a freehold eſtate, beſide a voluntary ſubſcription.

In Deadman's-place is an hoſpital or college for the poor of the pariſh, founded by Thomas Cure, eſq; in the reign of queen Elizabeth. It conſiſts of ſixteen rooms for as many poor men and women, each of whom hath twenty-pence per week, beſides 3l. 6s. 8d. given by his ſon, and Mrs. Applebee gave 3l. per annum for coals. This hoſpital is governed by one of the wardens, called the College Warden; and a chapel belongs to it, in which prayers are read twice a week by one of the old men belonging to the ſaid hoſpital or college. There are alſo two more in the ſame college, founded by Henry Sprat. In the churchyard are two rooms for two poor people, founded by Mr. Henry Jackſon in the year 1682, each of whom hath twenty-pence per week. Likewiſe two houſes founded by Henry Young, eſq; who endowed them with 5l. 4s. per annum, paid weekly.

This pariſh extends from Chequer-alley on the eaſt ſide of the High-ſtreet or Borough, including the ſouth ſide of that alley to Ax-and-bottle-yard, and takes in all the yards and alleys in that ſpace of ground. It extends on the weſt ſide of the Borough or High-ſtreet from the Maidenhead-alehouſe, ſouthward to Bell-yard, and weſtward from Piper's-alley to the Falcon along the Thames ſide; from thence ſouthward to Slut's-well, including the eaſt ſide of Gravel-lane, along by the Black-ditch to Bell-yard, including all the ſtreets, alleys, &c. in that compaſs.

At ſome diſtance from this, towards the weſt, is ſituate the pariſh of CHRIST CHURCH.

This church was founded by Mr. John Marſhal, of the Borough, gent. in 1627, who endowed it with 60l. per annum, towards the maintenance of a miniſter. In 1670 it was made parochial, and a diſtinct pariſh from St. Saviour's, and a rectory by act of parliament.

The preſent church was built in or about the year 1737, at the expence of the pariſh, and is a regular well-conſtructed building, with a ſquare tower. The patronage is at preſent in thirteen truſtees, and the value is computed at 140l. per annum beſides perquiſites.

The veſtry is free; and the pariſh offices are, ſeven auditors of accounts, two churchwardens, and two overſeers and collectors. Beſides which there are four conſtables, three headboroughs, and two ſcavengers.

There is in this pariſh a charity-ſchool for thirty boys and twenty girls, maintained by ſubſcription; a work-houſe for the poor; and a neat building ſituate about two hundred yards to the eaſt of the church, founded by Charles Hopton, eſq; about the year 1730, for twenty-ſix poor men, who have been houſekeepers, and come to decay; each of whom has an upper and lower room, with ten pounds per annum paid monthly, and a chaldron of coals; and committed to the truſt and management of the miniſter of the pariſh, two churchwardens, and ten other gentlemen.

This pariſh begins at the Falcon in Upper-ground-ſtreet, and extends weſtward to the Barge-houſe on the ſouth ſide, and ten houſes farther on the north ſide of that ſtreet, and takes in the buildings fronting the Thames from Hook's-hole, thirty-three houſes weſtward: and Marigold-lane, Queen's-arms-court, Bull-alley, Hook's-hole, Guy of Warwick-alley, and Overbodies-bridge; and from the Barge-houſe, ſouthward, in the Broad-wall, it extends to St. George's-fields, and from thence eaſtward through Melancholy-walk to Slut's-well, and from thence northward on the weſt ſide of Gravel-lane; all which part of St. Saviour's pariſh was called Paris-garden-liberty.

Returning again to the Borough we find, on the eaſt ſide thereof, near the middle,

St. THOMAS's HOSPITAL.

This is a very noble and extenſive charity, founded for the reception of the neceſſitous ſick and wounded.

With reſpect to the origin of this hoſpital, it is to be obſerved, that the priory of St. Mary Overies being deſtroyed by fire in the year 1207, the canons erected at a ſmall diſtance an occaſional edifice to anſwer the ſame purpoſe, till their monaſtery could be rebuilt; which being accompliſhed, Peter de Rupibus, biſhop of Wincheſter, for the greater convenience of air and water, pulled it down in 1215, and erected it in a place where the prior of Bermondſey had two years before built an almonry, or alms-houſe for the reception of indigent children, and neceſſitous proſelytes; and having dedicated the new ſtructure to St. Thomas the Apoſtle, he endowed it with land to the value of 343l. per annum; from which time it was held of the abbot of Bermondſey, and an hoſpital has continued in the ſame place ever ſince.

In 1428 one of the abbots granted the foundation lands to Nicholas Buckland, the maſter of the hoſpital, and in that condition they remained, till at the diſſolution of religious houſes in the reign of Henry VIII. this fell with the reſt.

In the year 1551 the Lord-mayor and citizens having purchaſed of king Edward VI. the manor of Southwark, with its appurtenances, for the ſum of 647l. 2s. 1d. a part whereof being this hoſpital, the city immediately repaired and enlarged it at the expence of about 1100l. and in November following receiving into it two hundred and ſixty poor ſick and helpleſs objects, the hoſpital ſtill retained its ancient name, St. Thomas's; and in 1553 the king incorporated a ſociety of perſons for its government, in common with the two other great charities, Bridewell and Chriſt's-hoſpital.

Though this hoſpital eſcaped the fire of London in 1666, yet it deſtroyed a great part of its poſſeſſions; and two others which happened a few years after in Southwark, contributed to the diſtreſs. By theſe accidents the hoſpital of St. Thomas was almoſt reduced to ruin. The building was old, and wanted great repairs, and the funds funds that ſhould have ſupported it were exhauſted. But in the year 1699 the governors ſet on foot a voluntary ſubſcription, which they opened by large donations from themſelves and their friends, and the public followed the example. The building was begun upon a larger and more commodious plan, and erected at different times by the aſſiſtance of various benefactors, till it became entirely completed, and conſiſts in the whole of three quadrangles or ſquare courts.

Next the ſtreet is a handſome pair of large iron gates, with a door of the ſame work on each ſide for the convenience of foot paſſengers. Theſe are faſtened on the ſides to a ſtone pier, on each of which is a ſtatue repreſenting one of the patients. Theſe gates open into a very neat ſquare court, encompaſſed on three ſides with a colonade, ſurrounded with benches next the wall, for people to ſit down. On the ſouth under an empty niche is the following inſcription:

This building on the ſouth ſide of this court, containing three wards, was erected at the charge of Thomas Frederick, of London, eſq; a worthy governor, and liberal benefactor to this hoſpital, Anno 1708.

Under the ſame kind of niche, on the oppoſite ſide, is this inſcription:

This building on the north ſide of this court, containing three wards, was erected at the charge of Thomas Guy, eſq; citizen and ſtationer of London, a worthy governor, and bountiful benefactor to this hoſpital, Anno 1707.

The center of the principal front, which is on the weſt ſide, facing the ſtreet, is of ſtone. On the top is a clock under a ſmall circular pediment, and beneath that a niche with a ſtatue of Edward VI. holding a ſceptre in his right hand, and the charter in his left. A little lower, in niches on each ſide is a man with a crutch, and a ſick woman; and under them, in other niches, a man with a wooden leg, and a woman with her arm in a ſling: over the niches are feſtoons, and between the laſt mentioned figures the king's arms in relievo. Under which is the following inſcription:

King Edward the ſixth, of pious memory, in the year of our Lord 1552, founded and endowed this hoſpital of St. Thomas the apoſtle, together with the hoſpitals of Chriſt and Bridewell in London.

Underneath is a ſpacious paſſage down ſeveral ſteps into the ſecond court, which is by far the moſt elegant, It has colonades like the former, except at the front of the chapel which is on the north ſide; and is adorned with lofty pilaſters of the Corinthian order, placed on high pedeſtals which riſe from the ground, and on the top is a pediment, as there is alſo on the center of the weſt and eaſt ſides. And the fronts of the wards, above the piazzas are ornamented with handſome Ionic pilaſters.

In the midſt of this court is a good braſs ſtatue of king Edward VI. by Mr. Scheemakers, and behind him is placed upon a kind of ſmall pedeſtal his crown laid upon a cuſhion. This ſtatue is ſurrounded with iron rails, and ſtands upon a lofty ſtone pedeſtal, upon which is the following inſcription in capitals:

This ſtatue
Of king Edward the ſixth,
A moſt excellent prince,
Of exemplary piety and wiſdom
above his years;
The glory and ornament of his age, and munificent founder of this hoſpital,
Was erected at the expence
of Charles Joyce, Eſquire, in the year MDCCXXXVII.

On the oppoſite face of the pedeſtal is the ſame inſcription in Latin.

In the midddle of the eaſt ſide of this court is a ſpacious paſſage into the next, the ſtructure above being ſupported by rows of columns. The buildings in the third court are older than the others, and are entirely ſurrounded with a colonade, above which they are adorned with a kind of long ſlender Ionic pilaſters, with very ſmall capitals. In the center is a ſtone ſtatue of Robert Clayton, eſq; dreſſed in his robes as Lord-mayor, ſurrounded with iron rails, upon the weſt ſide of the pedeſtal is his arms in relievo, and on the ſouth ſide the following inſcription:

To Sir Robert Clayton, knt. born in Northamptonſhire, citizen and Lord-mayor of London, preſident of this hoſpital, and vice-preſident of the new work-houſe, and a bountiful benefactor to it; a juſt magiſtrate, and brave defender of the liberty and religion of his country. Who (beſides many other inſtances of his charity to the poor) built the girls ward in Chriſt's hoſpital, gave firſt towards the rebuilding of this houſe 600l. and left by his laſt will 2300l. to the poor of it. This ſtatue was erected in his life-time by the governors, An. Dom. MDCCI. as a monument of their eſteem of ſo much worth; and to preſerve his memory after death, was by them beautified An. Dom. MDCCXIV.

By this noble charity many hundred thouſand of the poor have ſince its foundation received relief; and been cured of the various diſorders to which human nature is ſubject; and though the eſtates at firſt belonging to this foundation were ruined, yet by the liberal munificence of the citizens ſince that time, the annual diſburſements have of late amounted to near 8000l. The houſe contains nineteen wards, and 474 beds, which are conſtantly occupied; beſide theſe they have a conſiderable number of out patients.

The number of governors in this and the other city hoſpitals, are unlimited, and therefore uncertain. They chuſe their own officers and ſervants, both men and women: theſe are, a preſident, a treaſurer, an hoſpitaller or chaplain, four phyſicians, three ſurgeons, an apothecary, a clerk, a ſteward, a matron, a brewer and butcher, a cook, a cook, aſſiſtant and ſervant, an aſſiſtant clerk in the compting-houſe, two porters, four beadles, nineteen ſiſters, nineteen nurſes, nineteen watch-women, a chapel clerk and ſexton, and one watchman. On the north ſide of St. Thomas's behind this hoſpital, ſtands the pariſh church of St. THOMAS.

This church was originally erected for the uſe of the hoſpital; but the number of houſes and inhabitants having greatly increaſed in the precinct of that hoſpital, it was judged neceſſary to make the church parochial for the uſe of the inhabitants, and to erect a chapel in the hoſpital for the uſe of the patients. This church is therefore neither a rectory, vicarage, nor donative, but a ſort of impropriation in the gift of the hoſpital, the governors chuſing one out of two returned by the pariſhioners.

The church is a plain brick building enlightened by one ſeries of large windows, and the corners ſtrengthened and adorned with ruſtic, as is the corners of the tower. The principal door has a cornice ſupported by ſcrolls and a circular pediment, and the tower, inſtead of a baluſtrade, is crowned with a blocking courſe of the attic kind.

The government of this church is in a ſelect veſtry, which conſiſts of ſixteen perſons, and the miniſter; and in two churchwardens, two overſeers, two conſtables, and two ſcavengers. The miniſter receives 60l. per annum from the governors of the hoſpital in lieu of tythes.

Here are alms-houſes for the poor, and a ſchool, ſupported by private contributions, for the educating, cloathing, and puting apprentice thirty boys. And on the firſt of May the pariſhioners have a feaſt of love, at which the ſtewards collect money to put out the children of poor houſekeepers to ſervice, or to be apprentices.

Not far from St. Thomas's church ſtands

GUY's HOSPITAL.

This hoſpital was founded by Mr. Thomas Guy, a citizen and bookſeller of London, who, from a ſmall beginning, amaſſed an immenſe fortune, by his induſtry and frugality; and more particulaaly by purchaſing ſeamens tickets in the reign of queen Ann; and by his ſucceſs in buying and ſelling South Sea ſtock in the year 1720. He was never married nor had any near relations; and therefore, towards the cloſe of his life, conſidering how he ſhould diſpoſe of his wealth, he at length reſolved to be the founder of the moſt extenſive charity ever eſtabliſhed by one man. He was ſeventy-ſix years of age when he took this reſolution, and having no time to loſe, immediately purchaſed of the preſident and governors of St. Thomas's hoſpital, a leaſe of a piece of ground oppoſite to that hoſpital, for the term of 999 years, at a ground rent of 30l. a year.

And as this was covered with ſmall houſes that were old and ill tenanted, he immediately gave the inhabitants notice of his intention, and when they had removed their effects, pulled down the buildings in the year 1721, and proceeding with great expedition, he cauſed the foundation of the intended hoſpital to be laid the following ſpring; and this vaſt of fabric was roofed before the death of the founder, which happened on the twenty-ſeventh of December 1724.

The only motive that induced Mr. Guy to erect this hoſpital in ſo low and cloſe a ſituation, was his deſign of putting it under the management and direction of the governors of that of St. Thomas. But by the advice of his friends he altered his reſolution: it was then, however, too late to think of chuſing another ſituation, for the building was raiſed to the ſecond ſtory, but he rendered the place as agreeable as poſſible by its elevation above the neighbouring ſtreets.

The charge of erecting and furniſhing this hoſpital amounted to the ſum of 18,793l. 16s. great part of which he expended in his life-time; and the ſum he left to endow it amounted to 219,499l. both together amounting to 238,292l. 16s. a much larger ſum than was ever before left in this kingdom by one ſingle perſon to charitable uſes.

The entrance into this building is by an elegant and noble iron gate, hung on very handſome piers, which open into a ſquare; in the middle of which is a brazen ſtatue of the founder in his livery gown, and well executed. In the front of the pedeſtal is this inſcription:

THOMAS GUY SOLE FOUNDER OF THIS HOPITAL IN HIS LIFE-TIME. A. D. MDCCXXI.

On the weſt ſide of the pedeſtal is repreſented in baſſo relievo the parable of the Good Samaritan; on the ſouth ſide is Mr. Guy's arms; and on that ſide facing the eaſt is Our Saviour healing the impotent man.

The ſuperſtructure of this hoſpital has three floors beſides the garrets, and the ſame conſtruction runs through the whole building, which is ſo extenſive as to contain twelve wards, in which are 435 beds; and the whole is advantageouſly diſpoſed for the mutual accommodation of the ſick, and of thoſe who attend them.

Soon after Mr. Guy's deceaſe, his executors, purſuant to his laſt will, applied to parliament to get themſelves and fifty other gentlemen nominated by the founder, to be incorporated governors of the intended hoſpital; upon which all theſe gentlemen were conſtituted a body politic and corporate, by the name of the preſident, and governors of this hoſpital;: they were to have perpetual ſucceſſion and a common ſeal, with the power of poſſeſſing the real and perſonal eſtates of the late Thomas Guy, eſq; for the purpoſes of the will, and to purchaſe in perpetuity, or for any term of years, any other eſtate whatſoever, not exceeding 12,000l. per annum.

This corporation was no ſooner eſtabliſhed by parliament, than the preſident and governors ſet heartily about the work, by finiſhing and furniſhing the hoſpital, chuſing their officers and ſervants, and taking in patients, whoſe number at firſt amounted to 402. For the more effectual preventing inferior ſervants preying upon poor patients, or their friends, they reſolved to give them handſome ſalaries; which they ſtipulated as follow.

Theſe officers and ſervants are choſen by the ſixty governors, who have carried on this noble charity in ſuch a manner as to reſtore eaſe and health to many thouſands of their fellow-ſubjects. Beſides which, the expence of the out-patients who receive medicines gratis, generally amount to about 1600l. per annum.

It may not be improper, before we conclude this article, to mention ſome other particulars relating to Mr. Guy, in order to do juſtice to the character of that great benefactor to the public, by which it will be ſeen the little foundation there is for the general opinion of his being remarkable for nothing more than his parſimony and avarice.

He was a patron of liberty and of the rights of his fellow-ſubjects, which, to his great honour, he ſtrenuouſly aſſerted in ſeveral parliaments, whereof he was a member for the borough of Tamworth in Staffordſhire, the place of his birth. To this town he was a general benefactor; and early in his life he not only contributed towards the relief of private families in diſtreſs, but erected an alms-houſe, with a library, in that borough, for the reception of fourteen poor men and women, to whom he allowed a certain penſion during his life, and at his death he bequeathed the annual ſum of 125l. towards their future ſupport, and for putting out children apprentices, &c.

In the year 1701 Mr. Guy built and furniſhed, at his own expence, three wards on the north ſide of the outer court of St. Thomas's hoſpital, and gave to thoſe wards 100l. a year, for eleven years immediately preceding the foundation of his hoſpital. Some time before his death he removed the frontiſpiece of St. Thomas's hoſpital, which ſtood over the gateway in the borough, and erected it in the place where it now ſtands, fronting the ſtreet: he alſo enlarged the gateway; rebuilt the two large houſes on its ſides, and erected the fine iron gate between them, all at the expence of 3000l. At his death, he left to his poor aged relations the ſum of 870l. a year during their life; and among his younger relations, who were very numerous, and his executors, he left the ſum of 75,589l. He left the governors of Chriſt's hoſpital, a perpetual annuity of 400l. for taking in four children annually, at the nomination of the governors; and bequeathed 1000l. for diſcharging poor priſoners within the city of London, and the counties of Middleſex and Surry, who could be releaſed for the ſum of 5l. by which ſum, and the good management of his executors, there were above ſix hundred poor perſons ſet at liberty, from the ſeveral priſons within the bills of mortality.

At the ſouth extremity of the Borough or High-ſtreet, formerly ſtood a church dedicated to St. Margaret; on whoſe ſite is now erected a court of juſtice, which court-houſe ſtands on a ſmall colonade that leads to a tavern, over which is the court-room where the ſteward for the city of London holds a court of record every Monday, for all debts, damages, and treſpaſſes within his limits. On the front of this edifice is the ſtatue of king Charles II. under which is the following inſcription:

Beſides this court, there are alſo three court-leets held in the borough: for it contains three liberties or manors, viz. the Great liberty, the Guildable, and the King's manor, in which are choſen conſtables, ale-conners, &c. There are alſo court-leets kept at Bermondſey, Rotherhithe, and Lambeth.

Directly ſouthward from this court runs a ſpacious, wide, and well inhabited ſtreet of ſubſtantial tradeſmen and dealers, and inn-keepers, which is called St. Margaret's-hill, and extends as far as the ſouth-weſt corner of St. George's church.

On the eaſt ſide of this ſtreet is ſituate

The MARSHALSEA PRISON.

This is a place of confinement for perſons who have committed crimes at ſea, as pirates, &c. and for debtors. In this priſon is the Marſhalſea court, the judges of which are, the lord ſteward of his majeſty's houſhold for the time being; the ſteward of the court, who muſt be a barriſter at law; and a deputy ſteward. In all civil actions tried in this court, both the plaintiff and defendant muſt belong to his majeſty's houſhold. The perſons confined here for crimes at ſea, take their trials at the Old Bailey.

In the ſame priſon is the Palace court, the juriſdiction of which extends twelve miles round the palace of Weſtminſter, the city of London only excepted; and the debtors within any part of Weſtminſter, and twelve miles round, may be taken to this priſon for a debt of 40s. Actions for debt are tried in this court every Friday, and there are the ſame judges, counſellors and attornies here as in the Marſhalſea court; there are, beſides the judges already mentioned, a prothonotary, a ſecondary, a deputy prothonotary; four counſellors, and ſix attornies. But in this court neither the plaintiff nor defendant muſt belong to his majeſty's houſhold.

The buildings of this priſon are mean and ruinous; but the court-room is tolerably ſpacious and convenient.

How long this priſon has been kept in Southwark cannot be aſcertained; but that it is of conſiderable ſtanding will appear from the following occurrence:

In the year 1377 the duke of Lancaſter, lord-high admiral of the kingdom, having aſſembled the royal navy at London, a ſailor belonging to the ſame happened to be killed by a gentleman; which was ſo highly reſented by the ſailors in general, that they commenced a proſecution againſt him for murder; but obſerving the partiality of the court in his favour, and that a pardon had been obtained to ſecure him in caſe of danger, theſe proceedings exaſperated the proſecutors to ſuch a degree, that they ran in a body to the Marſhalſea priſon; and breaking open the ſame, ſeized the priſoner, and murdered him upon the ſpot; after which they dragged his body to the gallows, hung it thereon, and by ſound of trumpet returned to their reſpective ſhips in triumph. And in the year 1381 Wat Tyler, with his rebellious crew, broke open this priſon, with ſeveral others, and releaſed the priſoners.

At the ſouth eaſt angle of this ſtreet, on the ſame ſide ſtands the pariſh church of St. GEORGE.

Though we cannot trace the origin of this church, yet, that it is of great antiquity is manifeſt from its being given by Thomas Arderne to the abbot and monks of Bermondſey, in the year 1122. However, the late fabrick, being greatly decayed by age, the pariſhioners applied to parliament to have the ſame rebuilt; and having obtained an act for that purpoſe, the ſame was taken down, and the firſt ſtone of the preſent ſtructure laid in the beginning of the year 1734, and the work being carried on with great expedition, the ſame was finiſhed in the year 1736.

This church which is a rectory, is thus denominated from its dedication to St. George, the the Cappadocian martyr; and the advowſon thereof is in the gift of the crown. The profits ariſing to the incumbent amount to about 220l. per annum.

To this church there is an aſcent by a flight of ſteps, defended by plain iron rails. The door caſe, which is Ionic has a circular pediment, ornamented with the heads of cherubims in clouds; and on each ſide of this pediment, which reaches to the height of the roof the front is adorned with a baluſtrade and vaſes. From this part the tower riſes plain, ſtrengthened with ruſtic quoins, as is the body of the building, and on the corners of the tower are again placed vaſes. From hence are raiſed a ſeries of Ionic columns ſupporting the baſe of the ſpire, which has ribs on the angles, and openings in all the faces. The top is crowned with a ball from which riſes the fane.

The veſtry is ſelect, and the pariſh officers are, three churchwardens, ſix conſtables, four ſideſmen, three ſurveyors of the highway, and four ſcavengers.

The remarkable places in this pariſh are, the King's bench priſon, the Marſhalſea, the county jail, a bridewell, or houſe of correction, and the Lock-hoſpital. A charity-ſchool for fifty boys, maintained by ſubſcription; a baptiſt meeting in White's-ſtreet; and an independent meeting in Bridewell-alley.

At the ſouth eaſt corner of Kent-ſtreet is ſituate

The LOCK HOSPITAL.

This was anciently a houſe for the reception and cure of lepers; but at preſent it belongs to St. Bartholomew's-hoſpital, and is appropriated to the cure of veneral patients.

It is a ſmall neat edifice; at the ſouth end of which is a chapel, built about 120 years ago.

The ſtreet from St. George's church, ſouthward, is called Blackman-ſtreet; at the ſouth weſt corner of which there is a road, that runs through St. George's-fields to Weſtminſter-bridge. At the north eaſt corner of this road ſtands

The KING's BENCH PRISON.

This is a place of confinement for debtors; and for thoſe ſentenced by the court of King's-bench to ſuffer impriſonment for libels and other miſdemeanors; but thoſe who can purchaſe the liberties have the benefit of walking through a part of the Borough, and in St. George's-fields.

This priſon is ſituated in a fine air; but all proſpect of the fields, even from the uppermoſt windows, is excluded by the height of the walls with which it is ſurrounded. It has a neat chapel for the performance of divine worſhip, and only one bed in each room; but theſe rooms are extremely ſmall; they are all exactly alike, and none above nine feet in length. It is a new brick building, without which the marſhal, who has the keeping of this jail, has very handſome apartments. Priſoners in any other jail may remove hither by Habeas Corpus.

On the ſouth weſt of this road, near the turnpike, is a modern charity called

The ASYLUM.

This charitable foundation was eſtabliſhed in order to preſerve poor friendleſs and deſerted girls, under twelve years of age, from the miſeries and dangers to which they would be expoſed, and from the guilt of proſtitution.

The evils this charity is intended to prevent, are not chimerical but founded on facts. It too often happens, that by the death of the father, a mother intitled to no relief from any pariſh, is left with ſeveral helpleſs children to be ſupplied from her induſtry; her reſource for ſubſiſtence is uſually to ſome low occupation, ſcarcely ſufficient to afford bread and cloathing, and rarely the means of inſtruction. What then muſt become of the daughters of ſuch parents, poor and illiterate as they are, and thereby expoſed to every temptation? Neceſſity may make them proſtitutes, even before their paſſion can have any ſhare in their guilt. Among theſe unhappy objects, very agreeable features are frequently ſeen diſguiſed amidſt dirt and rags, and this ſtill expoſes them to greater hazards; for theſe are the girls which the vile procureſs ſeeks after; ſhe trepans them to her brothel, even while they are yet children, and ſhe cleans and dreſſes them up for proſtitution. But what is ſtill more dreadful, maternal duty and affection have been ſo thoroughly obliterated, that even mothers themſelves have been the ſeducers; they have enſnared their children to the houſe of the procureſs, and ſhared with her the infamous gain of initiating their daughters in lewdneſs: or if this has not been the caſe, they have too often been prevailed on, for a trifling conſideration, to conceal and forgive the crime of the infamous bawd.

Theſe and other conſiderations induced a number of noblemen and gentlemen, who had approved of a propoſal from John Fielding, eſq; one of the juſtices for the liberty of Weſtminſter, to hold their firſt meeting on the tenth of May 1758, for carrying into execution a plan of this Aſylum. Several other meetings were ſoon after held, in which the rules and orders for the reception and management of the children were eſtabliſhed, and the leaſe of a houſe, lately the Hercules inn near Weſtminſter-bridge, agreed for. This houſe was ſoon fitted up, and furniſhed, and the firſt children admitted on the fifth of July following.

The rules and orders eſtabliſhed are as follow:

1. The qualification of a perpetual guardian is a benefaction of thirty guineas or upwards, at one payment.

2. That of an annual guardian is a ſubſcription of three guineas or upwards per annum.

3. Ladies ſubſcribing the ſaid ſums, will be conſidered as guardians of this charity, and have a right of voting at all general elections, by proxy, ſuch proxy being a guardian, or they may ſend a letter to the board, naming therein the perſon they vote for, which ſhall be conſidered as their vote. It is eſteemed by the guardians a benefit to the charity, for the ladies occaſionally to viſit the houſe, and inſpect the management of the children; the matron being ordered to attend ſuch ladies, and to give them all neceſſary information: and, whatever obſervations they may then make, or whatever hints, at other times, may occur to them, for the good of the charity, if they will be pleaſed to tranſmit them by letter to the ſecretary, or to the committe, who meet every Wedneſday in the forenoon at the Aſylum, they will be immediately taken into conſideration, and have all reſpectful regard ſhewn to them.

4. Thoſe gentlemen and ladies, who have already ſubſcribed leſſer ſums than thirty guineas, by making up their ſubſcriptions to that ſum, within a year, will be entered in the ſubſcription book as perpetual guardians.

5. There is to be an annual general meeting of the guardians on the ſecond Wedneſday in March.

6. A general quarterly meeting is to be held on the ſecond Wedneſday in July, the ſecond Wedneſday in January, the ſecond Wedneſday in April, and the ſecond Wedneſday in October, for auditing the accounts, and making laws and rules for the government of the charity and for other buſineſs.

7. A commitee is appointed, to conſiſt of thirty guardians, who are to meet every Wedneſday at eleven o'clock in the forenoon at the Aſylum, to tranſact the buſineſs of the charity; and they are from time to time, to report their proceedings to the following general court, and any three of the ſaid gentlemen conſtitute a quorum. In theſe committees are a preſident, vice preſident and a treaſurer.

8. The officers and ſervants of the houſe are a phyſician, two ſurgeons, an apothecary and a chaplain.

A ſecretary, who keeps the accounts of the hoſpital, and does all ſuch other buſineſs as is commonly done by ſecretaries, clerks, and regiſters, at other charities.

A matron, who ſuperintends the affairs of the houſe, takes care of the proviſions and furniture, delivers an account of the current expences weekly to the ſecretary, to be laid before the committee. She is to ſee that the children are properly employed, that they are attentive to their learning, and that they behave with decency; that the teachers do their duty, and that they treat the children with humanity. The ſervants under her, are teachers of reading, knitting, ſewing, &c. a cook, a houſe-maid, and a ſervant man.

9. The objects to be admitted are orphans, the daughters of neceſſitous parents, reſiding in pariſhes where they have no relief, and deſerted girls within the bills of mortality, from eight to twelve years of age; but infirm children are not admitted, as the objects of this charity are to be conſtantly employed in every branch of good houſwifry.

10. Each object applying for admiſſion, muſt produce ſuch certificate of her age and neceſſity, as ſhall be ſatisfactory to the guardians then preſent and in all caſes, wherein, during the infancy; of this Aſylum more objects ſhall apply for admiſſion than the Aſylum can at once receive, the names of the objects not admitted are entered in a book kept for that purpoſe, and a notice is ſent to the perſons, ſignifying the certificate of each child, of the firſt opportunity of taking in ſuch children that ſhall happen afterwards; in filling up all which, the children, before refuſed, have the preference as they ſtand upon the entry: each of the above certificates muſt be ſigned by two ſubſtantial houſekeepers, of the pariſh where the object reſides.

11. The children are regularly and alternately employed in reading, knitting, ſewing, and in the buſineſs of the kitchen, to which latter employment four are appointed weekly, to be with the cook, to aſſiſt her, and to receive from her the neceſſary neceſſary inſtructions in plain cookery, curing proviſions, and other employments of the kitchen. They likewiſe make the beds, clean the rooms, aſſiſt in waſhing and ironing the linen, and in other houſhold buſineſs, according to their reſpective ages and abilities, at the diſcretion of the matron.

12. The chaplain preaches on Sundays, and performs the other parts of divine ſervice, and catechiſes the children. On the other days of the week prayers are alſo read by the matron or teacher; and ſome portion of ſcripture is read by thoſe of the children who are beſt able. They have alſo each of them a common prayer book, and the new teſtament; and other good books are likewiſe provided for them.

By this noble charity a great number of unhappy children have not only been preſerved from the brink of deſtruction, but have likewiſe become an happineſs to their parents, and uſeful members to ſociety.

In the north-weſt diviſion of St. George's-fields is a new road cutting which is to lead from Black-friars bridge to Newington; near the north end of which, on the weſt ſide is, at this time, erecting a very handſome and extenſive building, as a Magdalen houſe, for the reception of penitent proſtitutes, who, as ſoon as it is finiſhed, will be removed hither from their preſent ſituation in Preſcot-ſtreet, Goodmans-fields.

Proceeding ſouthward from Blackman-ſtreet, we come to a village called Newington-Butts, where, near the turnpike, is another new road which communicates between Weſtminſter bridge and the county of Kent, through Deptford and Blackheath. This village extends from Blackman-ſtreet to Kennington-common, and was ſo called from the exerciſe of ſhooting at butts, much practiſed on this ſpot of ground in ancient days; or from being the patrimony of the family of Butts in Norfolk.

A little to the ſouthward of the turnpike, on the ſouth-weſt corner of Newington, ſtand

FISHMONGERS ALMSHOUSES.

Theſe almſhouſes, which are very handſome buildings, were founded and erected at different times. The moſt ancient is St. Peter's hoſpital, a Gothic ſtructure, built with brick and ſtone, with a brick wall before it, within which are two rows of tall trees, and behind the buildings a garden.

The entrance is by a pair of iron gates opening to the center of the building, which is lofty, but irregular. On the inſide are two courts behind each other, in which is a hall with painted windows and a chapel. Inſcriptions on the ſides of theſe courts ſhew that they were built at different times.

To the ſouth of this hoſpital is another founded by Mr. James Hulbert, a liveryman of the fiſhmongers company, in the year 1719, whoſe ſtatue is erected upon a pedeſtal; and in the wall which extends before both, are iron rails to afford a view of this ſtatue, the more modern hoſpital, erected by that gentleman, and the pleaſant walks before it.

The fiſhmongers company erected St. Peter's hoſpital by virtue of letters patent granted by king James I. in the year 1618, for the reception of ſeveral of their poor members who had penſions bequeathed them by the wills of ſeveral members of the company: thirteen of whom were beadſmen and women of the company's great benefactor Sir Thomas Kneſworth, who in 1513 left them 8d. per week each. Sir Thomas Hunt alſo in 1615 left 20l. 10s. per annum towards the ſupport of ſix ancient poor men and women. In 1620 Richard Edmunds bequeathed an annual ſum of 6l. towards the maintenance of two poor perſons, which number of twenty-one penſioners, with one added by the company, were put into this hoſpital; and ſoon after Sir John Leman, Sir John Gayer, Mr. Harper, Arthur Mouſe and Mrs. Ann Bromſgrove, by their reſpective wills demiſed ſeveral ſums to the amount of 28l. per annum.

Each of the twenty-two alms-people have two rooms, and an allowance of 3s. per week, 15s. at Chriſtmas, and a chaldron of coals and a gown yearly. And one of the penſioners, who reads prayers twice a day in the chapel, has an additional allowance of 40s. per annum.

The more modern ſtructure, as before mentioned, was founded by Mr. James Hulbert, citizen and fiſhmonger, for the accommodation of twenty poor men and women; who, beſides two neat rooms to lie in, have each an allowance of 3s. per week, one chaldron of coals, a gown every year, and 15s. at Chriſtmas.

Not far from theſe alms-houſes, on the weſt ſide of the village, is ſituate the pariſh church of St. MARY, NEWINGTON.

This church, which is dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is a rectory of very ancient foundation. It is one of the peculiars belonging to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and is valued at 140l. per annum, in the gift of the biſhop of Wincheſter.

The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, four ſideſmen, and four overſeers and collectors. The peace officers are, four conſtables, four headborough., two ſurveyors of the highway, and two ſcavengers.

Here are eight alms-houſes for the poor of the pariſh, and for eight of the Drapers company, founded by Mr. Waller.

On the weſt of Southwark, and near the ſouth end of Weſtminſter-bridge, is the village of Lambeth. This place takes its name from Lamehithe, i. e. dirty-harbour. It is famous in ſtory for the death of Canute, the valiant Daniſh king of England; and for many ages the reſidence of the archbiſhops of Canterbury, as it had been long before the ſeats of the biſhops of Rocheſter.

The palace belonging to the archbiſhop of Canterbury was originally built by archbiſhop Baldwin in 1188, whoſe firſt intention was to raiſe a ſuperb ſtructure at Hackington, near this place; but the monks, with whom he was at variance, riance, obtained the pope's mandate againſt it; when, taking down what he had erected, he removed the beſt of the materials to Lambeth, with which he built the palace, a college and church, having before purchaſed the ground of the biſhop and convent of Rocheſter, by a fair exchange.

In the year 2250 Boniface, archbiſhop of Canterbury, having, by his arrogance, rendered himſelf hateful to the citizens of London, retired, for the ſecurity of his perſon, to this palace; and finding it in a ruinous condition, within the ſpace of three years rebuilt the whole north ſide, the archiepiſcopal apartments, the library and cloyſters, the guard chamber, the chapel, and Lollards tower.

From that time this palace became the reſidence of the greateſt perſons of the church, and was ſoon enlarged by many additional buildings: cardinal Pool built the gate, which, for that time, is a noble ſtructure. The Lollards tower, which is thus named from a room in it prepared for the impriſonment of the followers of Wickliff, the Britiſh reformer, who were called Lollards, was finiſhed by Chickely, and remains a laſting memorial of his cruelty, and antichriſtian ſpirit. It is a ſmall room, twelve feet broad and nine long, planked with elm, and there ſtill remain eight rings and ſtaples, to which chriſtians were chained, for preſuming to differ in opinion from that prelate. The ſpacious hall was erected by Juxton, and the brick edifice between the gate and the hall was begun by archbiſhop Sancroft, and finiſhed by Tenniſon.

From the preſent ſtructure being thus erected at different periods, it is not at all ſurprizing that it has but little appearance of uniformity; but the edifice, though old, is in moſt parts ſtrong; the corners are faced with ruſtic, and the top ſurrounded with battlements; but the principal parts are well proportioned and well enlightened. Some of the inner rooms are too cloſe and confined; but there are many others open and pleaſant in themſelves, with the advantage of being convenient, and of affording very agreeable proſpects: for as this palace is ſituated on the bank of the Thames, it admits of a fine view up and down the river, and, from the higher apartments, a proſpect of the county each way.

In this palace is a library, which is capacious, and well ſtored with books; among which there are upwards of ſix hundred volumes of manuſcripts. And at the ſouth-eaſt corner there are preſerved ſeveral relicks of popiſh ſuperſtition, and a complete dreſs, viz. a veſtment, alb, ſtole, maniple, &c. for a prieſt to ſay maſs.

Adjoining to the ſouth-weſt angle of this palace ſtands the parochial church of

St. MARY, LAMBETH.

On the death of Richard, archbiſhop of Canterbury, A. D. 1184, a conteſt aroſe between the ſuffragan biſhops of that province and the monks of Canterbury, concerning their ſeveral pretenſions to the right of electing their archbiſhop; on which occaſion, the monks appealing to Rome, great intereſt was made in behalf of each party, till at length a mandate was obtained of the pope, wherein the biſhops and monks were injoined to unite in the election: purſuant to which, the time of chuſing was appointed; but the refractory monks not appearing, the ſuffragans choſe Baldwin, biſhop of Worceſter, for their metropolitan; which the monks highly reſenting, ſtrenuouſly exerted themſelves to invalidate the election. But the king, who was a great favourer of Baldwin, being made acquainted with the demands and promiſes of the monks, prevailed upon him to renounce his election, and the electors to declare the ſame void. The monks having obtained what they wanted, proceeded to a new election, and, according to their previous declaration, re-elected Baldwin.

However, the king, willing to repreſs the inſolence of the monks, endeavoured, by the following ſtratagem, to wreſt from them the power electing their archbiſhop:

He commanded Baldwin, the archbiſhop, to build a college at Hackington, near Canterbury; for which he (the king) was to erect one prebend, and each of the ſuffragans of the province another, whereof, as founders, they were to have the perpetual patronage; which was done with a view to deprive the monks of the right of election, and to veſt the ſame in the canons of the intended college. And the more eaſily to prevail upon the pope to come into this ſcheme, they propoſed to dedicate the ſaid college to Thomas Becket, the moſt celebrated ſaint of that time, and who was held in ſuch veneration by the pope, that it was not in the leaſt doubted, but he would readily transfer the right of election from the monks of Canterbury to the canons of Hackington.

The foundation being dug, and materials provided for the intended work, the part thereof allotted to the archbiſhop to erect, was the church and a certain other part of the building. The monks, apprehenſive of the king's and the archbiſhop's deſign againſt them, applied to Rome for redreſs. In the mean time the work was carried on with ſuch expedition, that the church being almoſt finiſhed, it was conſecrated, and divers ſecular prieſts inſtituted and inſtalled therein. But the monks having ſucceeded in their application to Rome, obtained a mandate from the pope to diſſolve the new corporation, and raze the edifice; which neither the king nor archbiſhop daring to oppoſe, the arbitrary order was executed accordingly.

Pope Urban the great protector of the monks, dying ſoon after, he was ſucceeded by Gregory the eighth, a great favourer of Baldwin, who was thereby encourged to renew his deſign, but in another place; for which end having obtained of the biſhop and convent of Rocheſter, a certain ſpot of ground at Lamhee, Lamhithe, or Lambeth, (where the archiepiſcopal palace is ſituate) he began to erect a church, and manſions for the canons, about the year 1188, which he lived not to finiſh. Wherefore Hubert, one of his ſucceſſors, ſoon after endeavoured to accompliſh the ſame; but the monks of Canterbury, to defeat his deſign, as they had done that of his predeceſſor Baldwin, applied to Rome for that purpoſe; when when, after great ſollicitations on both ſides, a compoſition was brought about, on the following terms; viz. That upon condition it were pulled down, Hubert might erect another upon a new foundation, and endow the ſame with an annual revenue of one hundred pounds, and place therein twenty canons. Purſuant to this agreement, the church was pulled down, and the foundation of a new one laid, where the preſent church is ſituate by Hubert, for canons regular, about the year 1200.

This antique ſtructure, dedicated to St. Mary, is a very plain building. The tower is ſquare, and both that and the body of the church are crowned with battlements. In the ſouth eaſt window of the middle iſle there is a picture of a pedlar and his dog painted on glaſs, in memory of a pedlar who gave to this pariſh a piece of ground at Lambeth-wall, meaſuring an acre and nineteen poles, and called to this day Pedlar's-acre.

The veſtry of this pariſh is general. The pariſh officers are, three churchwardens, three ſideſmen and five overſeers and collectors for the poor. The peace officers are, ſix conſtables, nine headboroughs, twenty inqueſt, or leet jurymen, four ſurveyors of the highway, and two ſcavengers.

In this pariſh is an ancient royalty, in the conqueror's ſurvey denominated Chenintuna, but at preſent Kennington, where anciently ſtood a royal manſion wherein the kings of England uſed frequently to reſide; and whither John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, in the year 1377, fled to Richard prince of Wales, to avoid the fury of the Londoners, who threatened his life for an inſult offered their biſhop. A little northward from the palace ran Canute's trench, a canal, which had its influx to the river Thames, at the lower end of Chelſea reach, and through which it is ſaid he carried his navy to the weſt ſide of London-bridge, to attack the city by water on that ſide.

The remarkable places in this pariſh are, Lambeth-wells, Vauxhall gardens, a plate glaſs-houſe, a bottle glaſs-houſe, and the ſouth end of Weſtminſter-bridge. Alſo a ſchool for twenty poor children of the marſh and wall liberties, endowed with thirty-five pounds per annum; and archbiſhops Teniſon's ſchool for thirty boys and fourteen girls, endowed with ſixty pounds per annum for the maſter. Here are alſo almshouſes and a workhouſe for the poor.

The pariſh of Lambeth is very extenſive, and is divided into four liberties, and theſe ſubdivided into eight precincts, viz. 1. The Biſhop's. 2. The Prince's. 3. Vauxhall. 4. Kennington. 5. Marſh. 6. Wall. 7. Stockwell. 8. The Dean's. And the extent of the pariſh is as follows:

From the landing-place northward and eaſtward, along the waterſide to the Old Barge-houſe; and thence on to the corner of St. George's-fields, and ſo on the weſterly ſide of the ditch ſouthward to near the Dog and Duck; and then croſs the fields ſouth eaſtward (leaving the ditch on the left hand) to Kennington; and thence ſouthward to Kennington-common, (where it meets with Newington pariſh) to the croſs digged there in the ground; and then ſouth-weſtward croſs the fields to the back of Newbury-gardens, where they mark in an oaken tree, and from thence paſs ſouthward thirty rods; and thence eaſtward to Camberwell town through a lane near Dulwich, and ſo weſtward to Delver; alſo Wood's-farm, and thence near two miles ſoutherly to Vicar's-oak, at which oak meet the pariſhes of Lambeth northward, Camberwell eaſtward, Stretham ſouth-weſtward, and Batterſea ſouth weſt by weſt. And from this oak they go weſt by northward to Norwood's-gate, and thence ſouth-weſtward to Stretham-common, (to avoid a wood) and thence north-weſtward to the Windmill-houſe, and thence through a wood, weſt and by ſouthward, to Coles-farm, which leaving to the north-eaſtward, they paſs about ſouth-ſouth weſt to the road leading from London to Croydon; and, croſſing the road, they go weſt by north to Blake-hall, and thence on the ſame point to Broom-hill, and ſo eaſtward about forty rods in the road, and thence turning due weſt, they go to the road that leads to Kennington, and eaſterly along that road to Nine-elms, and thence ſouth-weſtward about thirty rods towards Batterſea, and thence backward into the road, and through Vauxhall to the Thames, and ſo along the water ſide to the plying place at Lambeth: being in the whole a circumference of about ſixteen miles and an half.

About three quarters of a mile ſouthward from Lambeth-palace are ſituate

VAUXHALL GARDENS.

Theſe gardens are large, well planted with lofty trees that afford a delightful ſhade, with woodbines and underwoods, which furniſh a ſafe aſylum for the birds.

From the great gate through which you enter into the gardens, is a noble gravel walk, 900 feet in length, planted on each ſide with very lofty trees, which is terminated by a landſcape of the country, a bautiful lawn of meadow ground, and a grand Gothic obeliſk.

To the right of this walk, as you enter is the grove; in the middle of it is a magnificent orcheſtra, the dome of which is ſurmounted with a plume of feathers, the creſt of the prince of Wales. In fine weather the muſical entertainments are performed here. It has a very fine organ, with ſeats and deſks for the muſicians, and a vacancy at the front for the vocal performers. The ſeats or boxes round the orcheſtra are diſpoſed to the beſt advantage for hearing the muſic.

In moſt of the pavilions are pictures, painted from the deſigns of Mr. Hayman and Mr. Hogarth, on ſubjects admirably adapted to the place. In the ground pavilion are four pictures of Hayman's own hand, from the hiſtorical plays of Shakeſpear, that are univerſally admired.

At ſome diſtance are ſeveral noble viſtas of very tall trees, where the ſpaces between each are filled up with neat hedges; and on the inſide are planted flowers and ſweet ſmelling ſhrubs.

The pavilions continue in a ſweep, which leads to a beautiful piazza, and a colonade, 500 feet in length, in the form of a ſemi-circle. This ſemi-circle leads to a ſweep of pavilions that terminate in the great walk.

At

At one end of the croſs gravel walk is a beautiful landſcape painting of ruins and running water. At each end of another walk is a beautiful painting; one is a building, with a ſcaffold and a ladder before it; the other is a view in a Chineſe garden.

There are alſo ſeveral ſtatues, in particular one in marble, by Mr. Roubiliac, of the late Mr. Handel playing on a lyre in the character of Orpheus; and another of Milton, erected on a rock, almoſt ſurrounded with buſhes, in a ſweet lawn adjoining to the garden, as if liſtening to muſic ariſing from the ground.

In cold or rainy weather the muſical performance is in a rotunda, in which is an orcheſtra, with an organ. This rotunda is ſeventy feet in diameter.

In the center hangs a magnificent chandelier, eleven feet in diameter, containing ſeventy-two lamps in three rows.

In the roof, which is arched and elliptic, are two little cupolas, in a peculiar taſte, each cupola is adorned with paintings; Apollo, Pan, and the muſes are in one; and Neptune, with the ſea nymphs in the other.

Adjoining to the walls are ten three quarter columns.

Between theſe columns are four paintings, by Hayman; the firſt repreſents the ſurrender of of Montreal, in Canada to the Britiſh army commanded by general Amherſt. On a commemorating ſtone, at one corner of the piece, is this inſcription: "Power exerted, Conqueſt obtained, "Mercy ſhewn! 1760."

The ſecond repreſents Britannia holding in her hand a medallion of his preſent majeſty, and ſitting on the right hand of Neptune in his chariot drawn by ſea horſes, who ſeem to partake in the triumph for the defeat of the French fleet (repreſented on the back ground) by Sir Edward Hawke, November 10, 1759. The third repreſents lord Clive receiving the homage of the Nabob; and the fourth, Britannia diſtributing laurels to lord Granby, lord Albemarle, lord Townſhend, and the colonels Monckton, Coote, &c.

The concert is opened with inſtrumental muſic, at ſix o'clock, which having continued about half an hour, the company are entertained with a ſong; and in this manner ſeveral other ſongs are performed, with ſonatas or concertos between each, till the cloſe of the entertainment, which is generally about ten o'clock.

A curious piece of machinery is exhibited about nine o'clock, (notice whereof is given by ringing a bell) in a hollow, on the inſide of one of the hedges near the entrance into the viſtas: by removing a curtain, is ſhewn a very fine landſcape, illuminated by concealed lights, in which the pricipal objects that ſtrike the eyes are the caſcade or water-fall, and a miller's-houſe. The exact appearance of water is ſeen flowing down a declivity, and turning the wheel of the mill; it riſes up in a foam at the bottom, and then glides away.

After day-light is cloſed, the garden near the orcheſtra is illuminated, almoſt in an inſtant, with about 1500 glaſs lamps; which, by their glittering among the trees, render it exceeding light and brilliant. And every thing is provided in the moſt elegant manner for the entertainment of thoſe who chuſe to ſup in the garden.

Returning from Lambeth to Newington, we find, as before mentioned, the road which leads from Weſtminſter-bridge to the two great villages of Deptford and Greenwich, ſituate on the eaſt of this great metropolis, in the county of Kent.

Deptford, which conſiſts of two large pariſhes well inhabited, was anciently called Weſt Greenwich, is ſaid to have received its preſent name from there have been a deep ford over the little river Ravenſbourn, near its influx into the Thames, where it has now a bridge. It is a large and populous town, and is divided into Upper and Lower Deptford, which contain together two churches, ſeveral meeting houſes, and about one thouſand nine hundred houſes. It is moſt remarkable for its noble dock, where the royal navy was formerly built and repaired, till it was found more convenient to build the larger ſhips at Woolwich, and other places, where there is a greater depth of water; but notwithſtanding this the yard is enlarged to more than double its former dimenſions, and a great number of hands are conſtantly employed. It has a wet deck of two acres for ſhips, and another of an acre and a half, with vaſt quantities of timber and other ſtores, and extenſive buildings, as ſtorehouſes, and offices, for the uſe of the place, beſides dwelling-houſes for thoſe officers who are obliged to live upon the ſpot, in order to ſuperintend the works. Here the royal yachts are generally kept, and near the dock is the ſeat of Sir John Evelyn, called Say's-court, where Peter the Great, Czar of Muſcovy, reſided for ſome time, and in this yard completed his knowledge and ſkill in the practical part of naval architecture.

In this town are two hoſpitals, one of which was incorporated by king Henry VIII. in the form of a college, for the uſe of ſeamen, and is commonly called Trinity houſe of Deptford Strond; this contains twenty-one houſes, and is ſituate near the church. The other called Trinity hoſpital, has thirty-eight houſes fronting the ſtreet, and is a very handſome edifice, with large gardens belonging to it. Though this laſt is the fineſt ſtructure, yet the other has the preference, on account of its antiquity; and as the brethren of the Trinity hold their corporation by that houſe, they are obliged at certain times, to meet there for buſineſs (as has been already mentioned) Both theſe houſes are for decayed pilots or maſters of ſhips, or their widows, the men being allowed 20s. and the women 16s. per month.

Greenwich is a very pleaſant village, and has been the birth place of ſeveral of our monarchs, particularly queen Mary and queen Elizabeth; and here king Edward VI. died. The palace was firſt erected by Humphry duke of Glouceſter, who named it Placentia. After which it was enlarged by Henry VII. and completed by Henry VIII. but being ſuffered to run to ruin, was pulled down by king Charles II. who began another magnificent edifice and lived to ſee the firſt wing finiſhed. He alſo enlarged the park, walled it round, planted it, and cauſed a royal obſerva-tory to be erected on the top of the ſteep of the hill. This edifice his majeſty erected for the uſe of the celebrated Mr. Flamſtead, and it ſtill retains the name of that great aſtronomer, he likewiſe furniſhed it with mathematical inſtruments for aſtronomical obſervations, and a deep dry well for obſerving the ſtars in the day time.

That which is properly the palace here, is an edifice of no great extent, and it is now converted into apartments for the governor of the Royal hoſpital, and the ranger of the park. This park is well ſtocked with deer, and affords a noble and delightful view of the fine hoſpital, the river Thames, and the city of London.

Greenwich is ſaid to contain 1350 houſes. Its pariſh church, which was rebuilt by the commiſſioners for erecting the fifty new churches, is a very handſome ſtructure, dedicated to St. Alphage, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who is ſaid to have been ſlain by the Danes in the year 1012, on the ſpot where the church now ſtands. There is a college at the end of the town, fronting the Thames, for the maintenance of twenty decayed old houſekeepers, twelve out of Greenwich, and eight who are to be alternately choſen from Snottiſham and Caſtle-Riſing in Norfolk. This is called the duke of Norfolk's college, though it was founded and endowed, in 1613, by Henry earl of Northampton, the duke of Norfolk's brother, and by him committed to the care of the Mercers company. To this college belongs a chapel, in which the earl's body is laid, which, as well as his monument, was removed hither ſome years ago, from the chapel of Dover caſtle, The penſioners, beſides meat, drink, and lodging, are allowed 1s. 6d. a week, with a gown every year, linen once in two years, and hats once in four years.

In the year 1560 Mr. Lambard, author of the perambulation of Kent, alſo built and founded an hoſpital called queen Elizabeth's college, ſaid to be the firſt erected by an Engliſh proteſtant. There are likewiſe two charity ſchools in this pariſh, one founded by Sir William Boreman, knt. for twenty boys, who are cloathed, boarded, and educated; they wear green coats and caps: and the other by Mr. John Roan, who left his eſtate for teaching alſo twenty boys reading, writing, and arithmetic, and allowing two pounds per annum for each boy's cloaths. Theſe wear grey coats.

The river Thames is here very broad, and the channel deep; and at ſome very high tides the water is ſalt, though it is uſually ſweet and freſh.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

This building ſtands on the ſpot, where once was ſituate the palace of ſeveral of our kings. The firſt wing of this noble and ſuperb edifice, erected by king Charles II. was deſigned to be applied to the ſame uſe. Indeed from the magnificence of the ſtructure, it can ſcarcely be taken for any thing leſs than the palace of a great monarch. However, king William III. being very deſirous of promoting the trade, navigation, and naval ſtrength of this kingdom, by inviting great numbers of his ſubjects to betake themſelves to the ſea, gave this noble palace, and ſeveral other edifices, with a conſiderable ſpot of ground, for the uſe of thoſe Engliſh ſeamen and their children, who by age, wounds, or other accidents, ſhould be diſabled from farther ſervice at ſea, and for the widows and children of ſuch as were ſlain in fighting at ſea, againſt the enemies of their country. king William alſo by his letters patent, in 1694, appointed commiſſioners for the better carrying on his pious intentions, and therein deſired the aſſiſtance of his good ſubjects, as the neceſſity of his affairs did not permit him to advance ſo conſiderable a ſum towards this work, as he deſired. In conformity to this requeſt, many benefactions were made to both in that and the ſucceeding reigns, to this noble charity, which, according to the tables hung up at the entrance of the hall, amount to 58,209l. and afterwards the eſtate of the earl of Derwentwater, who bore a principal part in the rebellion in 1715, amounting to 6000l. per annum, was given by parliament to this hoſpital. The firſt range had coſt king Charles II. 36,000l. and another was ordered to be built on the ſame model: this has been compleated with equal magnificence, and the whole ſtructure entirely finiſhed.

The front to the Thames conſiſts of theſe two ranges of ſtone buildings, with the governor's houſe, at the back part in the center, behind which the park, well planted with trees, riſes with a noble aſcent. Theſe buildings between which is a large area, perfectly correſpond with each other, and each range is terminated with a very noble dome.

In each front to the Thames, two ranges of coupled Corinthian columns finely wrought, ſupport their pediments, and the ſame order is continued in pilaſters along the building. The projection of the entablatures gives an agreeable diverſity of light and ſhade. In the center of each part, between theſe ranges of Corinthian columns, is the door, which is of the Doric order, and adorned above with a tablet and pediment. Within the height of theſe lofty columns are two ſeries of windows, enlightening two floors. The undermoſt, which are the ſmalleſt, have ruſtic caſes crowned with pediments; while the upper ſeries, which are larger, and more lofty, are adorned with the orders, and with upright pointed pediments. Over theſe is an attick ſtory; the entablature of the Corinthian columns and pilaſters ſupports a regular attick courſe: the pilaſters of this order riſing over every column, and pilaſters of the Corinthian below, between which the windows are regularly diſpoſed, and the top is crowned with a handſome baluſtrade.

The buildings, which are continued from theſe, and face the area, correſpond with them, though in a finer, and more elegant manner. In the center of both is a range of columns ſupporting a pediment, and at each corner a range of Corinthian pilaſters. The front is ruſticated, and there are two ſeries of windows. The domes at the end, which are 120 feet high, are ſupported on coupled columns, as are the porticos below; and and under one of theſe is the chapel, which is adorned on the inſide with the greateſt elegance and beauty.

On the ſides of the gate which opens to theſe buildings, from the park are placed a large celeſtial and terreſtrial globe, in which the ſtars are gilt; and in the center of the area, is fixed on a pedeſtal, a ſtatue of his majeſty king George II.

The hall of this hoſpital is finely painted by Sir James Thornhill, particularly the ceiling and upper end; on the latter are repreſented in an alcove, the late princeſs Sophia, king George I. king George II. queen Caroline, the queen dowager of Pruſſia, Frederic prince of Wales, the duke of Cumberland, and the five princeſſes, the daughters of his late majeſty. On the ceiling over the alcove are her majeſty queen Anne and prince George of Denmark: and on the ceiling of the hall are king William and queen Mary, with ſeveral fine emblematical figures. All ſtrangers who ſee this hall pay three-pence each, and this income is applied to the ſupport of the mathematical ſchool, for the ſons of ſailors.

For the better ſupport of this hoſpital every ſeaman in the royal navy and in the ſervice of the merchants pays 6d. a month. This is ſtopped out of the pay of all ſailors, and delivered in at the Six-penny Receiver's office on Tower-hill. And therefore a ſeaman who can produce an authentic certificate of his being diſabled, and rendered unfit for the ſea ſervice, by defending any ſhip belonging to his majeſty's Britiſh ſubjects, or in taking any ſhip from the enemy, may be admitted into this hoſpital, and receive the ſame benefit from it, as if he had been in his majeſty's immediate ſervice.

There are at preſent near two thouſand old or diſabled ſeamen, and an hundred boys, the ſons of ſeamen, inſtructed in navigation, and bred up for the ſervice of the royal navy: but there are no out-penſioners, as at Chelſea. Each of the mariners has a weekly allowance of ſeven loaves, weighing ſixteen ounces each; three pounds of beef; two of mutton; a pint of peaſe; a pound and a quarter of cheeſe; two ounces of butter; fourteen quarts of beer, and one ſhilling a week tobacco money; the tobacco money of the boatſwains is two ſhillings and ſixpence a week each; that of their mates one ſhilling and ſixpence, and that of the other officers in proportion to their rank. Beſides which each common penſioner receives once in two years, a ſuit of blue cloaths, a hat, three pair of ſtockings, two pair of ſhoes, five neckcloths, three ſhirts, and two night caps.

This hoſpital has about one hundred governors, compoſed of the nobility, great officers of ſtate, and perſons in high poſts under the king. The principal officers of the houſe, with their annual ſalaries, are,

Before we quit the ſurvey on the ſouth ſide of the Thames, it will be neceſſary to take in the pariſh of Rotherhithe.

This pariſh, which is commonly called Rederiff, was anciently a village on the ſouth-eaſt of London, on the ſouth bank of the Thames; but is now joined by buildings to Southwark. It extends eaſt to Wells's-dock, and to Weſt-lane in the weſt, including the weſt ſide of that lane.

Such parts of this pariſh as are next the river are well inhabited by maſters of ſhips, ſea-faring people and tradeſmen, depending upon navigation. And though that part between King-ſtreet and Princes-ſtreet was ſome time ago deſtroyed by fire, as related in this hiſtory, yet the ground is covered with very handſome and ſubſtantial buildings.

A little way to the eaſt of Princes-ſtreet, and near the Thames ſide, ſtands the pariſh church of St. MARY, Rotherhithe.

This church is diſtinguiſhed from others dedicated to the Virgin Mary, by the name of the place in which it is ſituated. The old church had ſtood above two hundred years, when, in 1736, it was in ſo ruinous a condition that the inhabitants applied to parliament for leave to pull it down, which being granted, the preſent ſtructure was finiſhed in 1739.

This edifice is built with brick and ornamented with ſtone. It is enlightened by a double range of windows, and the corners both in the tower and body are ſtrengthened with a handſome ruſtic. The tower conſiſts of two ſtages: in the lower are a door and window; in the upper a window and dial; and the whole is terminated by a baluſtrade, from which riſes a circular baſe that ſupports a kind of lanthorn, very elegantly conſtructed with Corinthian columns; over theſe are urns with flames; and from the roof of this lanthorn riſes a well-conſtructed ſpire terminated by a ball and fane.

This church is a rectory in the gift of a lay patron. The profits ariſing to the incumbent are ſaid to amount to near two hundred pounds per annum.

Here is a gift ſermon every Thurſday before the ſecond Sunday in the month, for which the rector receives ten pounds. The veſtry is general. The pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, two ſideſmen, and four overſeers and collectors for the poor. The peace officers are, one conſtable, ſix headboroughs, two ſcavengers, and two ſurveyors of the highway.

CHAP.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Containing the hiſtory, antiquities, and government of Weſtminſter, the dutchy of Lancaſter, and places adjacent; with the deſcription of the ſeveral pariſhes and other remarkable things within the city and liberty thereof.

WESTMINSTER, which is the third diviſion of this great metropolis, receives its name from its abbey or minſter ſituated to the weſtward of the city of London; and, according to ſeveral hiſtorians, was thus denominated to diſtinguiſh it from the abbey of Grace on Tower-hill, called Eaſtminſter. A late writer, however, proves this to be a miſtake, by ſhewing that the former is called Weſtminſter in a charter of ſanctuary granted by Edward the Confeſſor in the year 1066, and that the latter was not founded till 1359; he, therefore, ſuppoſes that the appellation of Weſtminſter was given to diſtinguiſh it from St. Paul's church in the city of London.

This part of the metropolis, in ancient times, was a mean, unhealthy place, with nothing worthy of notice but its minſter or abbey, ſituated in a marſhy iſland, ſurrounded on one ſide by the Thames, and on the other by what is called Long-ditch; a branch of the river which began near the eaſt end of the place, where Mancheſter-court is now ſituated, interſected King-ſtreet, and running along where Gardener's-lane now is, to the place called from thence Long-ditch, croſſed Tothill-ſtreet, a little to the weſt of the Gate-houſe, and continued its courſe along the ſouth wall of the abbey garden, over which is erected a common ſewer. The iſland thus formed was in a manner a waſte overgrown with thorns and briers, and was thence called Thorny iſland. In this ſituation was the abbey, minſter, or monaſtery founded; for the convenience of which a few houſes were probably firſt erected, and theſe at length grew into a ſmall town, in ancient books called the town of Weſtminſter.

For many ages Weſtminſter was entirely detached from London, and there was a very conſiderable ſpace between them. The Strand was the road which led from London to that town, and it was open on either ſide to the Thames and to the fields. In 1385 we find that this road was paved as far as the Savoy; and many years after Sir Robert Cecil building a houſe at Ivy-bridge, his intereſt brought the pavement of the road to to be extended thither; and many of the houſes of the nobility were built in the Strand.

Weſtminſter owed its moſt diſtinguiſhed privileges to Henry VIII. for in the 37th year of his reign an act was paſſed to authorize him by either letters patent or proclamation, to make it an honour, a title of diſtinction which he was empowered by the ſame act to confer upon Kingſton upon Hull, St. Oſyth's in Eſſex, and Donnington in Berkſhire; and after the diſſolution of the monaſtery, he converted it into a biſhopric, in the year 1541, with a dean and twelve prebendaries, and appointed the whole county of Middleſex, except Fulham, which was ſtill to belong to the biſhopric of London, as its dioceſe.

Many years before this Weſtminſter had been the ſeat of the royal palace, the high court of parliament, and of our law tribunals. His majeſty built the palace of St. James's, and purchaſed Whitehall for his own reſidence; the old palace near the abbey being deſtroyed by fire. He alſo incloſed a fine ſpot of ground for a park between the two palaces. And from this time Weſtminſter increaſed greatly with buildings on every ſide. This biſhopric was ſoon diſſolved, in 1550, by king Edward VI. and thereby the title of city, which had been obtained by the above honour, was loſt; though, through courteſy, people ſtill give it that honourable name.

At preſent the city of Weſtminſter conſiſts but of two pariſhes, St. Margaret's and St. John the Evangeliſt; but the liberties contain ſeven pariſhes, which are as follow: St. Martin in the fields, St. James's, St. Anne's, St. Paul's Covent Garden, St. Mary le Strand, St. Clement's Danes, St. George's, Hanover-ſquare, and the precinct of the Savoy.

The government both of the city and liberties, is under the juriſdiction of the dean and chapter of Weſtminſter, in civil as well as eccleſiaſtical affairs, and their authority alſo extends to the precinct of St. Martin's-le-Grand, by Newgate-ſtreet, and in ſome towns of Eſſex, that are exempted from the juriſdiction of the biſhop of London, and the archbiſhopric of Canterbury; but the management of the civil part has ever ſince the reformation been in the hands of laymen, elected from time to time, and confirmed by the dean and chapter.

The principal of theſe magiſtrates is the high ſteward, who is uſually one of the prime nobility. This great officer is choſen by the dean and chapter, and he holds his poſt during life; but upon his death or reſignation, a chapter is called for the election of another, in which the dean ſits as high ſteward, till the election is finiſhed.

The next magiſtrate is the deputy-ſteward, who is choſen by the high-ſteward, and confirmed by the dean and chapter. This officer, who likewiſe holds his poſt during life, ſupplies the place of a ſheriff; for he keeps the court leet with the other magiſtrates, and is always chairman at the quarter ſeſſions.

The next in rank is the high bailiff, who is nominated by the dean, and confirmed by the high high ſteward. He alſo holds his office for life, and has the chief management in the election of members of parliament for Weſtminſter, and all the other bailiffs are ſubordinate to him. He ſummons juries, and in the court-leet ſits next to the deputy ſteward. To him belong all fines, forfeitures and ſtrays, which renders his place very beneficial; but it is commonly executed by a deputy.

Beſides theſe, there are alſo ſixteen burgeſſes and their aſſiſtants, whoſe office in all reſpects reſembles that of the aldermen's deputies of the city of London, each having his proper ward under his juriſdiction; and out of theſe are elected two head burgeſſes, one for the city, and the other for the liberties, who take place in the court leet next to the head bailiff.

There is alſo a high conſtable, who is choſen by the court-leet, and has all the other conſtables under his direction.

Thus the government of Weſtminſter has but little reſemblance to that of an opulent and noble city; it being much more like that of a little country borough, ſince its repreſentatives are choſen by the houſeholders, and it has not the power of making freemen; has no trading companies; nor any other courts, beſides thoſe of the leet, the ſeſſions, and a court of requeſts lately erected.

Excluſive of theſe officers there are in Weſtminſter and its liberties fifty-two inqueſt-men, twelve ſurveyors of the highways, fifty-five conſtables, thirty-one beadles, two hundred and thirty-ſix watchmen, and eighty ſcavengers, who pay to the rakers for cleaning the ſtreets upwards of 4000l. per annum.

We ſhall begin the ſurvey of this part of the metropolis at Temple-bar; on the outſide of which we enter the dutchy of Lancaſter liberty. This part extends on the ſouth ſide of the Strand to the eaſt ſide of Cecil-ſtreet, reaches down this ſtreet to the Thames, and thence to Eſſex buildings, and takes in all the houſes to Temple-bar. On the north ſide it extends from Temple-bar to where the Maypole ſtood (now ſituated the New Church) and extending down Holywell-ſtreet, behind St. Clement's, paſſes by Butcher-row, taking in all the range of buildings. Beyond the place of the Maypole this liberty begins again, near the Fountain-tavern in Catharine-ſtreet, and reaches from thence into the Strand, as far as Exeter-change; then turning up Burleigh-ſtreet, it runs up within four houſes of the corner of Eſſex ſtreet, and croſſing it, proceeds into Catharine-ſtreet, by the Fountain tavern.

The firſt public building within this diſtrict, which is ſituated on the north ſide of the Strand, is the pariſh church of St. CLEMENT DANES.

This church is dedicated to St. Clement, a diſciple of St. Peter the apoſtle; and it receives the addition of Danes from its having been originally a burial-place for the people of that nation. A church has been ſituated on the ſame ſpot ever ſince the year 700. The preſent edifice began to be erected under the direction of Sir Chriſtopher Wren in 1680, and was compleated in two years after, though the ſteeple was not raiſed till the year 1719.

The body of the church, which is of ſtone, has two ſeries of windows, the lower plain and the upper well ornamented, and the termination is by an attic, whoſe pilaſters are crowned with vaſes. On the ſouth ſide it is entered by a portico, to which there is an aſcent of a few ſteps; the portico is covered with a dome ſupported by Ionic columns. Oppoſite to this there is another, and on each ſide the baſe of the ſteeple in the weſt front is a ſmall ſquare tower with its dome. The ſteeple is carried to a great height in ſeveral ſtages: where it begins to diminiſh the Ionic order takes place, and upon its entablature ſupports vaſes. The next ſtage is Corinthian, and above that ſtands the Compoſite ſupporting a dome which is crowned with a ſmaller one, from whence riſes the ball and its fane.

This church is a rectory, ſaid to be worth 600l. per annum, in the gift of the earl of Exeter and his heirs. The veſtry is ſelect; and the officers are ſix burgeſſes and their deputies, two churchwardens, five overſeers, of which four are collectors for the poor, two ſurveyors for regulating the pavements of the ſtreets, eight conſtables, eight ſcavengers, four ſurveyors of the highway, twenty-four jurymen of the dutchy liberty, four ale-conners, and four fleſh taſters.

This pariſh is divided into two liberties, viz. the upper and the lower. The upper, which is in the liberty of Weſtminſter, contains four wards, Temple-bar ward, Sheer lane ward, Drury-lane ward, and Holywell ward. The lower liberty is in the dutchy of Savoy, and contains alſo four wards, viz. Royal ward, Church ward, Middle ward, and Savoy ward.

In the upper church-yard are three ſchools; one for ſeventy boys, who are taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, by the maſter, who is allowed 40l. per annum, and coals and candles. The boys are alſo inſtructed in the mathematics, and are taught to ſing by maſters who are paid for teaching them. In the ſecond ſchool are forty girls, under a miſtreſs, who teaches them to read, ſew, knit, &c. and ſhe has 20l. per annum, beſides coals and candles: theſe girls have alſo a ſinging maſter to teach them, and both boys and girls are cloathed in blue. The third ſchool is the horn book ſchool, where thirty children are taught by a miſtreſs appointed for that purpoſe.

Here are alſo ſix alms-houſes, with ſix rooms, and twelve poor women in each houſe, who are allowed 2s. per week. And in the lower church-yard are five rooms for poor women, each of whom has 2s. 6d. per week.

The remarkable places in this pariſh are, Clement's-Inn, New-Inn, and Lyon's-Inn, the Hackney-coach office, and the ſociety for encouraging arts and manufactures.

CLEMENT'S INN.

This inn received its name from its ſituation in the neighbourhood of St. Clement's church; it belongs to the Inner Temple, and conſiſts of a hall and three courts, where the ſtudents of the law have had lodgings ever ſince the year 1478.

NEW INN.

This was ſo called in contradiſtinction to an old inn which belonged to this ſociety in Sea-coal-lane, near Fleet-ditch. It is ſituated in Wych-ſtreet, and joins to Clement's-inn. It is ſpacious and airy, conſiſting only of one well-built court, with a handſome hall and ſmall garden. This inn belongs to the Middle Temple, and is governed by a treaſurer, and twelve ancients.

LYON's INN.

This is oppoſite to New-inn, and is ſaid to have been in poſſeſſion of the ſtudents and practitioners of the law ever ſince the year 1420. It belongs to the Inner Temple.

At the north-eaſt corner of New-inn is a paſſage which leads into

CLARE MARKET.

This is ſo called from the family of Clare, dukes of Newcaſtle, who were the original proprietors thereof. It is an excellent market for butcher's meat, poultry, fiſh, and all ſorts of garden ſtuff.

HACKNEY-COACH-OFFICE.

This office, which is kept on the weſt ſide of Surry-ſtreet in the Strand, was erected by act of parliament in the year 1696, for licenſing hackney coaches and chairs, and to put them under the government of five commiſſioners, who have each a ſalary of 150l. per annum. The number of coaches is limited to eight hundred; out of which two hundred are to ply every Sunday in their turn, on the forfeiture of 5l. for every coachman who plies out of his turn.

For the better government of theſe coaches and chairs, and preventing the drivers and owners impoſing on thoſe who employ them, each coach has its reſpective number on a tin plate fixed on each ſide. The price of each licence is 50l. No perſon is allowed to have more than two licences; and every proprietor pays 5s. per week by monthly payments, to the receiver of the office. A hackney coachman plying without a licence, uſing another's figure, or defacing his own, forfeits 5l. And no horſe, mare, or gelding, under fourteen hands high, is to be uſed in drawing hackney coaches.

If any coachman abuſes a paſſenger, exacts more for his fare than he ought to do, or refuſes to go, whether by day or night, fair or foul weather, on complaint being made to the commiſſioners, and the number of the coach delivered in, ſuch coachman will be ſummoned to appear, fined for each offence twenty or forty ſhillings, according to the nature of his crime. And as a farther regulation for the ſaid hackney coachmen and their employers, the following rates are by the ſaid act of parliament appointed to be taken by them reſpectively.

That no licenſed hackney-coachman, or driver of ſuch coach, ſhall preſume to take for his hire in and about the cities of London and Weſtminſter, or ten miles of the ſame, above the rate of ten ſhillings per day, reckoned at twelve hours; and by the hours, eighteen pence for the firſt, and twelve pence for every hour after; and from any of the inns of court, or thereabouts, to any part of St. James's or Weſtminſter (except beyond Tothil ſtreet) one ſhilling; and from any of the ſaid inns of court to the Royal Exchange, one ſhilling; and if to the Tower of London, Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, Aldgate, or thereabouts, one ſhilling and ſixpence; and from the ſame places to the ſaid inns of court; and the like rates to and from places of the like diſtances.

Purſuant to the directions of the ſaid act of parliament, and for the better aſcertaining the fares between the moſt remarkable places of this city and ſuburbs, the commiſſioners of the hackney-coach office cauſed the diſtances between the followings parts to be meaſured, and the ſeveral rates fixed accordingly.

Rates of one ſhilling.

From Weſtminſter-hall to Marlborough-ſtreet, Albemarle-ſtreet, Bolton-ſtreet, Bloomſbury-ſquare, Soho-ſquare, or Little Queen-ſtreet, Holbourn.

In the Strand, between Eſſex-ſtreet and Milford-lane, anciently ſtood the chapel of St. Eſprit, but when, or by whom the ſame was founded, is unknown. And nearly contiguous to the ſaid Milford-lane, on the weſt, was ſituate the biſhop of Bath's palace, which coming to the earl of Arundel, it received the appellation of its new maſter; but it at laſt making way for new ſtreets, the titles of the laſt noble poſſeſſor are ſtill retained in thoſe denominated Arundel and Norfolk.

Here is a ſtreet, from a well formerly therein, called Holywell-ſtreet. It probably received this epithet from a chapel, ſaid to have ſtood near St. Innocent's church, or St. Mary-le-Strand.

At the upper end of Wych-ſtreet, and lower end of Drury-lane anciently ſtood the houſes of the noble families of Drury and Craven; and as from the former the neighbouring lane was denominated, ſo from the latter, a handſome court received the name of its buildings.

Some way farther to the weſt from St. Clements, we find the pariſh and church of St. MARY LE SRTAND.

This church is ſo called from its dedication to the Virgin Mary, and its ſituation in the middle of the Strand.

The original church belonging to this pariſh is mentioned ſo early as the year 1222, when it was named St. Mary and the Innocents of the Strand; but how long it ſtood before that time is uncertain. It was then ſituated on the ſouth ſide of the Strand nearly oppoſite the preſent edifice; for the erecting of which it was taken down in 1549, by order of Edward Seymour, duke of Somerſet; which depriving the pariſhioners of a place of worſhip, they joined themſelves to the church of St. Clement Danes, and afterwards to that of St. John Baptiſt in the Savoy, where they continued till the year 1723. At length the act having paſſed for erecting the fifty new churches within the bills of mortality, one was appointed for this pariſh, and the firſt ſtone laid on the 25th of February 1714. It was finiſhed in three years and a half, though it was not conſecrated till the firſt of January 1723, when, inſtead of its ancient name, it was called St. Mary le Strand.

This is a very ſuperb, though not a very extenſive edifice; maſſy, without the appearance of being heavy, and formed to ſtand for ages. At the entrance on the weſt end is an aſcent by a flight of ſteps cut in the ſweep of a circle. Theſe lead to a circular portico of Ionic columns covered with a dome, which is crowned with an elegant vaſe. The columns are continued along the body of the church, with pilaſters of the ſame order at the corners, and in the intercolumniations are niches handſomely ornamented. Over the dome is a pediment ſupported by Corinthian columns, which are alſo continued round the body of the ſtructure, over thoſe of the Ionic order beneath; between which are the windows placed over the niches. Theſe columns are ſupported on pedeſtals, and have pilaſters behind with arches ſprung from them, and the windows have angular and circular pediments alternately. A handſome baluſtrade is carried round the top, and its ſummit is adorned with vaſes. The ſteeple is light though ſolid, and ornamented with compoſite columns and capitals.

This

This church is a rectory in the gift of the biſhop of Worceſter; the value of the living is 225l. beſides ſurplus fees. Of this ſum one hundred pounds has been given and ſettled by parliament, and an hundred and twenty-five pounds is raiſed by the inhabitants by a rate of four-pence in the pound, in lieu of tythes.

The veſtry is ſelect; and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens and two overſeers of the poor. The peace officers are, one conſtable, and two ſcavengers.

On the ſite of this church, till the year 1714. ſtood a very lofty May-pole, which, on public occaſions, was adorned with ſtreamers, flags, garlands of flowers, &c. At the digging the foundation for the preſent church, the virgin earth was diſcovered at the depth of nineteen feet; whereby it appears that the ground in this neighbourhood originally was not much higher than the Thames; therefore this village was truly denominated the Strand, from its ſituation on the bank of the river.

The moſt remarkable building in this pariſh is a royal palace, called SOMERSET HOUSE.

This was built about the year 1549 by the duke of Somerſet, uncle to Edward VI. and protector of England, who demoliſhed the palaces of the biſhops of Cheſter and Worceſter, an inn of chancery called Strand Inn, with the church of St. Mary le Strand, that ſtood there, and building this palace with the materials, it from him obtained the name of Somerſet-houſe. But the duke being ſoon after attainted, it fell to the crown, and has uſually been aſſigned for the reſidence of the queen dowager. In this palace Anne of Denmark, queen to king James I. kept her court, whence it was called Denmark-houſe during that reign; but it ſoon after recovered the name of the founder. It was the reſidence of queen Catharine, dowager of king Charles II. and was ſettled on the late queen Caroline, in caſe ſhe had ſurvived his late majeſty. It conſiſts of ſeveral courts, and has a garden behind ſituated on the bank of the Thames. The firſt court is a handſome quadrangle, built on all ſides with free-ſtone. On the ſouth ſide is a piazza, before the great hall or guard-room; beyond which are other courts that lie on a deſcent towards the garden and the Thames; and on the ſide of the river king Charles II. added a magnificent ſtructure of free-ſtone, with a noble piazza built by Inigo Jones. This new building contains the royal apartments, which command a beautiful proſpect of the river, and the country beyond it. The garden was adorned with ſtatues, ſhady walks, and a bowling green: but as none of the royal family have reſided here ſince queen Catharine, ſeveral of the officers of the court, and its dependents, are permitted to lodge in it; and great part of it has been lately uſed as barracks for ſoldiers and recruits. The garden is entirely decayed, and the apartments are become ſuitable to thoſe who occupy them.

Near to the weſt from Somerſet-houſe, on the north ſide of the Strand, ſtands

EXETER EXCHANGE.

This is ſo called from its ſituation on the ſpot where once ſtood the manſion houſe of the earls of Exeter. It is a large building erected for the benefit of trade, and conſiſting of a lower and upper floor. The lower floor is laid out into little ſhops, ranged on each ſide a long room; and the upper one is now uſed for auctions and other like purpoſes.

Nearly oppoſite this is an ancient building, called

The SAVOY.

This place receives its name from Peter, earl of Savoy, who built a large houſe here in the year 1245, and gave it to the fraternity of Mountjoy, of whom queen Eleanor, wife of Edward III. purchaſed it for her ſon, the duke of Lancaſter. When it came into the hands of Henry VII. he founded here an hoſpital, and called it the hoſpital of St. John Baptiſt. It conſiſted of a maſter and four brethren, who were to be in prieſts orders, and officiate in their turns, and they were to ſtand alternately at the gate of the Savoy, and if they ſaw any perſon who was an object of charity, they were obliged to take him in and feed him. If he proved to be a traveller he was entertained for one night, and a letter of recommendation, with ſo much money given him as would defray his expences to the next hoſpital.

In the ſeventh year of Edward VI. this hoſpital was ſuppreſſed, and the furniture given to the hoſpitals of Bridewell, St. Thomas, &c. but falling into the hands of queen Mary I. ſhe new founded and endowed it plentifully, and it was under the care of a maſter, and four brethren in holy orders, and a receiver of the rents, who was alſo the porter, and locked the gates every night; and he choſe a watchman. The original rents amounted to 22,000l. per annum, which being deemed too large an endowment, an act of reſumption was obtained in the 4th and 5th of William and Mary, ſo that the lands reverted to the crown. But thoſe who had taken leaſes from the maſter of Savoy, had them confirmed for ever, upon the payment of twenty years purchaſe; a reſerve being made of 800l. or 1000l. a year, in perpetuity for the maſter and four brethren, &c.

The Savoy has been reduced to aſhes ſeveral times, particularly by Wat Tyler and Jack Cade; and at other times by accident.

The chapel in the Savoy (which is called St. Mary le Savoy) is probably the chapel of St. John the Baptiſt. It is all ſtone work, and ſeems to be of great antiquity by its aſpect. It was repaired, anno 1721, at the ſole charge of his majeſty George I. who alſo encloſed the burial ground with a ſtrong brick wall, and added a door to it, half of which conſiſts of iron work.

In the firſt year of the reign of queen Anne, commiſſioners were appointed to viſit the hoſpital, who were ſeven lords ſpiritual, and as many lords temporal: the commiſſion was opened by Sir Nathan Wright, then lord-keeper of the the great ſeal; and three of the brethren, or chaplains, were diſcharged, becauſe they had other benefices, as was alſo the fourth, by reaſon he was a teacher of a ſeparate congregation.

The chapel is ſituate by the church-yard of the Savoy, which ſtands between the ſouth ſide of the Strand, and the Thames, and in the county of Middleſex.

It is in the gift of the lord high treaſurer, or commiſſioners of the treaſury for the time being.

The value is uncertain, but computed to be worth by fees, dues, &c. 80l. per annum. The veſtry conſiſts of fourteen inhabitants. The officers are, two chapel wardens, and two overſeers.

The remarkable places and things are, two German churches, one of which is a Calviniſt, and the other a Lutheran; one French church, and one Quakers meeting. Barracks for 500 ſoldiers; the Savoy priſon for deſerters and other delinquents of the army, and for ſecuring the recruits. Here is alſo an handſome infirmary for ſuch of the guards as fall ſick, and for three or four officers.

A little to the weſtward from the Savoy ends the dutchy liberty, at Cecil-ſtreet, on the ſouth ſide of the Strand; and about oppoſite this ſtreet is Southampton-ſtreet, which leads up to Covent-garden.

This place received its name from being formerly a garden belonging to the abbot and monks of the convent of Weſtminſter, whence it was called Convent-garden, a name ſince corrupted into Covent and ſometimes Common-garden. At the diſſolution of religious houſes it fell to the crown and was given firſt to Edward duke of Somerſet; but ſoon after upon his attainder, it reverted again to the crown, and Edward VI. granted it in 1552 to John earl of Bedford, to gether with a field, named the Seven Acres, which being afterwatds built into a ſtreet, is from its length called Long Acre.

Here is a large ſquare called Covent-garden market. It contains about three acres of ground, and is the beſt market in England for herbs, fruit and flowers. It is ſurrounded by a wooden rail, and a column is erected in the middle of it, on the top of which are four ſun-dials. There is a magnificent piazza on the north ſide of this ſquare, deſigned by Inigo Jones, which, if carried round it according to the plan of this celebrated architect, would have rendered it beyond diſpute one of the fineſt ſquares in Europe. There was another piazza at the ſouth eaſt corner; but that being lately conſumed by fire has not been rebuilt.

On the weſt ſide of this ſquare ſtands the parochial church of St. PAUL, Covent-Garden.

This church, which is dedicated to St. Paul, was erected in the year 1640, as a chapel of eaſe to St. Martin's in the Fields, at the expence of Francis earl of Bedford, for the convenience of his tenants, who were then very conſiderably increaſed. It is remarkable for its majeſtic ſimplicity, and the gates on each ſide are very elegant and ſuitable to the ſtructure.

In 1645 the precinct of Covent-garden was ſeparated from St. Martin's, and conſtituted an independent pariſh, which was confirmed after the reſtoration in 1660, by the appellation of St. Paul's, Covent-garden, when the patronage was veſted in the earl of Bedford: and as it eſcaped the fire in 1666, which did not reach ſo far, it remains as it came from the hands of that great architect Inigo Jones.

In the front is a plain, but noble portico of the Tuſcan order, executed in the moſt maſterly manner; the columns are maſſy, and the intercolumniation large, which has an air of noble ſimplicity. The building, though as plain as poſſible, is happily proportioned; the walls are of brick covered with plaiſter, and the corners of ſtone; the roof is flat, and though of great extent, is ſupported by the walls alone, without columns. The pavement is ſtone; the windows are of the Tuſcan form like the portico, and the altar-piece is adorned with eight fluted columns of the Corinthian order, painted in imitation of porphyry.

This church ſtands in the liberty of Weſtminſter, and is a rectory valued at 400l. per annum, beſides a parſonage houſe in the gift of the duke of Bedford.

The veſtry in moſt caſes is in the nature of a ſelect one, compoſed of the churchwardens, or any two of them being preſent, and the ancients of the pariſh, who have ſerved the office of churchwardens. The pariſh officers are, three churchwardens, choſen yearly in Eaſter week, viz. one by the duke of Bedford, one by the rector, and one by the inhabitants, being houſholders of the pariſh, or the major part of them, and two overſeers of the poor. The peace officers are one burgeſs aſſiſtant, four conſtables, four ſcavengers, two ſurveyors of the highways, and two ſurveyors of the ſtreets.

In this pariſh are two charity ſchools, maintained by ſubſcription; one for thirty boys, which is kept under the belfry, who are taught to read, write, and caſt accounts, are cloathed, and have five pounds given to put each of them apprentice; the maſter's ſalary is twenty-five pounds per annum. The other is for twenty girls, who are cloathed, taught to work, read and write, and have three pounds given to put each of them out to do all manner of houſhold work: the miſtreſs, who finds a ſchool room, has a ſalary of 32l. per annum. Here is likewiſe a theatre called Covent-garden playhouſe, and a round-houſe.

Returning to the Strand, and proceeding weſtward from Southampton-ſtreet, we come to St. Martin's-lane, near the ſouth eaſt angle of which is ſituate the pariſh church of St. MARTIN in the Fields.

This church is ſo called from its dedication to St. Martin, and being originally ſituated in the fields. Though the preſent ſtructure is of a modern date, there was very early a church upon the ſame ſpot, dedicated to the ſame ſaint; for there are authentic records of a diſpute in 1222, between the abbot of Weſtminſter and the biſhop of London, concerning the exemption of the church of St. Martin in the fields, from the juriſdiction of the biſhop of London. How long before this building for the ſervice of religion was erected there, is not eaſy to determine; but it was probably a chapel for the monks of Weſtminſter, when they viſited their convent garden, which then extended to it. However, the endowments of this church fell with the monks who poſſeſſed it, and in Henry the VIIIth's reign a ſmall church was built there, at the king's expence; but this ſtructure not being capacious enough to accommodate the pariſhioners, it was greatly enlarged in 1607. At length, after many expenſive repairs, that building was taken down in 1721, and ſoon after the firſt ſtone of the preſent edifice was laid. Five years compleated the work, and in 1726 it was conſecrated.

The whole expence of building and decorating this church amounted to 6?,891l. 10s. 4d. of which 33,450l. was granted by parliament, and the reſt raiſed by ſubſcription, and the ſale of ſeats in the church.

This is an elegant edifice, built of ſtones. It has a noble portico on the weſt front, of Corinthian columns, ſupporting a pediment, in which are the royal arms cut in bas relief. The aſcent to this portico is by a flight of very long ſteps. The length of the church is about one hundred and forty feet, the breadth ſixty, and the height forty-five. It has a fine arched roof, ſuſtained by Corinthian ſtone columns. The ſteeple has a beautiful ſpire, and one of the beſt ſet of bells in London.

The living of this church, which is a vicarage and impropriation in the gift of the king, is ſaid to be worth 600l. per annum, though rated at no more than 12l. in the king's books.

The veſtry is ſelect, and the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, four ſideſmen, and nine overſeers of the poor. The peace officers are, five burgeſſes, five aſſiſtant-burgeſſes, eight conſtables, two ſcavengers, two ſurveyors of the highways, and two of the ſtreets.

The pariſh of St. Martin, which is ſuppoſed to have been originally taken out of St. Margaret's, has ſo increaſed both in houſes and inhabitants, that it is now one of the largeſt and moſt populous in the bills of mortality; and though the pariſhes of St. Paul's Covent-garden, St. Anne's, St. James's, and St. George's Hanover-ſquare, have been taken out of it, the number of its houſes is computed at upwards of five thouſand.

The remarkable places and things in this pariſh are, part of the Privy garden; part of St. James's-park; the Cockpit; in which is the Treaſury, the Wardrobe, and the Plantation-office; the Tilt-yard-guard; the Horſe-guards; Whitehall; the Banquetting-houſe; the Royal Tennis court; the effigies of king Charles I. in a Roman military habit, on horſeback, at Charing-croſs; and king James II. ſtanding on a pedeſtal with a truncheon in his hand, in the Privy garden; alſo the Lottery-office in the ſame garden; the Jewel-office, and the Secretary of War's office in Whitehall; the king's muſe; a play-houſe on the weſt ſide of the Haymarket; a chapel in Coventry-court; part of Leiceſter-ſquare; part of the king's play-houſe, called the Theatre Royal in Drury-lane; the New Exchange in the Strand; Northumberland-houſe; a French chapel in Spring-garden; another in Long's-paſſage in Orange ſtreet; a chapel in Chapel-court, Long-acre; another in Broad-court, Drury-lane, called Taviſtock-chapel; one in Oxendon-ſtreet; and one in Privy-garden.

In Hungerford-market is a charity ſchool, ſupported by voluntary ſubſcription; the boys are cloathed, and taught to read, write, and caſt accompts: the ſum of 5l. is given with each of them when put apprentice. The girls are cloathed, and taught to work, knit and ſew; they have 2l. 10s. given with each of them when put out to ſervice, &c.

In Caſtle-ſtreet by the Muſe, is a free-ſchool, erected and endowed by Dr. Thomas Tenniſon, late archbiſhop of Canterbury; over which ſchool there is a fine library; and adjoining to it a work-houſe for employing the poor.

Nearly oppoſite the ſouth end of St. Martin's-lane, ſtands

NORTHUMBERLAND HOUSE.

This building is ſo called from its having been in poſſeſſion of the earls of Northumberland for more than an hundred years. It was firſt built in the reign of king James I. by Henry Howard, earl of Northampton, and is almoſt the only houſe of the ancient nobility remaining in London. It originally conſiſted of three ſides only, but is now a ſpacious quadrangle, with a large garden and fine walks behind it, extending almoſt to the Thames.

The entrance into it is on the ſide of the court oppoſite to the great gateway; the veſtible is about eighty-two feet long, and more than twelve feet broad, being properly ornamented with columns of the Doric order. Each end of it communicates with a ſtair-caſe, leading to the principal apartments, which face the garden. They conſiſt of ſeveral ſpacious rooms, fitted up in the moſt elegant manner. The ceilings are embelliſhed with copies of antique paintings, or fine ornaments of ſtucco, richly gilt. The chimney pieces conſiſt of ſtatuary and other curious marble, carved and finiſhed in the moſt correct taſte. The rooms are hung either with beautiful tapeſtry or the beſt damaſks, and magnificently furniſhed with large glaſſes, chairs, ſettees, marble tables, &c. with frames of the moſt exquiſite workmanſhip, and richly gilt. They alſo contain a great variety of landſcapes, hiſtory pieces, and portraits, painted by Titian and the moſt eminent maſters. In ſome of the rooms are large cheſts, embelliſhed with old genuine japan; which being great rarities are almoſt ineſtimable.

The left wing, which forms a ſtate gallery or ball-room, is admirable in every reſpect, whether we conſider the dimenſions, the taſte, and maſterly manner in which it is finiſhed, or the elegant magnificence of the furniture. It is 106 feet long, long, the breadth being a fourth part of the length, and the height equal to the diagonal of the breadth. The ceiling is coved and ornamented with figures and feſtoons richly gilt. The flat part is divided into five copartments, ornamented with fine imitations of ſome antique figures; as, a flying Fame blowing a trumpet; a Diana; a triumphal car drawn by two horſes; a Flora; and a Victory holding out a laurel wreath. The entablature is Corinthian, and of moſt exquiſite workmanſhip. The light is admitted through nine windows in the ſide next the garden, being equidiſtant from each other, and in the ſame horizontal direction. Above theſe is another row of windows, which, though not viſible in the room, are ſo artfully placed as to throw a proper quantity of light over the cornice, ſo that the higheſt parts of the room are as much enlightened as the loweſt, and the pictures on the oppoſite ſide are free from that confuſed glare which would ariſe from a leſs judicious diſpoſition. In the ſpaces between the windows there are tables of antique marble, and ſtools covered with crimſon damaſk, alternately. The piers are likewiſe ornamented with large ſquare and oval glaſſes, arranged in the aforeſaid order; the frames of which form a beautiful variety of foliage to adorn the higher parts quite up to the entablature.

The oppoſite ſide is divided into three large ſpaces by two chimney pieces made of ſtatuary marble, with cornices ſupported by figures of Phrygian captives, copied from thoſe in the capitol of Rome, and executed in a maſterly manner. The finiſhing above the chimney pieces conſiſts of terms, ſphinxes, feſtoons, &c. and within the ſpaces formed by theſe ornaments are placed whole length portraits of the earl and counteſs of Northumberland in their robes.

The three grand diviſions on this ſide are ornamented with copies of five of the moſt admired paintings in Italy, which are placed as follows: In the middle and largeſt diviſion is Raphael's celebrated ſchool of Athens, copied from the original in the vatican by Raphael Mengs. In the two other diviſions on the right and left hand ſide of the former are placed the feaſt and council of the Gods, which were alſo painted by Raphael, and copied by Pompeio Battoni from the originals in the Little Farneſe. The two ends of the gallery are ornamented with the triumphal proceſſion of Bacchus and Ariadne (originally painted by Annibal Caracci in the Farneſe palace) and Guido's Aurora. The former was copied by Felice Conſtanſi, and the latter by Meſuccio, a ſcholar of Carlo Maratti, from the original in the Villa Roſpiglioſi. All theſe pictures are very large, being exactly of the ſame dimenſions with the originals, and are copied in a very maſterly manner.

Under theſe pictures are placed large ſophas, covered with crimſon damaſk and richly ornamented. This gallery is lighted up for the reception of company in the evenings, by means of four glaſs luſtres, conſiſting in all of as many branches as will receive one hundred large wax candles, and ſuſpended from the ceiling by long chains, magnificently gilt.

Excluſive of the apartments already deſcribed, there are above 140 rooms in this houſe, which are chiefly appropriated to the private uſes of the family. The apartments of lord and lady Northumberland are very commodious and elegantly furniſhed: her ladyſhip's cloſet is even a repoſitory of curioſities, and, amongſt other valuable things, contains ſo fine a collection of pictures, as to afford a moſt pleaſing and almoſt endleſs entertainment to a connoiſſeur. The two libraries alſo conſiſt of a great variety of books on the moſt uſeful and curious ſubjects, collected with judgment.

The garden lies between the houſe and the Thames, and forms a pleaſing piece of ſcenery before the principal apartments; for it conſiſts of a fine lawn ſurrounded with a neat gravel walk, and bounded next the walls by a border of curious flowers, ſhrubs, and evergreens.

Near Northumberland-houſe is a large opening called Charing-croſs, from one of the croſſes which king Edward I. cauſed to be erected in memory of his queen Eleanor, and Charing, the name of a village which ſtood on the ſpot where the croſs was built. The croſs continued till the civil wars in the reign of king Charles I. when it was entirely deſtroyed by the Fanatics, as a monument of popiſh ſuperſtition; but after the reſtoration, an equeſtrian ſtatue of king Charles I. was ſet up in its ſtead. This ſtatue, which ſtill remains is of braſs, and very finely executed. It ſtands on a pedeſtal ſeventeen feet high, and is ſecured by a palliſade, incloſing an area of thirty feet diameter, which is elevated about twelve inches above ſtreet.

Not far from this, on the weſt ſide of the ſtreet, nearly oppoſite to Scotland-yard, ſtands

The ADMIRALTY OFFICE.

This is a magnificent ſtructure built with brick and ſtone. The eaſt front has two deep wings, and a very lofty portico, ſupported by four very large ſtone pillars. Beſides a hall, and other common rooms, here are ſeven ſpacious houſes for as many commiſſioners of the admiralty. The wall before the court is built in an elegant manner: a piazza, conſiſting of beautiful columns runs almoſt from one end to the other, and each ſide of the gate is ornamented with the figure of a ſeahorſe cut in ſtone.

In this office are tranſacted all maritime affairs belonging to the juriſdiction of the admiralty, who here regulate the affairs of the navy; nominate admirals, captains, and other officers to ſerve on board his majeſty's ſhips of war, and give orders for the trial of thoſe who have failed in their duty, or been guilty of other irregularities.

Farther from this, on the oppoſite ſide the ſtreet, is a magnificent building called

WHITEHALL.

This was originally built by Hubert de Burgh, earl of Kent, before the year 1243. It afterwards came to the archbiſhops of York; whence it was called York Place, and continued to be the city reſidence of the archbiſhops, till it was purchaſed by by king Henry VIII. of Cardinal Wolſey, in 1530; then it became the place of reſidence for the court, and continued ſo till the year 1697, when, by accidental fire, it was all burnt down, except the part called the Banquetting-houſe, which had been added to the palace of Whitehall by king James I. according to a deſign of Inigo Jones. This Banquetting-houſe is an elegant and magnificent ſtructure, built of hewn ſtone, adorned with an upper and a lower range of pillars, of the Ionic and Compoſite order; the capitals are enriched with fruit and foliage; and between the columns are the windows. The roof is covered with lead, and ſurrounded with a baluſtrade. The Banquetting-houſe chiefly conſiſts of one room, of an oblong form, forty feet high, and a proportionable length and breadth. The ceiling is painted by the celebrated Sir Peter Paul Reubens. It is now uſed only as a chapel-royal, and the reſt of the houſe ſerves for ſtate-offices.

Oppoſite the Banquetting-houſe is a noble edifice called

The HORSE GUARDS.

It conſiſts of a center and two wings, and has an air of ſolidity perfectly agreeable to the nature of the building. It receives its name from the Horſe-guards, who, while the king is at St. James's, are here on duty, two at a time being conſtantly mounted and completely armed, under two handſome ſloped porches detached from the building, and erected to ſhelter them from the weather. This ſtructure is equally calculated for the uſe of the foot as well as the horſe on duty.

In the center of this edifice is an arched paſſage into St. James's-park, and the building over this has a pediment, in which are the king's-arms in bas relief. The wing on each ſide of this center is a pavillion, and in the middle riſes a cupola: the wings are plainer than the center, and conſiſt each of a front, projecting a little, with ornamented windows in the principal ſtory, and a plain one in the ſides. Each has its pediment, with a circular window in the center.

Near the Horſe-guards, and fronting the parade in St. James's-park, is a ſtone building called

The TREASURY.

This edifice conſiſts of three ſtories, of which the loweſt is of the baſement kind, with ſmall windows, though they are contained in large arches. This ſtory has the Tuſcan proportion, and the ſecond the Doric, with arched windows of a larger ſize; but what is very remarkable, the upper part of this ſtory is adorned with the triglyphs and metopes of the Doric freeza, though the range of ornament is ſupported by neither columns nor pilaſters. Over this ſtory is a range of Ionic columns in the center, ſupporting a pediment.

The Treaſury is under the government of five lords commiſſioners, one of whom is called firſt lord of the Treaſury: under theſe are two joint ſecretaries, four chief clerks, and ſixteen under clerks, with other officers.

This edifice has on the inſide a court ſurrounded with buildings, and here is kept the office of trade and plantations. This office is under the government of eight commiſſioners, and other officers, whoſe buſineſs it is to examine the Cuſtom-houſe accounts of all the goods exported and imported to and from the ſeveral parts of the kingdom, in order to diſcover the advantages and diſadvantages of the trade of this nation with other kingdoms and ſtates, in regard to the balance of trade, and alſo to benefit our plantations, by promoting their trade, and encouraging ſuch branches as are moſt conducive to their reſpective intereſts, as well as that of the kingdom in general.

We come now to that noble pile of antiquity Weſtminſter-abbey, of whoſe foundation, gradual increaſe, and preſent ſtate, together with a deſcription of the monuments contained therein, the reader will find in page 138, &c.

Near the north door of this abbey, and at the weſt end of King-ſtreet, ſtands the pariſh church of St. MARGARET.

This church was originally erected by Edward the confeſſor, who having reſolved to rebuild the conventual church of St. Peter with great magnificence, imagined that it would be a diſhonour to his new and ſtately edifice, to have the neighbouring people aſſemble in it as uſual, for the performance of religious worſhip, as well as prove troubleſome and inconvenient to the monks; therefore, about the year 1064, he cauſed a church to be erected on the north ſide of St. Peter's, for the uſe of the neighbouring inhabitants, and dedicated it to St. Margaret, the virgin and martyr of Antioch.

This church, which is ſituated only thirty feet to the north of the abbey, was rebuilt in the reign of king Edward I. by the pariſhioners and merchants of the ſtaple; except the chancel, which was erected at the expence of the abbot of Weſtminſter. In the year 1735 it was not only repaired, but its tower was caſed, at the expence of three thouſand five hundred pounds, granted by parliament in conſideration of its being the church where the houſe of commons attend divine ſervice on ſtated holidays, as the peers do at Weſtminſter abbey.

It is a plain, neat, and not inelegant Gothic ſtructure, well enlightened by a ſeries of large windows. It has two handſome galleries of conſiderable length, adorned in the front with carved work: theſe are ſupported by ſlender pillars, which riſe to the roof, and have four ſmall black pillars running along each of them, adorned with gilded capitals both at the galleries and at the top, where the flat roof is neatly ornamented with ſtucco. The ſteeple conſiſts of a tower, which riſes to a conſiderable height, and is crowned with a turret at each corner, and a ſmall lanthorn ornamented with carved work in the center, from whence runs a flag ſtaff.

In 1758 it was repaired at the public expence, and ornamented with new gilding and painting.

At the eaſt end of this church is a window curiouſly painted, with the hiſtory of the crucifixion, fixion, together with the figures of ſeveral apoſtles and ſaints, finely executed. It belonged formerly to a private chapel at Copt hall, near Epping, in Eſſex, and was purchaſed by the officers of this pariſh, a few years ago, for four hundred guineas.

This church is a rectory in the gift of the dean and chapter of Weſtminſter, and is valued at 400l. per annum.

The veſtry is ſelect. The pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, and ſix overſeers and collectors for the poor. The peace officers and others are, one high ſteward, one deputy-ſteward, one high bailiff and his deputy, ſeven burgeſſes, ſeven aſſiſtant burgeſſes, thirteen conſtables, eight inqueſt-men, four ſurveyors of the highways, two ſurveyors of the ſtreets, and ſixteen ſcavengers.

The remarkable places and things in this pariſh are, the tombs, and monuments in the abbey of Weſtminſter; Weſtminſter-hall; the courts of judicature; the Exchequer; the Houſe of Commons; the court of requeſts; the Painted Chamber; the Houſe of Lords; Lindſey-houſe, Lindſey-lane; Strafford houſe; Buckingham-houſe, now the Queen's-palace; the canal in St. James's-park; an infirmary; the New chapel; a chapel at the back of Tothill-ſtreet; the Gate-houſe; and a chapel in Queen's-ſquare.

The king's-ſchool, or college, is ſituated near the abbey, and was founded by queen Elizabeth, anno 1560, as a nurſery for the propagation of religion, and orthodox literature. To this ſchool belong one ſchool-maſter, a ſecond maſter, and four uſhers, and forty ſcholars, called the king's ſcholars; of theſe forty, when qualified, ſix or more are elected yearly, in Eaſter term, and tranſlated to the univerſities, viz. To Trinity-college, in Cambridge, and to Chriſt-church in Oxford. The ſcholars have each a black gown every year; and there are four lords ſcholars (as they are called) who wear purple gowns, and receive a ſtipend yearly from the treaſurer of the college, out of certain rents ſettled by John Williams, D. D.

The Almonry-ſchool was founded by Mr Emery Hill, where a miſtreſs has 6l. per annum, a houſe and a chaldron of coals, for teaching poor children of this pariſh.

Near Tothill-fields is a free-ſchool, founded by James Palmer, B. D. for a maſter and twenty boys. The maſter has twelve pounds and a chaldron of coals per annum, alſo a houſe, and a gown once in two years.

In Chapel-ſtreet is a charity ſchool, where about ſixty boys have their learning and cloaths, and are put out apprentice, by ſubſcription and collection at the church door. Theſe children wear blue coats, to diſtinguiſh them.

In Tothill-ſide is the Grey coat-hoſpital, founded by letters patent in the year 1706, for ſeventy boys and forty girls, who are maintained with all neceſſaries of meat, drink, waſhing, lodging, and cloaths, and put out apprentices.

In Tothill ſide there is alſo the Green coat hoſpital, for the poor fatherleſs children of this pariſh, founded by king Chares I. anno 1633, who endowed it with fifty pounds per annum, which is paid out of the treaſury. This hoſpital was rebuilt at the charge of doctor Buſby and Charles Twitty, eſq; anno. 1700.

Lady Ann Dacres alms houſes, called Emanuel-college, were founded by her the 17th of December, anno 1601, for ten poor men and ten poor women, (each of whom has liberty to bring up one poor child) according to the ſettlement for ſeventeen of St. Margaret's pariſh, two of Hays, and two of the pariſh of Chelſea. She gave 100l. per annum iſſuing out of the manor of Bramſburton, in the county of York, until the expiration of a leaſe of 199 years, and afterwards the whole manor (ſaid to be worth 600l. per annum) is to accrue to augment this foundation. The 100l. is paid out of the chamber of London, and is under the care and inſpection of the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen. No perſon that is wicked, or cannot ſay the creed and ten commandments in Engliſh, or under fifty years of age, or who has inhabited leſs than three years in one of the ſaid reſpective pariſhes to be admitted into this hoſpital.

In Tothill-ſide are Mr. George Whitcher's alms-houſes, founded in the year 1683, for ſix poor people who have each five pounds per annum and a gown. Here is a chapel for their uſe, and he that reads prayers to the reſt has twenty ſhillings more per annum.

In Tothill-ſide Weſtminſter, are alſo twelve alms-houſes, ſix for men and ſix for women, founded by Mr. James Palmer, B. D. anno 1654. They have each ſix pounds and a chaldron of coals per annum and a gown once in two years. Here is a chapel for their uſe, where he prayed with the poor people twice every day, and preached twice every week.

Near theſe are two alms-houſes founded in the year 1705, by Mrs. Judith Kifford, wife of Mr. Thomas Kifford, for two decayed, virtuous, poor gentlewomen; one to be choſen out of this pariſh, each of whom has five pounds per annum.

A little nearer the chapel in Tothill-fields are two large alms-houſes for men and their wives, each houſe has ſix pounds per annum. They were founded and endowed by Nicholas Butler, eſq; in the year 1675.

Near Tothill-fields are twelve alms-houſes erected out of the money left by Emery Hill, who by his will in the year 1677, endowed them for the maintenance of ſix poor men and their wives, and ſix widows. The ſingle perſons have each 4l. 16s. per annum and the others 7l. 4s. Beſides each has a gown once in two years, and a chaldron of coals yearly.

In the Little Almonry are twelve alms-houſes for poor men and their families; to each is paid 6l. per annum by the dean and chapter of Weſtminſter.

In the wool ſtaple towards the eaſterly end, are eight alms-houſes for poor people, and to each is paid out of the treaſury 5l. per annum. They were founded by Henry VIII. in the 36th year of his reign.

In Lady-alley about the middle of King's-ſtreet, are four alms-houſes for four poor women, each of whom has 1l. 6s. 8d. per annum paid out of the treaſury.

In or near Petty France and the New Chapel, are twenty alms-houſes built by Cornelius Vanden, but not being endowed are inhabited by the pariſh-penſioners.

There is in the Little Almonry a workhouſe, where the poor of this pariſh, and of St. John the Evangeliſt, are employed and maintained.

To this pariſh belongs a priſon called the Gatehouſe, where perſons are confined for debt, by writ directed to the high bailiff of Weſtminſter: it is alſo a gaol for criminal perſons, who have committed any crime in the city or liberty of Weſtminſter. Alſo

By Tothill-fields is a Bridewell, or houſe of correction, adjoining to the eaſt end of the Green-coat hoſpital, for ſuch as beg or live idly, or lead looſe lives in this city or liberty. It is alſo a gaol for criminals, who commit offences within the ſaid city and liberty, ſo made by an act of parliament in the reign of queen Anne.

Proceeding weſtward from St. Margaret's church, we come to a place called Mill-bank; on the weſt ſide of which ſtands the parochial church of

St. JOHN THE EVANGELIST.

The pariſh of St. Margaret being greatly increaſed in the number of houſes and inhabitants, it was judged neceſſary to erect one of the fifty new churches within it. This church being finiſhed, was dedicated to St. John the Evangeliſt; a pariſh was taken out of St. Margaret's, and the parliament granted the ſum of 2500l. to be laid out in the purchaſe of lands, tenements, &c. for the maintenance of the rector: but beſides the profits ariſing from this purchaſe, it was alſo enacted, that as a farther proviſion for the rector, the ſum of 125l. ſhould be annually raiſed by an equal pound rate upon the inhabitants.

This church was finiſhed in 1728, and is remarkable only for having ſunk while it was building, which occaſioned an alteration in the plan. On the north and ſouth ſides are magnificent porticos, ſupported by vaſt ſtone pillars, as is alſo the roof of the church. At each of the four corners is a beautiful ſtone tower and pinnacle: theſe additions were erected, that the whole might ſink equally, and owe their magnitude to the ſame cauſe. The parts of this building are held together by iron bars, which croſs even the iſles.

The advowſon of this church is in the dean and chapter of Weſtminſter: and to prevent this rectory being held in commendam, all licences and diſpenſations for holding it are, by act of parliament declared null and void.

The veſtry is ſelect. The pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, and two overſeers and collectors for the poor. The peace officers are, four burgeſſes, with each his aſſiſtant, two conſtables, one ſurveyor of the highways, two ſurveyors of the ſtreets, and two ſcavengers.

Returning to Weſtminſter-abbey we find, on the north ſide thereof, an old Gothic building called

WESTMINSTER HALL.

This was firſt built by William Rufus, as an addition to a royal palace there, and afterwards rebuilt by king Richard II, in the year 1397. It is reckoned one of the largeſt rooms in Europe, being two hundred and ſeventy feet long, ſeventy-four feet broad, and ninety feet high, ſupported only by buttreſſes, without one pillar. The roof is timber, and was a few years ago ſlated, the old covering of lead being thought too heavy: the pavement is of ſtone. In this ſpacious room the kings of England have generally held their coronation and other ſolemn feaſts. It is generally uſed for the trial of peers; and here, ever ſince the reign of Henry III. the three great courts of Chancery, King's Bench, and Common Pleas have been held at the four terms of the year; and above ſtairs is held the court of Exchequer.

The Court of Chancery took its name from the croſs bars of iron or wood, called by the Romans cancelli, with which it was formerly incloſed, to prevent the officers being incommoded by the crowding of the people. The ſupreme and ſole judge of this court is the lord high chancellor. This great officer, who is aſſiſted by the maſters in Chancery, takes precedency after the archbiſhop of Canterbury; and, next to the king and princes of the blood, is the higheſt perſon in the kingdom in civil affairs. He is generally keeper of the great ſeal, and is thence ſtiled lord keeper.

The chancery conſiſts of two courts, in one of which the lord chancellor proceeds according to the laws and ſtatutes of the kingdom, and in the other according to equity, judging rather by the ſpirit than the letter of the laws. In caſe of abſence his place upon the bench is ſupplied by the maſter of the rolls, who alſo determines cauſes in the ſame equitable manner.

Out of this court are iſſued writs for parliaments, charters, patents for ſheriffs, writs of certiorari to remove records and falſe judgments in inferior courts, writs of moderata miſericordia, when a perſon has been amerced too high, and for a reaſonable part of goods for widows and orphans. Here alſo are ſealed and enrolled treaties with foreign princes, letters patent, commiſſions of appeal, oyer and terminer, &c. The actions in this court are by bill or plaint; the witneſſes are privately examined; there is no jury, but all the ſentences are given by the judge of the court.

The twelve maſters in Chancery are aſſiſtants of the chancellor or lord-keeper; the firſt of whom is maſter of the rolls, which is a place of great dignity, and is in the gift of the king. Theſe gentlemen ſit at Weſtminſter-hall, with the lord chancellor, three at a time while the term laſts, and two at a time when the chancellor ſits to hear cauſes in his own houſe. The ſalary of the maſters in chancery, excluſive of robe money, is 100l. per annum, paid quarterly out of the exchequer.

The Court of King's Bench is the higheſt court of common law in England. It is ſo called becauſe the king ſometimes ſat there in perſon on an high high bench, and judges, to whom the judicature belongs in his abſence, on a low bench at his feet. Or becauſe this court determines pleas between the crown and the ſubject of treaſons, felonies, and other pleas, which properly belong to the king; and alſo in whatever relates to the loſs of life or member of any ſubject in which the king is concerned. Here likewiſe are tried breaches of peace, oppreſſion, and miſgovernment; and this court corrects the errors of all the judges and juſtices of England, in their judgments and proceedings, not only in pleas of the crown, but in all pleas, real, perſonal, and mixed; except only pleas in the exchequer. This court is general, and extends to all England: and wherever it is held the law ſuppoſes the ſovereign to be there in perſon. In this court there generally ſit four judges, the firſt of whom is ſtiled the lord chief juſtice of the King's-bench, and ſometimes the lord chief juſtice of England.

The Court of Common Pleas was anciently ambulatory, and followed the king whereſoever he went; but at the confirmation of Magna Charta by king John in 1215, it was fixed at Weſtminſter, where it ſtill continues. It is ſo denominated becauſe in this court are debated the uſual or common pleas between ſubject and ſubject, and all civil cauſes whatſoever. After this court was fixed at Weſtminſter, ſuch a number of cauſes was brought before it, that the king, for the greater diſpatch of buſineſs, found it neceſſary, inſtead of three, to conſtitute ſix judges, whom he appointed to ſit in two places. At preſent, however, the number is only four, the principal of which is ſtiled lord chief juſtice of the Common Pleas. Theſe ſit together in Weſtminſter-hall to hear and determine cauſes; but no counſellor can plead before them under the degree of a ſerjeant.

The other officers of this court are, the Cuſtos Brevium; three prothonotaries and their ſecondaries; ſeveral clerks, who have their reſpective counties allotted them, and are to engroſs the fines levied on lands in their ſeveral diviſions: the Chirographer; the Regiſter of the fines, and a clerk of the proclamations. The prothonotaries and chirographer ſit in the court covered with black round caps, which was the faſhion before the invention of hats and wigs. Theſe are all ſworn, and have their offices for life. There are likewiſe ſeveral other officers who are not ſworn.

The Court of Exchequer is ſo called from a chequered cloth, which antiently covered the table where the judges, or chief officers ſat. This court was firſt erected by William the conqueror, for the trial of all cauſes relating to the revenues of the crown; and in the ſame court there are now alſo tried matters of equity between ſubject and ſubject.

The judges of this court are, the lord chief baron of the exchequer, and three other judges called barons of the exchequer. There is alſo the curſitor baron of the exchequer, who adminiſters the oaths to the ſheriffs, under-ſheriffs, bailiffs, ſearchers, ſurveyors, &c. of the Cuſtom-houſe; but is no judge. When at any time the barons are of different opinions concerning the deciſion of any cauſe, they call to their aſſiſtance the chancellor of the exchequer, who decides in favour of one of the parties by his caſting vote.

Adjoining to the ſouth-eaſt angle of Weſtminſter-hall is a building formerly called St. Stephen's chapel, from its having been dedicated to St. Stephen. It was founded by that king, and rebuilt in 1347 by king Edward III. who converted it to a collegiate church; but ever ſince it was ſurrendered to Edward VI. it has been uſed for the aſſembly of the repreſentatives of the commons of England, and is now generally called

The HOUSE OF COMMONS.

This is a ſpacious room wainſcotted to the ceiling. It is capable of holding ſix hundred perſons, and has commodious apartments about it, as the Speaker's chamber, rooms for committees, and other offices. The benches for the members, which gradually aſcend one above another, as in a theatre, are covered with green cloth; the floor is matted, and there are wainſcot galleries around it, ſuſtained by cantilevers adorned with carved work, where ſtrangers are often permitted to ſit and hear the debate.

At the upper end of this room the ſpeaker is placed upon a raiſed ſeat, ornamented behind with Corinthian columns, and the king's arms carved and placed on a pediment; before him is a table, at which the clerk and his aſſiſtant ſit near him on each hand, juſt below the chair; and on either ſide, as well below as in the galleries, the members are placed promiſcuouſly. The ſpeaker and clerks always wear gowns in the houſe, as the profeſſors of the law do in term time; but no other of the members wear robes, except the four repreſentatives for the city of London, who, the firſt day of every new parliament, are dreſſed in ſcarlet gowns, and ſit all together on the right hand of the chair, next to the ſpeaker.

The time of ſitting is upon any day in the morning, except on Sundays, or ſome other high feſtivals or faſt days, upon which it is not uſual to aſſemble, unleſs upon the moſt urgent occaſions: but though the ſpeaker always adjourns the houſe to nine o'clock of the morning of the day when they agree to meet again, the houſe ſeldom meets till twelve.

This houſe has an equal ſhare with the lords in making laws, nor can any be made without the conſent of the commons, who are the guardians of the liberties of the people; and as they are the grand inqueſt of the nation, they have a power to impeach the greateſt lords in the kingdom, both ſpiritual and temporal.

On the day prefixed by the king in the writ of ſummons, his majeſty goes in perſon to the houſe of lords, where being ſeated with the crown on his head, and cloathed in his royal robes, he ſends for the commons by the gentleman uſher of the black rod, who coming to the bar of the houſe, bows, and advancing a few ſteps, repeats this mark of reſpect a ſecond and a third time, ſaying, "Gentlemen of the houſe of commons, the "king commands this honourable houſe to attend "him

" him immediately in the houſe of peers; and then retiring backwards, bowing, withdraws: the commons then immediately attend his majeſty in the houſe of lords, when the lord chancellor or keeper commands them in the king's name to chuſe a ſpeaker, upon which they return to their own houſe. One of the members then ſtanding up in his place, and making a ſhort introductory ſpeech, moves that ſuch member as he then names, may take the chair, and his motion being ſeconded by ſome other member, if no conteſt happens, they lead the perſon mentioned from his ſeat to the bar of the houſe, from whence they conduct him bowing thrice, up the chair; where being placed, he ſtands up, and returns thanks to the houſe for the honour done him, and modeſtly acknowledging his inability to diſcharge ſo great a truſt, deſires they would make choice of a more able perſon, which being diſapproved, he ſubmits to their pleaſure; and after receiving the directions of the houſe, on the uſual requeſts to be made on his appearing before his majeſty, adjourns to the day appointed for that purpoſe.

But before the commons can enter upon any buſineſs, or even the choice of a ſpeaker, all the members enter the court of wards, where they take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, with thoſe appointed by the act of the firſt of William and Mary, in the preſence of an officer appointed by his majeſty, who is uſually the lord ſteward of the houſhold; and after they have choſen the ſpeaker, they take the ſame oaths again in the houſe, at the table, and ſubſcribe their opinions againſt the doctrines of tranſubſtantiation, the invocation and adoration of ſaints, and the ſacrafice of the maſs; and before they can give any vote in the houſe, except for the choice of a ſpeaker, they are obliged alſo to abjure the pretender.

Upon the day appointed, the uſher of the black rod is again ſent for the commons, when he alters his ſtile, and addreſſes himſelf to the ſpeaker. The members, obeying this ſummons, return to the houſe of lords, and preſent their ſpeaker to the king, who is again ſeated on the throne, and have obtained his approbation, the ſpeaker deſires, that the commons, during their ſitting, " may have free acceſs to his majeſty, " freedom of ſpeech in their own houſe, and " freedom from arreſts." After which the king makes his ſpeech to both houſes, the whole houſe of commons being ſuppoſed to be at the bar of the houſe of lords.

After the ſpeaker and members have taken the oaths, the ſtanding orders of the houſe are read, and grand committees appointed to ſit on uſual days: which being done, the houſe generally begins with reading ſome bills left unfiniſhed the ſeſſions before. Any member of parliament is at liberty to move for a bill to be brought in; which being agreed to by the houſe, the perſon who made the motion, with ſome of thoſe who ſeconded it, are orderd to prepare, and bring it in. When the bill is ready, ſome of the members who were ordered to prepare it, read the order at the ſide bar of the houſe, deſiring leave to bring the bill to the table; which upon the queſtion being agreed to, it has a firſt reading by the clerk at the table; and then the ſpeaker taking the bill in his hand, reads the abbreviate or abſtract of it: which done, after the debate upon the bill, if any happens, he puts the queſtion, whether it ſhall have a ſecond reading; and ſometimes upon a motion being made appoints a day for it.

When the bill has been read a ſecond time, the queſtion is put, whether it ſhall be committed, which is either to a committee of the whole houſe, if the bill be of importance; or to a private committee, any member at pleaſure naming the perſons to be of that committee; and their names being read by the clerk at the table, they are ordered to meet in the ſpeaker's chamber, and report their opinion to the houſe. Accordingly meeting there, they chuſe their chairman, and and either adjourn to ſome other time, or proceed upon the bill, which in this laſt caſe, the chairman orders a clerk who attends them to read, then taking the bill himſelf, and reading it paragraph by paragraph, he puts every clauſe to the queſtion, fills up the blanks, and makes amendments according to the opinion of the majority of the committee, of whom there muſt be eight of the perſons named, to proceed regularly, though five may adjourn.

When the committee have gone through the whole bill, the chairman by their deſire makes his report at the ſide bar of the houſe, reading all the alterations made by the committee, and how any of theſe amendments have altered the ſcope of the bill, the clerk having before written down in what page and line of the bill thoſe amendments are to be found; and if the committee have thought fit to add any clauſes, they are marked alphabetically, read by the chairman and delivered to the clerk, who reads all the amendments and clauſes. The ſpeaker then puts the queſtion, whether they ſhall be read a ſecond time, and if this be agreed to, he then reads them himſelf, and particularly as many of them as the houſe agrees to. After which the queſtion is put, whether the bill ſo amended ſhall be ingroſſed, that is, written fair on parchment; and read the third time ſome other day. It being at length read the third time, the ſpeaker holds the bill in his hand, and puts the queſtion, whether the bill ſhall paſs, and if the major part be for it, the clerk writes on the bill Soit baillè aux Seigneurs, i. e. Be it delivered to the lords.

When an engroſſed bill is read, and any clauſes referred to be added to it, they muſt be on parchment ingroſſed like the bill, which are then called riders; and if agreed to, they are added to the bill.

Petitions are offered like bills at the bar of the houſe, and brought up and delivered at the table, by the member who preſents them.

When a member ſpeaks to a bill, he ſtands up uncovered, and addreſſes himſelf only to the ſpeaker; but if he be anſwered by another, he is not allowed to reply the ſame day, unleſs perſonally reflected on: for nobody is to ſpeak to a bill above once in a day, unleſs the whole houſe be turned into a committee, and then every member may reply as often as the chairman thinks proper. But if a bill be rejected, it cannot be any more propoſed, during the ſame ſeſſions.

Meſſengers

Meſſengers from the lords, and all perſons appearing at the bar of the houſe, are introduced by the ſerjeant attending the houſe, with the mace upon his ſhoulder.

While the ſpeaker is in the chair, the mace lies upon the table, except when ſent upon any extraordinary occaſion into Weſtminſter-hall and the court of requeſts, to ſummon the members to attend. But when the members reſolve themſelves into a committee of the whole houſe, the mace is laid under the table, and the chairman to that committee takes the chair where the clerk of the houſe uſually ſits.

Forty members are neceſſary to make a houſe, and eight a committee. But the ſpeaker is not allowed to vote, except the houſe be equally divided: nor is he to perſuade or diſſuade in paſſing a bill; but only to make a ſhort and plain narrative.

The members of the houſe of commons vote by yeas and noes; but if it appear doubtful which is the greater number, the houſe divides. If the queſtion relates to any thing already in the houſe, the noes go out; but if it be to bring any thing in, as a bill, petition, &c. the ayes go out: where the houſe divides, the ſpeaker appoints four tellers, two of each opinion, who after they have told thoſe within, place them in the paſſage between the bar and the door, and tell the others who went out; which done, the two tellers who have the majority take the right hand, and place themſelves within the bar, all four advancing bowing three times; and being come up to the table deliver the number, ſaying, the ayes who went out, are ſo many; the noes who ſtaid ſo many; or the contrary: which is repeated by the ſpeaker, who declares the majority.

In a committee of the whole houſe, they divide by changing ſides, the ayes taking the right hand of the chair, and the noes the left; and then there are only two tellers.

If when a bill is paſſed in one houſe, and ſent to the other, they demur upon it; a conference is then demanded in the painted chamber, where certain members deputed from each houſe meet, and debate the affair, while the lords ſit covered at the table, and the commons ſtand without their hats. If they diſagree, the affair is dropped; but if they come to an agreement, it is at length brought, with all the other bills that have paſſed both houſes, to receive the royal aſſent, in the houſe, where the king being ſeated in the chair of ſtate, the clerk of the crown reads the title of each bill; and as he reads the clerk of the parliament, according to the inſtructions he hath received from his majeſty pronounces the royal aſſent; if it be a public bill by ſaying, Le Roy le veut, i. e. The king will have it ſo: or if a private bill, Soit fait comme il eſt deſiré; i. e. Be it done as is deſired. But if his majeſty does not approve the bill, the anſwer is Le Roy s'aviſera: that is the king will conſider of it.

Money bills always begin in the houſe of commons; becauſe the greateſt part of the ſupplies are raiſed by the people, and for this reaſon the commons will not allow the lords to alter them; and on the preſenting theſe bills to his majeſty, the anſwer is, Le Roy remercie ſes loyaux ſujets, accepte leur benevolence, & auſſi le veut: that is, the king thanks his loyal ſubjects, accepts of their benevolence, and therefore grants his conſent.

A bill for a general pardon has but one reading in each houſe; becauſe they muſt take it as the king will pleaſe to give it: and when this bill is paſſed the anſwer is, Les Prelats, Seigneurs, & Communei, en ce parlement aſſemblez, au nom du tous vos autre ſujets, remercient très humblement votre Majeſté, & prient Dieus vos donner en ſanté bonne vie & longue: that is, the biſhops, lords, and commons in this parliament aſſembled, in the name of all your other ſubjects, moſt humbly thank your majeſty, and beſeech God to grant you a long and healthful life.

The king without his perſonal preſence, may, by a committee granted to ſome of his nobles, give his royal aſſent to any bill that requires haſte.

When his majeſty prorogues or diſſolves the parliament, he generally comes in perſon, and being ſeated with the crown on his head, ſends the black rod for all the houſe of commons to come to the bar of the houſe of lords; and then the ſpeech being read by the lord chancellor, he, by the king's ſpecial command, pronounces the parliament prorogued or diſſolved.

The parliament was formerly diſſolved at the death of the king; but to prevent tumults and confuſion, it is now expreſsly provided by a ſolemn act, that a parliament ſitting, or in being at the king's demiſe, ſhall continue; and if not ſitting ſhall meet expreſsly, for keeping the peace of the realm, and preſerving the ſucceſſion.

Adjoining to Weſtminſter-hall, on the ſouth ſide is an edifice called

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

This houſe is ſo denominated from its being the place where the peers of Great Britain aſſemble in parliament. It is an oblong room, ſomewhat leſs than that in which the commons meet, and is hung with fine old tapeſtry, with hiſtorical figures, repreſenting the defeat of the Spaniſh Armada in 1588, the gift of the ſtates of Holland to queen Elizabeth.

At the upper end of the room is the throne upon which the king is ſeated on ſolemn occaſions, in his robes, with the crown on his head, and adorned with all the enſigns of majeſty. On the right hand of the throne is a ſeat for the prince of Wales, and on the left another for the next perſon of the royal family.

Below the throne, on the king's right hand, are the ſeats of the two archbiſhops, and a little below them the bench of biſhops. Before the throne, are three broad ſeats ſtuffed with wool; on the firſt of which, next to the throne, ſits the lord chancellor or keeper of the great ſeal, who is a ſpeaker of the houſe of peers; and on the other two ſit the lord chief juſtice, the maſter of the rolls, and the other judges, who attend occaſionally to be conſulted in points of law. The benches for the lords ſpiritual and temporal are covered with red cloth; and there is a bar acroſs the houſe, at the end oppoſite to the throne. Without the bar ſits the king's firſt gentleman uſher, called the black rod, from a black wand he carries in his hand. Under him is a yeoman uſher, who waits at the inſide of the door, a crier without, and a ſerjeant at mace, who always attends the lord chancellor.

When the king is preſent with the crown on his head, the lords ſit uncovered and the judges ſtand till his majeſty gives them leave to ſit. In the king's abſence the lords, at their entrance, do reverence to the throne, as is done by all who enter the preſence chamber. The judges then may ſit, but muſt not be covered till the lord chancellor or keeper ſignifies to them, that the lords permit them to be ſo.

When the king goes in ſtate to the houſe, either at the opening or breaking up of the ſeſſions, the park guns are diſcharged; and his majeſty arriving at the houſe of lords, enters a room adjoining to it, called the prince's chamber, where he puts on his robes and crown, and from thence is conducted into the houſe by the lord chamberlain, where all the lords are dreſſed in their ſcarlet robes, and being ſeated on the throne, ſends for the commons by the gentleman uſher of the black rod. On their appearing, his majeſty's ſpeech is read by the lord chancellor to this grand united aſſembly; after which his majeſty returns in the ſame manner as he came, in his ſtate coach drawn by eight beautiful horſes, attended by his guards, and the guns firing.

The houſe of lords in conjunction, with the king and commons, have the power not only of making and repealing laws, but of conſtituting the ſupreme judicature of the kingdom; the lords here aſſembled take cognizance of treaſons and high crimes committed by the peers and others; try all who are impeached by the commons; and acquit or condemn without taking an oath, only laying their right hand upon their breaſt, and ſaying, Guilty, or Not guilty upon my honour. They receive appeals from all other courts, and even ſometimes reverſe the decrees of chancery; and from this higheſt tribunal lies no appeal. All the lords ſpiritual and temporal have the peculiar privilege of appointing proxies to vote in their ſtead, when from ſickneſs or any other cauſe, they cannot conveniently appear; but ſuch as would make proxies are obliged, at the beginning of every parliament, to enter them in perſon.

The lords give their ſuffrages or votes, beginning at the puiſne, or loweſt baron, and then proceeding in a regular ſeries, every one anſwering apart, content, or not content. If the affirmatives and negatives are equel, it paſſes in the negative, the ſpeaker not being allowed a voice, unleſs he be a peer of the realm.

Between the houſe of lords and the houſe of commons is an apartment called the painted chamber. This is ſaid to have been Edward the Confeſſor's bed-chamber, and the rooms in which the parliaments were anciently opened. Conferences are often held here between the two houſes, or their committees, there being a gallery of communication for the members of the houſe of commons to come up without being crowded.

At the ſouth end of New Palace-yard is a plain old building called the Exchequer, or the office of the receipt of his majeſty's exchequer, where the king's revenue is received and diſburſed.

This important office is under the direction of the chancellor of the exchequer, who has the comptrollment of the rolls of the lords of the treaſury, and ſits in the court above the barons of the exchequer. He has the gift of the office of comptroller of the pipe, and that of clerk of the Nihils.

Another great officer is, the auditor of the receipts of the exchequer. He files the bills of the tellers, and draws all orders to be ſigned by the lords commiſſioners of the treaſury, for iſſuing forth all money, in virtue of privy ſeals, which are recorded by the clerk of the pells, and entered and lodged in the auditor's office. He likewiſe, by warrant from the lords of the treaſury, makes debentures to the ſeveral perſons who have fees, annuities or penſions, by letters patent from the king, out of the exchequer, and directs them for payment to the tellers. He daily receives the ſtate of each teller's account, and weekly certifies the whole to the lords commiſſioners, who immediately preſent the eſtimate, or balance to the king. He makes half yearly, at Michaelmas and Lady-day, a book called a declaration, containing a methodical abſtract of all the accounts and payments made the preceding half year, and delivers one of them to the lords of the treaſury, and another to the chancellor of the exchequer; and by him are kept the regiſters appointed for paying all perſons in courſe, upon ſeveral branches of the king's revenue. For the diſcharge of theſe offices he has a chief clerk, a clerk of the debenture, a clerk of the regiſters and iſſues, a clerk of the caſh book, and a clerk for making out exchequer bills; and in the offices for annuities under the auditor are two chief clerks, under whom are nine other clerks.

The other great officers are the four tellers of the exchequer, each of whom has his deputy, his firſt clerk and four other clerks. Their office is to receive all moneys due to the king, and thereupon to throw down a bill through a pipe into the tally court, where it is received by the auditor's clerk, who there attends to write the words of the bill upon a tally, and then delivers the ſame to be entered by the clerk of the pells, or his under clerk, who attends to enter it in his book; then the tally is cloven by the two deputy chamberlains, and while the ſenior deputy reads one part the junior examines the other.

The clerk of the pells is another great officer. He enters the the tellers bills on a parchment ſkin, in latin Pellis, and likewiſe all receipts and payments for the king; this officer is in the nature of a comptroller; he has a deputy and two clerks.

To the tally court belong the two chamberlains of the exchequer, in whoſe cuſtody are many ancient records, leagues and treaties with foreign princes, the ſtandards of money, weights, and meaſures, thoſe ancient books called the black book of the exchequer, and dooms-day book, which laſt contains an account of all the cities, towns, villages and families in the reign of William the Conqueror. This book is kept under three locks and keys, and cannot be examined for leſs than 6s. 8d. and for every line tranſcribed is paid four-pence.

Under theſe officers are four deputy chamberlains, in whoſe offices are preſerved all the counter-foils of the above tallies, ſo exactly ranked by months or years, that they may be eaſily found out, in order to be joined with their reſpective tallies, which being done and proved true, they deliver it atteſted for a lawful tally to the clerk of the pipe, to be allowed in the great roll.

The other officers of this court, are the uſher of the exchequer, his deputy and clerk; three paymaſters of exchequer bills, their deputy, and a comptroller of exchequer bills; a tally writer for the auditor, who has two aſſiſtant clerks, and a tally cutter.

There are ſeveral other offices belonging to the exchequer, as the Pipe office in Gray's Inn; Foreign Appoſer's office, and King's Remembrancer's office, in the Temple; Clerk of the pleas office, in Lincoln's Inn, &c.

In leaving this diviſion we proceed from Weſtminſter-bridge (which has been already deſcribed in p. 301, &c.) through a fine ſtreet which opens and leads to St. James's Park.* At the weſt end of this park, fronting the mall and grand canal, ſtands

The QUEEN's PALACE.

This building was originally known by the name of Arlington-houſe; but being purchaſed by the late duke of Buckingham's father, who rebuilt it in 1703, with brick and ſtone, it was called Buckingham-houſe till the year 1762, when his preſent majeſty bought it; and it has obtained the name of the Queen's Palace from the particular pleaſure her majeſty has expreſſed in the retirement of it. It is in every reſpect a fine building, and not only commands a proſpect of St. James's-park in front, but has a park, lately much enlarged, and a canal belonging to itſelf behind it, together with a good garden, and a fine terrace, from whence, as well as from the apartments, there is a proſpect of the adjacent country. It has a ſpacious court-yard, incloſed with iron rails, fronting St. James's Park, with offices on each ſide, ſeparated from the manſion-houſe by two wings of bending piazzas, and arched galleries, elevated on pillars of the Tuſcan, Doric, and Ionic orders. Each front of this houſe has two ranges of pilaſters of the Corinthian and Tuſcan orders.

To this palace has been lately added a new library ſupplied with the beſt authors in various languages. Here is alſo a fine collection of prints; and the whole ſtructure is adorned with a great variety of pictures by the moſt eminent maſters. Among which are the famous cartoons by Raphael, remove

2. The delivery of the keys, John xxi. As this is the appearance of our Saviour after the reſurrection, preſent authority, late ſuffering, humility and majeſty, command and love, are finely mixed in his divine aſpect. He is wrapped only in one large piece of white drapery; his left arm and breaſt are bare, and part of his legs naked. The figures of the eleven apoſtles all expreſs the ſame paſſion of admiration, but diſcover it differently according to their characters. Peter receives his maſter's orders on his knees, with an admiration mixed with a more particular attention; the beloved diſciple has, in his countenance [wonder loſt in love. The laſt perſonage whoſe back only is ſeen, one would imagine to be Thomas, whoſe perplexed concern could not be better drawn than by this acknowledgement of the difficulty to deſcribe it. The mixture of tints in the draperies all together produce a wonderful harmony.

3. The miracle of healing the cripple at the beautiful gate of the temple, Acts iii. All the figures are admirably performed.

4. The death of Ananias, Acts v. Here is the greateſt dignity in the apoſtles; they are, however, only a ſubordinate group, becauſe the principal action relates to the criminal; thither the eye is directed by almoſt all the figures. What a horror and reverence is viſible in the whole aſſembly on this mercenary man's falling down dead!

The proconſul has a greatneſs and a grace ſuperior to his character, equal to what might be ſuppoſed in a Cæſar.

* This place was originally a wild wet field, till king Henry VIII. incloſed it, laid it out into walks, and drained it by cutting canals, for a pleaſure ground to his new palace at St. James's. It was afterwards much enlarged and improved by king Charles II, who planted it with lime-trees, and formed a beautiful viſta, near half a mile in length, called the mall from its being adopted to a play at bowls ſo called. He alſo formed the water into a canal of 100 feet broad, and 2800 feet long; and furniſhed the park with a decoy, and other ponds for water fowl. This park, which is near a mile and a half in circumference, and ſurrounded with magnificent ſtructures, is conſtantly open and uſed as a thoroughfare by all ſorts of people. At the eaſt end is a ſpacious parade for the exerciſe of the horſe and foot-guards.

There were in all twelve of theſe pieces: two are in the poſſeſſion of the French king; the king of Sardinia has two of the others; and one belonged to a gentleman in England, who pledged it for a ſum of money. When the perſon who had taken this valuable depoſit found it was to be redeemed, he greatly damaged the drawing, for which the gentlamen brought his action in Weſtminſter-hall.

On the north ſide of St. James's-park, near the center, is an old building called

St. JAMES's PALACE.

On the ſpot where this edifice ſtands was once an hoſpital dedicated to St. James, originally founded by the citizens of London for only fourteen maids afflicted with the leproſy, who were to live a chaſte and devout life; but afterwards new donations increaſed the extent of the charity, and eight brethren were added to miniſter divine ſervice. This hoſpital, which is mentioned in a manuſcript of the Cotton library, ſo early as in the year 1100, was at length ſuppreſſed by king Henry VIII. who allowed the ſiſters penſions during the term of their lives, and taking down the edifice built a palace in its room, which retained the name of the hoſpital, and is ſtill ſtanding. In this edifice our kings have reſided ever ſince Whitehall was conſumed by fire in 1697, and his majeſty uſually reſides here during the winter ſeaſon. It is an irregular building, of a mean appearance from without, but it contains many beautiful and magnificent apartments. The chapel of the hoſpital was converted to the uſe of the royal family, as it remains to this day, and is a royal peculiar exempted from all epiſcopal juriſdiction. The ſervice in the chapel is like that in cathedrals; and for that end there belongs to it a dean, a lord-almoner, a ſub-dean, forty-eight chaplains, who preach in their turns before the royal family, twelve gentlemen of the chapel, two organiſts, ten children, a ſerjeant, a yeoman, a groom of the veſtry, and a bell-ringer.

On the eaſt ſide of this palace is Malborough-houſe, which is a very large brick edifice, ornamented with ſtone, and built in a peculiar taſte. It has two wings, and a very ſpacious court before it. The front, which is very extenſive, has only two ſeries of windows. The building is terminated by a baluſtrade on the top; and the apartments are magnificent, well diſpoſed and richly furniſhed.

But the moſt elegant building, not only in point of architecture, but in richneſs of furniture, is lord Speencer's houſe, ſituate on the weſt ſide of St. James's-palace. Nothing can be more pleaſingly elegant than the park front, which is ornamented to an high degree, and yet not with profuſion; nor is the fitting up and furniture of the rooms inferior to the beauties of the outſide. The library which is thirty feet by twenty-five, is moſt beautifully ornamented. The chimney-piece very light, of poliſhed white marble. On one ſide of the room hangs a capital picture of the nature of witchcraft; the expreſſion and finiſhing is very great; and the extent of the painter's imagination ſtriking, in drawing into one point ſuch a multitude of the emblems of witchcraft, and all deſigned with a fine wildneſs of fancy. It is ſomewhat in the ſtile of Scarlatti.

From hencce you enter the dining room, forty-ſix by twenty-four; exceedingly elegant: the decorations in the fineſt taſte, and the richeſt of their kind; the ceiling and cornice of white and and green, very beautiful. The ſlabs of Siena marble, large and finely veined. The chimney-piece, baſſo relievo, of white marble beautifully poliſhed. On one ſide of it is a landſcape, the killing of a dragon, the general brilliancy of which is very fine, and the trees beautifully expreſſed. On the other ſide is another yet more pleaſing, the trees of which are likewiſe ſtriking. The figures are a centaur carrying off a naked woman: her back appears, which is painted with a moſt delicate ſoftneſs: ſhe has a little ſlight drapery, which is very elegantly deſigned, though perhaps not perfectly natural.

We next enter the drawing room, which is twenty-four by twenty-one, clear of a noble bow-window, parted from the room only by two pillars of the moſt exquiſite wormanſhip; they are carved in leaves, the thick foliage of which bends round in a fine arch from one to the other, in a taſte that cannot be too much admired. On each ſide, in a ſemicircular cove in the wall, an urn of white marble with baſſo relievos, very beautiful. Nothing can be more elegant than the chimney-piece; a fine border of Siena marble with a ſweet feſtoon of flowers upon it in white marble poliſhed; the ceiling, cornice, and ornaments of green and white and gold, and in a moſt delicate ſtile. Over the chimney, a picture of two uſurers; great expreſſion.

Returning, we next view the attic ſtory; the ſtair caſe is in a very juſt taſte, wide and lofty; the ceiling and ornaments green and white.

From the landing-place you enter firſt the muſic room twenty-five by twenty-three, chimney-piece extremely light and elegant: on the left a ſmall dreſſing-room, very neat; chimney-piece very beautiful, the cornice of white poliſhed marble, ſupported by pillars of Siena. This opens into the bed-chamber, twenty-five by twenty.

The South east View of the MIDDLESEX HOSPITAL near Oxford Road

The beds and tables very finely carved and inlaid, the former of crimſon damaſk, with covered tops and extremely elegant.

Returning to the muſic-room, you enter the grand dreſſing-room, twenty-five by twenty-three, which is fitted up with all poſſible taſte; ſcarce any thing can be more beautiful than the moſaic ceiling, the cornices, and all the ornaments. The chimney-piece is exquiſitely deſigned, and admirably executed: it is of white marble, wrought with the utmoſt taſte, and beautifully poliſhed. Over the cornice are feſtoons of the lighteſt carving, and two eagles, with a very fine baſſo relievo of carving in a glaſs in the center. The pictures are diſpoſed with great elegance, and hung up by ribbons of gilt carving in the higheſt taſte.

From this room you enter the ſaloon, forty-five by thirty. The ceiling, which is coved, is in moſiac compartments, green and white and gold; gilt medallions are let into it. The door-caſes exceedingly elegant, their cornices ſupported by pillars moſt beautifully carved, and gilt with the ſame mixture of green as in the ceiling. The chimney-piece large, but very light; relievos of white poliſhed marble, wonderfully elegant. Between the windows are two ſlabs very large, of the fineſt Siena marble, the frames carved in the moſt exquiſite taſte, and richly gilded; they are beyond all compariſon more beautiful and rich than any we have ſeen. The pier-glaſſes of a vaſt ſize, ſingle plates, and the frames of admirable workmanſhip. The carving and gilding of the ſofa frames in a ſtile and taſte till now unknown. In the center of the room hangs an exceeding fine glaſs luſtre. On each ſide the chimney is an hiſtorical landſcape, one Alexander and Diogenes; the expreſſion good, but the colouring of both ſomething of the Manneriſt.

The next room is called the painted one, twenty-four by twenty-two. On one ſide is a bow window, ornamented with the moſt exquiſitely carved and gilt pillars you can conceive. The walls and ceiling are painted in compartments by Mr. Steuart, in the moſt beautiful taſte; even the very ſcrolls and feſtoons of the ſlighteſt ſort, which are run between the ſquare and circular compartments, are executed with the minuteſt elegance. The ground of the whole is green; and the general effect more pleaſing than is eaſily conceived. Nothing can be lighter or more beautiful than the chimney-piece: the frieze contains a moſt exquiſite painting repreſenting a clandeſtine marriage, which, without variety or glare of colours, has all the harmony of their utmoſt power. Nothing can be finer than the drapery, which is deſigned with the juſteſt taſte, diſplaying the form of every limb through it in a moſt beautiful manner. The ſoft expreſſion of the naked, and the beauty of the heads, are very great. We ſhould obſerve, that two of the ſmall compartments of the wall are landſcapes, let into it with no other than the painted frame of the diviſions; one repreſents a water-fall, and the other a bridge over a ſtream, both fine. The frames of the tables, ſofas, ſtands, &c. &c. are all carved and gilt in the ſame taſte as the other ornaments of the room, all with a profuſion of richneſs, but with the utmoſt elegance. The peacock's feathers over one of the glaſſes, the turtles on a wreath of flowers, and the magpies on bunches of grapes, are very beautiful, and the deception of the firſt extraordinary. The bold relief of ſuch ſlight ſtrokes does honour to the pencil of the artiſt. The looking-glaſs window is a piece of taſte, and has an happy effect.

At the ſouth-eaſt corner of Hyde-Park is a neat plain building, called

St. GEORGE's HOSPITAL.

This hoſpital was firſt opened for the admiſſion of patients, on the firſt day of January 1734, and has ever ſince been ſupported by voluntary ſubſcriptions and donations, and ſo well attended and managed, that now it is one of the moſt flouriſhing hoſpitals in the kingdom.

Here are admitted the poor, ſick and lame, who are ſupplied with advice, medicine, diet, waſhing, lodging, and ſome of the more diſtreſſed even with cloaths. The phyſicians viſit their patients on Mondays and Fridays, and on all intermediate days whenever occaſion requires; but the ſurgeon attends every day; and on every Friday morning there is a general conſultation of all the phyſicians and ſurgeons. No ſecurity for the burial of the patients is required, nor any money, gift, or reward taken of them or their friends, on any account whatever. Thoſe who die, if their friends are unable to bury them, are interred at the charge of the ſociety. And the money collected in the poor box at the door, is kept as a ſeparate fund for furniſhing thoſe with ſome little ſum of money, whoſe diſtance from their habitations, or other particular neceſſities, require it.

The apothecaries, who are governors, are appointed to attend by rotation as viſitors, to ſee that the apothecary of the houſe takes due care of the medicines and patients. Two viſitors are choſen weekly out of the ſubſcribers, to attend daily, and take care, by examining the proviſion and patients, that the orders of the ſociety are punctually obſerved, that the patients are treated in every reſpect with order and tenderneſs, and to make a report in writing of their obſervations.

Prayers are read daily to the patients; a ſermon is preached every Sunday, the communion is adminiſtered every month, and the chaplain attends at other times to catechize and perform other religious offices, as often as their caſes require; and when the patients are diſcharged, religious tracts are given to each of them, for their farther edification.

A board of governors meet every Wedneſday morning to do the current buſineſs of the hoſpital, to receive and examine the reports of the viſitors, to diſcharge and admit patients, to receive the complaints and propoſals of all perſons, and to prepare ſuch matters as are proper for the conſideration of general boards. A general board of the governors meet regularly five times a year.

The governors are in number upwards of three hundred. No perſon receiving ſalary, fee, or reward from the hoſpital, is capable of being a governor; but every other gentleman ſubſcribing 5l. a year, or upwards, or giving one benefaction of 50l. although he be not an annual ſubſcriber, is thereupon put in nomination to be a governor, and at the firſt general court, which is held one month after, is accordingly ballotted for by the governors. The ſubſcriptions are received by the treaſurers, at the weekly board, held every Wedneſday morning in the hoſpital.

The other rules and regulations of this hoſpi- are as follow:

1. No perſon is to be admitted a patient, except in caſes of accidents, without a note from a governor or contributor, ſpecifying the name and place of abode of ſuch patient, and that he or ſhe is a proper object of this charity.

2. All recommendations are to be delivered every Wedneſday morning by nine o'clock.

3. In caſe out-patients neglect coming two weeks ſucceſſively on the day and hour they are ordered to attend, ſuch out-patients ſhall be diſcharged for irregularity, except they have had leave from their phyſician.

4. No perſon diſcharged for irregularity is to be ever again admitted into the hoſpital, upon any recommendation whatſoever.

5. No patient is to be ſuffered to go out of the hoſpital without leave in writing; and to avoid giving offence, no leave is to be given to any patient to go into St. James's Park; or the Green Park, called Conſtitution-hill, upon any pretence whatſoever.

6. No governor, officer, or ſervant, muſt at any time preſume, on pain of expulſion, to take of any tradeſman, patient, or other perſon, any fee, reward, or gratification of any kind, directly or indirectly, for any ſervice done, or to be done, on account of this hoſpital.

7. No perſon ſubſcribing leſs than two guineas a year, can recommend more than two in-patients in the year.

8. When there is not room for all the patients recommended at one time to be received into the hoſpital, thoſe are taken in whoſe admiſſion the board are of opinion, will moſt effectually anſwer the end of the charity; and the reſt, if proper objects, are admitted out-patients, till there is room for them in the hoſpital.

This hoſpital enjoys a fine ſituation, and has all the benefit of a clear and pure air. It is a very neat, though not an expenſive building; and though it is extremely plain, yet it is not void of ornament. It has two ſmall wings, and a large front, with only one door, which is in the middle, and to which there is an aſcent by a few ſteps. On the top of this part of the building is a pediment raiſed above the reſt of the edifice, and under this ornament is a ſtone with an inſcription, expreſſing the noble uſe to which this ſtructure is applied.

Near this hoſpital is a Lock-hoſpital, erected for the reception of perſons afflicted with venereal diſorders, and ſupported by voluntary ſubſcriptions and donations.

Returning eaſtward we come to a ſtreet called Piccadilly, on the ſouth ſide of which is ſituate the pariſh church of St. JAMES.

This is one of the churches that owes its riſe to the increaſe of buildings and inhabitants; for the church of St. Martin in the Fields being too ſmall for the inhabitants, and too remote from thoſe in this quarter, the earl of St. Alban's, with other perſons of diſtinction in that neighbourhood, erected this edifice at the expence of about 7000l. It was built in the reign of king Charles II. and though a large fabric, was conſidered as a chapel of eaſe, to St. Martin's; but being conſecrated in 1684, it was dedicated to St. James, in compliment to the name of the duke of York, and the next year, when that prince had aſcended the throne, the diſtrict for which it was built, was by act of parliament ſeparated from St. Martin's, and made a diſtinct pariſh. The walls are brick, ſupported by ruſtic quoins of ſtone; and the windows, which are large, are alſo caſed with ſtone. The tower at the eaſt end riſes regularly from the ground to a conſiderable height, and is crowned with a neat, well conſtructed ſpire.

This church is a rectory, in the patronage of the biſhop of London; and is ſaid to be worth 500l. per annum. The veſtry is ſelect; and the officers are, two churchwardens, four ſideſmen, eight overſeers, two burgeſſes, two aſſiſtant-burgeſſes, ſeven conſtables, fourteen ſcavengers, and two ſurveyors of the highways.

The remarbable places and things in this pariſh are,

Burlington-houſe, ſo called from its being the reſidence of the earls of Burlington. It is fenced from the ſtreet by a brick wall, about two hundred and twenty feet in length, in which are three coach gates. The front of the houſe is of ſtone, and is remarkable for the beauty of the deſign and workmanſhip. It has two wings, joined by a circular colonade of the Doric order. The front was built by the late earl of Burlington. The apartments are in a fine taſte, and the ſtair-caſe painted with great ſpirit, by Sab. Ricci. Behind the houſe is a ſpacious garden.

Here are ſeveral other magnificent houſes, as Sunderland-houſe, Devonſhire-houſe, and two new-houſes, one erected by the earl of Bath, and the other by the earl of Egremont.

St. James's-ſquare, which is neatly paved with heading-ſtone all over; in which there is a moſt curious oval baſon, 150 feet diamater; in the center thereof is a pedeſtal about fifteen feet ſquare, for a ſtatue of king William III. on horſeback; the whole is environed with iron rails eight ſquare, and at each angle without the rails is a ſtone pillar about nine feet high, and a lamp on the top: the gravel walk within the rails is in breadth from each angle to the margin of the baſon, about twenty-ſix feet.

Soho-ſquare or King's-ſquare, (a part of which only is in this pariſh) is of conſiderable extent, and as an area ſurrounded with high pales, encloſing a garden, in which is a ſtatue of king Charles

Charles II. ſtanding upon a pedeſtal placed in the midſt of a ſmall baſon. At his majeſty's feet lie the repreſentations of the four principal rivers, the Thames, Trent, Humber and Severn, pouring out their waters. On the ſouth ſide of this ſquare are Frith-ſtreet and Greek-ſtreet, on the eaſt Sutton-ſtreet, on the north Charles-ſtreet, and on the weſt Denmark-ſtreet.

Golden-ſquare, which is very ſmall, but neat, is adorned on the inſide with graſs plats and gravel walks, and is ſurrounded with handſome iron rails.

St. James's-market.

Marlborough or Carnaby-market.

A large chapel in King-ſtreet, built in 1702 at the ſole expence of archbiſhop Tenniſon, who endowed the ſame. The morning preacher's ſalary is 70l. per annum, the afternoon preacher has 50l. per annum, and the two curates who read prayers have 20l. per annum each.

In Berwick-ſtreet there is a chapel; the morning preacher has 30l. per annum and the afternoon preacher has 20l. per annum.

In the ſame ſtreet is a French chapel.

A Preſbyterian meeting-houſe in Swallow-ſtreet.

An Anabaptiſt meeting-houſe in Glaſs-houſe-ſtreet.

An opera and a playhouſe in the Hay-market, in which there is alſo a market for hay and ſtraw three days in a week, viz. Tueſdays, Thurſdays and Saturdays.

There is a charity ſchool in King's-ſtreet for thirty-ſix boys, who are the children of poor inhabitants, for ſchooling only.

Another over the watch-houſe for forty poor boys, who are taught to read, write, &c. at the charge of the offertory.

On the north part of Burlington-gardens is the charity-ſcool, a handſome edifice, where eighty girls are boarded, cloathed, taught, and placed out to ſervice, &c. at the charge of divers ſubſcribers and by collections.

In the upper burial-ground is a work-houſe capable of containing 300 poor people. When any of the poor fall ſick, they are removed to the infirmary, which is in a ſtreet, called the Gravel Pits near Broad-ſtreet.

To the north from the pariſh we come to Great George-ſtreet, on the eaſt ſide of which is ſituate the pariſh church of St. GEORGE, Hanover-ſquare.

This was one of the new churches erected within the bills of mortality, by act of parliament, in the reign of queen Anne, and was taken out of the pariſh of St. Martin's in the Fields. It has a plain body with an elegant portico; the columns, which are Corinthian, are of a large diameter, and the pediment has its acroteria, but without further ornament. It has a tower, which, above the clock, is elegantly adorned at the corners with coupled Corinthian columns that are very lofty: theſe are crowned with their entablature, which at each corner ſupports two vaſes, and over theſe the tower ſtill riſes till it is terminated by a dome crowned with a turret that ſupports a ball, over which riſes the weather-cock.

This pariſh at firſt conſiſted of two out wards of that of St. Martin's in the Fields; but it has now four wards, named Conduit-ſtreet, Groſvenor-ſtreet, Dover-ſtreet and the out-ward.

It is a rectory, the advowſon of which is ſettled upon the biſhop of London and his ſucceſſors. The profits ariſing to the rector are ſaid to amount to about 600l. per annum. Lieutenant general Stewart gave the ground on which this church was erected, and ſome time after bequeathed to the pariſh the ſum of 4000l. towards erecting and endowing a charity ſchool therein.

The veſtry is ſelect; and the officers are, two churchwardens, two ſideſmen, eight overſeers, one burgeſs and his aſſiſtant, four conſtables, one headborough, four ſurveyors of the highways, three ſurveyors of the ſtreets, and ſix ſcavengers.

The remarkable places and things in this pariſh are, Hanover-ſquare; Groſvenor-ſquare; a chapel in Conduit-ſtreet called Trinity chapel; a chapel at Knight's-bridge, and another near Groſvenor-ſquare; part of Hyde-park, Chelſea water-works; a workhouſe for the poor, and a market for meat and herbage.

Hanover-ſquare, contains about two acres of ground, in the middle of which is a garden encloſed with rails: the houſes are new built in the modern taſte; they make a grand appearance, and are inhabited by noblemen and gentlemen of diſtinguiſhed rank.

Groſvenor-ſquare contains about five acres, and in the middle is a large garden ſurrounded with paliſade pales placed upon a circular dwarf wall. This garden is laid out into walks, and adorned with an equeſtrian ſtatue of king George I. gilt, which ſtands upon a pedeſtal in the center.

In Duke-ſtreet, Groſvenor-ſquare, in this pariſh, is a lying-in-hoſpital, for unmarried as well as married women. It is ſupported by voluntary contributions; and any woman recommended by a governor or ſubſcriber is received, and provided with aſſiſtance, and all neceſſaries, during the laſt ſtate of pregnancy, and the month of lying-in.

This hoſpital, which firſt began in Jermyn-ſtreet, St. James's, and was from thence removed into Duke-ſtreet, is governed by a preſident, a vice-preſident, and a treaſurer, annually elected out of the governors greater benefactors to this charity; by a general court of governors held in the months of March, June, September and December, to take the reports of the committees; and by a houſe committee who inſpect accounts and tranſact ſuch buſineſs as is laid before them.

A phyſicial committee is appointed at the general quarterly courts out of the phyſicians, men-midwives, ſurgeons, and apothecaries, who are to meet once a month to examine the medicines and drugs brought into the diſpenſatory, and none are ſuffered to be uſed without their approbation.

Two phyſicians and two ſurgeons attend twice a week on extraordinary caſes; a ſurgeon and man-midwife every day from eleven o'clock till

one

one; and ſuch objects as come within theſe hours have advice in phyſic and ſurgery, without fee or reward, whether accidental or recommended.

Every governor or ſubſcriber is entitled to ſend one in-patient at a time, and out-patients without limitation. All ſubſcriptions are during pleaſure. Thoſe who contribute two guineas a year are governors while they continue their ſubſcription, and thoſe who give 20l. at one payment are governors during life, and have a vote and intereſt at the committees.

No officers or ſervants are permittcd, on pain of expulſion, to take any fee, reward, or gratuity whatſoever, of patients or other perſons, for any ſervice done, or to be done in this hoſpital.

The poor women recommended by the governors and ſubſcribers are received on Wedneſdays and Fridays, from eleven o'clock till one.

Near Oxford-road, in this pariſh, is a plain, but commodious brick building, called

The MIDDLESEX HOSPITAL.

The charitable deſigns of this hoſpital were carried on for ſeveral years in two convenient houſes adjoining to each other, in Windmill-ſtreet, Tottenham-court-road, where the firſt inſtitution in Auguſt 1745, was intended only for the relief of the indigent ſick and lame; but in July 1747, the governors, willing to render it more worthy the notice of the public, extended their plan to the relief of the pregnant wives of the induſtrious poor; when the great increaſe of patients ſoon obliged the governors to think of enlarging their edifice, as well as their plan; and the kind benevolence of the public by donations, legacies, &c. enabled them in 1755, to erect the preſent more extenſive building. The apartments for the reception of the lying-in women are in a ſeparate part of the building, remote from the ſick and lame; and that ladies may viſit the lying-in patients without being incommoded by the ſick and lame, different ſtair-caſes lead to each, the lying-in wards having no communication with the other.

The qualification of a governor of this charity is an annual ſubſcription of three guineas; which alſo entitles the ſubſcriber to recommend, and have in the houſe at one time, either one ſick or lame patient, or one lying-in woman, and to recommend out-patients. A ſubſcription of five guineas per annum entitles the ſubſcriber to recommend one ſick or lame in-patienr, out-patients, and one lying-in woman. A ſubſcription of thirty guineas at one payment conſtitutes the ſubſcriber a governor for life, with the laſt mentioned privileges.

A committee of the governors meet at the hoſpital every Tueſday, at ten of the clock, to receive and diſcharge patients, and to tranſact the other neceſſary buſineſs of the houſe. The patients are attended by three eminent phyſicians, a man-midwife, three ſurgeons, and a divine. The phyſicians viſit the patients every Tueſday, Thurſday and Saturday, and on intermediate days, when particular caſes require it. The ſurgeons attend every day.

Patients are admitted on a letter of recommendation from a governor or contributor, who may recommend in-patients, and have out-patients on the books, according to the regulation before-mentioned; and when in-patients are recommended, and there is not room in the houſe to receive them, they are put on the liſt to be admitted on the firſt vacancy, and in the mean time are preſcribed for as out-patients.

No ſecurity is required for burials.

All accidents are admitted without recommendation.

Tueſday being the day appointed for the admiſſion of patients, they muſt be at the hoſpital, with their recommendations, at ten of the clock.

The phyſicians and ſurgeons meet every Saturday at twelve o'clock, at the hoſpital, where they give advice to to all ſuch diſeaſed poor who ſhall come, though not recommended and require it.

Married women are only admitted (in the laſt month of their pregnancy) after they have been examined by the weekly board, and on their producing an affidavit made before a juſtice of peace, of the time and place of their marriage, and of the ſettlement of the huſband, with the manner the ſaid ſettlement was obtained, whether by birth, ſervitude, or otherwiſe.

The ſervants of the houſe are forbid to take any gratuity of the patients or their friends, on any pretence whatſoever, on pain of expulſion.

Proceeding eaſtward from Hanover-ſquare, we come to Dean-ſtreet, Soho, on the weſt ſide of which, in the liberty of Weſtminſter, is ſituate the pariſh church of St. ANN.

This church owes its foundation to the great increaſe of public buildings. The inhabitants of the pariſh of St. Martin's in the Fields became too numerous to be contained in the church, and therefore applying to parliament, this was erected in the year 1686, on a ſpot of ground then called Kemp's Field, and the pariſh to which it belongs was ſeparated from St. Martin's in 1687.

The walls of this church are of brick with ruſtic quoins. The tower which is ſquare, is ſtrengthened with a kind of buttreſſes, and at the ſpringing of the dome, which ſupports the lanthorn, there are urns on the corners with flames. The lanthorn, which is formed of arches, is ſurrounded with a baluſtrade at the bottom, and over it is a turret crowned with a globe and fane.

The advowſon of this church is ſettled upon the biſhop of London, and the rector, inſtead of tythes, receives from the pariſhioners 100l. per annum which, together with the glebe, ſurplus fees, and eaſter-book, amount to about 300l. per annum.

The veſtry is ſelect; and the officers are two burgeſſes, two aſſiſtant burgeſſes, two churchwardens, four collectors for the porr, ſix conſtables, four beadles, four ſcavengers, and two ſurveyors of the highways.

Leiceſter-ſquare, which contains an area of between two and three acres. On the north ſide is Saville-houſe, the winter reſidence of his preſent majeſty while prince of Wales; and adjoining to that is Leiceſter-houſe, formerly the reſidence of the princeſs dowager of Wales. This ſquare is encloſed with iron rails, and in the center is a gilt equeſtrian ſtatue of his late majeſty king George II. on a high pedeſtal.

Proceeding eaſtward from St. Anne's Soho, and from the liberties of Weſtminſter, we leave Oxford-road and all the new buildings on the north ſide of that ſpacious-ſtreet, and come to the pariſh church of St. GILES in the Fields.

This church is ſo called to diſtinguiſh it from St. Giles's, Cripplegate. The place in which it ſtands was formerly a village of the ſame name as the church, which was ſtanding ſo early as the year 1222, though it was not made parochial till the year 1547. The little edifice for divine worſhip being taken down in the year 1623, a church of brick was erected in its ſtead; but the ground in its neighbourhood being gradually raiſed to the height of eight feet above the floor, it became very damp and unwholeſome. On this the inhabitants, by conſent of parliament, had it rebuilt, the ſum of 8000l. being granted for that purpoſe. The old fabrick was taken down in 1730, and the preſent one erected three years after.

The church and ſteeple are built with Portland ſtone. The area of the church within the walls is ſixty feet wide, and ſeventy-five feet in length, excluſive of the receſs for the altar. The roof is ſupported with Ionic pillars of Portland ſtone, on ſtone piers, and is vaulted underneath. The outſide of the church has a ruſtic baſement, and the windows of the galleries have ſemicircular heads, over which is a medillion cornice. The ſteeple is one hundred and ſixty feet high, and conſiſts of a ruſtic pedeſtal, ſupporting a Doric order of pilaſters, and over the clock is an octangular tower with three quarter Ionic columns ſupporting a baluſtrade with vaſes, on which ſtands the ſpire, which is alſo octangular and belted.

The whole expence of erecting this church amounted to 10,026l. 15s. 9d.. It is a rectory in the gift of the crown, and the living is computed at 400l. per annum.

The veſtry is ſelect; conſiſting of the rector, two churchwardens and thirty-ſix inhabitants: and the officers are, two churchwardens, ten overſeers, two ſideſmen, five conſtables, ten headboroughs, ten ſurveyors of the highways, and ten ſcavengers.

In this pariſh is one of the largeſt and moſt beautiful ſquares in London, if not in Europe, called Lincoln's-inn-fields. It was originally laid out by the celebrated Inigo Jones. The area contains about ten acres, in the middle of which is a baſon of water, ſurrounded with graſs and gravel walks, encompaſſed with an iron paliſade, fixed upon a ſtone plinth. This ſquare is bounded on the north, weſt, and ſouth, with ſpacious and elegant buildings, and to the eaſt with the wall of Lincoln's-in gardens. The north ſide is called Newman's row, the weſt ſide, Arch-row, the ſouth ſide Portugal-row, and the eaſt ſide Lincoln's-inn wall. Between theſe bounds and the paliſades is a ſpacious avenue for carriages, and a path for foot paſſengers, paved with broad flat ſtones, and ſecured by poſts at proper diſtances.

Nearly adjoining to this ſquare is

LINCOLN's-INN.

This is one of the four inns of court, and is ſituate on the ſpot where formerly ſtood the houſes of the biſhop of Chicheſter and of the black friars, the latter erected about the year 1222, and the former about 1226; but both of them coming to Henry Lacey, earl of Lincoln, he built in their ſtead a ſtately manſion for his city reſidence. However, it afterwards reverted to the biſhopric of Chicheſter, and was demiſed by Robert Sherbourn, biſhop of that ſee, to Mr. William Syliard, a ſtudent there, for a term of years, at the expiration of which doctor Richard Sampſon, his ſucceſſor, in the year 1536, paſſed the inheritance thereof to the ſaid Syliard and Euſtace his brother; and the latter, in conſideration of the ſum of 500l. conveyed the houſe and gardens in fee to Richard Kingſmill and the reſt of the benchers.

The charge of admiſſion into this houſe, including fees, amounts to five pounds, and every ſtudent, after ſtudying there ſeven years, is admitted to the bar. The members are obliged to be a fortnight in commons every term, on the penalty of forfeiting 18s. in caſe of abſence.

This inn principally conſiſts of three rows of good buildings occupied by gentlemen of the ſociety. Theſe form three ſides of the ſquare, and here the buildings are all new and uniform, the north ſide lying open to the gardens, which are greatly improved with gravel walks, graſs plots, rows of trees, and a very long terrace walk. Theſe gardens, which are extremely pleaſant and commodious, are laid open for public uſe. The greateſt part of the weſt ſide of the ſquare is taken up with the offices belonging to the ſtamp duty. In the middle of the ſquare is a neat fluted Corinthian column in a ſmall baſon ſurrounded with iron rails. This column ſupports a handſome ſun-dial, which has four ſides, and on the corners of the pedeſtal are four naked boys ſpouting water out of Triton ſhells.

Behind the north eaſt ſide of the ſquare is a good hall and chapel; the latter of which was built by Inigo Jones about the year 1622, on pillars, with an ambulatory or walk underneath, paved with broad ſtones. The outſide of the chapel is a good piece of Gothic architecture, and the windows are painted with the figures at full length of the principal perſonages mentioned in the ſcriptures. On the twelve windows on the north ſide are, Abraham, Moſes, Eli, David, and the prophets Daniel, Iſaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Amos, and Zachariah, with John the Baptiſt, and St. Paul, and on the ſouth ſide are the reſt of the apoſtles. Under theſe figures are the arms of a great number of gentlemen belonging to this ſociety.

In the old buildings fronting the garden beyond the ſquare, is the library, which conſiſts of a good collection of books in ſeveral languages and faculties.

Beſides theſe remarkables in the pariſh of St. Giles, there is a popiſh chapel in Duke-ſtreet, and ſeveral meeting-houſes; two charity ſchools, an alms-houſe, and a work-houſe for the reception of the poor.

In Brownlow-ſtreet, Long-Acre, there is a lying-in hoſpital, ſupported by charitable contributions, for the relief of pregnant poor women, where ſuch married women as are objects of charity, are amply provided with commodious apartments and beds, good nurſing, plain ſuitable diet, proper medicines, and the advice and aſſiſtance of gentlemen of ſkill and experience in midwifry, as well as the attendance of midwives, in the laſt ſtage of their pregnancy, and during the month of lying-in. This hoſpital is nearly under the ſame direction and government, as thoſe of a like nature, which have been already mentioned.

Proceeding more eaſtward we come to the pariſh and church of St. GEORGE, Bloomſbury.

This is one of the fifty new churches appointed to be built by act of parliament within the bills of mortality. The name of St. George was given to it in honour of his late majeſty; and it received the additional epithet of Bloomſbury, from its ſituation, to diſtinguiſh it from others of the ſame name. It is likewiſe farther diſtinguiſhed by ſtanding ſouth and north, and by the ſtatue of king George I. at the top of its ſpire.

This church was erected at the public expence, and conſecrated in January 1731. A diſtrict for its pariſh was by authority of parliament taken out of that of St. Giles's, and the ſum of 3000l. was given towards the ſupport of its rector, to which being added 1250l. by the inhabitants of St. Giles's pariſh, both ſums were ordered to be laid out in the purchaſe of lands, tenements, &c. in fee ſimple, as a perpetual fund for the maintenance of the rector and his ſucceſſors; but the poor of this pariſh and that of St. Giles's in the Fields, are to be maintained by the joint aſſeſſment of both pariſhes, in the ſame manner as before their being divided.

This church is a rectory in the gift of the crown, and is valued at 400l. per annum. The veſtry is ſelect; and the officers are, two churchwardens, four overſeers, two ſideſmen, two conſtables, two headboroughs, and two ſcavengers.

The remarkable places in this pariſh are,

The Britiſh Muſeum; a particular deſcription of which, with the curioſities therein contained, the reader will find in p. 341, &c.

Bloomſbury ſquare. This ſquare is embelliſhed with many good houſes, and the graſs plots in the middle ſurrounded with neat iron rails. The north ſide is entirely taken up with Bedford-houſe, which is elegant, and was the deſign of Inigo Jones. Beſides the body of the houſe, are two wings, and on each ſide the proper offices. One of the wings is a magnificent gallery, in which are copies of the cartoons at Hampton-court, as large as the originals, by Sir James Thornhill. Behind the houſe are extenſive gardens, which command a view of the country, and particularly of Highgate and Hampſtead.

From the north-eaſt corner of Bloomſbury-ſquare there opens a way to Queen's-ſquare, thro' Southampton-row; at the ſouth-weſt angle of which ſtands the pariſh church of

St. GEORGE, Queen-ſquare,

This church likewiſe took its riſe from the great increaſe of buildings. Several gentlemen at the extremity of the pariſh of St. Andrew Holbourn having propoſed the erecting of a chapel for religious worſhip, Sir Streynſham Maſter, and fourteen of the other neighbouring gentlemen, were appointed truſtees for the management of this affair. Theſe gentlemen in the year 1705, agreed with Mr. Tooley to give him 3500l. for erecting a chapel and two houſes, intending to reimburſe themſelves by the ſale of pews; and this edifice being finiſhed the next year, they ſettled annual ſtipends for the maintenance of a chaplain, an afternoon preacher who was alſo reader, and a clerk, giving to the firſt and ſecond a ſalary of 100l. each, and to the laſt 50l. But the commiſſioners for erecting fifty new churches, reſolving to make this one of them, purchaſed it, cauſed a certain diſtrict to be appointed for its pariſh, and had it conſecrated in the year 1723, when it was dedicated to St. George, in compliment to Sir Streynſham Maſter, who had been governor of Fort St. George in the Eaſt Indies.

This church is a plain common building, void of all elegance; it is however convenient and well enlightened. The rectory, like that of St. Andrew's, is in the gift of the Montague family, but the value of the living is uncertain.

The veſtry is ſelect, conſiſting of thirty gentlemen; and the officers are, two churchwardens, two ſideſmen, two conſtables, and two headboroughs.

In this pariſh are two very fine ſquares, each conſiſting of about four acres. One is called Queen ſquare, and is encloſed with very good houſes on all ſides, except the north, where it lies open to the fields, which renders it very airy and pleaſant. The other is Red-lion-ſquare, which is railed in, and adorned with an obeliſk in the center.

In Great Ormond-ſtreet, in this pariſh, is Powis-houſe, thus called from its having been the town reſidence of the duke of Powis. It is reckoned one of the moſt beautiful buildings in and about London. In this ſtreet is alſo the houſe of Charles Jennens, eſq; in which is one of the moſt capital collection of paintings in England.

In this pariſh likewiſe ſtands that commodious ſtructure called the Foundling Hoſpital; the origin and deſcription of which has been already given in p. 306, &c.

The

The next place of attention is

GRAYS INN.

This inn is ſituate on the north ſide of Holbourn, near the bars, and is ſo called from its being formerly the reſidence of the ancient and noble family of Gray of Wilton, who in the reign of Edward III. demiſed it to ſeveral ſtudents of the law. It is one of the four inns of court, and is inhabited by barriſters and ſtudents of the law, and alſo by ſuch gentlemen of independent fortune, as chuſe this place for the ſake of an agreeable retirement, or the pleaſure of the walks.

The members of the houſe are to be in commons a fortnight every term, for which they pay ſixteen ſhillings. The officers and ſervants are, a treaſurer, a ſteward, a chief and three under butlers, an upper and under cook, a pannier man, a gardener, the ſteward, the chief butler's men, and two porters.

This inn conſiſts chiefly of two very handſome quadrangles, one of which is called Coney-court, and was built in 1687; and one ſide of it contains a hall, a chapel and a library. The hall is a fine old ſtructure, well built of timber, in the form of a college hall. The chapel is a Gothic building, lately beautified and repaired. The library is well furniſhed with books in various faculties and languages, for the uſe of the ſtudents. But the chief ornament belonging to this inn is a ſpacious garden, conſiſting of gravel walks, between lofty trees, of graſs-plots, agreeable ſlopes, and a long terrace, with a portico at each end. The terrace is aſcended by a handſome flight of ſteps.

Proceeding down Gray's-inn-lane, and turning to the north-eaſt, we come to the pariſh and church of St. JAMES, Clerkenwell.

This church, which is ſituate on the north ſide of Clerkenwell-green, is part of the ancient priory church, denominated from its dedication to St. James Minor, biſhop of Jeruſalem, and the monaſtery to which it belonged. It is a very heavy ſtructure, partly Gothic, which was the original form, and partly Tuſcan. The body, though it has not the leaſt appearance of elegance, is well enlightened, and the ſteeple conſiſts of a low heavy tower crowned with a turret. It is a curacy in the gift of the pariſh, and the ſtipend is no more than 4l. 19s. 10d.

The veſtry is general; and the officers are, two churchwardens, four ſideſmen, four overſeers, five conſtables, nine headboroughs, two ſurveyors of the highways, and four ſcavengers.

In this place was anciently a priory, which was founded by Jordan Briſet, a wealthy baron, who, about the year 1100, gave to Robert, his chaplain, fourteen acres of land in a field adjoining to Clerks, or Clerkenwell, whereon to build a monaſtery; which was no ſooner erected and dedicated to the honour of God, and the aſſumption of the Virgin Mary, than he placed therein a certain number of nuns, in whom and their ſucceſſors it continued till it was ſuppreſſed by Henry VIII. in the year 1539. Soon after which the ſite thereof became the inheritance of Sir William Cavendiſh, who being afterwards created duke of Newcaſtle, erected thereon the preſent ſpacious and ſtately ſquare brick edifice on the north ſide of the church, and eaſt ſide of the cloſe.

The church of this pariſh, which was that of the late priory, for divers ages, not only ſerved as a place for the nuns to celebrate the divine offices in, but it likewiſe accommodated the neighbouring inhabitants in the performance of their religious duties; and by its being made parochial (ſoon after the diſſolution of its monaſtery) whereby 'tis manifeſt, that Clerkenwell at that time muſt have been a conſiderable village; and tho' at preſent it be, by the contiguous buildings, added to this great city, 'tis nevertheleſs in the county of Middleſex, hundred of Oſulſton, and manor of Finſbury; and owes its origin to the late monaſtery, as much as that did its name to the Clerks Well in that neighbourhood.

The ſteeple of this church being greatly decayed in courſe of time, a part thereof fell down in the year 1623, which occaſioned the pariſh to contract with the builder, to re-edify the whole. This builder raiſed the new work upon the old foundation; and having carried on the ſame with the utmoſt expedition, the bells were ſoon after hung therein; but before the ſame was entirely finiſhed, it fell down and deſtroyed part of the church, which were both ſoon after rebuilt, as they at preſent appear.

Adjoining to the north ſide of the church, is the beautiful ambulatory, or ſouth ſide row of the cloiſter of the ancient priory, conſiſting of ſix arches; and although the eaſtern part of the ſaid cloiſter be deſtroyed, yet the nuns hall, which was ſituate at the north end thereof, is ſtill remaining, though at preſent it is converted into a cabinet-maker's workſhop. And the garden on the eaſt ſide was formerly the cemetery belonging to the nunnery.

At the lower end of Clerkenwell green, in Rag-ſtreet, oppoſite Mutton-lane, is the celebrated fountain, denominated Clerks, or Clerkenwell, ſo called from the pariſh clerks of the city of London, who antiently uſed to meet there annually, to repreſent certain parts of ſcripture in a theatrical manner; to which the Lord-mayor and citizens of London not only repaired, but likewiſe the nobility, to ſee their performances: from which well, the late priory, as well as the preſent church and pariſh, are denominated.

A little ſouth eaſt of Clerkenwell priory, where at preſent St. John's-ſquare, &c. are ſituate, ſtood the houſe, or hoſpital of St. John of Jeruſalem, which was founded by the aforeſaid Jordan Briſet, who, for that end, purchaſed of the prioreſs and nuns of Clerkenwell, ten acres of land (for which he gave them twenty acres in his lordſhip of Willinghale in Kent) whereon he erected the ſaid hoſpital about the year 1110. But the church thereof was not dedicated to St. John the Baptiſt till the year 1185.

This magnificent fabrick was the chief ſeat in in England belonging to the Knights Hoſpitalers, who, from the greateſt poverty, by the profuſe liberality of ſimple Bigots and Enthuſiaſts, ſoon attained to that degree of riches and honour, that their prior was reckoned the firſt baron of the kingdom, and who for ſtate and grandeur vied with the king. Such was the antipathy of the populace to theſe imperious knights, that the rebels of Kent and Eſſex under the conduct of Wat Tyler and Jack Straw, anno 1381, conſumed this ſtately edifice by fire; but the ſame being rebuilt in a much more magnificent manner, it was ſuppreſſed by Henry VIII. in the year 1541. Soon after this it was converted into a repoſitory of martial ſtores, and the royal hunting equipage; to which uſes it was employed till the year 1550, when Edward Seymour, duke of Somerſet, and protector of the kingdom, cauſed the church thereof, together with its lofty and beautiful ſteeple, to be demoliſhed, and the ſtones thereof employed in building his ſtately and magnificent palace of Somerſet-houſe. The ſite of this building and appurtenances is now St. John's-ſquare, at the eaſt end of which is a chapel dedicated to St. John, and endowed of late years by one Mr. Michell. There ſtill remain two gates into this court or ſquare, which bear the marks of great antiquity; but that on the ſouth is the largeſt, and is called St. John's-gate.

In Cold Bath Fields, in this pariſh, is a very plain, but neat ſtructure, called

The SMALL POX HOSPITAL.

The centre of this building, which projects a little from the reſt, is terminated on the top by an angular pediment, on the apex of which is placed a vaſe upon a ſmall pediment.

This excellent charity was inſtituted in the year 1746, ſupported by a ſubſcription then made by ſeveral noblemen, gentlemen and ladies, who were deſirous that a charity uſeful in itſelf, and ſo beneficial to the public, might be begun near this great metropolis, there not being any hoſpital of the kind in Europe.

This hoſpital conſiſts of two houſes, at a proper diſtance from each other in airy ſituations. That for preparing the patients for inoculation is a handſome new building near the new road Iſlington; and that for receiving them when the diſeaſe appears, and for the reception of patients in the natural way, is in Cold Bath Fields.

To this hoſpital belong two preſidents, four vice-preſidents, and a treaſurer, who are annually elected out of the governors. There are a ſecretary, two apothecaries, a meſſenger, matrons, proper nurſes, &c. No fee, reward, or gratuity, is to be taken from any patients, or other perſons, on account of the hoſpital, on pain of expulſion.

Thirty guineas conſtitutes a governor for life; each of whom has a vote at all general courts and committees, and is entitled to have one patient in each houſe at a time.

Every perſon who ſubſcribes five guineas per annum is entitled to have one patient in the hoſpital for the natural way at a time, provided their are three beds for men, and two for women patients, in reſerve, for the recommendations of governors.

A committee of accounts, conſiſting of ſeven governors, is annually held between Lady-day and Michaelmas, who meet at leaſt once a quarter to examine and audit all tradeſmens bills, which are afterwards ordered by the houſe committee for payment. The accounts are regularly kept, and open at all times for the inſpection of the governors. Two governors are appointed viſitors, by the houſe committee, for ſix months, who frequently attend the hoſpital for inoculation, and alſo that for the natural way, alternately. Every perſon deſtitute of friends, or money, and labouring under this melancholy diſeaſe, or deſirous of being inoculated, is a proper object of this charity. Patients in the natural way are received every day: thoſe for inoculation about eight times in the year, of which timely notice is generally given in ſome of the public papers.

There is no charge attending the admiſſion of patients for inoculation, but patients in the natural way a depoſit of one pound and ſix-pence, to anſwer the expences of burial in caſe of death, or to be returned to the perſon, who paid the ſame, when diſcharged the hoſpital. Proper dreſſes are provided for the patients, and worn by them in the hoſpital, while their own cloaths are fumigated with brimſtone, which is always done before their diſcharge.

The ſums received for the ſupport of this hoſpital, from its firſt inſtitution, amount to twenty-four thouſand nine hundred and twenty ſix pounds. There have been received into the houſe, during that time, ſeven thouſand nine hundred and forty-ſix patients, who had the ſmall pox the natural way. Four thouſand ſix hundred and ninety-eight patients have been inoculated, of whom ſix only are ſaid to have died.

In Clerkenwell-green ſtands the New priſon, erected in the year 1615, for criminals in the county of Middleſex. And in the cloſe is a Bridewell for the confinement and correction of idle and diſorderly perſons.

At the ſouth end of St. John's-ſtreet is a building called Hicks's-hall, being the ſeſſion-houſe for the juſtices of the peace for the county of Middleſex This building took its name from Sir Baptiſt Hicks, a mercer in Cheapſide, and a juſtice of the peace, who erected it in 1612. Here the grand jury meet eight times a year to find bills of indictment againſt the criminals who are to be tried at the ſeſſions-houſe in the Old Bailey. The hall is a plain brick building, with a portico at the entrance.

Beſides theſe remarkables, there are in this pariſh an alms-houſe, three charity-ſchools, a market for ſheep ſkins, two work-houſes, and the New River water-works.

In the ſame pariſh is likewiſe an hoſpital called the Charter-houſe, which is a corruption of the word Chartreux, a name formerly uſed for a convent or priory of the Carthuſians.

The buildings of this hoſpital, which are extremely rude and irregular, have nothing but their convenience and ſituation to recommend them. The rooms are well diſpoſed, and the ſquare in the front is very neat, and kept in as good order as moſt in London. This ſquare, and the large gardens behind, give a free air, and at one and the ſame time contribute both to health and pleaſure.—For the origin and preſent ſtate of the Charter-houſe, the reader is referred to p. 217.

In leaving this place, and the pariſh of St. James Clerkenwell, we croſs Pickax-ſtreet, which brings us into Old-ſtreet road, on the north ſide of which, near the centre, is ſituate the pariſh church of St. LUKE.

This church owes its riſe to the great increaſe of buildings in the pariſh of St. Giles, Cripplegate; for notwithſtanding there being a chapel of eaſe, and ſeveral meeting-houſes, the pariſh church could not contain half the inhabitants who were deſirous of aſſembling there to attend divine worſhip. The commiſſioners for erecting the fifty new churches taking this into conſideration, purchaſed a piece of ground in this pariſh, and erected one of thoſe churches upon it; after which the inhabitants applying to parliament had the Middleſex liberty of St. Giles appointed for the pariſh; and by the ſame act 3500l. was granted to be laid out in fee ſimple, for the ſupport of a rector, beſides the profits of which the churchwardens were to pay him annually 120l. to be raiſed by burial fees.

The church was finiſhed in 1732, and was conſecrated the next year on St. Luke's day, when the name of that ſaint was given as its patron. Though the building is convenient and well enlightened with two rows of windows, it is a very ſingular ſtructure. In the center of the weſt front is the entrance, adorned with coupled Doric pilaſters; and to this door is an aſcent by a ſmall ſtraight flight of ſteps. Over the entrance is a round window, and on each ſide a ſmall tower covered with a dome, and ornamented with two windows in front, one of the uſual form, and another over it, anſwering to that over the door. The tower is carried up ſquare, and behind it the roof of the church forms to the weſt a kind of pediment, broken by the riſe of the tower to which it joins on each ſide. The uppermoſt ſtage of the tower diminiſhes very conſiderably, and this, which is the baſe of an obeliſk, ſupports on each ſide a dial. From hence riſes, as a ſteeple, a fluted obeliſk, which reaches to a great height, diminiſhing ſlowly, and being of a conſiderable thickneſs towards the top; the upper edges are chopped off, and the whole is terminated by a ball and fane.

The advowſon of this church is in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, and it is not to be held in commendam; all licences and diſpenſations for that purpoſe being declared void by the beforementioned act.

The veſtry is neither ſelect nor general, all being admitted that have either ſerved or fined for offices; the pariſh officers are, two churchwardens, four overſeers of the poor, four conſtables, ſixteen headboroughs, thirteen ſcavengers, and four beadles.

In this pariſh is Tindal's, or the diſſenting burial ground, and the artillery ground adjoining, both lying weſt-ward between the Doghouſe-bar-road and Bunhill-row. And on the eaſt ſide, at the north end of Upper Moorfields, ſtands the late foundation of St. LUKE's HOSPITAL.

This hoſpital which is appropriated for the reception of lunatics, is ſupported by private ſubſcriptions, and is deſigned as an improvement upon Bethlem, which, at the time of its eſtabliſhment, was incapable of receiving and providing for the relief of all the unhappy objects for whom application was made.

Patients are received into this hoſpital according to the order of time in which the petitions of their friends have been delivered to the ſecretary, without favour or partiality. They are even admitted without any expence, except only ſuch as are pariſh poor muſt have their bedding provided, which they are at liberty to take away when diſcharged.

On the admiſſion of any patient, two reſponſible houſekeepers, reſiding within the bills of mortality, muſt enter into a bond to the treaſurer for the time being, in the penalty of 100l. to take away ſuch patient within ſeven days after notice given them for that purpoſe by the committee, or their ſecretary. Theſe ſecurities muſt leave their names with their places of abode in writing, delivered to the ſecretary at leaſt four days before ſuch admiſſion, and muſt be approved of by the committee; but no governor can be ſecurity for any patient.

No perſon is to be admitted into this hoſpital who has been a lunatic above twelve calendar months; or has been diſcharged as an incurable from any other hoſpital for the reception of lunatics; or who has the veneral diſeaſe; is troubled with epileptic or convulſive fits, or is deemed an ideot; nor any woman with child.

The patients are not expoſed to public view; nor is any money received for the uſe of this charity expended in entertaining the general court of committee at any of their meetings.

The general committee receive immediately into the hoſpital any patient who ſhall have been diſcharged cured, in caſe ſuch patient relapſes within two months. They likewiſe take in by rotation ſuch patients as are diſcharged uncured; but the number of theſe in the houſe muſt not exceed twenty.

For tranſacting the buſineſs of this hoſpital, a general court is held twice every year, viz. on the ſecond Wedneſday in the months of February and Auguſt, and every general court conſiſts of nine governors.

Every perſon paying twenty guineas or upwards, or paying five guineas, and ſigning an agreement to pay the like ſum for the four next ſucceeding years, is admitted a governor, except all perſons acting as phyſician, ſurgeon, apothecary, or ſecretary to this hoſpital.

At the general court held annually on the ſecond Wedneſday in the month of February, one preſident, four vice-preſidents, a treaſurer, a general committee, phyſician, ſurgeon, apothecary, and ſecretary, are elected for the year enſuing. And no perſon acting as phyſician, ſurgeon, or apothecary to any other hoſpital or infirmary, can be phyſician, ſurgeon or apothecary to this hoſpital.

At the general court held annually on the ſecond Wedneſday in Auguſt, a ſpecial committee of ſeven governors, who are not of the general committee, are appointed to audit and examine the ſeveral accounts relating to this hoſpital, and report their opinion of ſuch accounts to the general court held on the ſecond Wedneſday in February following.

The preſident has power to order ſpecial general courts to be ſummoned as often as he thinks neceſſary; and upon every vacancy in the office of treaſurer, phyſician, ſurgeon, apothecary, or ſecretary, a general court is ſummoned to meet, in order to fill up the vacancy: but no perſon is entitled to vote at ſuch general court, unleſs he has paid his ſubſcription money on or before the day in which the vacancy is declared.

The general committee conſiſts of the preſident, vice-preſidents, and treaſurer for the time being, and of the five governors named as leſſes in the leaſe of the ground on which the hoſpital is built, and of all perſons who have paid 100l. or upwards for the uſe of the hoſpital; and of ſuch twenty-four governors reſiding within the bills of mortality, as are annually elected for that purpoſe at the general court held on the ſecond Wedneſday in February, of which committee five at leaſt are neceſſary to do buſineſs. They meet one ſtated day in every month, or oftener, if they ſee convenient, and at ſuch other times as the treaſurer, or any ſub committee for the time being appoint. And have power to hire, govern, and diſcharge the domeſtic ſervants of this hoſpital, to keep the buildings properly repaired, and purchaſe proviſions, furniture, and other neceſſaries for the ſame: to admit and diſcharge patients: to ſee that the ſeveral books relating to the hoſpital be regularly kept: that all debts, legacies, annual ſubſcriptions, and other revenues of this hoſpital be received and recovered as the ſame ſhall reſpectively become due: that all monies in the hands of the treaſurer, above what is neceſſary in the opinion of the ſaid committee for defraying the current expences of the hoſpital, be from time to time placed out in transferable government ſecurities, and no other, in the names of the treaſurer for the time being, and two of the vice-preſidents, or of two ſuch other governors as the general court ſhall appoint for that purpoſe; and that all juſt demands be regularly diſcharged at leaſt once in ſix months.

For the more eaſy diſpatch of buſineſs, this committee has power to ſummon ſub-committees, one of which is called the houſe-committee; and ſuch ſub-committees have power to ſummon the general committee as often as they think proper.

All purchaſes of proviſions, and other materials for the uſe of the hoſpital, are to be made as often as poſſible by contract: but no contract is to be made by which any member of the committee is directly or indirectly concerned.

A book, intituled, The Viſitor's Book, is kept in the hoſpital, for the governors to enter complaints of any neglect or miſconduct in the officers or ſervants, theſe complaints being ſigned by ſuch governor's name are taken into conſideration, and redreſſed by the committee.

The phyſician, who is allowed to have the liberty of pupils, attends every committee day, and one other day in the week, and as often otherwiſe as there is occaſion. The ſurgeon alſo attends the hoſpital every weekly committee day, and as often as there is occaſion; and the ſix apothecaries who generouſly attend and adminiſter their medicines gratis, are there monthly by rotation, attending every weekly committee day, and two other days in the week, and as often at other times as there is occaſion.

Every officer or ſervant who ſhall take any fee, gratuity, or reward, directly or indirectly, from any tradeſman or other perſon dealing with this hoſpital, patient, or friend of any patient, in reſpect of any ſervice done or to be done, ſhall forthwith be diſcharged, and rendered incapable of being received again into the ſervice of this hoſpital. Except that it be lawful for the ſecretary of this hoſpital, upon his waiting on every governor with a ſtaff and a printed copy of the rules and orders of this hoſpital, to accept of a fee not exceeding one guinea.

Cloſe adjoining to the north ſide of this hoſpital is a building called the Foundery, which was originally uſed by a founder in his trade, but now more remarkable for being the chief methodiſt meeting under the direction of the Reverend John Weſley. And on the ſouth ſide of Old-ſtreet road is another methodiſt meeting, called Mr. Whitfield's tabernacle, a different congregation from the above.

In Peſt-houſe row, in the pariſh of St. Luke, is an alms-houſe, founded by George Palyn, citizen and girdler, for ſix poor members of his company, and endowed with an eſtate of forty pounds a year, of which the company is truſtee.

Near this alms-houſe is a noble charity called

The FRENCH HOSPITAL.

This hoſpital was erected in the year 1717, and the governors by letters patent of the 4th of king George I. in 1718, were conſtituted a body politic and corporate, by the name of "The go-"vernor and directors of the hoſpital for the "poor French proteſtants, and their deſcendants "reſiding in Great Britain."

This hoſpital contains two hundred and twenty poor helpleſs men and women, one hundred and forty-ſix of whom are upon the foundation, and are plentifully ſupplied with all the neceſſaries of life, at the expence of the hoſpital; but the other ſeventy-four are paid for by their friends, at the rate of 9l. per annum each. This charity alſo extends to lunatics, for whoſe accommodation a large infirmary is provided.

To this foundation belong a chaplain, phyſician, ſurgeon, and other officers, who carefully attend the penſioners, and adminiſter to their ſeveral neceſſities.

In

In Peſt-houſe Fields is an houſe erected in 1672, by the viſcounteſs Lumley, for the accommodation of ſix poor women of Aldgate and Biſhopſgate pariſhes, with an allowance of four pounds, and twelve buſhels of coals per annum each.

In Peſt-houſe-lane is an alms-houſe founded in 1616, by Edward Alleyn, a comedian, for ten poor men and women, who receive ſix-pence a week each, and a coat and gown every other year.

In George-yard, Old-ſtreet, an alms-houſe was erected in 1655, by Suſan Amyas of London, widow, for the habitation of eight poor ſingle men or women, who are allowed, as a body, twenty ſhillings a year for water, and ſix pounds a year for coals. Each of them has a ſeparate allowance of four pounds a year; and twenty ſhillings a year are ſettled for one of the eight to read prayers every day.

Beſides theſe remarkables, there are, in the pariſh of St. Luke, three charity ſchools, one free-ſchool, and a work-houſe for the reception of the poor.

The next pariſh and church we come to is that of St. LEONARD, Shoreditch.

This church is thus denominated from its dedication to St. Leonard, biſhop of Leomeges in France, and its ſituation in the hamlet of Shoreditch.

There was a church in this place dedicated to the ſame ſaint in very early times, and there are records of a diſpute concerning it in the reign of Henry II. The laſt ſtructure, which was a very mean heavy pile, ſtood till the year 1735, when the inhabitants having the year before applied to parliament, it was pulled down, and the preſent light and elegant edifice was ſoon after erected in its ſtead.

To this church there is an aſcent by a double flight of plain ſteps, which lead to a portico of the angular kind ſupported by four Doric columns, and bearing an angular pediment. The body of the edifice is plain, but well enlightened, and the ſteeple light, elegant and lofty. The tower at a proper height has a ſeries of Ionic columns, and on their entablature are ſcrolls which ſupport as many Corinthian columns on pedeſtals, and ſupporting a dome, from whoſe crown riſes a ſeries of columns of the Compoſite order, on whoſe entablature reſts the ſpire ſtanding upon four balls, which give it an additional air of lightneſs, and on the top is a ball and fane.

This church is both a rectory and a vicarage; but the diſtinct rights of the rector and the vicar are ſaid to be not thoroughly aſcertained; however, the profits of the vicarage amount to about 350l. per annum.

The veſtry is occaſionally both ſelect and general: and the officers are, two churchwardens, ſix overſeers of the poor, four conſtables, eighteen headboroughs, ſix ſcavengers, four ſurveyors of the highways, and four beadles.

Among the various public buildings in this pariſh, one of the moſt remarkable is an hoſpital called

The Haberdaſhers Alms-houſes, or Aſke's Hoſpital.

This edifice was erected in 1692, by the company of Haberdaſhers, purſuant to the will of Robert Aſke, eſq; one of their members, who left thirty thouſand pounds for the building, and the relief of twenty poor members of the company of Haberdaſhers, beſides the maintenance and education of twenty boys, ſons of decayed freemen of the ſame company. The men who are all to be ſingle, have each an apartment of three rooms, with proper diet and firing, a gown once in two years, and three pounds per annum in money. The boys have alſo a ward to themſelves, with all neceſſaries: their maſter, who reads prayers twice a day in the chapel, has, beſides a houſe, 40l. per annum, which, together with the ſalaries of the clerk, butler, porter, and other domeſticks, amounts to about 800l. a year.

This building, which is of brick and ſtone, is four hundred feet long, with an ambulatory in front of three hundred and forty feet, under a piazza, elevated on ſtone columns of the Tuſcan order. In the middle of the building is a chapel, adorned with columns, entablature, and pediment of the Ionic order; and under the pediment is a niche, with a ſtatue of the founder cloathed in his gown, and holding in his hand a roll of parchment, which ſeems to be his laſt will. Under him is the following inſcription:

ROBERTO ASKE Armigero, hujus Hoſpitii Fundatiori, Socie. Haberda. B. M. P. C.

And on one ſide of him is this inſcription:

Anno Chriſti MDCLXXXII. Societas Haberdaſheorum de London hoc Hoſpitium condiderunt, ex Legato & Teſtamento Roberti Aſke Armigeri, ejusdam Societatis; ad viginti Senum Alimenta, & totidum Puerorum Educationem.

On the other ſide the following:

The worſhipful company of Haberdaſhers built this hoſpital, purſuant to the gift and truſt of R. Aſke, Eſq; a late worthy member of it, for the relief of twenty poor members, and for the education of twenty boys ſons of decayed freemen of that company

Fronting the entrance of the chapel is a large pair of very handſome iron gates, and at each end of the hoſpital is an edifice of the ſame height as the chapel.

In Kingſland road is a very handſome and beautiful ſchool built by ſubſcription, in the year 1722, in which there are apartments for a maſter and miſtreſs, who have 100 children under their care, viz. fifty boys and fifty girls, who are maintained by ſubſcription, are cloathed yearly, and have books provided for them.

Near

Near Hoxton are ſix alms-houſes, containing twelve rooms for the widows of twelve weavers, each of whom has 1l. per annum paid quarterly, and twenty-four buſhels of coals.

Near to theſe are twelve alms-houſes for 12 poor widows of Shoreditch pariſh, each of whom has 4l. per annum and one ſack of coals; founded by judge Fuller.

Alſo eight alms-houſes, where eight poor widows of this pariſh have five ſhillings per month and half a chaldron of coals yearly; founded and endowed by John Walter, citizen and draper of London.

Likewiſe ſix houſes for ſix poor men (or for men and their wives) of this pariſh, each of whom has 1l. a year; the gift of Allen Badger, eſq; anno 1698.

Northward from the above, in Hoxton town, are two alms-houſes built by Mr. Bearmore.

On the eaſt ſide of Kingſland road are twelve alms-houſes, given by Mr. Samuel Harwar, citizen and draper of London, built in the year 1713; in ſix of them the drapers company put in decayed freemen, or their wives, and the other ſix are filled up by the pariſh. Every one has a load of coals yearly, and 6s. per month paid by the drapers company.

Near to theſe, in the ſame road is a large handſome building called

JEFERIES's ALMS-HOUSE.

This edifice, which conſiſts of fourteen handſome well built houſes, and a chapel, was founded by Sir Robert Jefferies, knight and alderman, and Lord-mayor of London in 1686, who died in the month of February 1703. Theſe houſes were erected by the company of ironmongers in the year 1713, in each of which are four rooms and a cellar, ſo that they contain fifty-ſix poor people. He likewiſe left 15l. per annum to a miniſter to read prayers every day, and preach on Sundays. By the will of the donor, each of the poor people has 1l. 10s. per quarter, and ſomewhat more, paid by the ironmongers company, of which he was a member. No man is admitted under fifty-ſix years of age; and if married, his wife may cohabit with him, and be elected in his ſtead when he dies. The women are cloathed in blue, and the men have gowns with hanging ſleeves of the ſame colour. The donor's effigies is curiouſly carved, and placed in the front of the chapel.

In this pariſh there are likewiſe two charity-ſchools, and a large workhouſe for the poor.

Proceeding from Shoreditch church ſouthward, we traverſe Spital-fields, and the parts adjacent, the grand ſeat of the weaving trade and manufacture in all branches. In which we find the liberty of Norton Falgate, containing about two hundred houſes. It is extra-parochial, for the inhabitants maintain their own poor, and marry and bury where they pleaſe: but they generally make uſe of a chapel, built originally for them near Spital-yard, by Sir George Wheeler, prebendary of Durham.

Spital-fields was originally a hamlet belonging to the pariſh of St. Dunſtan, Stepney; but is now a pariſh ſo made by act of parliament in 1723. In which year the foundation of their church was laid, and in 1729 it was finiſhed, and dedicated to Our Saviour by the name of CHRIST CHURCH, Spital-fields.

This is one of the fifty new churches, built of ſtone, with a very high ſteeple, in which is a fine ring of bells. The body of the church is ſolid and well proportioned: it is ornamented with a Doric portico, to which there is a handſome aſcent by a flight of ſteps; and upon theſe the Doric order ariſes, ſupported on pedeſtals. The tower over theſe riſes with arched windows and niches, and on its diminiſhing for the ſteeple, is ſupported by the heads of the under corners, which form a kind of buttreſſes: from this part riſes the baſe of the ſpire, with an arcade; its corners are in the ſame manner ſupported with a kind of pyramidal buttreſſes ending in a point, and the ſpire is terminated by a vaſe and fane.

This church is made a rectory, but is not to be held in commendam. For the maintenance of the rector and his ſucceſſors, the parliament granted the ſum of 3000l. to be laid out in the purchaſe of lands and tenements in fee ſimple: beſides which proviſion the churchwardens are by that act appointed to pay him annually the ſum of 125l. to be raiſed by burial fees.

The veſtry conſiſts of thoſe who have ſerved or fined for overſeers of the poor; and the officers are, two churchwardens, twelve auditors of accounts, four overſeers, one ſideſman, one conſtable, nine headboroughs, one ſurveyor of the highways, four ſcavengers, two ſurveyors of the ſtreets, and one aleconner.

This pariſh enjoys the privilege of a market, which is of great reputation for all ſorts of proviſions. And here are two French and two Engliſh alms-houſes, two charity ſchools and a workhouſe for the poor.

At the north eaſt corner of Hare-ſtreet, Spital-fields is ſituate the pariſh church of St. MATTHEW, Bethnal-green.

This pariſh was formerly one of the hamlets of Stepney, from which it was ſeparated by an act of parliament in the 13th year of his late majeſty king George II. The church is a neat commodious edifice, built with brick coped and coined with free-ſtone; and the tower, which is not high, is of the ſame materials.

At Mile-end, in this pariſh is an hoſpital belonging to the corporation of Trinity-houſe. It was founded in 1695 for twenty-eight decayed or ancient ſeamen, who have been maſters or pilots of ſhips, and for their widows, each of whom receive 16s. the firſt Monday in every month, beſides 20s. a year for coals, and a gown every other year. This is a noble edifice, built of brick and ſtone, conſiſting of two wings, and containing twenty-eight apartments. In the centre, between the two wings, is a chapel, which riſes conſiderably higher than the other buildings.

Here is likewiſe a beautiful building, ſchool and chapel, called

BENCROFT's Alms-houſe.

Theſe were erected by the drapers company in the year 1735, purſuant to the will of Mr. Francis Bencroft, who bequeathed to that company upwards of twenty-eight thouſand pounds, for purchaſing a ſite, and building upon it an alms-houſe, with convenient apartments for twenty-four alms-men, a chapel and a ſchool room for one hundred poor boys, and two dwelling-houſes for two ſchool-maſters, and alſo for endowing the ſame; ſo that each alms-man ſhould have eight pounds, and half a chaldron of coals yearly, and a gown of baize every third year; that the ſchool-boys ſhould be cloathed, and taught reading, writing, and arithmetic; that each of the maſters ſhould have a ſalary of 30l. a year; and that both ſhould have the yearly ſum of 20l. for coals and candles for their own uſe, and that of the ſchool; together with a ſufficient allowance for books, paper, pens, and ink: every boy put out apprentice is entitled to four pounds, but only two pounds ten ſhillings if put out to ſervice.

This edifice is not only neat, but extremely elegant, conſiſting of two wings and a center detached from both of them. In the middle of the front is the chapel, before which is a noble portico, with Ionic columns, and coupled pilaſters at the corners, ſupporting a pediment, in the plane of which is the dial. There is an aſcent to the portico by a flight of ſteps, and over the chapel is a handſome turret. On each ſide of the portico are two houſes like thoſe in the wings. The conſtruction of the wings is uniform, lofty and convenient: twelve doors in each open in a regular ſeries, and the windows are of a moderate ſize, numerous, and proportioned to the apartments they are to enlighten. The ſquare is ſurrounded with gravel walks, with a large graſs-plot in the middle, and next the road the wall is adorned with handſome iron rails and gates.

It is remarkable that the above Mr. Francis Bencroft, who left ſo large a ſum for erecting and endowing this fine hoſpital, and even ordered two ſermons to be annually preached in commemoration of his charity, was one of the Lord-mayor's officers, and by informations and ſummoning the citizens before the Lord-mayor, upon the moſt trifling occaſions, and other things not belonging to his office, not only pillaged the poor, but alſo many of the rich, who rather than loſe time in appearing before that magiſtrate, gave money to get rid of this common peſt of the citizens, which together with his numerous quarterages from the brokers, &c. enabled him to amaſs annually a conſiderable ſum of money. But by theſe and other mercenary practices, he ſo incurred the hatred and ill-will of the citizens of all ranks and denominations, that the perſons who attended his funeral obſequies, with great difficulty ſaved his corpſe from being thrown off the bearers ſhoulders in the church by the enraged populace, who ſeizing the bells, rang them for joy at his unlamented death.

In this pariſh are alſo eight alms-houſes belonging to the drapers company, twelve belonging to the ſkinners company, twelve to the vintners company; and twelve others known by the name of Fuller's alms-houſes, from having been founded in 1592 by a judge of that name. In Dog-row, near Mile-end, is an alms-houſe built in 1711, by captain Fiſher, for the widows of ſix maſters of ſhips. And at Bethnal-green is an alms-houſe, founded by Mr. Bermeeter, for ſix poor women.

At the north eaſt extremity of this pariſh the bloody Bonner, biſhop of London, had a houſe, where he was wont to torture the proteſtants; which, though now converted into many dwelling houſes, retains the name of Bonner's-hall.

Proceeding to the ſouth eaſt from Spital-fields, we come to Whitechapel road, on the ſouth ſide of which, at the ſtones end ſtands the pariſh church of St. MARY, Whitechapel.

This church was originally erected as a chapel of eaſe to the church of St. Dunſtan, Stepney; and from its external appearance probably received the additional epithet of White. We read of this church ſo early as the year 1329, and the firſt chapel was probably of much greater antiquity.

The old church being in a very ruinous condition in 1673, it was taken down and rebuilt in the preſent form. It is a coarſe and very irregular building. The body, which is formed of brick, and ornamented with ſtone ruſtic work at the corners, is ninety-three feet in length, ſixty three in breadth, and the height of the tower and turret eighty feet. The principal door is adorned with a kind of ruſtic pilaſters, with cherubims heads by way of capitals, and a pediment above. The body has many windows, which are of various forms and different ſizes, a ſort of Venetian, oval and ſquare. The ſquare windows have ill-proportioned circular pediments, and the oval, or more properly elliptic windows, ſome of which ſtand upright, and others croſsways, are ſurrounded with thick feſtoons. The ſteeple, which is of ſtone, and appears to be a part of the old ſtructure, riſes above the principal door, and is crowned with a plain ſquare battlement, in the center of which riſes a ſmall turret with its dome and fane.

This church is a rectory, in the gift of the principal and ſcholars of King's-hall and Brazen-Noſe College, Oxford; and the incumbent's profits are ſaid to be worth 350l. per annum.

The veſtry is general; and the officers are, three churchwardens, ſix overſeers of the poor, one conſtable, ſixteen headboroughs, ten ſcavengers, two ſurveyors of the highways, and three beadles.

On the ſouth ſide of Whitechapel road, in this pariſh, and near a place called Whitechapel-mount, is a large and commodious brick building, erected by voluntary contributions, called

The LONDON INFIRMARY.

This hoſpital is ſupported by charitable contributions, for the relief of all ſick and diſeaſed perſons; ſons; and, in particular, manufacturers, ſeamen in the merchants ſervice, and their wives and children. It was inſtituted on the ſecond of November 1740, in a large houſe in Preſcot-ſtreet, Goodman's Fields, which is at preſent the Magdalen-houſe; but that becoming too ſmall for this extenſive charity, a new, more capacious and more commodious building, was erected by the voluntary contributions of ſeveral governors, in an airy ſituation, near the Mount in Whitechapel road.

This is a very neat brick building, contrived to be plain and yet elegant, without being very expenſive; and it conſiſting of one extended front, without either wings or inner courts, the whole is ſeen at one view. To the middle door is an aſcent by a flight of ſteps, and over this part extends a very large angular pediment, within which is a dial. Above the ground floor extend two ſeries, of each twenty-three ſaſh windows, their number and the length of the building giving it an air of dignity. The architect has properly conſidered the uſe for which it is deſigned, and has ſuited every thing to convenience. It is properly furniſhed, and fitted up with about one hundred and ſixty beds for the reception of the patients.

The ſociety for carrying on this laudale undertaking conſiſts of a preſident, two vice preſidents, and a treaſurer, annually elected out of the moſt conſiderable benefactors to this charity, and of ſuch perſons, who by giving a benefaction of thirty guineas or more at one time, become governors for life; and thoſe who ſubſcribe five guineas or more a year, are governors during ſuch ſubſcription.

A general court of governors is held in the months of March, June, September and December, to take the reports of the committees, elect a houſe committee for the enſuing quarter, inſpect accounts, and tranſact ſuch other buſineſs as may be then laid before them. The anniverſary feaſt of this charity is held between the firſt of February and the laſt day of April, when a printed account of the general ſtate of the hoſpital, the number of patients received and diſcharged, and an abſtract of the accounts for the year paſt is laid before them.

A houſe committee of thirteen governors is appointed at every general quarterly court, who at their firſt meeting elect a chairman to preſide for the firſt quarter, who meet at the hoſpital on Tueſdays weekly, at eleven in the forenoon, to receive and diſmiſs patients, to order and inſpect the proviſions and furniture ſent in, and ſuch neceſſaries that may be wanting, and to examine and regulate the conduct of the ſervants and patients, and other matters which come before them, according to the conſtitution of this charity. All governors that pleaſe to attend, have a vote at this committee, and their attendance is eſteemed a favour.

A committee of accounts, conſiſting of twelve governors, is appointed at the general quarterly court in June, for one year, who meet at the hoſpital once a quarter, to examine and audit tradeſmens bills, which are paid by the treaſurer within a fortnight after. The accounts are open at all times for the inſpection of the governors.

A phyſical committee conſiſting of the governors who practiſe phyſic, ſurgery, or pharmacy, or are converſant in the knowledge of drugs or medicines (excepting ſuch as ſhall be directly or indirectly concerned in ſerving the hoſpital with ſuch neceſſaries) are ſummoned by order of the houſe committee for the time being every firſt Thurſday in the month, and have power to order and inſpect the neceſſary drugs and medicines, and report their proceedings to the general quarterly court by their chairman.

Two governors are appointed viſitors by the houſe committee, for one fortnight to attend twice a week, or oftener, if they think proper, to inſpect into the management and conduct of the houſe, during the interval of the meetings of the houſe committee.

A clergyman of the church of England reads prayers every day, and preaches every Sunday, and reads prayers morning and afternoon; adminiſters the ſacrament regularly every month; and is ready to viſit, pray by, and adminiſter the ſacrament at all times when required, to the patients in the wards.

Three phyſicians attend alternately; two of the ſurgeons daily, from eleven o'clock till one, without fee or reward, and give their advice and aſſiſtance to all ſuch objects as come within thoſe hours, whether recommended or accidental. A ſurgeon extraordinary attends in conſultation, in all dangerous caſes. The ſurgeons in waiting have an apprentice, or pupil, conſtantly in the houſe, to receive, and, if neceſſary, to call the ſurgeon to ſuch accidents as ſhall be brought in at any hour of the day or night.

An apothecary (with an aſſiſtant) conſtantly reſides at the hoſpital, who compounds and diſpenſes all medicines uſed here, and ſolely attends the buſineſs thereof.

A ſteward (for whoſe fidelity proper ſecurity is given) has the charge of the houſe and furniture, keeps and account of every thing brought to or expended in the houſe, and ſubjects the ſame to the examination of the viſitors and houſe committee, and has the inſpection likewiſe of the conduct of all the men-ſervants. Two matrons have the direction of the nurſes and other women-ſervants, and ſee the diet and medicines adminiſtered according to order. Under them are nurſes and watchers, in proportion to the number of patients, who are guided by written orders, to prevent any miſconduct. Proper diet for the patients has been ſettled by the phyſicians and ſurgeons engaged in this charity, and is fixed up in the wards for the ſatisfaction of the patients and their friends.

No officers or ſervants are permitted, upon pain of expulſion, to take of any tradeſmen, patients, or other perſons, any fee, reward, or gratuity of any kind, directly or indirectly, for any ſervice done, or to be done, on account of this hoſpital.

Every governor is entitled to ſend one in-patient at a time, and out-patients without limitation. Subſcribers of ſmaller ſums may likewiſe ſend what what number of out-patients they pleaſe. All ſubſcriptions are during pleaſure, and any ſmall ſums from well-diſpoſed perſons will be thankfully received; but in order to carry on this undertaking, all perſons are deſired to pay their ſubſcription at the time of ſubſcribing.

The poor objects recommended as in-patients, if there are beds empty, are received at any hour without difficulty or expence, and are ſupplied with advice, medicine, diet, waſhing, lodging, and every comfortable aſſiſtance during their cure: nor is any ſecurity required againſt future contingencies, they being, in caſe of death, buried at the the expence of the charity, if not removed by their friends. All out-patients have advice and medicines adminiſtered from eleven till one.

All accidents, whether recommended or not, are received at any hour of the day or night.

This is the plan of this noble charity; and ſuch has been the extraordinary encouragement given to it, that from the third of November 1740, to the firſt of January 1759, the ſums generouſly contributed to its ſupport amounted to ſeventy-nine thouſand one hundred and fifty-three pounds, a great part of which is laid out in government ſecurities. But what is ſtill more extraordinary, one hundred and thirty-ſeven thouſand two hundred and fifty-two diſtreſſed objects have been relieved at this hoſpital; and from labouring under the oppreſſion of ſome of the moſt malignant diſeaſes and unhappy accidents, have been reinſtated in their honeſt and induſtrious capacities of working; and, ſo far as our obſervation reaches, their morals much amended, whereby the public again enjoy the benefit of their labour, and they, and their families, are preſerved from periſhing, and prevented from being an incumbrance to the community. And, notwithſtanding the great number of objects relieved by this charity, it has not leſſened the number of patients relieved by other hoſpitals.

The ſubſcribers are deſired to take notice, that if any patients do not conform to the rules of the houſe, or are guilty of any miſbehaviour, they will be diſcharged, and never more relieved by this charity: and not to ſend any patient unable to walk, till they are firſt aſſured of room in the houſe; and when they recommend an in-patient, whoſe ſettlement is in the country, it is further requeſted, that they will ſatisfy the houſe committee concerning the removal of ſuch patient, when cured, or judged incurable.

"No perſons of known ability to pay for their "cure, are allowed to partake of this charity; "nor any with infectious diſtempers, or deemed "incurable by the phyſicians and ſurgeons, or "any in conſumptive or aſthmatic condition, are "admitted into this houſe, being more capable "of relief as out-patients."

The patients, being admitted without any expence, are required to be conſtant in their attendance on the phyſicians or ſurgeons at the hoſpital, before eleven o'clock; and at nine o'clock, to return thanks at the chapel, and at the weekly committee next after their cure; and thoſe only who attend their cure, and return thanks, will receive a certificate thereof, which will entitle them to future relief.

On the ſouth ſide of Whitechapel are ſix almshouſes, containing twelve rooms for as many poor widows of this pariſh, each of whom has 5l. 4s. per annum and a chaldron of coals, founded by William Meggs, eſq; which having become ruinous have lately been rebuilt by Mr. Goodwin, late of this pariſh.

In Whitechapel-road is a court, called his majeſty's court of record for the manor of Stepney, for the trial of debts under 5l. contracted within the ſaid manor. Here is alſo a priſon for debtors, called Whitechapel priſon. Likewiſe two free ſchools in one houſe, erected at the proper coſts and charges of Ralph Davenant, rector of this pariſh.

Proceeding to the ſouth from Whitechapel-road, we find, on the north ſide of the Thames, the pariſh and church of

St. ANNE, Limehouſe.

This is one of the fifty new churches appointed by act of parliament to be built within the bills of mortality. The foundation was laid in the year 1712, but it was not finiſhed till 1729. It is of a very ſingular conſtruction; the body is not one plain building, but is continued under ſeparate portions. The door under the tower has a portico, covered with a dome ſupported by pilaſters, and to this door there is an aſcent by a flight of ſteps. The tower, which is ſquare, has a Corinthian window adorned with columns and pilaſters. The corners of the tower are alſo ſtrengthened by pilaſters, which on their tops ſupport vaſes. The upper ſtage of the tower is plain, and extremely heavy, and from this part riſes a turret at each corner, and a more lofty one in the middle.

This church is a rectory, the pariſh of which was taken out of St. Dunſtan, Stepney, and like that is in the gift of Brazen-noſe college, Oxford. It is valued at 60l. to be paid annually to the rector by the churchwardens, and the produce of 3500l. given by parliament to puchaſe an eſtate in fee ſimple.

The veſtry conſiſts of ſuch only as pay two ſhillings per month to the poor; and the officers are, two churchwardens, two overſeers of the poor, one conſtable, four headboroughs, two ſcavengers, two ſurveyors of the highways, and one beadle.

Adjoining to this pariſh is the hamlet of Poplar and Blackwall, which form a ſtreet upwards of a mile in length, inhabited by ſeafaring people, and ſuch as are concerned in ſhip-building. About the middle of Poplar, on the north ſide, is a ſet of alms-houſes founded for widows of ſeamen in the India ſervice; adjoining to which is a large chapel of eaſe to this part of the pariſh of St. Dunſtan, Stepney (of which hereafter.) Blackwall is remarkable for the mooring of Indiamen at the ſtairs; and for a conſiderable ſhip-yard, where many Eaſt-Indiamen are both laid up and built.

Proceeding weſtward from St. Anne's, Limehouſe, we come to Ratcliff-croſs, near which, in Broad-

Broad-ſtreet, is a ſchool, alſo a ſet of alms-houſes, with a chapel, founded by Nicholas Gibſon in 1537, and left in truſt to the coopers company, with a conſiderable eſtate for their ſupport: and at the north-weſt angle of School-houſe-lane, in Brook-ſtreet, is a noted quakers meeting.

Adjoining to Ratcliffe, on the weſt end is the pariſh and church of St. PAUL, Shadwell.

This church, which is a rectory, ſituate on the ſouth ſide of Upper Shadwell, owes its name to its being dedicated to St. Paul the Apoſtle, and its ſituation; the advowſon whereof is in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's.

Shadwell, though now joined to London, was anciently a hamlet belonging to Stepney; but being greatly increaſed in the number of its inhabitants, Thomas Neale, eſq; erected the preſent church in the year 1656 for their accommodation; and in 1669 this diſtrict was by act of parliament conſtituted a diſtinct pariſh from that of Stepney, and 120l. per annum was granted for the maintenance of the rector in lieu of tythes, beſides a conſiderable glebe, oblations and church dues, which, together, are ſuppoſed to make the value of the living upwards of 300l. per annum.

The church, which is but a mean edifice built with brick, is eighty-ſeven feet long, and ſixty-three broad; the height to the roof is twenty-eight feet, and that of the ſteeple ſixty. The body has a few windows with ruſtic arches, and ſome very mean ones in the roof. At the corners of the building are balls placed on a kind of ſmall pedeſtals. The tower is carried up without ornament, and is terminated with balls at the corners in the ſame manner as the body of the church, and is crowned with a plain low turret.

The veſtry is general; and the officers are, two churchwardens, four collectors for the poor, one conſtable, ſeven headboroughs, two ſcavengers, and two beadles.

This pariſh, which is one of the Tower Hamlets, received the name of Shadwell from a ſpring or well which at this time lies buried under a pillar near the ſouth weſt corner of the church, within the church-yard. And the ſouth part of the pariſh, denominated Lower Shadwell, being antiently part of Wapping Marſh, it was within the courſe of the river Thames, till the ſame was embanked.

The ſtreets in this pariſh, called Old and New Gravel-lanes, were ſo denominated from their being antiently ways wherein carts laden with gravel from the neighbouring fields uſed to paſs to the river Thames, where it was uſed in ballaſting ſhips, before ballaſt was taken out of the ſaid river.

In the north eaſt part of this pariſh (now called Sun Tavern fields) a Roman cemetry was diſcovered about the year 1615, wherein were found two coffins; one whereof, being of ſtone, contained the bones of a man; and the other of lead, beautifully embelliſhed with ſcollop ſhells and a crotiſter border, contained thoſe of a woman, at whoſe head and feet were placed two urns of the height of three feet each; and at the ſides divers beautiful red earthen bottles. with a number of lachrymatories of Hexagon and Octagon forms: and on each ſide of the inhumed bones were depoſited two ivory ſcepters of the length of eighteen inches each; and upon the breaſt the figure of a ſmall cupid curiouſly wrought, as were likewiſe two pieces of jet, reſembling nails, of the length of two inches.

The perſon here interred, according to the opinion of that judicious antiquary Sir Robert Cotton, who made the diſcovery, muſt have been the conſort of ſome prince or Roman pretor, by the decorations of the coffin, and things therein contained.

At the ſame time were likewiſe diſcovered a great number of urns, with Roman coin, which on one ſide had this inſcription, Imp. Pupienus Maximus P. F. and on the reverſe, with hands conjoined, Patrus Senatus.

The remarkables in this pariſh at preſent are, the church, a preſbyterian meeting-houſe, two charity ſchools, an alms-houſe, a market, a dock for ſhip building, and a work-houſe for the reception of the poor.

More to the weſt from this pariſh, on the eaſt ſide of Canon-ſtreet, ſtands the parochial church of St. GEORGE in the Eaſt.

This is one of the fifty new churches appointed to be built by act of parliament in the reign of queen Anne, the foundation of which was laid in 1715, and the ſtructure finiſhed four years after.

This is a maſſy ſtructure, erected in a very ſingular taſte. The floor is raiſed a conſiderable height above the level of the ground; and to the principal door, which is in the weſt front of the tower, is an aſcent by a double flight of ſteps, cut with a ſweep, and defended by a low wall of the ſame form; but the moſt remarkable thing is, there are two turrets over the body of the church, and one on the tower, which laſt is in the manner of a fortification, with a ſtaff on the top for an occaſional flag.

This pariſh is taken out of that of Stepney; and by act of parliament the hamlet of Wapping Stepney is appropriated to that purpoſe, and in all reſpects rendered independent of Stepney pariſh. Towards the maintenance of the rector and his ſucceſſors the parliament gave the ſum of 3000l. to be laid out in the purchaſe of lands, tenements, &c. in fee ſimple; and as a farther proviſion, the churchwardens are annually to pay him the ſum of 100l. to be raiſed by burial fees. The advowſon of this rectory, like that of Stepney, is in the principal and ſcholars of King's hall, and Brazen-Noſe College, Oxford.

The veſtry conſiſts of ſuch as pay two ſhillings per month to the poor; and the officers are, two churchwardens, four overſeers of the poor, one conſtable, twelve headboroughs, four ſcavengers, two ſurveyors of the highways, and two beadles.

In this pariſh we find a turnpike at the north end of Canon-ſtreet; two ſquares, in one of which is a Swedes church, and in the other a Danes church; two meeting houſes of the anabaptiſt baptiſt perſuaſion; and a noble foundation for poor boys and girls by Mr. Raine, brewer; it is ſituate in Fowden-fields, Old Gravel-lane for 50 boys and 50 girls. And the ſame gentleman in 1737, alſo founded an hoſpital near to the ſaid ſchool, and erected a handſome commodious brick building for 48 girls, to be taken out of the ſaid ſchool to be kept to work, &c. till fit for ſervice; and 10l. to be given every May-day to portion one of thoſe girls, choſen by lot, to be married at that time.

From hence, croſſing Old Gravel-lane, we come to the pariſh church of St. JOHN, Wapping.

The old church was built in the year 1617, when the increaſe of houſes in the pariſh of St. Mary Whitechapel rendered ſuch an edifice neceſſary. It was dedicated to St. John the Baptiſt, and as there were other churches under the patronage of the ſame ſaint, it was diſtinguiſhed, from its ſituation, by the name of Wapping. Originally it was no more than a chapel of eaſe to St. Mary's pariſh; but in 1694 the hamlet of Wapping was conſtituted a diſtinct pariſh; the inhabitants were empowered to purchaſe 30l. per annum in mortmain, and as a farther proviſion for the rector, he was allowed to receive all eccleſiaſtical dues, except tithes, inſtead of which the rector has 130l. a year raiſed upon the inhabitants by an equal pound rate.

From the ruinated ſituation of this church, a new one has been very lately erected in its ſtead. It is a neat brick building, and conſiſts only of a plain body, with a tower, from which riſes a fane.

The advowſon is in the principal and ſcholars of King's Hall, and Brazen Noſe College, Oxford.

The veſtry is neither ſelect nor general, all being admitted who have either ſerved or fined for offices. The officers are, two churchwardens, four overſeers of the poor, one conſtable, ſeven headboroughs, four ſcavengers and one beadle.

The ſite of this pariſh, together with the parts adjoining, were antiently within the flux of the river Thames; but when, or by whom they were at firſt embanked is unknown. By frequent inundations of the river Thames, its banks in theſe parts became great ſufferers; for about the year 1565 divers breaches were made therein, which were no ſooner repaired, than another happened in the year 1571; when the commiſſioners of ſewers, after viewing the ſame, were of opinion, that the moſt effectual way to ſecure the bank of the river in thoſe parts, would be to erect houſes thereon: to which end ground was taken, and the firſt foundations of houſes laid where Wapping at preſent is ſituate.

In this pariſh is Execution Dock, ſo called from its being the place where pirates and others who have committed capital crimes at ſea, are executed on a gallows which leans over the water.

In Cock-alley, near the church, is a charity-ſchool for forty boys, who have learning and cloaths by ſubſcription.

Near the ſame alley is a ſchool for twenty girls.

Six poor children of this pariſh are educated at the free-ſchool erected in the pariſh of Allhallows Barkin; purſuant to the will of alderman Hickſon, bearing date the 16th of February 1686.

Proceeding from hence through the Hermitage, we come to the pariſh church of St. CATHARINE.

This church, which is ſituate on the eaſt ſide of St. Catharine's-court near the Tower, was originally an hoſpital, founded by Matilda conſort to king Stephen, and was farther endowed by queen Eleanor, the relict of Henry III. Queen Eleanor conſort to Edward I. and king Henry VI. who not only confirmed all the former grants, and added ſeveral additional ones, but gave an ample charter to this hoſpital. It was exempt from the juriſdiction of the biſhop of London, till its ſuppreſſion by Henry VIII. ſoon after which king Edward VI. annexed it to the dioceſe of London. The church, which is a very antique building, is at preſent collegiate, and has a maſter and three brethren, who have 40l. each; three ſiſters who have 20l. and ten beads-women who have 8l. per annum each; but the other profits ariſing from their eſtates, being only known to the maſter and brethren, are divided amongſt them.

Having now gone through and deſcribed the ſeveral pariſhes and churches, &c. of the cities of London and Weſtminſter, Borough of Southwark, and their reſpective liberties, we ſhall now ſubjoin a liſt of their chapels, together with thoſe in all other parts within the bill of mortality belonging to the eſtabliſhed church; likewiſe the number of all the meeting-houſes of the ſeveral denominations, both domeſtic and foreign, within the ſaid diſtrict.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Containing an account of the principal towns and villages within that circumference of the city of London called the Bill of Mortality; with an ample deſcription of the public buildings, and other remarkables contained in each reſpective place.

As theſe towns and villages are diſperſed in various parts round this vaſt metropolis, we ſhall, for the ſake of uniformity, digeſt them in alphabetical order. To effect which we begin with the village of

BATTERSEA.

THIS village is ſituate on the river Thames, about four miles from London, and the ſame diſtance from Richmond. The gardens about this ſpot are remarkable for producing the fineſt aſparagus. It gave the title of baron to the late lord viſcount St. John, who had a ſeat here, which is a plain old building. And in this place Sir Walter St. John founded a free ſchool for twenty boys.

BOW.

BOW.

This village is ſituate a little to the eaſt of Mile-end, and is likewiſe called Stratford le Bow. It received the name of Bow from the ſtone arches of its bridge built over the river Lea, by Maud wife of Henry I. The church built by Henry II. was originally a chapel of eaſe to Stepney, but was lately made parochial.

This village is inhabited by many whitſters and ſcarlet dyers, and here has been ſet up within theſe few years a large manufactory of porcelain, which is brought to ſuch perfection as to be very little inferior to that of China.

Here is an annual fair held on Thurſday, Friday and Saturday, in Whitſun week, for toys, &c.

BRENTFORD.

This town, which is ſituate about eight miles from London, received its name from a brook called Brent, which runs through the weſt part of the town, named Old Brentford, into the Thames. As it is a great thoroughfare to the weſt, it has a conſiderable trade, particularly in corn, which is brought both by land and water. The church and market houſe ſtands in that part of the town called New Brentford. It has alſo two charity ſchools, though the church, which has been lately new built, is only a chapel to Great Eling. That part of it called Old Brentford is ſituate upon a fine riſing bank cloſe to the Thames, directly oppoſite to which, on the other ſide the river is Kew Green, which from hence appears to great advantage.

BROMLEY.

In this village, which is ſituate near Bow, was formerly a monaſtery. The great houſe here was built by Sir John Jacob, bart. commiſſioner of the cuſtoms at the reſtoration, and afterwards became the ſeat of Sir William Benſon, ſheriff of London in the reign of queen Anne, the father to William Benſon, eſq; auditor of the impreſt, who ſome years ago ſold it, with the manor and rectory, to Mr. Lloyd, a gentleman of Wales.

CHARLTON.

This village, which is very pleaſant and well built, is ſituate near Blackheath, and is remarkable for a fair held annually in its neighbourhood on St. Luke's day. It is called Horn Fair, and there are ſold at it ram's horns, horn toys, and wares of all ſorts. Of the origin of this fair tradition gives us the following account. King John having a palace at Eltham, and being hunting near Charlton, then a mean hamlet, was ſeparated from his attendants; when entering a cottage he admired the beauty of the miſtreſs, whom he found alone, and debauched: her huſband, however, ſuddenly returning, caught them in the fact, and threatening to kill them both, the king was forced to diſcover himſelf, and to purchaſe his ſafety with gold, beſides which he gave him all the land from thence as far as the place now called Cuckold's Point, and alſo beſtowing on him the whole hamlet, eſtabliſhed a fair, as a condition of his holding his new demeſne, in which horns were both to be ſold and worn. A ſermon is preached on the fair day in the church, which is one of the handſomeſt in the county, and was repaired by Sir Edward Newton, bart. to whom king James I. granted this manor. This gentleman built his houſe at the entrance of the village. It is a long Gothic ſtructure, with four turrets on the top; it has a ſpacious court-yard in the front, with two large Gothic piers to the gates, and on the outſide of the wall is a long row of ſome of the oldeſt cypreſs trees in England. Behind the houſe are large gardens, adjoining to which is a ſmall but neat park. This houſe now belongs to the earl of Egmont.

On the edge of the hill, and at a ſmall diſtance from the church, are two fine houſes, one of which was in the poſſeſſion of the late governor Hunter, and the other was erected by the late lord Romney.

CHELSEA.

This is a very large and populous village, ſituate on the banks of the Thames, about a mile to the weſtward of St. James's park.

In this village there is a beautiful edifice for the reception of old ſoldiers and invalids in the land ſervice, called CHELSEA HOSPITAL, the ROYAL HOSPITAL, and ſometimes CHELSEA COLLEGE.

The original building on this ſpot was a college founded by Dr. Sutkliff, dean of Exeter, in the reign of king James I. for the ſtudy of Polemic divinity, and was endowed in order to ſupport a provoſt and fellows, for the inſtruction of youth in that branch of learning. The king, who laid the firſt ſtone, gave many of the materials, and promoted the work by a large ſum of money, and the clergy were very liberal upon the ſame occaſion; but the ſum ſettled upon the foundation by Dr. Sutkliff being far unequal to the end propoſed, the reſt was left to private contributions; and theſe coming in ſlowly, the work was ſtopped before it was finiſhed, and therefore ſoon fell to ruin. At length the ground on which the old college was erected, becoming eſcheated to the crown, Charles II. began to erect the preſent hoſpital, which was carried on by James II. and completed by William and Mary.

The whole edifice, which was built by the great Sir Chriſtopher Wren, conſiſts of a vaſt range of buildings. The front toward the north opens into a piece of ground laid out in walks for the penſioners; and that facing the ſouth, into a garden which extends to the Thames, and is kept in good order. This ſide affords not only a view of that fine river, but of the county of Surry beyond it. In the center of this edifice is a pediment ſupported by four columns, over which is a handſome turret, and through this part is an opening which leads through the building. On one ſide of this entrance is the chapel, the furniture and plate of which was given by king James I. and on the other ſide is the hall, where all the penſioners dine in common, the officers by by themſelves. In this hall is the picture of king Charles II. on horſeback, with ſeveral other pieces as big as the life, deſigned by Signior Vario, and finiſhed by Mr. Cook. Theſe were preſented by the earl of Ranelagh. The pavement of both the chapel and hall are black and white marble. The altar-piece in the chapel is the reſurrection, painted by Sebaſtian Ricci.

The wings, which extend eaſt and weſt, join the chapel and hall to the north, and are open towards the Thames, on the ſouth: theſe are near three hundred and ſixty feet in length, and about eighty in breadth; they are three ſtories high, and the rooms are ſo well diſpoſed, and the air ſo happily thrown in by means of the open ſpaces, that nothing can be more pleaſant. On the front of this ſquare is a colonade extending along the ſide of the hall and chapel, over which, upon the cornice, is the following inſcription in capitals:

In ſubſidium et levamen emeritorum ſenio, belloque fractorum, condidit CAROLUS II. Auxit JACOBUS II. Perfecere GULIELMUS et MARIA, Rex et Regina, MDCXC.

And in the midſt of the quadrangle is the ſtatue of king Charles II. in the ancient Roman dreſs, ſomewhat bigger than the life, ſtanding upon a marble pedeſtal. This was given by Mr. Tobias Ruſtat, and is ſaid to have coſt him five hundred pounds.

There are ſeveral other buildings adjoining, that form two other large ſquares, and conſiſt of apartments for the officers and ſervants of the houſe; for old maimed officers of horſe and foot, and the infirmary for the ſick.

An air of neatneſs and elegance is obſervable in all theſe buildings. They are compoſed of brick and ſtone, and which way ſoever they are viewed, there appears ſuch a diſpoſition of the parts as is beſt ſuited to the purpoſes of the charity, the reception of a great number, and the providing them with every thing that can contribute to the convenience and pleaſure of the penſioners.

Chelſea Hoſpital is more particularly remarkable for its great regularity and proper ſubordination of parts, which is very apparent in the north front. The middle is very principal, and the tranſition from thence to the extremities, is very eaſy and delightful.

The expence of erecting theſe buildings is computed to amount to one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, and the extent of the ground is above forty acres.

In the wings are ſixteen wards, in which are accommodations for above four hundred men, and there are beſides in the other buildings, a conſiderable number of apartments for officers and ſervants.

Theſe penſioners conſiſt of ſuperannuated veterans, who have been at leaſt twenty years in the army; or thoſe ſoldiers who are diſabled in the ſervice of the crown. They wear red coats lined with blue, and are provided with all other cloaths, diet, waſhing and lodging. The governor has five hundred pounds a year; the lieutenant-governor two hundred and fifty pounds; and the major one hundred and fifty pounds. Thirty-ſix officers are allowed ſix-pence a day; thirty-four light horſemen, and thirty ſerjeants, have two ſhillings a week each; forty-eight corporals and drums have ten-pence per week; and three hundred and thirty-ſix private men, are each allowed eight-pence a week. As the houſe is called a garriſon, all the members are obliged to do duty in their reſpective turns; and they have prayers twice a day in the chapel, performed by two chaplains, who have each a ſalary of one hundred pounds a year. The phyſician, ſecretary, comptroller, deputy treaſurer, ſteward, and ſurgeon, have alſo each one hundred pounds per annum, and many other officers have conſiderable ſalaries. As to the out-penſioners, who amount to between eight and nine thouſand, they have each ſeven pounds twelve ſhillings and ſix-pence a year.

Theſe great expences are ſupported by a poundage deducted out of the pay of the army, with one day's pay once a year from each officer and common ſoldier; and when there is any deficiency, it is ſupplied by a ſum raiſed by parliament. This hoſpital is governed by the following commiſſioners; the preſident of the council, the firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, the principal ſecretary of ſtate, the paymaſter general of the forces, the ſecretary at war, the comptrollers of the army, and by the governor and lieutenant governor of the hoſpital.

Beſides this hoſpital, there is at Chelſea, a phyſic-garden belonging to the apothecaries company. It contains almoſt four acres, and is enriched with a vaſt variety of plants, both domeſtic and exotic. This garden was given to the apothecaries company by Sir Hans Sloane, bart. on condition of their paying a quit-rent of five pounds a year, and delivering annually to the preſident and fellows of the Royal Society, at one of their public meetings, fifty ſpecimens of different ſorts of plants, well cured, and of the growth of this garden, till the number of ſpecimens amount to two thouſand.

In this village is alſo a celebrated place of public reſort, called RANELAGH GARDENS, from their formerly belonging to the earl of Ranelagh. This is one of thoſe public places of pleaſure, which is not to be equalled in Europe, and is the reſort of people of the firſt quality. Though its gardens are beautiful, it is more to be admired for the amphitheatre. This is a circular building, the external diameter is one hundred and eighty-five feet: round the whole is an arcade, and over that a gallery with a baluſtrade (to admit the company into the upper boxes) except where the entrances break the continuity. Over this are the windows, and it terminates with the roof. The internal diameter is one hundred and fifty feet, and the architecture of the inſide correſponds with the outſide, except that over every column, between the windows, termini ſupport the roof. In the middle of the area, where the orcheſtra was at firſt deſigned, is a chimney having four faces. This makes it warm and comfortable in bad weather. The orcheſtra fills up the place of one of the entrances. The entertainment consists of a fine band of music, with an organ, accompanied by the best voices. The regale is tea and coffee.

In this village likewise is a useful engine called CHELSEA WATERWORKS, the management of which is invested in a society, who were incorporated by act of parliament in the year 1722, by the name of "The governor and company of "the Chelsea waterworks." They have a common seal, and power to purchase lands, &c. in mortmain to the value of 1000l. per annum, with a right to alienate and dispose of the same as they shall think proper. The works are divided into two thousand shares; and a governor, deputy-governor, and thirteen directors are appointed to conduct the business of the company.

CHESWICK.

In this village which is situate on the north bank of the Thames, about four miles from London, are two manors, one belonging to the prebendary of Cheswick in St. Paul's cathedral, and the other called the dean's manor, from belonging to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's.

The most remarkable building in this place is the house of the late earl of Burlington, which was originally very plain but commodious, with good offices about it; but a part of the old edifice being some years ago destroyed by fire, his lordship erected near it a beautiful villa, which, for elegance of taste, surpasses every thing of its kind. The court in the front, which is of a proportionable size with the building, is very neatly gravelled. On each side are yew hedges in pannels, with termini placed at a proper distance; and in the front of these hedges are two rows of cedars of Libanus, which at a small distance have a fine effect. The ascent to the house is by a noble flight of steps, on one side of which is the statue of Palladio, and on the other that of Inigo Jones. The portico is supported by six fine fluted columns of the Corinthian order, with a pediment; and the cornice, frize and architrave are very elegant.

Though the other front towards the garden is plainer, yet it is in a very bold, noble and masterly stile, and has at the same time a pleasing simplicity, as hath also the side front towards the Serpentine river, which is different from the other two. The inside of this structure is finished with the utmost elegance; the ceilings are richly gilt and painted, and the rooms adorned with the following pictures executed by the best masters.

Having thus deſcribed the paintings within this beautiful ſtructure, we ſhall now proceed to the gardens, which are laid out in the moſt elegant taſte.

On deſcending from the back part of the houſe, you enter a verdant lawn planted with clumps of evergreen, between which are two rows of large ſtone vaſes. At each end next the houſe are two wolves in ſtone, done by that celebrated ſtatuary Scheemaker. At the farther end are two large lions, and the view is terminated by three fine antique ſtatues, dug up in Adrian's garden at Rome, with ſtone ſeats between them.

On the right hand, turning to the houſe, is an open grove of trees, which affords a view of the orangery, that is ſeen as perfectly as if the trees were planted on the lawn; and when they are in flower their fragrance is diffuſed over the whole place, even to the houſe.

Leaving the houſe to the left, an eaſy ſlope covered with ſhort graſs takes you down to the ſerpentine river, on the ſide whereof are clumps of evergreens, with agreeable breaks, between which the water is ſeen; and at the farther end is an opening into an incloſure, where are a Roman temple, and an obeliſk, with graſs ſlopes, and in the middle a circular piece of water.

You are led from hence to the wilderneſs, through which are three ſtrait avenues terminated by three different edifices; and within the quarters are ſerpentine walks, through which you may ramble near a mile in the ſhade. On each ſide the ſerpentine river are verdant walks, which accompany the river in all its turnings. On the right hand of this river is a building that is the exact model of the portico of the church of Covent Garden; on the left is a wilderneſs laid out in regular walks, and in the middle, acroſs the river, is a Palladian wooden bridge.

Beſides this beautiful building, there are ſeveral other very elegant ſeats in this village; as the earl of Shrewſbury's, the earl of Grantham's, now colonel Elliot's, and the late lord Wilmington's, &c. Here is likewiſe a very good charity ſchool.

DULWICH.

This is a very pleaſant village, ſituate about five miles from London, where there is a ſpring of exceeding good mineral water, which principally ſupplies this city, and in particular St. Bartholomew's hoſpital.

Oppoſite the Green Man, a noted houſe for entertainment, is a fine aſcending walk through the woods, which affords from its top a very noble proſpect; but this is much exceeded by a hill behind the houſe, where from under a tree diſtinguiſhed by the name of "The Oak of Ho-" nour," you have a view as in a fine piece of painting, of the houſes as well as churches, and other public edifices, from Putney down to Chelſea, with all the adjacent villages, together with Weſtminſter, London, Deptford, Greenwich, &c.

The principal building in this village is the college, the foundation and preſent ſtate of which the reader will find in p. 222. The original edifice is in the old taſte; but part of it has been lately pulled down and rebuilt with greater elegance. The maſter's rooms are richly adorned with very noble old furniture, which he is obliged to purchaſe on his entering into that ſtation; and for his uſe there is a library, to which every maſter adds a number of books. The college is alſo accommodated with a very pleaſant garden, adorned with walks, and a great number of flowers and fruit-trees.

ELTHAM.

In this town, which is ſituate about ſeven miles from London, in the county of Kent, was a palace built by Anthony Beck, biſhop of Durham, who beſtowed it upon queen Eleanor, the wife of Edward I. King Edward II. conſtantly reſided in this place, and his ſon being born here, was on that account called John of Eltham. The palace was afterwards much enlarged by the ſucceeding kings, who when the court was kept at Greenwich often retired hither; and here were made the ſtatutes of Eltham, by which the king's houſe is ſtill governed. At this time, however, there are no traces of the palace left. The town has the honour of giving the title of earl to the prince of Wales; and there are here ſeveral houſes belonging to wealthy citizens, and two charity ſchools.

FULHAM.

This village is ſituate on the banks of the Thames, about four miles from London. The Danes encamped here in the year 879, and the place was held of the king by the canons of St. Paul's in the time of William the Conqueror. It is now only remarkable for ſeveral gentlemen's ſeats, beſides a palace of the biſhop of London, who uſes it in ſummer; and for a wooden bridge over the Thames to Putney, where toll is not only taken for horſes and carriages, but likewiſe for foot paſſengers.

HACKNEY.

This is a very large and populous village, ſituate on the north-eaſt ſide of London. The pariſh has ſeveral hamlets belonging to it, among which are Clapton on the north, Dorleſton and Shacklewell on the weſt, and Hummerton on the eaſt.

The church belonging to this village was a diſtinct rectory and vicarage in the year 1292, and dedicated to St. Auguſtine; but the knights templars having obtained a mill and other poſſeſſions in the pariſh, they were, upon the ſuppreſſion of their order, granted to the knights templars of St. John of Jeruſalem, from whom the church is ſuppoſed to have received the preſent appellation of St. John. However, it was not preſented to by that name till after the year 1660. It is in the gift of Mr. Tyſon, lord of the manor, but in eccleſiaſtical affairs is ſubject to the biſhop of London. The veſtry, which is ſelect, conſiſts of thirty-ſeven members; and the officers are, two churchwardens, two overſeers of the poor, three conſtables, ten headboroughs, two ſurveyors of the highways, and one beadle.

This village being anciently celebrated for the numerous ſeats of the nobility and gentry, occaſioned a great reſort thither of perſons of all conditions from the city of London; whereby ſo great a number of horſes were daily hired in the city on that account, that at length all horſes to be let received the common appellation of Hackney horſes; which denomination has ſince communicated itſelf both to public coaches and chairs. And though this place is deſerted by the nobility, yet it ſo greatly abounds with merchants and other perſons of diſtinction, that it excels all other other villages in the kingdom in the riches and opulency of its inhabitants, as may be judged from the great number of perſons who keep carriages therein.

In this village are two meeting houſes, viz. a preſbyterian meeting near the church, and an independent meeting in Mare-ſtreet; beſides a preſbyterian meeting houſe at Clapton. Here are alſo ſix boarding ſchools, a free ſchool, a charity ſchool, and ſeveral alms-houſes.

At the bottom of Hackney Marſh there have been diſcovered within theſe few years the remains of a great ſtone cauſeway, which, by the coins found there, appears to have been one of the famous highways made by the Romans.

HAMPSTEAD.

This village is ſituate near the top of a hill about four miles on the north-weſt ſide of London. On the ſummit of this hill is a heath, which is adorned with many handſome houſes, and extends about a mile every way, affording a moſt beautiful proſpect over the city as far as Shooter's hill, and into the counties around it. This village uſed to be formerly reſorted to for its mineral waters; and there is here a fine aſſembly room for dancing. Its old ruinous church, which was a chapel belonging to the lord of the manor, was ſome few years ago taken down, and a new one erected in its ſtead: beſides which, there is a handſome chapel near the wells, built by the contribution of the inhabitants, who are principally citizens and merchants of London.

HIGHGATE.

This is a very large and populous village, ſituate about four miles north of London. It received its name from its high ſituation on the top of a hill, and a gate erected there about four hundred years ago, to receive toll for the biſhop of London; upon an old miry road from Grays-inn to Barnet being turned through that biſhop's park. The gate, however, has been very lately taken down, and the road laid entirely open.

The church, which is a very old edifice, is a chapel of eaſe to Pancras and Hornſey; and where it ſtands was formerly an hermitage, near which the lord chief baron Cholmondely built and endowed a free-ſchool in 1562, which was enlarged in the year 1570, by Edwin Sandys, biſhop of London, and a chapel added to it.

On that ſide of this village next London, the fineneſs of the proſpect over the city, as far as Shooter's-hill, and below Greenwich, has occaſioned ſeveral handſome edifices to be built; among which is a very fine houſe erected by the late Sir William Aſhurſt. Here are likewiſe ſeveral diſſenting meeting houſes.

ISLEWORTH or THISTLEWORTH.

In this village, which is pleaſantly ſituated on the Thames oppoſite to Richmond, are two charity ſchools; and in its neighbourhood are the ſeats of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction.

Between this village and the town of Brentford, ſtands a handſome building called SION HOUSE, one of the ſeats of the right honourable the duke and dutcheſs of Northumberland. It received the name of Sion from a monaſtery which was founded by Henry V. in the year 1414, very near the place where the houſe now ſtands, and was endowed with 1000 marks per annum, for the maintenance of ſixty nuns. It was dedicated to St. Saviour and St. Bridget; from the latter of whom the nuns were called Brigettines, and were of the order of Auguſtines, as reformed by ſome new regulations made by the aforeſaid Bridget.

This monaſtery was almoſt one of the firſt that was ſuppreſſed by Henry VIII. perhaps not on account of any great irregularities of behaviour which had been diſcovered in it by the viſitors, but becauſe the members of that ſociety had been remarkably favourable to the king's declared enemies, and particularly to the maid of Kent; for ſhe met with a very kind reception amongſt them, and ſo far excited the curioſity of the neighbourhood, as to induce the famous Sir Thomas More to have two private conferences with her at this very place.

When the monaſtery was ſuppreſſed, its revenues amounted to one thouſand nine hundred and forty-four pounds, eleven ſhillings and elevenpence three farthings; and on account of its fine ſituation, it was not ſold nor given immediately to any court-favourite, but appropriated to the king's own uſe, And accordingly we find, that when the corpſe of Henry VIII. was to be removed from Weſtminſter to Windſor to be interred, it lay the firſt night, not at Richmond, as is commonly ſuppoſed, but at Sion; which by this means became the ſcene in which a prophecy was ſuppoſed to be fulfilled. For father Peto, preaching before the king at Greenwich in 1534, told him, that the dogs would lick his blood as they had done Ahab's. Now, as the king died of a dropſical diſorder, and had been dead a fortnight before he was removed to Sion, it ſo happened, that ſome corrupted matter of a bloody colour ran through the coffin at that place. Whereupon the incident, though a natural conſequence of the aforeſaid circumſtances, was miſconſtrued into a completion of Peto's pretended prophecy, and conſidered as a piece of divine juſtice inflicted upon the king for having forced the Bridgettines from their religious ſanctuary. In the next reign the monaſtery was given by the king to his uncle the duke of Somerſet, the protector, who in 1547 (as is generally ſuppoſed) began to build Sion-Houſe, and finiſhed the ſhell of it, as it now remains, except a few trifling alterations.

The houſe is built on the very ſpot where the church belonging to the monaſtery formerly ſtood, and is a very large, venerable, and majeſtic ſtructure, built of white ſtone, in the form of a hollow ſquare, ſo that it has four external and as many internal fronts: the latter of which ſurround a ſquare front in the middle. The roof is flat, covered with lead, and ſurrounded with indented battlements, like the walls of a fortified city. Upon every one of the four outward angles of the roof, there is a ſquare turret, flat-roofed, and embattled like the other parts of the building. The houſe is three ſtories high, and the eaſt front, which faces the Thames, is ſupported by arches, forming a piazza. The gardens formed two ſquare areas, incloſed with high walls before the eaſt and weſt fronts, and were laid out and finiſhed in a very grand manner; but being made at a time when extenſive views were judged to be inconſiſtent with that ſolemn reſerve and ſtately privacy affected by the great, they were ſo ſituated as to deprive the houſe of every beautiful proſpect which the neighbourhood afforded. None of them at leaſt could be ſeen from the lower apartments. To remedy in ſome meaſure that inconvenience, the protector built a very high triangular terrace in the angle between the walls of the two gardens; and this it was that his enemies afterwards did not ſcruple to call a fortification, and to inſinuate that it was one proof, amongſt many others, which they alledged of his having formed a deſign very dangerous to the liberties of the king and people. Such was the ſtate of the gardens as finiſhed by the protector. After his attainder and execution on the twenty-ſecond of January 1552, Sion was confiſcated to the crown. Whereupon the furniture of the apartments, in which the duke had lived, (and they were probably a part of the old monaſtery) were given to Sir John Wroth the keeper, and the new houſe, that is, the preſent houſe at Sion, to the duke of Northumberland, which then became the reſidence of his ſon, the lord Guildford, and his daughter-in-law, the unfortunate Jane Grey. The duke being beheaded on the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, 1553, Sion-houſe once more reverted to the crown. Three years after this, queen Mary reſtored it to the Bridgettines; and it remained in their poſſeſſion until the ſociety was expelled by queen Elizabeth in the firſt year of her reign. Such of the nuns as perſiſted in their errors carried away their portable treaſure, and ſettled ſucceſſively at Zurickzee in Zealand, at Mechlin, Roan; and laſtly at Liſbon, where the ſociety ſtill ſubſiſts.

Some years after this ſecond diſſolution, which Sion had undergone as a monaſtery, it was granted, by a leaſe of a long term, to Henry, earl of Northumberland, who, in conſideration of his eminent ſervices to the government, was permitted to enjoy it by paying a very ſmall rent as an acknowledgement. This acknowledgment, however, was entirely laid aſide by James I. who, conſidering his lordſhip no longer as a tenant, gave Sion to him and his heirs for ever. Many improvements were made in his time; for it appears from one of his lordſhip's letters to the king in 1613, that he had laid out 9000l. in the houſe and gardens, which ſum was probably expended in finiſhing them according to the protector's plan. His ſon Algernon, afterwards appointed lord high admiral of England, ſucceeded to the eſtate in November 1632. He employed Inigo Jones, to new face the inner court, to make many alterations in the apartments, and to finiſh the great hall in the manner in which it appears at preſent.

In the year 1646 the dukes of York and Glouceſter, and the princeſs Elizabeth, were ſent hither by an order of the parliament, and, according to lord Clarendon, were treated by the earl and counteſs of Northumberland in all reſpects as was moſt ſuitable to their birth. The unhappy king frequently viſited them at Sion in 1647, and thought it a great allevation of his misfortunes to find his children ſo happy in their confinement. The duke of Glouceſter and the princeſs Elizabeth continued at Sion till 1649, at which time the earl reſigned them to the care of his ſiſter the counteſs of Leiceſter. In 1682, Charles duke of Somerſet married the lady Elizabeth Percy, the only daughter and heireſs of Joſceline earl of Northumberland, by which means Sion, and the immenſe eſtate of the Percies, became his grace's property. The duke and dutcheſs lent this houſe at Sion to the princeſs of Denmark, who honoured it with her reſidence during the time of a miſunderſtanding which aroſe between her royal highneſs and her ſiſter.

On the death of Charles duke of Somerſet, Algernon earl of Hertford, his only ſurviving ſon, ſucceeded to the title and a vaſt eſtate, and ſoon after gave Sion to his daughter and ſon-in-law, the preſent dutcheſs and duke of Northumberland, to whoſe fine taſte and liberality are owing the many and great improvements which have been made ſince that time.

It has been already obſerved, that the old gardens were indeed very grand and magnificent, according to the faſhion of the age in which they were made, but, in conſequence of the taſte that then prevailed, they deprived the lower apartments of almoſt every advantage of proſpect, which the fine ſituation of Sion houſe naturally affords. To make the neceſſary alterations, required nothing leſs than his Grace's generoſity. Accordingly, the high triangular terrace, which the protector had raiſed at a great expence, was removed, the walls of the old garden were taken down, and the ground before the houſe levelled, and it now forms a fine lawn, extending from Iſleworth to Brentford. By theſe means alſo a beautiful proſpect is opened into the king's gardens at Richmond, as well as up and down the Thames. Towards the Thames the lawn is bounded by an ha-ha, and a meadow; which his lordſhip ordered to be cut down into a gentle ſlope, ſo that the ſurface of the water may now be ſeen even from the loweſt apartments, and the gardens. In conſequence of theſe improvements, the moſt beautiful piece of ſcenery imaginable is formed before two of the principal fronts; for even the Thames itſelf ſeems to belong to the garden, and the different ſorts of veſſels, which ſucceſſively ſail as it were through them, appear to be the property of their noble proprietor.

The houſe ſtands nearly in the middle point of that ſide of the lawn, which is the fartheſt from the Thames, and communicates with Iſleworth and Brentford, either by means of the lawn or a fine gravel walk, which in ſome places runs along the ſide, and in others through the middle of a beautiful ſhrubbery; ſo that even in the moſt retired parts of this charming maze, where the proſpect is moſt confined, almoſt the whole vegetable getable world riſes up as it were in miniature around you, and preſents you with every foreign ſhrub, plant, and flower, which can be adopted by the ſoil of this climate. His lordſhip has not only thus improved the ground where the old gardens ſtood, but has alſo made a very large addition to it, and ſeparated the two parts, by making a new ſerpentine river. It communicates with the Thames, is well reſtored with all ſorts of river fiſh, and can be emptied and filled by means of a ſluice, which is ſo contrived as to admit the fiſh into the New River, but to prevent their returning back again into the Thames.

His grace has alſo built two bridges, which form a communication between the two gardens; and has erected in that, which lies near Brentford, a ſtately Doric column, upon the top of which is a fine proportioned ſtatue of Flora, ſo judiciouſly placed as to command as it were a diſtinct view of the ſituation over which ſhe is ſuppoſed to preſide.

At a proper diſtance from the houſe are the kitchen gardens, which are very large, and contain every thing, as an hot houſe, fire-walls, &c. The greenhouſe is a very neat building with a Gothic front, the back and end walls of which are the only remains of the old monaſtery.

This building ſtands near a circular baſon of water, well ſtored with gold and ſilver fiſh; and in the middle of the baſon is a ſpouting fountain, which is well ſupplied, and kept perpetually playing.

Before we leave the deſcription of this beautiful ſtructure, we cannot help taking notice of the great gallery, which extends the whole length of the eaſt front of the arcades, and of that immenſe quantity of old china vaſes, of different forms and ſizes, which are crowded together in almoſt every apartment. It is likewiſe to be obſerved, that many fine proſpects may be ſeen from the leads on the top of the houſe; for they command a view of the country to the diſtance of twelve or fourteen miles, and conſequently the greateſt part of London may be ſeen from them. We muſt alſo add, that the gardens, when viewed from the top of the houſe, form a more beautiful landſcape than can eaſily be imagined.

ISLINGTON.

This village is ſituate on the north ſide of London, to which, by the late increaſe of buildings, it is almoſt contiguous. It appears to have been originally built by the Saxons, and in the time of William the Conqueror was called Iſendon or Iſledon.

The principal building in this village is the church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, and is one of the prebends of St. Paul's. The original edifice was erected in the year 1503, and ſtood till 1751, when it being in a ruinous condition, the inhabitants applied to parliament for leave to rebuild it, and ſoon after erected the preſent ſtructure, which is a very ſubſtantial brick edifice, though it does not want an air of lightneſs. The body is well enlightened, and the angles ſtrengthened and decorated with a plain ruſtic. The floor is raiſed conſiderably above the level of the church-yard, and the door in the front is adorned with a portico, which conſiſts of a dome ſupported by four Doric columns; but both the door and the portico appear too ſmall for the reſt of the building. The ſteeple conſiſts of a tower, which riſes ſquare to a conſiderable height, terminated by a cornice ſupporting four vaſes, at the corners. Upon this part is placed an octangular baluſtrade, from within which riſes the baſe of the dome in the ſame form, ſupporting Corinthian columns with their ſhafts wrought with ruſtic. Upon theſe reſts the dome, and from its crown riſes the ſpire, which is terminated by a ball and its fane. Though the body of the church is very large, the roof is ſupported without pillars, and the inſide is extremely commodious, and very neatly ornamented.

The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are, three churchwardens, four overſeers of the poor, ſix conſtables, ſeven headboroughs, three ſurveyors of the highways, and one beadle.

This pariſh is very extenſive, and includes Upper and Lower Holloway, three ſides of Newington Green, and part of Kingſland. There are in Iſlington two independent meeting-houſes, and a charity-ſchool, founded by dame Alice Owen, for educating thirty children. This foundation, together with that of a row of almshouſes, are under the care of the Brewers company. There is here alſo a ſpring of chalybeat water in a very pleaſant garden, which for ſome years was honoured by the conſtant attendance of the princeſs Amelia, and many perſons of quality, who drank the waters. To this place, which is called New Tunbridge Wells, many people reſort, particularly during the ſummer, the price of drinking the waters being three pence for each perſon. Near this place is a houſe of entertainment called Sadler's Wells, where, during the ſummer ſeaſon, people are amuſed with rope-dancing, tumbling, and pantomime entertainments.

At the ſouth-weſt ſide of this village is a fine reſervoir called the New-River Head, which conſiſts of a large baſon, into which the New River diſcharges itſelf; part of the water is from thence conveyed by pipes to London, while another part is thrown by an engine through other pipes up hill to a reſervoir, which lies much higher, in order to ſupply the more riſing parts of London.

Here is an ancient manor houſe, denominated Canonbury, from its having formerly belonged to the prior and canons of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield; the eaſtern part whereof ſtill ſhews it to be of great antiquity. This manſion, at preſent vulgarly called Cambray-houſe, is pleaſantly ſituate on a beautiful eminence, on the eaſt ſide of this village, and commands three delighful proſpects to the eaſt, north and ſouth.

KENSINGTON.

This is a very large and populous village, ſituated about two miles weſt from London: and is remarkable for a royal palace, which, in the reign of his late majeſty, was generally the ſummer reſidence of the court.

This

This building, which was the ſeat of the lord chancellor Finch, afterwards earl of Nottingham, was purchaſed by king William, who greatly improved it, and cauſed a royal road to be made to it through St. James's and Hyde Parks, with lamp-poſts erected at equal diſtances on each ſide. Queen Mary enlarged the gardens: her ſiſter, queen Anne, improved what ſhe had begun; and was ſo pleaſed with the place, that ſhe frequently ſupped during the ſummer in the Greenhouſe, which is very beautiful: but her late majeſty queen Caroline completed the deſign, by extending the gardens from the great road leading to Acton; by bringing what is called the ſerpentine river into them, and by taking in ſome acres out of Hyde Park, on which ſhe cauſed a mount to be raiſed, with a chair upon it, that could be eaſily turned round, ſo as to afford ſhelter from the wind.

Theſe gardens, which are three miles and a half in compaſs, are kept in great order, and in ſummer time, when the court is not there, are reſorted to by great numbers of people, who from a decent appearance and behaviour, obtain eaſy admittance. Though this palace is very irregular, in point of architecture, yet the royal apartments are extremely grand, and ſome of the pictures with which they are adorned are executed by the beſt maſters.

When you paſs the baſe court, you enter thro' a large portico into a ſtone gallery, that leads to the great ſtair-caſe, which is very handſome, and conſiſts of ſeveral flights of black marble ſteps, adorned with iron baluſters finely wrought. The painting here affords the view of ſeveral balconies with groups of figures repreſenting yeomen of the guard, and ſpectators, among whom are drawn Mr. Ulrick, commonly called the young Turk, in the Poloneſe dreſs in which he waited on his majeſty king George I. Peter the wild youth, &c. The ſtair-caſe is richly decorated and painted by Mr. Kent.

The firſt room is hung with very fine tapeſtry, repreſenting the goddeſs Diana hunting, and killing the wild boar. Over the chimney is a picture in a grand taſte, repreſenting one of the Graces in the character of Painting, receiving inſtructions from Cupid. This piece is ſaid to be done by Guido Reni. In one corner of the room is a marble ſtatue of Venus, with an apple in her hand; and in another is the ſtatue of Bacchus, whoſe head is finely executed; but the body, which is inferior to it, ſeems to be done by another hand.

The ceiling of the next room is painted with Minerva, ſurrounded by the arts and ſciences, by Mr. Kent. Over the chimney is a very fine piece repreſenting Cupid admiring Pyſche, while ſhe is aſleep, by Vandyke. On each ſide of the room are hung ſeveral pictures, as king Henry VIII. and the comptroller of his houſhold, by Holbein: a three-quarter picture of king Charles I. and another of his queen, by Vandyke: the duke and dutcheſs of York, by Sir Peter Lely: as alſo king William and queen Mary, when prince and princeſs of Orange, over the doors, by the ſame hand.

The third room, which was the late queen's apartment, is adorned with very beautiful tapeſtry, repreſenting a Dutch winter-piece, and the various diverſions peculiar to the natives of Holland, done by Mr. Vanderbank. Over the chimney is an admirable picture of king Charles II. king James II. and their ſiſter the princeſs of Orange, when children, by Vandyke.

In the fourth room is the picture of a battle or ſkirmiſh between the Germans and Italians, by Holbein. Another of Danae deſcending in a ſhower of gold; and another of the widow Eliot, finely executed by our countryman Riley.

In the fifth room is a picture of the crucifixion, and another of Our Saviour laid on the croſs, both by Titian: of Our Saviour calling St. Matthew from the receipt of cuſtoms, by Annibal Caracci; and of his healing the ſick in the temple, by Verrio: a picture of Henry IV. of France, by Titian: two heads of queen Mary I. and queen Elizabeth, when children, by Holbein: the late queen Anne, when an infant, by Sir Peter Lely: and ſeveral heads by Raphael.

In the ſixth room, or rather gallery, are the pictures of king Henry VIII. and queen Katharine of Arragon, both by Holbein: king Philip of Spain, and queen Mary, by the ſame hand: king James I. by Vandyke: king Charles II. the face by Sir Peter Lely: queen Elizabeth in a Chineſe dreſs, drawn when ſhe was a priſoner at Woodſtock: king James II. when duke of York, and another of his queen, both by Sir Peter Lely: king William and queen Mary in their coronation robes, by Sir Godfrey Kneller. Sir Godfrey was knighted on his painting theſe pictures; king William being doubtleſs pleaſed with ſo fine a picture of his queen. The next is queen Anne, after Sir Godfrey Kneller; and a picture of queen Caroline, which is but poorly executed. In this room is a curious amber cabinet, in a glaſs caſe; and at the upper end a beautiful orrery, likewiſe in a glaſs caſe.

The ſeventh, which is called the Cupola room, has a ſtar in the centre, and the ceiling all around is adorned with paintings in Moſaic. Round the room are placed, at proper diſtances, eight buſtos of ancient poets, and ſix ſtatues of the heathen gods and goddeſſes at full length, gilt. Over the chimney piece is a curious bas relief in marble, repreſenting a Roman marriage, with a buſto of Cleopatra, by Mr. Ryſbrack.

In the king's great drawing room, over the chimney, is a very fine picture of St. Francis adoring the infant Jeſus, held in the lap of the Virgin Mary, Joſeph attending, the whole performed by Sir Peter Paul Rubens. In this room are alſo the holy family, finely painted by Paul Veroneſe: three prieſts, by Tintoret: a noble picture of St. Agnes over one of the doors, by Domenichino: St. John Baptiſt's head, Mary Magdalen, and a naked Venus, all by Titian: a Venus in a ſupine poſture, ſteeling an arrow out of Cupid's quiver, with beautiful ornaments, in the high guſto of the Greek antique, repreſenting Love and the Drama, by Jacobo da Punturmo: upon the original out lines of the great Michel Angelo Buonaroti: a picture of Villars, duke of Buckingham, and his younger brother, when boys, one of the capital pieces of Vandyke: two large pictures by Guido Reni, one of Venus dreſſing by the graces; the other of Andromeda chained to a rock: Our Saviour in the manger, by Baſſan; and a picture of part of the holy family, by Palma the elder.

The ceiling in this room, in which there is ſuch a mixture of ſacred and prophane pieces, is painted with the ſtory of Jupiter and Semele.

In the ſtate chamber, the bed is of crimſon damaſk; and over the chimney is a picture of Our Saviour and St. John Baptiſt, by Raphael.

In the ſtate dreſſing-room the hangings are all of needle-work, a preſent from the queen of Pruſſia. Here is a picture of Edward VI. by Holbein; of a young nobleman of Venice, by Tintoret; another young nobleman of the ſame place, by Tintoret; and Titian's lady, painted by himſelf.

The painted gallery is adorned with many admirable pieces. At one end is king Charles I. on a white horſe, with the duke of d'Eſpernon holding his helmet; the king is an auguſt and noble figure, with ſome dejection in his countenance: the triumphal arch, curtain, and other parts of the back ground, are finely executed, and ſo kept, that the king is the principal figure that ſtrikes the eye: at a little diſtance it has more of the life than a picture, and one is almoſt ready to get out of the horſe's way, and bow to the king.

At the other end of the gallery, oppoſite this picture, is the ſame king, with his queen, and two children, king Charles II. when a child, and king James II. an infant in the queen's lap. The king's paternal tenderneſs is finely expreſſed, his ſon ſtanding at his knee: the queen's countenance is expreſſive of all affectionate obedience to his majeſty, and a fond care of her child, which ſhe ſeems to deſire the king to look on. The infant is exquiſitely performed; the vacancy of thought in the face, and the inactivity of the hands, are equal to life itſelf at that age. Theſe two admirable pieces were done by Vandyke.

Another very capital picture in this gallery is, Eſther fainting before king Ahaſuerus, painted by Tintoret. All the figures are finely drawn and richly dreſſed in the Venetian manner; for the Venetian ſchool painted all their hiſtorical figures in their own habits, thinking them more noble and pictureſque than any other.

The next piece is the nine muſes in concert, finely drawn by the ſame maſter.

Midas preferring Pan to Apollo, is a fine piece, by Andrea Schiavone; but it is greatly hurt by time: the figures, however, are well drawn and coloured; and the affectation of judgment in Midas is finely expreſſed.

The ſhepherds offering gifts to Chriſt, St. John in priſon, the ſtory of the woman of Samaria, and John Baptiſt's head, are fine pieces, by old Palma.

Noah's flood, by Baſſan, is a maſterly performance.

Over the chimney is a Madona, by Raphael, which, though a ſmall piece, gives a very high idea of that great maſter's abilities. There is alſo in this gallery a Madona by Vandyke, which is exquiſitely performed.

The other pictures here are, the birth of Jupiter, a fine piece, by Giulio Romano; a Cupid whetting his arrow, by Annibal Caracci; and a Venus and Cupid, by Titian.

K E W.

In this town, which is ſituate on the Thames, oppoſite to Old Brentford, is a chapel of eaſe erected at the expence of ſeveral of the nobility and gentry, on a piece of ground that was given for that purpoſe by queen Anne. Here the late Mr. Molineux, ſecretary to his majeſty king George II. when prince of Wales, had a very fine ſeat on the green, the gardens of which are ſaid to produce the beſt fruit in England.

Oppoſite to Kew Green is a very neat bridge, which conſiſts of eleven arches. The two piers and their dependent arches on each ſide next the ſhore are built of brick and ſtone, the intermediate arches, which are ſeven in number, are entirely wood. The center arch is fifty feet wide, and the road over the bridge is thirty feet. This bridge was erected in conſequence of an act of parliament paſſed for that purpoſe in the year 1758.

In this town ſtood the ſeats of lady Eyre and Sir Thomas Abney, both of which were purchaſed by her late majeſty queen Caroline; the former for the late duke of Cumberland, and the latter for the princeſſes Amelia and Caroline.

LOW LEYTON or LEIGHTON.

This is a very pleaſant village ſituate on the ſide of a hill near Walthamſtow, at the foot of of which runs the river Lea. In this pariſh are ſeveral very handſome ſeats which formerly belonged to the nobility, but are now in the poſſeſſion of wealthy citizens, and other gentlemen; particularly the ſeat of the late Sir Fiſher Tench, bart. which is a modern ſtructure, and adorned with large and delightful gardens.

The pariſh of Leyton is waſhed on one ſide by the river Lea or Ley, from which the village obtains its name, and riſes in a gentle aſcent for about two miles, from the river to Waltham Foreſt; on which ſide lies one ward of the pariſh called Leyton Stone: in this part is a chapel of eaſe erected ſome few years ago for the convenience of the inhabitants.

The pariſh church is a ſmall building, conſiſting of a chancel and two iſles. It is dedicated to the Virgin Mary; and the advowſon of the vicarage is veſted in the lord of the manor.

MARYBORNE, or Mary le Bonne.

This village, which by the great increaſe of buildings, is now almoſt united to the metropolis; took its origin from the following circumſtance.

The village of Tyborne going to decay, and its church, named St. John the Evangeliſt, left alone by the ſide of the highway, it was robbed of its books, veſtments, images, and other decorations; on which the pariſhioners petitioned the biſhop of London for leave to take down their old, and erect a new one elſewhere, which being readily granted in the year 1400, they built a new church where they had ſome time before erected a chapel, and that ſtructure being dedicated to the Virgin Mary, received the additional epithet of Borne, from its vicinity to the neigbouring brook or bourn.

The old church, which was a mean edifice, was pulled down, and a new one erected in 1741. This ſtructure is built with brick in as plain a manner as poſſible. It has two ſeries of ſmall arched windows on each ſide, and the only ornaments are a vaſe at each corner, and a turret at the weſt end.

The veſtry of this pariſh is general; and the officers are, two churchwardens, two overſeers of the poor, two conſtables, two ſurveyors of the highways, and one beadle.

There are in this village a French meeting-houſe, a charity ſchool, and a place of public entertainment, which has a pleaſant garden, and a band of vocal and inſtrumental muſic.

If the ſpirit of building ſhould continue as it has gone on for ſome few years paſt, this village will undoubtedly, in a very ſhort time, be quite joined, and become a part of the metropolis.

PANCRAS.

This is a ſmall hamlet on the north weſt ſide of London, in the road to Kentiſh town. It has a church dedicated to St. Pancras, and called St. Pancras in the Fields, an old plain Gothic ſtructure, with a ſquare tower, without a ſpire.

It is a vulgar tradition that this church is of greater antiquity than that of St. Paul's cathedral, of which it is only a prebend; but this ariſes from a miſtake; for the church of St. Pancras, termed the mother of St. Paul's, was ſituated in the city of Canterbury, and was changed from a Pagan temple to a Chriſtian church by St. Auſtin the monk, in the year 598, when he dedicated it to St. Pancras.

The church yard is a general burial-place for perſons of the Romiſh religion. At a public houſe on the ſouth ſide of the church is a medicinal ſpring.

This church, which ſtood on the north ſide of St. Pancras-lane, near Queen-ſtreet, in Cheap ward (ſee page 485) owed its name, as did the church mentioned in the above article, to St. Pancras, a young phrygian nobleman, who ſuffered martyrdom under the emperor Diocleſian, for his ſtrict adherence to the Chriſtian religion.

The ſervice of this church is only performed the firſt Sunday in every month, owing to the great extent of the pariſh, and the number of chapels erected in various parts of it for the convenience of the inhabitants.

PECKHAM.

This is a very pleaſant village ſituate about four miles from London, in the pariſh of Camberwell.

In this village is the ſeat of the late lord Trevor, built in the reign of king James II. by Sir Thomas Bond, who being deeply engaged in the pernicious ſchemes of that imprudent prince, was obliged to leave the kingdom with him, when the houſe was plundered by the populace, and became forfeited to the crown.

The front of this building ſtands to the north, with a ſpacious garden before it, from which extends two rows of large elms, of conſiderable length, through which the Tower of London terminates the proſpect. On each ſide of this avenue you have a view of the city; and the maſts of veſſels appearing at high-water over the trees and houſes up to Greenwich, greatly improve the proſpect. The kitchen garden and the walls were planted with the choiceſt fruit trees from France, and an experienced gardener was ſent for from Paris to have the management of them; ſo that the collection of fruit trees in this garden has been accounted one of the beſt in England.

Soon after lord Trevor died, the ſeat was purchaſed by a private gentleman, who began to make very conſiderable improvements, and had he lived a few years longer, would have rendered it a very delightful ſpot of retirement.

Here are likewiſe ſeveral other villas and neat houſes, inhabited by the tradeſmen of London, and thoſe who have retired from buſineſs.

PUTNEY.

This village which is ſituate on the Thames, five miles ſouth weſt of London, is famous for being the birth-place of Thomas Cromwell, earl of Eſſex, whoſe father was a blackſmith in this place.

About this village the citizens of London have many very handſome ſeats; and on Putney Heath is a public houſe remarkable for polite aſſemblies, and in the ſummer ſeaſon for breakfaſting and dancing, and for one of the pleaſanteſt bowling-greens in England.

Here is an old church erected after the ſame model with that of Fulham, on the oppoſite ſhore, and they are both ſaid to have been built by two ſiſters. That part of Putney which joins to the heath commands a fine view both up and down the river Thames.

RICHMOND.

This is reckoned the fineſt village in the Britiſh dominions, and has therefore been termed the Freſcati of England. It was anciently the ſeats of our monarchs, and the place from its ſplendor was called Shene, which in the Saxon tongue ſignifies bright or ſhining.

In this place king Edward III. died of grief for the loſs of his heroic ſon Edward the back prince; and here died Anne the wife of Richard II. who firſt taught the Engliſh women the uſe of the ſide ſaddle. Richard was ſo afflicted at her death, that it gave him ſuch a diſlike to the place where it happened, that he defaced the fine palace; but it was afterwards repaired and beautified by king Henry V. who alſo founded near it three religious houſes.

In

In the year 1497 this palace was deſtroyed by fire, when king Henry VII. was there; but in 1501 that prince cauſed it to be new built, and commanded that the village ſhould be called Richmond. Henry VII. died here; as did likewiſe his daughter queen Elizabeth. On the ground where formerly ſtood a part of the old palace is a ſeat belonging to the earl of Cholmondeley.

The preſent palace, which is delightfully ſituated, is a plain edifice built by the duke of Ormond, who received a grant of a conſiderable ſpace of land about Richmond, from king William III. as a reward for his military ſervices; but on the attainder of that duke in the beginning of the reign of king George I. it devolved to the crown; and it was by his late majeſty confirmed to queen Caroline, in caſe ſhe became queen dowager of England.

The king took great delight here, and made ſeveral improvements in the palace, while her majeſty amuſed herſelf at her royal dairy houſe, Merlin's cave, the Hermitage, and the other improvements which ſhe made in the park and gardens of this delightful manſion.

The gardens are extremely fine, and are formed with an agreeable wildneſs and pleaſing irregularity, that cannot fail to charm all who are in love with nature, and afford a much higher and more laſting ſatisfaction than can poſſibly ariſe from the moſt extenſive decorations of art.

On entering theſe rural walks, you are conducted to the dairy, a neat but low brick building, to which there is an aſcent by a flight of ſteps; in the front is a handſome angular pediment. The walls on the inſide are covered with ſtucco, and the houſe is furniſhed ſuitable to a royal dairy, the utenſils for the milk being of the moſt beautiful china.

Proceeding through a grove of trees you come to the temple, which is ſituated on a mount. It is a circular dome crowned with a ball, and ſupported by Tuſcan columns, with a circular altar in the middle, and to which there is an aſcent by very ſteep ſlopes.

Returning by the dairy, and croſſing the gravel walk which leads from the palace to the river, you come to a wood, which you enter by a walk terminated by the queen's pavillion, a neat elegant ſtructure, wherein is ſeen a beautiful chimney-piece, taken from a deſign in the addition to Palladis, and a model of a palace intended to be built in this place. In another part of this wood is the duke's ſummer-houſe, which has a lofty arched entrance, and the roof riſing to a point is terminated by a ball.

From the wood you come to the ſummer-houſe on the terrace, a light ſmall building with very large and lofty windows, to give a better view of the country, and particularly of that noble ſeat called Sion-houſe, In this edifice are two pictures, repreſenting the taking of Vigo by the duke of Ormond.

Paſſing through a labyrinth, you ſee, near a pond, Merlin's cave, a Gothic building thatched; within which are the following figures in wax, Merlin, an ancient Britiſh enchanter; the excellent and learned queen Elizabeth, and a queen of the Amazons; here is alſo a library conſiſting of a well choſen collection of the works of modern authors neatly bound in vellum.

On leaving this edifice, which has an antique and venerable appearance, you come to a large oval of above five hundred feet in diameter, called the Foreſt oval, and turning from hence you have a view of the Hermitage, a groteſque building, which ſeems as if it had ſtood many hundred years, though it was built by order of her late majeſty. It has three arched doors, and the middle part which projects forward, is adorned with a kind of ruinous angular pediment; the ſtones of the whole edifice appear as if rudely laid together, and the venerable look of the whole is improved by the thickneſs of the ſolemn grove behind, and the little turret on the top with a bell, to which you may aſcend by a winding walk.

The inſide of this building is in the form of an octagon with niches, in which are the buſts of the following truly great men, who by their writings were an honour not only to their country, but to human nature. The firſt on the right hand is the incomparable Sir Iſaac Newton, and next to him the juſtly celebrated Mr. John Locke. The firſt on the left hand is Mr. Woolaſton, the author of The Religion of Nature Diſplayed; next to him is the reverend and learned Dr. Samuel Clarke, and in a kind of alcove is the truly honourable Mr. Robert Boyle.

From this ſeat of contemplation you paſs thro' fields cloathed with graſs; through corn fields, and a wild ground interſperſed with broom and furze, which afford excellent ſhelter for hares and pheaſants, of which there are great abundance.

Leaving this beautiful variety, in which nature appears in all her forms of cultivation and barren wildneſs, you come to an ampitheatre formed by young elms, and a diagonal wilderneſs, through which you paſs to the foreſt walk, that extends about half a mile, and then paſſing through a ſmall wilderneſs you leave the gardens.

At the north-eaſt extremity of the garden is another houſe that belonged to her majeſty, and near it the houſe of his late royal highneſs Frederick prince of Wales, which is on the inſide adorned with ſtucco. Oppoſite this laſt houſe is the princeſs Amelia's, built by a Dutch architect, the outſide of which is painted.

To the weſt of the gardens are ſeen the fine houſes of ſeveral of the nobility and gentry, particularly the lady Buckworth's, and Mr. Geoffrey's; and extending the view acroſs the Thames, there appears Iſleworth.

Having thus deſcribed this beautiful manſion, we ſhall now return to the village itſelf. The green is exceeding pleaſant, it being levelled and encloſed in a handſome manner; it is alſo ſurrounded with lofty elms, and adorned on each ſide with the houſes of perſons of diſtinction. Among the various ſeats on this ſpacious green is a handſome edifice that formerly belonged to Sir Charles Hedges, and ſince to Sir Matthew Decker, in the gardens of which is ſaid to be the longeſt and higheſt hedge of holly that was ever ſeen, with ſeveral other hedges of evergreens. There are here alſo viſtas cut through woods, grottos, fountains, a fine canal, a decoy, ſummer-mer-houſe and ſtove-houſes, in which the anana, or pine apple, was firſt brought to maturity in England.

On the north eaſt ſide of the green is a fine houſe, which belonged to the late Mr. Hegdigger, and a little beyond it that of the late duke of Cumberland; paſſing by which you come to a ſmall park belonging to his majeſty, well ſtocked with deer, and oppoſite to it is the entrance into the gardens.

This village runs up a hill, on the aſcent of which are wells of a purging mineral water, frequented during the ſummer by a great number of gentry and others. On the top there is a moſt extenſive and beautiful proſpect of the country, interſperſed with villages and incloſures; the Thames is ſeen running beneath, and the landſcape is improved by the many fine ſeats that are ſcattered along its banks.

Beſides theſe remarkables, there are in this village the following. An almſhouſe built by Dr. Duppa, biſhop of Wincheſter in the reign of king Charles II. for the ſupport of ten poor widows, purſuant to a vow made by that prelate during that prince's exile. Another almſhouſe endowed with above 100l. a year, which, ſince its foundation, has been conſiderably encreaſed by John Mitchell, eſq; Here are alſo two charity ſchools, one for fifty boys, and the other for fifty girls. Likewiſe a very ſmall but neat playhouſe.

STEPNEY.

This is a very ancient village ſituate about two miles eaſt of London; and is remarkable for its church, and the great number of tomb ſtones, both in that edifice and its ſpacious cemetry.

That this village is of great antiquity, and has been of great importance in former times, may be collected from its being once the reſidence of kings, the ſeat of parliament, which was held there, and the place where the deans of St. Paul's had their country manſion; ſome faint remains of which are ſtill to be ſeen.

There was a church here ſo long ago as the time of the Saxons, when it was called the church of all Saints, Eccleſia omnium Sanctorum, and we read of the manor of Stepney under the reign of William the Conqueror, by the name of Stibenhede, or Stiben's-heath; but it does not appear when the church changed its name by being dedicated to St. Dunſtan, the name it at preſent bears. To this church belong both a rectory and vicarage; the former, which was a ſine-cure, was in the gift of the biſhop of London, and the latter, in the gift of the rector, till Ridley, biſhop of London, gave the manor of Stepney, and the advowſon of the church to Edward VI. who, in his turn, granted them to Sir Thomas Wentworth, lord chamberlain of his houſhold. But the advowſon being afterwards purchaſed by the principal and ſcholars of King's-hall and Brazen-Noſe college in Oxford, they preſented two perſons to the rectory and vicarage by the name of the Portioniſts of Ratcliff and Spital-fields, till the year 1744, when the hamlet of Bethnal-green being ſeparated from it, and made a new pariſh by act of parliament, Stepney became poſſeſſed by only one rector.

This pariſh was of ſuch vaſt extent, and ſo amazingly encreaſed in buildings, as to produce the pariſhes of St. Mary Stratford at Bow, St. Mary Whitechapel, St. Anne's Limehouſe, St. John's at Wapping, St. Paul's Shadwell, St. George's Ratcliff Highway, Chriſt-church Spital-fields, and St. Matthew's Bethnal-green; all which have been ſeparated from it, and yet it ſtill remains one of the largeſt pariſhes within the bill of mortality, and contains the hamlets of Mile-end, Old and New Towns, Ratcliff and Poplar.

The preſent church, which has been lately repaired and beautified, is of very conſiderable extent, being 104 feet long, though it is no more than 54 feet broad. The height of the roof is 35 feet, and that of the tower, with its turret, 92 feet. The wall and battlements are built of brick and wrought ſtone, plaſtered over; and the roof is covered with lead. The pillars, arches and windows, are of the modern Gothic, and the weſt porch, built in 1610, has not any reſemblance to the reſt of the building, it being of the Tuſcan order. The tower, which is plain and heavy, is ſupported at the corners by a kind of double buttreſſes; it is crowned with ſquare plain battlements, without pinnacles, and with a ſmall mean turret; and the ſame kind of battlements are carried round the body of the church.

On the inſide are three galleries and an organ, and the altar-piece is adorned with four Corinthian pilaſters, with their entablature and a pediment; theſe have gilt capitals, with the arms of queen Anne carved. On the eaſt ſide of the portico, leading up to the gallery on the north ſide of the chancel, is a ſtone, whereon are engraved the following words:

Of Carthage great I was a ſtone,
O mortals read with pity!
Time conſumes all, it ſpareth none,
Men, mountains, towns, nor city:
Therefore, O mortals! all bethink
You whereunto you muſt,
Since now ſuch ſtately buildings
Lie buried in the duſt.

The church is well pewed with oak, and wainſcoted about eight feet high, and the pulpit is of the ſame ſort of timber.

The veſtry is ſelect, conſiſting of a certain number of repreſentatives choſen by each hamlet, and the churchwardens for the time being.

Among the various monumental inſcriptions in this great cemetry, the following are the moſt remarkable.

On a grave ſtone near the ſouth eaſt corner of the church-yard, is this inſcription on Mrs. Mary Angel:

To ſay, an Angel here inter'd doth lye,
May be thought ſtrange, for Angels never dye.
Indeed ſome fell from Heav'n to Hell,
Are loſt and riſe no more:
This only fell by Death to Earth,
Not loſt but gone before.
Her Duſt lodg'd here, her Soul perfect in Grace
'Mongſt Saints and Angels now hath took its place.

At

At the eaſt end of the church-yard, near the church, is a monument of white marble, adorned with a cherub, urn, palm branches and a coat of arms, under which is the following inſcription:

Here lieth interred the body of dame Rebecca Berry, the wife of Thomas Elton of Stratford Bow, gent. who departed this life April 16, 1696, aged 52.

Come ladies, you that would appear
Like angels fair, come dreſs you here;
Come dreſs you at this marble ſtone,
And make that humble grace your own,
Which once adorn'd as fair a mind,
As e're yet lodg'd in woman kind.
So ſhe was dreſs'd; whoſe humble life
Was free from pride, was free from ſtrife.
Free from all envious brauls and jars
(Of human life the civil wars)
Theſe ne'ere diſturb'd her peaceful mind,
Which ſtill was gentle, ſtill was kind.
Her very looks, her garb, her mien,
Diſclos'd the humble ſoul within.
Trace her through every ſcene of life,
View her as widow, virgin, wife,
Still the ſame humble ſhe appears,
The ſame in youth the ſame in years;
The ſame in low and high eſtate,
Ne're vex'd with this, ne're mov'd with that.
Go, ladies, now, and if you'd be
As fair, as great, as good as ſhe,
Go learn of her humility.

On a ſtone, near the foot path, on the north weſt ſide of the church is the following:

Whoever treadeth on this ſtone,
I pray you tread moſt neatly,
For underneath the ſame doth lye
Your honeſt friend Will. Wheatly.

On the ſouth ſide is another ſtone with this inſcription:

Here lies the body of Daniel Saul,
Spitalfields weaver, and that is all.

Under a ſtone ſouthward from the church is the following:

Here remains all that was mortal of Mr. Roger Crab, who entered into eternity the 11th day of September 1680, in the 60th year of his age.

Tread gently, reader, near the duſt
Committed to this tomb-ſtone's truſt,
For while 'twas fleſh it held a gueſt
With univerſal love poſſeſt;
A ſoul that ſtemm'd opinion's tyde,
Did over ſects in triumph ride,
Yet ſeparate from the giddy crowd and paths tradition had allowed,
Through good and ill report he paſt,
Oft cenſur'd, yet approv'd at laſt.
Would'ſt thou his religion know,
In brief 'twas this: to all to do
Juſt as he would be done unto.
So kind in Nature's laws he ſtood,
A temple undefil'd with blood,
A friend to every thing was good.
The reſt angels alone can fitly tell.
Haſte then to them and him, and ſo farewell.

The laſt inſcription we ſhall mention is the following, on a ſpacious marble ſtone, near the ſouth ſide of the church:

Here lieth interred the bodies of captain Thomas Chever's, who departed this life November 18, 1675. Aged 44 years.

And of Ann Chevers his wife, who departed this life, November 14, 1675. Aged 34 years.

And of John Chevers their ſon, who departed this life, November 13, 1675. Aged 5 days.

Reader, conſider well how poor a ſpan,
And how uncertain is the life of man:
Here lie the huſband, wife, and child, by Death
All three in five days time depriv'd of breath.
The child dies firſt, the mother on the morrow
Follows, and then the father dies with ſorrow.
A Cæſar falls by many wounds, well may
Two ſtabs at heart the ſtouteſt captain ſlay.

The other remarkables in this pariſh are, a Preſbyterian, Independent, Anabaptiſt, and a Quaker meeting-houſes; two charity-ſchools; fifteen almſhouſes; an hoſpital; two workhouſes; a large ſhip-yard to build in; and two Portugueſe and one German burial grounds, the firſt of which contains near one thouſand ſepulchral ſtones of beautiful marble, under which perſons of all ages and ranks lie promiſcuouſly in rows without diſtinction, and whoſe graves are never re opened.

TOTTENHAM HIGH CROSS.

This is a pleaſant village ſituate on the weſt ſide of the River Lea, five miles north of London, in the road to Ware.

The original proprietors of this manor were the earls of Northumberland and Cheſter; after whom it fell into the hands of David king of Scotland, who gave it to the monaſtery of the Trinity in London; but Henry VIII. granted it to William Lord Howard of Effingham, who being afterwards attainted, it reverted again to the king, who then granted it to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, to whom it ſtill belongs.

The preſent earl of Northumberland and the lord Colerain have ſeats here, and there are alſo a great number of handſome houſes belonging to the citizens of London.

The church ſtands on a hill, which has a little river called the Moſel at the bottom, to the weſt, north and eaſt. The pariſh is divided into four wards, viz. 1. Nether ward, in which ſtands the parſonage and vicarage. 2. Middle ward, comprehending Church end, and Marſh-ſtreet. 3. High Croſs ward, containing the hall, the mill, Page-green, and the High Croſs. 4. Wood-green ward, which comprehends all the reſt of the pariſh, and is larger than the other three wards put together.

The Croſs, which gives name to the place, was once much higher than it is at preſent; and upon that ſpot queen Eleanor's corpſe was reſted, when on the road from Lincolnſhire to London. St. Loy's well, in this pariſh, is ſaid to be always full, and never to run over; and many ſtrange cures have been performed at Biſhop's well.

An almſhouſe was founded here in 1596 by one Zancher, a Spaniard, the firſt confectioner ever known in this kingdom. Here are alſo a free-ſchool, and a charity-ſchool for twenty-two girls, who are taught and cloathed.

TOWTING.

There are two villages of this name, ſituate near each other, and diſtinguiſhed by the epithets upper and lower. The former lies in the road from Southwark to Epſom, abo ut four miles from London.

In this village is an almſhouſe founded in 1709, by the mother of Sir John Bateman, Lord-mayor of London, for ſix poor women, to be nominated by the eldeſt heir of the family. It is likewiſe adorned with ſeveral fine ſeats belonging to the gentlemen and citizens of London, particularly the houſe and gardens of the Bateman family.

Lower Towting is two miles ſouth weſt of Wandſworth; and here the lord Gray and the earl of Lindſey had their ſeats in the laſt century.

TWICKENHAM.

This is a very pleaſant village, ſituate on the banks of the Thames between Teddington and Iſleworth, and between two brooks that here fall into that river.

The church, which is a modern edifice, rebuilt by the contribution of the inhabitants, is a fine Doric ſtructure. Here is a charity-ſchool for fifty boys, who are taught and cloathed; and this delightful village is adorned with the ſeats of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, particularly on the bank of the river.

At the upper end of the village there is an elegant Gothic ſeat called Strawberry-hill, belonging to the honourable Mr. Walpole; near which is a beautiful houſe, late the earl of Radnor's, now in the poſſeſſion of Mr. Hindley. The next of conſiderable note is Sir William Stanhope's, formerly the reſidence of our moſt celebrated poet, Mr. Alexander Pope: then Mr. Backwell's; and the laſt on this beautiful bank is doctor Battie's, at preſent in the poſſeſſion of Mr. Paulet. All theſe houſes, beſides ſeveral others on this delightful ſpot, enjoy a moſt pleaſing proſpect both up and down the river, perpetually enlivened with the weſt country navigation, and other moving pictures on the ſurface of this enchanting river.

Below the church is the fine ſeat of Mr. Whitchurch, that of the earl of Strafford, Mrs. Pitt, and at the entrance into the meadows, the elegant ſtructure called Marble-hall, belonging to the counteſs of Suffolk. Still farther down the ſtream you have the ſmall but very neat houſe of Mr. Barlow; the larger and more grand one of Mr. Cambridge; and the ſweet retirement called Twickenham Park, the reſidence of the counteſs of Montrath. This brings you down to Iſleworth, which from the entrance into the meadows at lady Suffolk's, is about a mile and a half on the bank of the river, oppoſite to Ham walks and Richmond-hill, and is one of the moſt beautiful walks in England.

On the right hand of the road, between Turnham-green and Brentford, is Gunnerſbury-houſe, a noble and elegant ſtructure built by Inigo Jones, or, as ſome ſay, by Mr. Web, who was ſon-in-law to Inigo Jones. Indeed the architecture ſhews, that if the plan was not drawn by that celebrated architect himſelf, it was deſigned by ſome of his ſcholars; for the building has that majeſtic boldneſs and ſimplicity which grace all the works of that excellent artiſt. It is ſituated on a riſing ground; the approach to it from the garden is remarkably fine. The loggia has a beautiful appearance at a diſtance, and commands a fine proſpect of the county of Surry, the river of Thames, and of all the meadows on its banks for ſome miles, and in clear weather, of even the city of London.

The apartments are extremely convenient and well contrived. The hall, which is large and ſpacious, is on each ſide ſupported by rows of columns, and from thence you aſcend, by a noble flight of ſtairs, to a ſaloon, which is a double cube of twenty-five feet high, and moſt elegantly furniſhed. This fine room has an entrance into the portico on the back front, which is ſupported by columns, and from the fineneſs of the proſpect over the Thames, is a delightful place to ſit in, during the afternoon in the ſummer ſeaſon; for it being contrived to face the ſouth eaſt, the ſun never ſhines on it after two o'clock; but extending its beams over the country, enlivens the beautiful landſcape that lies before this part of the edifice.

On entering the garden from the houſe, you aſcend a noble terrace, which affords a delightful view of the neighbouring country; and from this terrace, which extends the whole breadth of the garden, you deſcend by a beautiful flight of ſteps, with a grand baluſtrade on each ſide. But the gardens are laid out too plain, having the walls in view on every ſide. This was the houſe of the late Henry Furneſſe, eſq; who had a fine collection of pictures. It is now in the poſſeſſion of the princeſs Amelia.

WALTHAMSTOW.

This is a very pleaſant village, ſituate on the river Lea, and contiguous to Low Layton. Here are three manors, viz. Walthamſtow, Tony or High-hall, Walthamſtow Frances or Low-hall, which was the manor of the late J. Conyers, eſq; and the manor of the rectory, which once belonged to Trinity-abbey in London.

The church, which is dedicated to the Bleſſed Virgin, is a large edifice ſituated upon a hill, and conſiſts of three iſles; that on the north ſide built by Sir George Monox, knt. alderman and Lord-mayor of London in the reign of Henry VIII. is called Monox's iſle; that on the ſouth ſide bears the name of Thorn's iſle, from a citizen and merchant-taylor of that name, who in all probability, was at the expence of building it.

In this church there are a great number of monuments, particularly one near the altar erected to the memory of Sir Thomas Stanley, knt. ſecond ſon to the earl of Derby, on which there is the effigy of a lady on her knees. And before the communion table within the rails, is a piece of marble over the body of doctor Pierce, biſhop of Bath and Wells.

In the pariſh of Walthamſtow there are ſeveral ancient ſeats, and handſome houſes, belonging to perſons of diſtinction; the moſt remarkable of which was that of Higham-hall, pleaſantly ſituated upon Higham-hills, a riſing ground, about half a mile north from Clay-ſtreet, juſt above the river Lea, overlooking the counties of Middleſex and Hertfordſhire, and commanding a moſt delightful and extenſive proſpect. It has been a magnificent and ſpacious fabrick, and in ancient times, when the lords reſided upon their royalties, no place could be more admirably ſituated than this manſion, erected at the top of the hill of Higham, and having within its view the whole extent of its juriſdiction; but there are hardly now any traces of its ancient grandeur remaining.

Oppoſite the church is the Nag's-head, a noted public houſe for the accommodation of the gentry who occaſionally reſort hither to participate of thoſe pleaſures which the ruſticity of this delightful village naturally affords.

WANSTED.

In this village which is ſituate near Woodford, about eight miles eaſt of London, are ſeveral fine ſeats of the nobility, gentry, and wealthy citizens; but the moſt remarkable is Wanſted-houſe, the magnificent ſeat of the earl of Tilney.

This noble manſion was prepared by Sir Joſeph Child, his lordſhip's grandfather, who added to the advantage of a fine ſituation, many rows of trees, planted in avenues and viſtas leading up to the ſpot of ground where the old houſes ſtood. The late lord, before he was enobled, laid out the moſt ſpacious pieces of ground in gardens that are to be ſeen in England.

The green-houſe is a very ſuperb building furniſhed with ſtoves and artificial places for heat, from an apartment which has a bagnio, and other conveniences, that render it both pleaſant and uſeful.

The preſent building is a magnificent ſtructure, two hundred and ſixty feet in length, and ſeventy in depth. The fore front, which is of Portland ſtone, has a long viſta that reaches to the great road at Leighton Stone, and from the back front facing the gardens is an eaſy deſcent that leads to the terrace; and affords a moſt beautiful proſpect of the river, which is formed into canals; and beyond it the walks and wilderneſſes extend to a great diſtance, riſing up the hill, as they ſloped downwards before; ſo that the ſight is loſt in the woods, and the whole country, as far as the eye can reach, appears one continued garden.

This beautiful building, which was erected by the late earl of Tilney, and deſigned by colonel Campbell, is certainly one of the nobleſt houſes not only near London, but in the kingdom. It conſiſts of two ſtories, the ſtate and ground ſtory. This latter is the baſement, into which you enter by a door in the middle underneath the grand entrance, which is in a noble portico of ſix Corinthian columns ſupporting a pediment in which are the arms of this nobleman. To this you aſcend by a flight of ſteps, and paſs into a magnificent ſaloon richly decorated with painting and ſculpture, through which you paſs into the other ſtate rooms which are ſuitably furniſhed with pictures, gilding, velvet, tapeſtry, and other rich hangings.

Before the houſe is an octangular baſon which ſeems equal to the length of the front. On each ſide as you approach the houſe are two marble ſtatues of Hercules and Venus, with obeliſks and vaſes alternately placed. The garden front has not any portico, but a pediment with a bas relief ſupported by ſix three quarter columns.

The church belonging to this pariſh was ſome few years ago rebuilt, chiefly by the liberality of Sir Richard Child, bart. lord viſcount Caſtlemain; and in the chancel is a very ſuperb monument for Sir Joſiah Child, whoſe ſtatue in white marble ſtands pointing downward to the inſcription. Underneath lies the figure of Bernard his ſecond ſon, and on each ſide ſits a woman veiled, one leaning her head upon her hand, and the other cloſing her hands and wringing them. There are alſo ſeveral boys in mourning poſtures, and one expreſſing the vanity of life by blowing up a bubble.

WIMBLETON.

This is the village where Ethelbert king of Kent was defeated in a battle by Ceaulin the Weſt Saxon, in the year 568. The common or heath, which is ſuppoſed to be as high as that of Hampſtead, is about a mile each way, and is adorned on the ſides with ſeveral handſome ſeats.

About half a mile ſouth from the road, on the common, ſtands Wimbleton houſe, which was built by Sir Thomas Cecil, ſon of the lord treaſurer Burleigh, in the year 1588, and was afterwards general Lambert's, who had here a moſt remarkable fine flower garden.

The manor of Wimbleton was purchaſed by Sarah Churchill, dutcheſs dowager of Marlborough, who left it to the late John Spencer, eſq; brother to the late duke of Marlborough, together with a fine ſeat ſhe built here, which is adorned with a grand terrace walk, that extends from the houſe to the ſeat of Sir Abraham Janſſen, bart. and has a beautiful proſpect to the ſouth.

WOOLWICH.

This town is ſituated on the ſouthern bank of the Thames, about nine miles from London. Here is a royal dock, the oldeſt in the kingdom, for building ſhips of war; and alſo a gun-yard called called the Warren. In the former more ſhips have been built than in any other two docks in the kingdom; and in the latter, artillery of all kinds and dimenſions are caſt. Here the company of matroſſes are employed in making up cartridges, and in charging bombs, carcaſes, and grenadoes, for the public ſervice. Here are likewiſe in this town many yards of warehouſes, and magazines of military and naval ſtores; and an academy has been lately eſtabliſhed here, for teaching the military ſciences, and whatever elſe relates to the attack and defence of fortified places.

A guardſhip is generally ſtationed in the river before the dock-yard, where the water is ſo deep that the largeſt ſhips may ſafely ride without touching the ground, even at low water.

The town has been of late years conſiderably enlarged, and the pariſh church rebuilt in a very handſome manner, as one of the fifty new churches. Here is a weekly market on Friday.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Containing an account of the principal towns, villages, remarkable places, and public buildings out of the bill of mortality, and within the circumference of twenty miles of London.

ADDINGTON.

THIS village is ſituated at the deſcent of a high ſpacious common to which it gives name, about three miles from Croydon, in the county of Surry. Its church, though ſaid to be above three hundred years old, is ſtill very ſubſtantial; but the moſt remarkable circumſtance is, that the lord of the manor held it in the reign of Henry III. by the ſervice of making his majeſty a meſs of pottage in an earthen pot in the king's kitchen at his coronation. And ſo late as the coronation of king Charles II. Thomas Leigh, eſq; then lord of the manor, made a meſs according to his tenure, and brought it to his majeſty's table, when that king, though he did not taſte what he had prepared, yet accepted of his ſervice.

St. ALBANS.

This town, which is ſituated on the river Ver, twenty miles from London, received its name from an abbey built here about the year 703, to the memory of St. Albanus, the firſt martyr of Britain, who ſuffered in the firſt perſecution of the emperor Dioclеſian. It is incorporated by charter, and governed by a mayor, high ſteward, recorder, twelve aldermen, a town clerk, and twenty-four aſſiſtants.

In this borough there is a particular diſtrict called a Liberty, which has a juriſdiction, both in eccleſiaſtical and civil matters, peculiar to itſelf. This liberty has a jail, and a jail-delivery at St. Albans four times a year, on the Thurſday after the quarter ſeſſions at Hertford.

There are four wards in this town, in each of which are two churchwardens and a conſtable. It is large and populous, though not one of the moſt beautiful towns in the kingdom. The country round it is, however, very pleaſant, and abounds with fine ſeats. Here are two charity ſchools; one founded for twenty-eight boys, who are cloathed; and the other for twenty-one girls, of whom fourteen only are cloathed.

The origin of St. Albans was owing to the monaſtery built by Offa, king of the Mercians, to the memory of St. Alban, in expiation of his barbarous murder of Ethelbert, king of the Eaſt-Angles, whom he had treacherouſly inveigled to his court, on pretence of marrying his daughter. This monaſtery or abbey church has been rebuilt in whole or part ſeveral times. The town purchaſed it at the diſſolution for four hundred pounds, which prevented ſo noble a fabric being pulled down, and torn to pieces, for making money of the materials; and it is made a pariſh church for the borough.

In this ancient edifice is a funeral monument and effigies of king Offa, who is repreſented ſeated on his throne; under which is the following inſcription:

Fundator Eccleſiæ circa annum 793.
Quem male depictum, et reſidentem cernitis alte
Sublimem ſolio, MERCIUS OFFA fuit.

That is,

The founder of the church about the year 793.
Whom you behold ill-painted on his throne
Sublime, was once for MERCIAN OFFA known.

On the eaſt ſide ſtood the ſhrine of St. Alban, where is ſtill to be ſeen the following ſhort inſcription:

S. ALBANUS VEROL AMENSIS, ANGLORUM PROTOMARTYR, 17 Junii 293.

In the ſouth iſle near the above ſhrine is the monument of Humphry, brother to king Henry V. commonly diſtinguiſhed by the title of the Good Duke of Glouceſter. It is adorned with a ducal coronet, and the arms of France and England quartered. In niches on one ſide are ſeventeen kings; but in the niches on the other ſide there are not any ſtatues remaining. The inſcription, which alludes to the pretended miraculous cure of a blind man, detected by the duke, is as follows:

Piæ

Piæ Memoriæ V. Opt. Sacrum.

Hic jacet HUMPHREDUS, dux ille Gloceſtrius olim.
Henrici ſexti protector, fraudis ineptæ
Detector, dum ficta notat miracula cœci
Lumen erat patriæ, columen venerabile regni,
Pacis amans, Muſiſque favens melioribus; unde
Gratum opus Oxonio, quæ nunc ſchola ſacra refulget.
Invida ſed mulier regno, regi, ſibi nequam,
Abſtulit hunc, humili vix hoc dignata ſepulcro.
Invidia rumpente tamen, poſt funera vivat.

In Engliſh thus:

Sacred to the pious memory of an excellent man.

Interr'd within this conſecrated ground
Lies he, whom Henry his protector found;
Good Humphrey, Glo'ſter's duke, who well could ſpy
Fraud couch'd within the blind impoſtor's eye:
His country's light, the ſtate's rever'd ſupport,
Who peace, and riſing learning, deign'd to court;
Whence his rich library, at Oxford plac'd,
Her ample ſchools with ſacred influence grac'd:
Yet fell beneath an envious woman's wile,
Both to herſelf, her king, and kingdom, vile;
Who ſcarce allow'd his bones this ſpot of land;
Yet ſpite of envy ſhall his glory ſtand.

In digging for a grave about forty years ago, the ſtairs leading to the vault where the body lies, were diſcovered. It contains a leaden coffin, with the body preſerved by the pickle it lies in, except the legs, from which the fleſh is waſted, the pickle of that end being dried up. On the wall at the eaſt end of the vault is a crucifix painted, with a cup on each ſide of the head; another at the ſide; and a fourth at the feet.

The weſt end of the choir hath a noble piece of Gothic workmanſhip, for the ornament of the high altar. And there are many curious models and coins to be ſeen in the church, which have been dug out of the ruins of old Verulam.

Beſides this venerable piece of antiquity, there are in this town three churches, viz. St. Michael's, St. Peter's, and St. Stephen's.

In the church of St. Michael, is a monument of the famous Francis Bacon, lord Verulam, and viſcount of St. Albans. It was erected by Sir Thomas Marrin, who had been ſecretary to this great man. The philoſopher is ſitting thoughtfully in an elbow chair; and on the monument is this inſcription:

Franciſc. Bacon, Baro de Verulam, Sti. Albani Viceco.
Seu notioribus titulis,
Scientiarum lumen, facundiæ lex,
Sic fedebat.
Qui, poſtquam omnia naturalis ſapientiæ,
Et civilis arcana evolviſſet,
Naturæ decretum explevit,
Compoſita ſolvantur,
An. Dom. 1626. Ætat. 66.
Tanti viri mem. Thomas Meautys, ſuperſtitis cultor;
Defuncti admirator.

In Engliſh thus.

Francis Bacon, baron of Verulam, and viſcount of St. Albans; or by his more known titles, the light of the ſciences, and the law of eloquence; was thus accuſtomed to ſit; who, after having unravelled all the myſteries of natural and civil wiſdom, fulfilled the degree of nature, "that things joined ſhould be looſed," in the year of our Lord 1626, and of his age 66.

To the memory of ſo great a man, this was erected by Sir Thomas Meautys, who reverenced him while living, and admires him dead.

The late dutcheſs dowager of Marlborough had a ſeat here, and which now belongs to lord Spencer, built by the late duke upon the river Verlam, which runs through the garden; and who alſo built handſome almſhouſes at the entrance of the town.

The following remarkable inſcription and character is cut upon the pedeſtal of a fine ſtatue of the late queen Anne, carved by the noted Mr. Ryſbrack, and erected at St. Albans, at the expence of the dutcheſs, in gratitude to the memory of that excellent princeſs:

"Queen Anne was very graceful and majeſtic "in her perſon; religious without affectation. "She always meant well. She had no falſe ambition, which appeared by her never complaining at king William's being preferred to the "crown before her, when it was taken from the "king her father, for following ſuch counſels, "and purſuing ſuch meaſures, as rendered the "revolution neceſſary. It was her greateſt affliction to be forced to act againſt him, even for "ſecurity. Her journey to Nottingham was never concerted, but occaſioned by the great "conſternation ſhe was under at the king's ſudden return from Saliſbury.

"She always paid the greateſt reſpect to king "William and queen Mary; never inſiſted upon "any one circumſtance of grandeur, more than "what was eſtabliſhed in her family by king "Charles II. though, after the revolution, ſhe "was preſumptive heir to the crown, and, after "the death of her ſiſter, was in the place of "prince of Wales.

"Upon her acceſſion to the throne, the civil "liſt was not increaſed. The late earl of Godolphin, lord high treaſurer of England, often "ſaid, that from accidents in the cuſtoms, and "lenity in the collection, it did not ariſe, one "year with another, to more than five hundred "thouſand pounds a year.

"She had no variety in her expences, nor "bought any one jewel in the whole time of her "reign.

"She paid out of her civil liſt many penſions "granted in former reigns, which have ſince "been thrown upon the public.

"When a war was neceſſary to ſecure Europe "againſt the power of France, ſhe contributed, "in one year, towards the war, out of her civil "liſt, one hundred thouſand pounds, in eaſe of "her ſubjects.

"She granted the revenue ariſing from the "firſt fruits, to augment the proviſions of the "poorer clergy.

"She never refuſed her private charity to proper objects.

"Till a few years before her death, ſhe never "had but twenty thouſand pounds a year for her "privy.

" privy purſe. At the latter end of her reign, " it did not exceed twenty-ſix thouſand pounds a " year; which was much to her honour, becauſe " it is ſubject to no account. And as to her robes " it will appear by records in the exchequer, " that in nine years ſhe ſpent only thirty-two " thouſand and fifty pounds, including the coro- " nation expence.

" She was extremely well bred, treated her " chief ladies and ſervants as if they had been " her equals. Her behaviour to all that ap- " proached her was decent, and full of dignity; " and ſhewed condeſcenſion, without art or " meanneſs.

" All this I know to be true.

" SARAH MARLBOROUGH.
" MDCCXXXVIII."

Near this town two bloody battles were fought between the houſes of York and Lancaſter: the firſt upon the twenty-third of May 1455, in which the Yorkiſts got the day; the ſecond on Shrove Tueſday, in the 39th of Henry VI. when the martial queen Margaret overcame the Yorkiſts, who had then the king in their power, and fought under the ſanction of his name.

In the middle of this town king Edward I. erected a very ſtately croſs in memory of queen Eleanor, who dying in Lincolnſhire was carried through St. Albans to Weſtminſter, where ſhe was interred.

St. Albans ſends two members to parliament, has a large market, eſpecially for wheat, on Saturday; and three annual fairs, viz. the 25th of March, the 17th of June, and the 29th of September, all for the ſale of horſes, cows and ſheep, and for hiring of ſervants.

On the weſt ſide of the river Ver, oppoſite to this town, ſtood the ancient and famous city of Verulam. When Julius Cæſar invaded Britain, Verulam was a large and populous place, though the only remains of it at preſent are, the ruins of walls, and ſome teſſalated pavements and Roman coins, which have from time to time been diſcovered by digging.

About the year 1666 there was dug up in this place a copper coin, which on one ſide had Romulus and Remus ſucking the wolf; and on the other, the word Roma, much defaced.

When the Romans drove from hence the powerful Caſſibelinus, who is ſuppoſed to have been king of the Caſſii, they plundered the town of Verulam; but the inhabitants living quietly under their government, they were rewarded with the privileges of citizens of Rome, and their town made a municipium, or city. This was one of the two Roman cities that were taken and ſacked by the Britons, under the conduct of Boadicia, queen of the Iceni, in the reign of the emperor Nero, when a moſt dreadful ſlaughter was made of the Romans, and their allies. The other city deſtroyed by the Britons on this occaſion, was Maldon, in Eſſex; but both theſe places were afterwards rebuilt, and flouriſhed under the Romans.

In the fields adjoining to St. Albans, Garinus, an abbot of that place, founded, about the year 1190, an houſe or hoſpital for ſix poor perſons, and leprous women. It was dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and called St. Mary de la Pray; which, in courſe of time, became ſo well endowed, that a princeſs, and ſeveral nuns of the order of St. Benedict, were maintained here. Cardinal Wolſey, commendatory abbot of St. Albans, procured, about the year 1528, a bull from pope Clement VIII. for the ſuppreſſion of this nunnery, and annexing the revenues to the monaſtery of St. Albans; but on the ſixth of June, in the 20th year of Henry VIII. he obtained a grant of it, together with all the lands belonging to that houſe, for himſelf. After the cardinal's attainder, the king exchanged it for other lands, with the abbey of St. Albans.

BANSTED.

This village is ſituated between Darking and Croydon in Surry, and is remarkable for producing a great quantity of walnuts; but much more for its downs, one of the moſt delighful ſpots in England, on account of the agreeable ſeats in that neighbourhood; for the extenſive proſpect of ſeveral counties on both ſides the Thames, and even of the royal palaces of Windſor and Hampton Court; and for the fineneſs of the turf, covered with a ſhort graſs intermixed with thyme, and other fragant herbs, that render the mutton of this tract, though ſmall, remarkable for its ſweetneſs. On theſe downs there is a four miles courſe for horſe races, which is greatly frequented.

BARKING.

This is a large market town in Eſſex, ſituated about eleven miles from London, on a creek that leads to the Thames, from whence fiſh is ſent up in boats to London, the town being chiefly inhabited by fiſhermen.

This pariſh has been ſo much enlarged by lands recovered from the Thames, and the river, Rothing, which runs on the weſt ſide of the town, that it has two chapels of eaſe, one at Ilford, and another called New Chapel, on the ſide of Epping Foreſt; and the great and ſmall tythes are computed at above 600l. per annum.

At a ſmall diſtance from the town, in the way to Dagenham, ſtood a large old houſe, in which the gunpowder plot is ſaid to have been firſt projected.

BARNET.

This town is ſituated in the road to St. Albans, eleven miles from London, on the top of a hill, whence it is called High Barnet, and alſo Chipping, or Cheaping Barnet, from king Henry the ſecond's granting the monks of St. Albans the privilege of holding a market here.

In this town is an alms-houſe founded and endowed by James Ravenſcroft, eſq; for ſix widows. Likewiſe a free-ſchool founded by queen Elizabeth, and endowed partly by that princeſs, and partly partly by alderman Owen of London, whoſe additional endowment is paid by the fiſhmongers company, who appoint twenty-four governors, by whom the maſters and uſhers are choſen to teach ſeven children gratis, and all the other children for five ſhillings a quarter. The church is a chapel of eaſe to the village of Eaſt Barnet.

Here is a famous market for corn and cattle, held on Wedneſday; and ſix annual fairs, viz. the 8th, 9th, and 10th of April, for toys: and the 4th, 5th, and 6th of September, for Engliſh, Welſh, and Scotch cattle.

This place is remarkable for a deciſive battle fought in its neighbourhood on Eaſter-day 1468, between the houſes of York and Lancaſter, in which the great earl of Warwick, ſtiled the ſetter up, and puller down of kings, was ſlain, together with many of the principal nobility, and ten thouſand men. The place ſuppoſed to have been the field of battle is a green ſpot near Kick's End, between St. Albans and Hatfield roads, a little before they meet; and here, in the year 1740, a ſtone column was erected, on which is a long inſcription, giving a particular account of that battle.

Eaſt Barnet is a pleaſant village ſituate near Whetſtone and Endfield Chace, and was formerly much frequented on account of its medicinal ſpring, which was diſcovered in a neighbouring common upwards of an hundred years ago. The church is a mean edifice; but the rectory is very beneficial.

Here is the fine ſeat of the lord Trevor, to which queen Elizabeth gave the name of Mount Pleaſant.

Though the following place is within the bill of mortality, yet as it is neither a town or village, it could not with propriety be inſerted in the laſt chapter.

BLACKHEATH.

This is a very extenſive plain ſituated to the ſouth of Greenwich, and is ſaid to have received its name from the colour of the ſoil. It was on this plain that Wat Tyler, the famous rebel in the reign of Richard II. muſtered near an hundred thouſand men. On the heath is an eminence called Shooter's-hill, from whence there is a moſt extenſive and beautiful proſpect; and on the top of this hill is a ſpring, which conſtantly overflows, and is never frozen in the ſevereſt weather. Some time ſince a plan was formed for building a ſuperb town on this hill, and ſome of the houſes actually finiſhed; but the deſign was laid aſide, on account of the ground being ſo full of ſprings, that no cellars could be formed, nor the foundations ſecurely laid.

The only remarkable building in this place is the magnificent ſeat of Sir Gregory Page, bart. It is a noble building, with two handſome fronts; that to the ſouth is ornamented with an Ionic portico. The hall is a very elegant room, adorned with handſome pillars, and other ornaments in a good taſte. The dining-room is well proportioned, with a ſmall receſs for the ſide board; the fitting up, rich carving and gilding, on a white ground; chimney-piece of white marble poliſhed, and very beautiful. This room opens into the gallery, which is ſixty feet long, twenty broad, and twenty high; the ceiling, cornice, door caſes, and all the ornaments very elegant gilt carving on white grounds. The crimſon bedchamber is very handſomely ornamented; and the bed is placed in a part ſeparated from the reſt of the room by pillars. This opens into the library, which is forty-five by twenty, and is ſupported by very handſome pillars. In ſhort, the whole fitting up and furniſhing this magnificent ſtructure, is exceedingly ſuperb. The rooms are hung with crimſon, and ſilks and damaſks; and the cornices, ceilings, door-caſes. ſlab, ſofa, and chair frames, all carved and gilt in a juſt taſte. The chimney-pieces are very beautiful, being of white marble poliſhed, and ſome of them elegantly decorated with wreaths and feſtoons of wrought marble.

Beſides theſe beautiful ornaments, this houſe is likewiſe adorned with many capital pictures, a liſt whereof, for the ſatisfaction of the curious, is here ſubjoined.

BLECHINGLY.

This is a ſmall, ancient parliamentary borough, ſituate twenty miles from London, in the county of Surry. It had a caſtle, which, with the manor, is or was ſome years ſince in poſſeſſion of the family of Sir William Clayton. The bailiff, who returns its members, is choſen annually at the lord of the manor's court. The town ſtands on a hill, on the ſide of Holmſdale, with a fine proſpect as far as the ſouth downs, and Suſſex; and from ſome ruins of the caſtle, which are ſtill viſible, though overgrown with a coppice, there is a proſpect eaſt into Kent, and weſt into Hampſhire. Here is an almſhouſe for ten poor people, and a free ſchool for twenty poor children. It has a handſome church, which had a ſpire, but in 1606 it was conſumed by lightning, and all the bells melted.

This place ſends two members to parliament, though it has no weekly market; and here are two annual fairs, viz. the twenty-ſecond of June, and the ſecond of November, for horſes, bullocks and toys.

CARSHALTON.

This village, which is in Surry, is ſituated among innumerable ſprings, which altogether form a river in the very center of the place, and joining other ſprings that flow from Croydon and Beddington, make one ſtream called the Wandell.

Though this village is thus ſituated among ſprings, it is built upon firm chalk, and on one of

of the moſt beautiful ſpots on that ſide of London, on which account it has many fine houſes belonging to the citizens of London, ſome of which are built with ſuch grandeur and expence, that they might be rather taken for the ſeats of the nobility, than the country houſes of citizens and merchants. Mr. Scawen intended to build a magnificent houſe here in a fine park which is walled round, and great quantity of ſtone and other materials were collected by him for the purpoſe; but the deſign was never carried into execution. Here alſo doctor Ratcliff built a very fine houſe, which afterwards belonged to Sir John Fellows, who added gardens and curious waterworks. It at length paſſed into the hands of the lord Hardwick, who ſold it to the late William Mitchell, eſq; by whoſe family it is at this time poſſeſſed.

CASHIOBURY.

This is ſituated ſixteen miles north of London, in the county of Hertford; and is ſaid to have been the ſeat of the kings of Mercia, during the heptarchy, till Offa gave it to the monaſtery of St. Albans. Henry VIII. however beſtowed it on Richard Moriſon, eſq; from whom it paſſed to Arthur lord Capel, baron of Hadham, and from him came by inheritance to be the manor of the earls of Eſſex, who have here a noble ſeat erected in the form of an H, with a large park adorned with fine woods and walks. The gardens were planted and laid out by Le Notre in the reign of king Charles II. The front and one ſide are of brick and modern, but the other ſide is very antique.

CHERTSEY.

This town, which is ſituate in Surry, nineteen miles from London, has a bridge over the Thames to Shepperton in Middleſex; and its principal trade is in malt, which is ſent in barges from hence to London. It gives name to a hundred, which has the particular privilege of being exempted from the juriſdiction of the high ſheriff, who muſt direct his writ to the bailiff of it, who is appointed for life by letters patent from the exchequer. It is noted for the burial place of Henry V. whoſe bones were afterwards removed by Henry VII. to Windſor; and for the retreat of the celebrated poet Mr. Cowley from court to the exerciſes of a country life, the happineſs of which he has beautifully deſcribed in one of his poems; as he has, in another, the baſe ſervility of a court life, and his hearty abhorence of it, in that well known diſtich.

Were I to curſe the man I hate,
Attendance and dependence be his fate.

Here is a market on Wedneſdays, and four annual fairs, viz. the firſt Monday in Lent, for horſes, cattle, and hops; the fourteenth of May, the ſixth of Auguſt and the twenty-fifth of September, for horſes, cattle and toys.

At Coway Stakes, near this place, Julius Cæſar paſſed the Thames. There is a handſome free-ſchool here, built by Sir William Perkins. Its market was granted by king James I.

CHESHUNT.

This village is ſituate about three miles to the ſouth of Hoddeſdon, in Hertfordſhire, and is thought by ſome to be the Ducalitum of Antoninus, which, in his Itenerary, he places fifteen miles from London, and which ſtands near the military way called Ermine-ſtreet.

In Kilſmore-fields, weſt of Cheſhunt, are the remains of a camp. The angle of the ſquare, or rather oblong fortification, is ſtill remaining, and the rampart and ditch are very viſible for above an hundred yards.

There was formerly in this village a benedictine nunnery, dedicated to the Virgin Mary. It was founded about the year 1183, and afterwards augmented with the lands and tenements of the canons of Cathel, in the 24th of Henry III. But notwithſtanding this augmentation of its revenues, it was valued, on the diſſolution of religious houſes, at no more than fourteen pounds one ſhilling per annum.

In the pariſh of Cheſhunt is a ſmall village called THEOBALDS, where formerly was built a magnificent ſeat by lord treaſurer Burleigh; the gallery of which was painted with the genealogy of the kings of England, and from thence was a deſcent into the garden, which was encompaſſed with a ditch filled with water, and large enough to have the pleaſure of rowing in a boat between the ſhrubs. It was adorned with a great variety of trees and plants, labyrinths made with much labour, a jet d'eau with its baſon of white marble, and with columns and pyramids. In the ſummer-houſe, the lower part of which was built ſemicircularly, were the twelve Roman emperors in white marble, and a table of touch-ſtone; the upper part of it was ſet round with leaden ciſterns, into which water was conveyed through pipes.

This ſeat the lord Burleigh gave to his younger ſon Sir Robert Cecil, in whoſe time king James I. ſtaying there for one night's refreſhment, as he was coming to take poſſeſſion of the crown England, he was ſo delighted with the place tha he gave him the manor of Hatfield Regis in exchange for it, and afterwards enlarged the park, and encompaſſed it with a wall ten miles round. This palace he often viſited, in order to enjoy the pleaſure of hunting in Enfield Chaſe and Epping Foreſt, and at laſt died there. In the civil wars it was however plundered and defaced; it being the place from whence king Charles I. ſet out to erect his ſtandard at Nottingham: king Charles II. granted the manor to George Monk, duke of Albemarle; but it reverting again to the crown, for want of heirs male, king William III. gave it to William Bentinck, whom he created earl of Portland, from whom it deſcended to the duke his grandſon: the great park, a part of which was in Hertfordſhire, and a part in Middleſex, is now converted into farms.

Here are ſeveral houſes belonging to perſons of diſtinction; and in this neighbourhood Richard Cromwell, who had been protector, but abdicated, paſſed the laſt part of his life in a very private manner.

CHIPPING ONGAR.

This town is ſituated twenty miles from London, in the county of Eſſex, and was formerly the manor of Richard Lacy, who being protector of England, while Henry II. was abſent in Normandy, he built a church and a caſtle here with other fortifications, the remains of which are ſtill to be ſeen.

COBHAM.

Though this town is but ſmall, yet it has ſome good inns, being ſituated in the high road to Portſmouth, about ſixteen miles from London. It has two annual fairs, one on the ſeventeenth of March for toys; and the other on the eleventh of December, for horſes and ſheep.

Near Cobham are ſeveral fine ſeats, particularly that of Mr. Bridges, which is built in a very ſingular taſte, ſomething after the model of an Italian villa, but very plain on the outſide. The apartments within are very commodious, and the principal rooms elegantly fitted up, and richly ornamented. The offices below are very convenient, and judiciouſly contrived to anſwer the purpoſes for which they were deſigned. But what chiefly ſtrikes the beholder's eye, is a falſe ſtory contrived on each ſide of the houſe, taken from the difference in the height of the ſide rooms from thoſe principal apartments; and theſe are converted into long galleries, with a ſmall apartment at one end, which affords a communication between them.

The houſe is ſituated on an eminence, ſo that it commands a proſpect of the adjacent fields, which are kept in very exact order; and there is a declivity from the houſe to the river Mole, which paſſes by the ſide of the garden. It ſtands about a mile from the road, and is ſo much hid by the trees near it, as not be ſeen till the ſpectator riſes on the heath beyond Cobham, where, in ſeveral parts of the road between that and Ripley are fine views of it.

There are in this neighbourhood two other elegant ſeats, one belonging to lord Ligonier, and the other to——Hamilton, eſq. The gardens and ornamented park of the latter is ſaid to be exceeded by few in England.

COLNBROOK, or COLEBROOK.

This town is ſituated in two counties, one part being in Middleſex, and the other in Buckinghamſhire. It ſtands on four channels of the river Coln, over each of which it has a bridge, and is about eighteen miles from London. It is ſituated in the high road to Bath, and has ſeveral conſiderable inns by which it principally ſubſiſts.

Here is a charity ſchool, and an ancient chapel, ſaid to have been founded by king Edward III. Likewiſe a weekly market on Tueſday, and two annual fairs, viz. the fifth of April, and the firſt of May, both for horſes, black cattle and ſheep.

CRAYFORD.

This town, which is ſituate two miles to the weſt of Dartford, and about fourteen miles from London, received its name from its ſituation on a ſmall river called the Cray, over which there was formerly a ford. It is an obſcure town, and has not any thing remarkable, except a ſmall market on Tueſday. But on the heath, and in the fields near the place, are ſeveral caverns, from ten to twenty fathoms deep, narrow at the top and wide at the bottom. It is ſuppoſed by ſome that theſe were dug by the ancient Britons, and uſed by them as granaries for ſecuring their corn; but others ſuppoſe they were made by the Saxons, as receptacles for their wives and children, and effects, when they were at war with the Britons.

To the ſouth of this town is Foot's Cray, a ſmall place, remarkable for the elegant ſeat of Bouchier Cleeve, eſq; called FOOTS CRAY PLACE. It was built by himſelf after a deſign of Palladio of the Ionic order, and is very elegant. The hall is octagonal, and has a gallery, round which you are conveyed to the bedchambers. The ſituation is pleaſant, and the proſpect from the houſe very good. The edifice is built of ſtone, but the offices, which are on each ſide at ſome diſtance, are brick. The diſpoſition of the rooms within the houſe appear to be very convenient, and the ſeveral apartments are elegantly finiſhed and ſuitably furniſhed. The Chineſe bed, and other furniture of this kind in the principal bedchamber, is perfectly beautiful. The gallery, which extends the whole length of the north front of the houſe is a very grand room, and is filled with pictures by the moſt eminent maſters; and there are ſeveral other good pieces of this kind in the dining room and parlour; a liſt of all which is as follows:

Common Parlour.

Admittance to ſee the houſe is by tickets from Mr. Cleeve, every Thurſday during the ſummer.

CROYDON.

This is a very large and populous town, ſituate on the edge of Banſtead downs, about eleven miles from London, in the county of Surry. It is ſaid that in this town was formerly a royal palace, which, with the manor, was given to the archbiſhops of Canterbury, who converted it to their uſe; but it is now greatly decayed. Archbiſhop Whitgift founded an hoſpital here, which is a handſome building, in the form of a college, and endowed with farms, for the maintenance of a warden, and twenty-eight men and women, poor decayed houſekeepers of this town and Lambeth; and a ſchool for ten boys and ten girls, who are all cloathed and taught, with a houſe for the maſter, who muſt be a clergyman, endowed with twenty pounds a year for his ſalary.

This church, which is the largeſt and fineſt in the county, ſtands by the palace, and contains many remarkable monuments; particularly that of doctor Grindall, whoſe effigies lie on his tomb in his epiſcopal robes. Another of archbiſhop Sheldon, reckoned one of the fineſt in England; and one for Mr. Tyrrel, a grocer of London, who gave two hundred pounds to erect a market-houſe, beſides forty pounds to beautify the church.

The town is encompaſſed with hills, well ſtored with wood, of which great quantities of charcoal are made, and ſent to London. The market is chiefly for oats and meal, though there is a great ſale of wheat and barley. Here are likewiſe two annual fairs for cattle; one held the fifth of July, and the other the ſecond of October.

DARTFORD or DARENTFORD.

This town is ſo called from its ſituation on the river Darent, * which runs through it, and at a ſmall diſtance falls into the Thames. It is ſituate in Kent, ſixteen miles from London, in the high road to Canterbury and Dover, and, on that account, is remarkable for containing a great number of inns and other public houſes. The market, which is on Saturdays, is chiefly for corn, and the town has the honour of giving the title of viſcount to the earl of Jerſey.

* On this river the fineſt paper-mill in England was erected by Sir John Spilman, who obtained a patent and 200l. per annum from king Charles I. to enable him to carry on that manufacture: and on this river was alſo the firſt mill for ſlitting iron bars to make wire.

In this town king Edward III. about the year 1355, founded and endowed a celebrated nunnery, which he dedicated to St. Mary and St. Margaret. The prioreſs and nuns were firſt of the order of St. Auguſtine, then of St. Dominic. and afterwards of St. Auguſtine again. At the diſſolution they were a ſecond time of the order of St. Dominic, but under the government of Black friars ſettled at Langley in Hertfordſhire. It was endowed at the ſuppreſſion with yearly revenues amounting to 380l 9s.

The church, which is large, and dedicated to the Trinity, has two church-yards, one round the edifice, and the other without the town, on the top of a hill, which is ſo high, that it overlooks the tower of the church.

DATCHET.

This is a pleaſant village ſituated in Buckinghamſhire, about eighteen miles from London. It is noted for its horſe races, and has a bridge over the Thames erected in the reign of queen Anne.

In this pariſh is Ditton park, the houſe belonging to which is an ancient and venerable manſion, and was built by Sir Ralph Winwood, ſecretary of ſtate to king James I. after which it came into the Montague family; but on the demiſe of the late duke the houſe and manor of Datchet came to the preſent earl of Cardigan. The former is built in the manner of a caſtle, ſurrounded by a large moat, in the middle of the park, which is well planted with timber. The apartments are large and beautifully painted; and in the picture gallery is a good collection of paintings, many of which are executed by the beſt artiſts.

EGHAM.

This town is ſituated on the bank of the Thames, almoſt oppoſite to Staines, and three miles on this ſide of Windſor. It has ſeveral good inns, a noble charity ſchool, and an almshouſe built and endowed by Baron Denham, ſurveyor of the works to king Charles II. for five poor old women, each of whom has an orchard. The parſonage houſe was formerly the ſeat of Sir John Denham, who, rebuilt it. This Sir John was father to the poet of that name, who made this ſpot his principal place of retirement.

EPSOM.

This is a very handſome and well built town in Surry, ſixteen miles from London. It abounds with very genteel houſes, which are principally the retreats of the merchants and citizens of London, and is a delightful place open to Banſtead Downs. Its mineral waters which iſſue from a riſing ground adjoining, were diſcovered in 1618, and ſoon became extremely famous; but though they are not impaired in virtue, they are far from being in the ſame repute as formerly; however, the ſalt made of them is valued all over Europe. The hall, galleries, and other public apartments, are now gone to decay, and there remains only one houſe on the ſpot, which is inhabited by a countryman and his wife, who carry the waters in bottles to the adjacent places. Horſe races are annually held on the neighbouring downs.

There are many fine ſeats in the neighbourhood, particularly lord Guildford's, lord Baltimore's, the lady Fielding's, and the earl of Berkſhire's. The town extends about a mile and a half in a ſemicircle, from the church to lord Guildford's ſeat at Durdam; and it has been obſerved that there are here ſo many fields, meadows, orchards, and gardens, that a ſtranger would be at a loſs to know whether this was a town in a wood, or a wood in a town.

ERITH.

This village is ſituate on the bank of the Thames, about fourteen miles from London, in the county of Kent. The village itſelf has not any thing remarkable; but on the brow of a hill, nearly adjoining is BELVEDERE HOUSE, the manſion of the late Sampſon Gideon, eſq. This houſe commands a vaſt extent of a fine country many miles beyond the Thames; which is about a mile and a half diſtant. The river and navigation add greatly to the beauty of the ſcene, which exhibits to the eye of the delighted ſpectator, as pleaſing a landſcape of the kind as imagination can form. The innumerable ſhips employed in the immenſe trade of London are beheld continually ſailing up and down the river. On the other ſide are proſpects not leſs beautiful, though of another kind.

The houſe is but ſmall, though an addition has been made of a very noble room, this and two others are finely furniſhed with pictures, of which the following is a catalogue. The collection, though not numerous, is very valuable, it containing none but pieces which are originals by the greateſt maſters, and ſome of them very capital.

In the long Parlour.

View of Venice, by Canaletti.
Ditto, with the Doge marrying the ſea, ditto.
Time bringing truth to light, a ſketch, Rubens.
The Alchymiſt, Teniers.
Portrait of Sir John Gage, Holbein.
A landſcape, G. Pouſſin.
Battle of the Amazons, Rottenhammer.
The unjuſt ſteward, Quintin Matſys.

In the Lobby.

Noah's ark, Velvet Brughel.
St. Catherine, Leonardo da Vinci.
Van Trump, Francis Hals.
Vulcan, or the element of fire, Baſſan.
A picture of horſes, its companion, Wouverman.
Two inſides of churches, ſmall, De Neef.
A Dutch woman and her three children, Sir Ant. More.
Rembrandt painting an old woman, himſelf.
A courtezan and her gallant, Giorgione.
The golden age, Velvet Brughel.

Snyders

Snyders with his wife and child, Rubens.
Rebecca bringing preſents to Laban, De la Hyre.
Boors at cards, Teniers.
The element of earth, Jai. Baſſan.
Marriage in Cana of Gallilee, P. Veroneſe.
Two landſcapes.
The genealogy of Chriſt, Albert Durer.
Beggar boys at cards, Salvator Roſa.
Herod conſulting the wiſemen, Rembrandt.
Marriage of St. Catharine, Old Palma.
Two fine bas relievos in braſs, one Bacchus and Ariadne, the other Ceres teaching Triptolemus the uſe of the plough, Soldani.

In the Saloon.

The conception, painted for an altar-piece, Murillo.
The flight into Egypt, its companion, ditto.
Vulcan, Venus, Cupid, and ſundry figures, an emblematic ſubject, Tintoret.
Mars and Venus, P. Veroneſe.
Chriſt among the doctors, L. Giordano.
Duke of Buckingham's three children, and a ſon of Rubens, himſelf.
A landſcape, Claude.
Leopald's gallery, Teniers,
Teniers's own gallery, its companion, ditto.

ESHER.

This village is ſituated near Walton upon Thames, and is remarkable for containing two very elegant buildings; the firſt of which, called ESHER PLACE, was the ſeat of the late Henry Pelham, eſq.

The houſe is a Gothic ſtructure, built of a browniſh red brick, with ſtone facings to the doors, windows, &c. It ſtands upon almoſt the loweſt ground belonging to it, and has the river Mole gliding cloſe by it, and through the grounds. This houſe was originally one of thoſe built by Cardinal Wolſey; and here it is ſaid, that Cardinal was firſt ſeized by order of Henry VIII. on his refuſing to annul his marriage with queen Catharine, and which refuſal brought on his fall. The late Mr. Pelham, however, rebuilt the whole, except the two towers in the body, which are the ſame that belonged to the old building.

The grand floor of the houſe is elegantly finiſhed, and conſiſts of ſix rooms. The great parlour is carved and gilt in a taſte ſuitable to the ſtile of the houſe, with curious marble chimney-pieces and ſlabs. In this room are the portraits of Mr. Pelham, Sir Robert Walpole, afterwards earl of Orford, lord Townſhend, duke of Rutland, the late duke of Devonſhire, and the late duke of Grafton; a picture of lady Catharine Pelham and her ſon is over the chimney. In the drawing-room, over the chimney, is a picture of king Charles II. when only eleven years old, by Vandyke. The library is curiouſly finiſhed, and there is a good collection of books in it.

There is a fine ſummer-houſe built upon a hill on the left hand as you enter, which commands the view of the houſe, park, and country round on both ſides of the Thames for many miles. The park or ground in which the houſe is ſituated, appears quite plain and unadorned; yet perhaps not a little art has been uſed to give it this natural and ſimple appearance, which is certainly very pleaſing. But in one part of it there is a pretty wilderneſs laid out in walks, and planted with a variety of ever-green trees and plants, with a grotto in it, and ſeats in different places. The wood in the park is well diſpoſed, and conſiſts of fine oak, elm, and other trees; and the whole country round appears finely ſhaded with wood.

The other building with which this village is adorned is CLAREMONT, the ſeat of the late duke of Newcaſtle, but now in the poſſeſſion of lord Clive.

The houſe was deſigned and built by the late Sir John Vanbrugh, in a whimſical ſtile of architecture. It was afterwards purchaſed of Sir John by his grace who made very conſiderable improvements. The ſtructure though ſingular, does not appear to be irregular. It is built of brick, with a great deal of variety in it, and of conſiderable extent, but not much elevated. Among the improvements made by his grace was the addition of a grand room for the reception of company, when numerous, which makes the ends of the houſe not appear ſimilar. There is a lawn in the front ſhaded on each ſide with trees, and the ground behind it riſing gradually, ſhews the trees there alſo, ſo that the houſe appears to be embowered by them, except juſt in the front; and the white ſummer-houſe, with four little pinnacles, one at each corner, built on the mount which gives name to the place, when viewed from before the front of the houſe, riſes up finely from behind the trees, and altogether forms a very pleaſing appearance.

The park in which it is ſituated is diſtinguiſhed by its noble woods, lawns, walks, mounts, proſpects, &c. And the ſummer-houſe, called the Belvedera, about a mile diſtance from the houſe, affords a very beautiful and extenſive view of the adjecent countries.

ETON.

This town is ſituated on the banks of the Thames, on the borders of Berkſhire, and joined to Windſor by a wooden bridge. It is famous for its beautiful college, founded by Henry VI. in the nineteenth year of his reign for a provoſt, ten prieſts, four clerks, ſix choriſters, twenty-five poor grammar-ſcholars, with a maſter to teach them, and twenty-five poor old men. Some of the endowments were taken away by Edward IV. and at the general diſſolution, out of which it was particularly excepted, the annual revenue was valued at no more than eight hundred and eighty-ſix pounds twelve ſhillings. But this revenue has been ſince increaſed to five thouſand pounds a year; and the college now conſiſts of a provoſt and ſeven fellows, two ſchoolmaſters, two conducts, an organiſt, ſeven clerks, ten choriſters, and other officers. Seventy poor grammar ſcholars are inſtructed here; they are nominated by the king, and thence called King's ſcholars; theſe, when properly qualified, are elected on the firſt

Tueſday in Auguſt, to King's college, in the univerſity of Cambridge; where, after being ſtudents three years, they claim a fellowſhip: but as there is not always a vacancy at Cambridge, the ſcholars remain at Eaton till vacancies happen, and theſe vacancies they fill up according to ſeniority.

The ſchool is divided into two parts, the upper and the lower, and each of theſe is ſubdivided into three claſſes. Children are admitted very young into the lower ſchool; none enter the upper ſchool till they can make latin verſes, and have acquired ſome knowledge of the Greek. Beſides the ſeventy ſcholars on the foundation, there are ſeldom leſs than three hundred others, for whoſe education the maſters are paid, and who board at the maſters houſes. The maſter of each ſchool has therefore four uſhers. The building has large cloiſters like the religious houſes abroad, and the chapel is a noble pile of Gothic architecture.

The preſent ſchool-room is a modern building, and the other parts of the college have been repaired and beautified at a great expence. There is a library for the uſe of the ſchool, and the number of the books have been greatly increaſed by two other collections; one bequeathed by doctor Waddington, ſometime biſhop of Cheſter, valued at two thouſand pounds; and the other by the late lord chief juſtice Reeves, to whom the collection had been bequeathed by Richard Tapham, eſq; keeper of the records in the tower of London. The gardens are very large and pleaſant, extending from the college almoſt to the Thames.

GATTON.

This village is ſituate under the ſide of a hill in the road to Ryegate, about eighteen miles from London in the county of Surry. It is a borough by preſcription, and was formerly a large town, but now a mean village, with a ſmall church, without fair or market; yet, ever ſince the 29th of Henry VI. has ſent members to parliament, that are returned by its conſtable, who is annually choſen at a court held by the lord of the manor for that purpoſe.

This town is ſuppoſed to have been known to the Romans, by reaſon of their coins, and other antiquities that have been diſcovered here; and where the manor-houſe ſtands it is ſaid there was once a caſtle. This place ſends two members to parliament.

GRAVESEND.

This town is ſituated on the Thames, oppoſite to Tilbury Fort, and about five miles eaſt from Dartford, in Kent. It is a large and populous town, but the ſtreets are narrow and dirty, and the buildings mean. In the eaſt part of it are the remains of an old chapel, ſuppoſed originally to have belonged to ſome religious houſe.

This town, and Milton, a ſmall village to the eaſt of Graveſend, was incorporated in the 10th year of queen Elizabeth, by the ſtile of the portreve, jurats, and inhabitants of Graveſend and Milton; but the name of portreve is now changed into that of mayor.

In the road before the town all outward bound ſhips are obliged to anchor till they have been viſited by the cuſtom-houſe officers; and for this purpoſe a centinel at the block-houſe gives notice when any ſhip is coming down the river, by firing his muſket. But the homeward bound all paſs by without notice, unleſs to receive tide-waiters on board, if they are not ſupplied before. Moſt of the outward ſhips compleat their cargoes, and take in proviſions here, which occaſions the town to be generally very full of ſeamen.

In the reign of Richard II. the French and Spaniards coming up the Thames, burnt and plundered the town, and carried away moſt of the people. To compenſate for this misfortune, the abbot of St. Mary le Grace on Tower-hill, to whom Richard II. had granted a manor belonging to Graveſend, called Parrock's, obtained a grant from the crown, that the inhabitants of this town and Milton ſhould have the ſole privilege of carrying paſſengers by water from hence to London, at four-pence the whole fare, or two-pence a head, which was confirmed by Henry VIII. but ſince that time the fare has been advanced to nine-pence per head. Coaches ply here at the coming in of the tilt boats, to carry paſſengers to Rocheſter.

In the year 1727, the whole town of Graveſend, together with its church, was conſumed by fire: and the parliament, in order to aſſiſt the inhabitants in rebuilding their town and church, granted five thouſand pounds by an act paſſed in 1731, and the church is accordingly conſidered as one of the fifty new ones, then ordered to be built at the expence of the public.

King Henry VIII. built two platforms, one in this town, and the other at Milton; they are mounted with heavy cannon, and intended as a defence to the mouth of the Thames.

In the year 1624, one Mr. Pinnock gave twenty-one dwelling-houſes here, beſides one for a maſter weaver, for the employment of the poor; and here is a charity ſcool for twenty boys, who are cloathed and educated.

The towns for ſeveral miles round Graveſend are ſupplied from hence with garden ſtuff, of which great quantities are alſo ſent to London, where the aſparagus of Graveſend is preferred to that from many other places.

Here are two weekly markets, the one on Wedneſday, and the other on Saturday; likewiſe two annual fairs, viz. the twenty-third of April, and the twenty-fourth of October, for horſes, black cattle, cloaths, toys, and various other commodities.

There are a great variety of romantic landſcapes in this neighbourhood. The hills are wild, ſteep, almoſt covered with wood, and riſe into bold variations, between the breaks of which vaſt proſpects of the valley beneath, and of the Thames winding through it, are very frequently ſeen; and from the tops of ſome of them are ſeen the moſt extenſive proſpects of the whole country.

HAMPTON

HAMPTON COURT.

This royal palace is ſituated on the north bank of the river Thames, about two miles from Kingſton. It was originally built by cardinal Wolſey, and given by him to king Henry VIII. who greatly enlarged it. King William pulled down the old apartments, and rebuilt them in the manner in which they now appear. The park and gardens are about three miles in circumference. On a pediment at the front of the palace on this ſide is a bas relief of the triumphs of Hercules over Envy; and facing it a large oval baſon, anſwering to the form of this part of the garden, which is a large oval divided into gravel walks and parterres laid out in the old taſte by thoſe two eminent gardeners London and Wiſe.

As you enter the grand walk there are two large marble vaſes of exquiſite workmanſhip; one ſaid to be performed by Mr. Cibber, and the other by a foreigner, as a trial of ſkill They are beautifully adorned with bas relief; that on the right hand repreſenting the triumphs of Bacchus, and that on the other, Amphitrite and the Nereids.

At the end of this walk, oppoſite a large canal which runs into the park, are two other large vaſes, the bas relief of one repreſenting the judgment of Paris; and that of the other Meleager hunting the wild boar. In four of the parterres are four beautiful braſs ſtatues.

The firſt is a Gladiator from the original antique in the Borgheſe palace at Rome. The ſecond is a young Apollo. The third a Diana; and the fourth Saturn going to devour one of his children. All after fine antiques.

At the gates of the palace are four large brick piers adorned with the lion and unicorn, and ſeveral trophies of war well carved in ſtone. Paſſing through a long court-yard we come to the firſt portal, decorated by Wolſey with the heads of Trajan, Adrian, Tiberius and Vitellius. Through this portal we paſs into a large quadrangle. This leads into a ſecond, where is the aſtronomical clock made by the celebrated Tompion. On the left hand of this quadrangle is the great old hall, in which queen Caroline erected a theatre. In the front is a portal of brick decorated with four Cæſars heads. On the oppoſite ſide is a ſtone colonade of fourteen columns, that leads us to a great ſtair-caſe, which, with the ceiling is painted by Verrio. On the left ſide, at the top, are repreſented Apollo and the nine muſes, at whoſe feet ſits the God Pan with his unequal reeds, and a little below them the goddeſs Ceres, holding in one hand a wheat ſheaf, and with the other pointing to loaves of bread. At her feet is Flora ſurrounded by her attendants, and holding in her right hand a chaplet of flowers. Near her are the two river Gods, Thame and Iſis, with their urns; and in the middle is a large table decorated with flowers, on which is a quantity of rich plate.

On the ceiling are Jupiter and Juno, with Ganymede riding on Jupiter's eagle, and offering the cup. Juno's peacock is in the front. One of the Parcæ, with her ſciſſars in her hand, ſeems to wait for Jove's orders to cut the thread of life. Theſe figures are covered with a fine canopy ſurrounded with the ſigns of the Zodiac, and by ſeveral Zephyrs, with flowers in their hands; and on one ſide of them is Fame with her two trumpets. Underneath is a beautiful figure of Venus riding on a ſwan, Mars addreſſing himſelf to her as a lover, and Cupid riding on another ſwan. On the right hand are Pluto and Proſerpine, Cœlus and Terra, Cybele crowned with a tower, and others. In the front are Neptune and Amphitrite, with two attendants who are ſerving them with fruit. Bacchus is leaning on a rich ewer, and, being accompanied by his attendants, places his left hand on the head of Silenus, who ſits on an aſs that is fallen down, he ſeeming to catch at a table, to which Diana above is pointing. The table is ſupported by eagles; on one ſide of it ſits Romulus, the founder of Rome, with a wolf; and on the other ſide of it is Hercules leaning on his club. Peace in her right hand holds a laurel, and in her left a palm over the head of Æneas, who ſeems inviting the twelve Cæſars, among whom is Spurina the ſoothſayer, to a celeſtial banquet. Over their heads hovers the genius of Rome, with a flaming ſword, and a bridle, the latter the emblem of government, and the former that of deſtruction.

Hence we paſs into the guard chamber, which is very large and ſpacious, and contains arms for five thouſand men, curiouſly placed in various forms. This leads us to the other rooms, which are all elegantly furniſhed with rich tapeſtry, and contain a great number of curious paintings executed by the beſt hands; an account of which is as follows:

In the king's preſence chamber, on the left hand as you enter, is a fine picture 18 feet by 15, by Sir Godfrey Kneller. King William III. is in armour on a ſtately grey horſe, trampling on trophies of war, by which lies a flaming torch. In the clouds Mercury and Peace ſupport his helmet decorated with laurel, and a Cupid holds a ſcroll. At the bottom appears Neptune and his attendants by the ſide of a rock, welcoming the hero to ſhore; and at a diſtance is ſeen a fleet of ſhips, their ſails ſwelled with the eaſt wind. In the front Plenty with his cornucopia offers him an olive branch, and Flora preſents flowers. Over the chimney is the marquis of Hamilton lord ſteward of the houſhold to king Charles I. a whole length, by Van Somer; and over the doors are two pieces of architecture, by Roſſo.

In the ſecond preſence chamber, over the chimney, is a whole length of Chriſtiern IV. king of Denmark, by Van Somer. Over the three doors are pieces of ruins and landſcapes, by Roſſo. In this room are two fine marble tables, with two pier glaſſes, and two pair of gilt ſtands. The tapeſtry is ancient but very rich, the lights being all gold, and the ſhadows ſilk; the ſhadows are, Hercules and the Hydra, and Midas with his aſſes ears.

In the next room the tapeſtry repreſents part of the ſtory of Abraham. Over the chimney is a whole length picture of Elizabeth queen of Bohemia, daughter of king James I. and over each of the two doors is a Madona by Domenico Feti.

In

In the fifth room the tapeſtry is ancient and richly wove with gold; the ſubject Abraham ſending his ſervant to get a wife for Iſaac. Over the chimney is an admirable whole length of king Charles I. by Vandyke; and over the doors two capital pictures; the one, David with Goliah's head, by Fetti; the other, the holy family, by Correggio.

In the king's ſtate bed chamber the ceiling is painted by Verrio, and repreſents Endymion lying with his head in the lap of Morpheus, and Diana admiring him as he ſleeps. Over two doors are two flower pieces, by Baptiſte; and over the chimney is a whole length of the dutcheſs of York, by Van Somer. The tapeſtry of this room repreſents the hiſtory of Joſhua, about which are eight ſilver ſconces chaſed with the judgment of Solomon. The bed, which is of crimſon velvet, is laced with gold, and on the top are plumes of white feathers.

In the king's private bedchamber, the bed is of crimſon damaſk, and the room hung with tapeſtry, the ſubject of which is Solbay fight.

The king's dreſſing-room is hung with ſtraw-coloured India damaſk, as are likewiſe the chairs, ſtools, and ſcreen. The ceiling is painted by Verrio, and repreſents Mars ſleeping in Venus's lap, with ſeveral cupids ſtealing away his armour, ſword and ſpear, and others are binding his legs and arms with fetters of roſes. Over the doors are flower pieces by Baptiſte.

In the king's writing cloſet, over each door is a flower piece by Baptiſte; and over the chimney a picture of great variety of birds by Bougdane.

Queen Mary's cloſet is hung with needle-work, ſaid to be wrought by her own hand. The chairs and ſcreen are likewiſe ſaid to be her work. Over the chimney piece is an old painting, repreſenting Jupiter's throne, near which is the thunder, and his eagle in the clouds, by Raphael.

The queen's gallery is ſeventy feet long, and twenty-five wide, and is hung with ſeven pieces of tapeſtry, repreſenting the hiſtory of Alexander the Great, from Le Brun's paintings.

The ceiling of the queen's ſtate bed-chamber is painted by Sir James Thornhill, and repreſents Aurora riſing out of the ocean in her golden chariot, drawn by four white horſes. The bed is of crimſon damaſk; and beſides other furniture the room is adorned with a glaſs luſtre, with ſilver ſockets. The pictures in this room are,

King James I. whole length, by Van Somer.
Queen Anne his conſort, ditto.
Princeſs Elizabeth their daughter, ditto.
Henry prince of Wales, whole length, Vandyke.
George I.
George II.
Queen Caroline.
Frederick prince of Wales.

The queen's drawing-room is hung with green damaſk, on which are placed nine pictures, repreſenting the triumph of Julius Cæſar, painted in water-colours upon canvas, by Andrea Mantegna. Theſe were formerly all in one piece. The ceiling of this room is painted by Verrio; in the center of which is the late queen Anne, under the character of Juſtice, holding the ſcales in one hand, and a ſword in the other. She is dreſſed in a purple robe lined with ermine, and over her head is a crown ſupported by Neptune and Britannia.

In the queen's ſtate audience room are, the duke, dutcheſs, and marchioneſs of Brunſwick their daughter; the dutcheſs of Lenox, and Margaret queen of Scots, all at full length, by Holbein. The tapeſtry in this room repreſents the children of Iſrael carrying the twelve ſtones to the river Jordan.

In the prince of Wales's preſence chamber over the doors are Guzman and Gundamor two Spaniſh ambaſſadors, and Madam Chatillon the French admiral's lady. Over the chimney Lewis XIII. with a walking ſtick in his hand, and a dog by his ſide; all by Holbein. The tapeſtry is wrought with the ſtory of Tobit and Tobias.

In the prince's drawing-room, over the chimney is the duke of Wirtemburg; and over the doors the wife of Philip II. king of Spain, and count Mansfield general of the Spaniards in the low countries, whole lengths, all by Holbein. The tapeſtry of this room repreſents Elymas the ſorceror ſtruck with blindneſs.

In the prince's bedchamber are four pictures, viz. Over the chimney a whole length of the duke of Lunenburgh, grandfather to king George I. Over the doors Philip II. king of Spain; the conſort of Chriſtiern IV. king of Denmark, and a whole length of the prince of Parma, governor of the Netherlands; all by Holbein.

In the private dining-room are four pictures of the defeat of the Spaniſh Armada, by Vandevelde; and over the chimney a fine one by Vandyke of the lord Effingham Howard, lord high admiral of England.

In the admiral's gallery are pictures of the following celebrated admirals, viz.

Sir George Rooke.
Sir Cloudeſley Shovel.
Sir John Leake.
Lord Torrington.
Admiral Churchill.
Sir Stafford Fairborne.
Sir John Jennings.
Sir Thomas Hopſon.
Admiral Beaumont.
Sir Thomas Dilks.
Admiral Bembo.
Admiral Whetſtone.
Admiral Wiſhart.
Amiral Graydon.
Admiral Munden.

All theſe are painted by Dahl, and Sir Godfrey Kneller.

In the room of beauties nine ladies are placed in the following order:

Lady Peterborough.
Lady Ranelagh.

Lady

Lady Middleton.
Miſs Pitt.
The dutcheſs of St. Albans.
Lady Eſſex.
Lady Dorſet.
Queen Mary.
The dutcheſs of Grafton.

Queen Mary was painted by Wiſſing, and all the reſt by Sir Godfrey Kneller.

In the Cartoon gallery were placed the celebrated cartoons of Raphael; but they are now removed to the queen's palace, in which they have been already mentioned.

Over the chimney piece in this gallery is a fine bas relief in white marble of Venus drawn in her chariot, and attended by ſeveral Cupids.

We now come to the queen's ſtair-caſe, where the ceiling is painted by Vick. Here is king Charles II. and Catharine his queen, with the duke of Buckingham repreſenting Science in the habit of Mercury, while Envy is ſtruck down by naked boys.

From this we deſcend into a new quadrangle, in the center of which is a round baſon, and four large lamps on pedeſtals of iron work; and on the right hand over the windows are the twelve labours of Hercules in Freſco.

The whole palace conſiſts of three quadrangles. The firſt and ſecond are Gothic, but in the latter is a moſt beautiful colonade of the Ionic order, the columns in couples, built by Sir Chriſtopher Wren. In the third court are the royal apartments, magnificently built of brick and ſtone by king William III.

Nearly adjoining to the entrance of the palace is a fine wooden bridge over the Thames, finiſhed a few years ſince, and has been of very conſiderable advantage to this part of the country.

In this neighbourhood are likewiſe ſeveral very elegant ſeats belonging to the nobility and gentry.

HARROW on the HILL.

This place is ſo called from its being ſituated on the higheſt hill in the county of Middleſex, about fifteen miles north weſt of London; on the top of which ſtands the church with a very high ſpire.

The pariſh is remarkable for a free-ſchool founded by Mr. John Lyons in the reign of queen Elizabeth; and on the fourth of Auguſt in each year a ſelect number of the ſcholars, dreſſed in the habit of archers, attend on the hill, and ſhoot at a mark for a ſilver arrow.

HERTFORD or HARTFORD.

This town is pleaſantly ſituated in a ſweet air and dry valley on the river Lea. It is built in the figure of a roman Y, and has a caſtle placed between the two horns, in which is the ſeſſions-houſe for the county. An elegant town hall has been lately erected; and here is alſo a county goal.

Hertford had formerly five churches, which are now reduced to two, All Saints, and St. Andrew's. The former is ſituated on the ſouth ſide of the town, and has a tall ſpire, covered with lead, and eight good bells, beſides an organ, and a handſome gallery for the mayor and aldermen of the borough, and for the governors of Chriſt-church hoſpital in London, who have erected a convenient houſe in this town for the reception of ſick and ſupernumerary children: they have alſo built a large gallery in the church, in which two hundred of their children may be accommodated. St. Andrew's is only remarkable for giving its name to one of the ſtreets. Here is a free grammar ſchool, founded by Richard Hale, eſq; in the reign of king James I. and endowed with forty pounds a year: the corporation are governors of it, but the maſter is appointed by the heirs or repreſentatives of Mr. Hale. The houſe is a handſome ſtructure, and was rebuilt ſome years ago. Here are alſo three charity-ſchools, one erected by the inhabitants for forty boys, who are cloathed and taught by ſubſcription; another for twenty-five children, and a third for twenty children. Both the latter are ſupported by private contributions.

This town was a place of ſome note in the time of the ancient Britons. The eaſt Saxon king's often keep their courts here, and upon the firſt diviſion of the kingdom into counties, it was made the county town. It ſent members to parliament in the reign of Edward I. but after the ſeventh of Henry V. on the petition of the bailiff and burgeſſes, to be excuſed on account of their poverty, that privilege was diſcontinued till the twenty ſecond of James I.

In the time of Henry VII. the ſtandard of weights and meaſures was fixed here, and queen Mary made this a corporation, by the name of bailiffs and burgeſſes; and by her charter, the number of burgeſſes was to have been ſixteen.

In the twenty-fifth and thirty-fifth years of queen Elizabeth, Michaelmas term was held here, on account of the plague, which then raged in London; and that princeſs granted the town a new charter, by the ſtile of a bailiff, eleven capital burgeſſes, and ſixteen aſſiſtants.

King James I. granted another charter, with the ſtile of mayor, burgeſſes and commonalty, to have ten capital burgeſſes, and ſixteen aſſiſtants, and the mayor to be choſen out of the burgeſſes, by both the burgeſſes and aſſiſtants; but at preſent, the town is governed by a mayor, high ſteward, who is generally a nobleman, a recorder, nine aldermen, a town clerk, chamberlain, ten capital burgeſſes, and ſixteen aſſiſtants, together with two ſerjeants at mace.

Here was formerly a priory of Benedictine monks, ſubordinate to the abbey of St. Albans, erected about the latter end of the reign of William the Conquerer, by the biſhop of Limoſie, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary. Its annual revenues at the diſſolution amounted to ſeventy-two pounds, fourteen ſhillings and two-pence.

This town has the honour of giving the title of earl to the duke of Somerſet, and of ſending two members to parliament. The principal commodities of its market are wool, wheat, and malt; and it is ſaid to ſend 5000 quarters of malt, weekly to London by the river Lea.

Here are likewiſe four annual fairs, viz. on the Saturday fortnight before Eaſter, the twelfth of May, the fifth of July, and the eighth of November, all for the ſale of horſes, black cattle and ſheep.

HATFIELD.

This town is ſituated on the great northern road, about twenty miles from London, in the county of Hertford; and is likewiſe called Biſhop's Hatfield, from its belonging to the biſhops of Ely. Here was once a royal palace, from whence both king Edward VI. and queen Elizabeth were conducted to the throne. King Edward was educated here, and queen Elizabeth purchaſed the manor of the biſhops of Ely. Here Theodore, archbiſhop of Canterbury, held a ſynod againſt the Eutychian opinions; and here are ſtill two charity ſchools.

The church, which is a rectory, is in the gift of the earl of Saliſbury; and is computed to be worth eight hundred pounds per annum.

This town, beſides a weekly market on Thurſday, has two annual fairs, one on the twenty-third of April, and the other on the eighteenth of October.

The moſt remarkable building with which this town is adorned is the the ſeat of the earl of Saliſbury, built by the great lord Burleigh, and called Hatfield houſe. It is a beautiful antique building ſituated on an eminence at the entrance of the town, and commands a moſt delightful proſpect. The park and gardens, in which is a vineyard, are watered by the river Lea.

HODDESDON.

This town, which is a great thoroughfare, is ſituate on the river Lea, about nineteen miles from London, in the ſame county with the former. It is very ſmall, though it had once a conſiderable market for all ſorts of grain; but this, for ſome years paſt, has been diſcontinued.

Queen Elizabeth granted, by charter, a free grammar ſchool to this town, and endowed it with certain privileges. An almſhouſe was alſo founded here in the reign of Henry VI. by Richard Rich, ſheriff of London. There are ſtill the remains of an ancient chapel, belonging to an hoſpital formerly founded here for perſons afflicted with the leproſy.

HOUNSLOW.

This village is ſituated about twelve miles north of London, on the edge of a heath of the ſame name. It belongs to two pariſhes, the north ſide of the ſtreet to Heſton, and the ſouth to Iſleworth.

In this place was anciently a convent of mendicant friars, who by their inſtitution were to beg alms for the ranſom of captives taken by the infidels. On its diſſolution by king Henry VIII. that prince gave it to the lord Windſor, who afterwards ſold it to Mr. Auditor Roan.

Here are a chapel and a charity ſchool; and though this town has not any weekly market, yet it has two annual fairs, viz. Trinity Monday, and the Monday after Michaelmas-day, for horſes, black cattle and ſheep.

KINGSTON.

This town is ſituated on the banks of the Thames about twelve miles from London, in the county of Surry. It received its name from having been the reſidence of ſeveral of our Saxon kings, ſome of whom were crowned on a ſtage erected in the market place. The town is large and populous, and in the reigns of Edward II. and III. ſent members to parliament.

The church is ſpacious, and decorated with the pictures of the Saxon kings who were crowned here; together with that of king John, who gave the inhabitants their firſt charter.

Here is alſo a wooden bridge of twenty arches over the Thames; a free ſchool erected and endowed by queen Elizabeth; and a charity ſchool for thirty boys who are all cloathed.

The ſummer aſſizes for the county of Surry are generally held here; and on the top of the hall is a gallery, which overlooks the town.

A houſe near this town, now called Hircomb's place, was once the ſeat of the famous earl of Warwick, ſtiled the ſetter up and the puller down of kings. Beſides the bridge already mentioned, here is another of brick over a ſtream that flows from a ſpring about four miles above the town, and which, within the diſtance of a bow ſhot from its ſource, forms a brook ſufficient to drive two mills. The market in this town is very conſiderable for corn, and the trade to London, &c. pretty large.

Here is a market, on Saturday, and three annual fairs, viz. Thurſday, Friday, and Saturday, in Whitſun-week, for horſes and toys; the ſecond, third, and fourth of Auguſt, for fruit and pedlars ware; and the fifteenth of November, for horſes, cattle and toys.

LEATHERHEAD.

This town is pleaſantly ſituated on a riſing bank about four miles to the ſouth weſt of Epſom, in the county of Surry. It had formerly a market, but that has been diſcontinued upwards of an hundred years.

Here is a bridge over the river Mole, which having ſunk into the earth near Mickelham, at the foot of Box-hill, riſes again near this town, and runs through Cobham to the Thames at Moulſey.

At a ſmall diſtance from this town is Leith-hill, admired for affording one of the nobleſt proſpects in all Europe; of which Mr. Dennis, in his "letters familiar, moral and critical," gives the following lively deſcription: "In a late journey (ſays "he) which I took into the Wild of Suſſex, I "paſſed over an hill, which ſhewed me a more "tranſporting ſight than ever the country had "ſhewn me before, either in England or Italy. "The proſpects which in Italy pleaſed me moſt,

"were

" were that of the Valdarno from the Apennines;
" of Rome and the Mediterranean from the moun" tains of Viterbo; of Rome at forty, and the " Mediterranean at fifty miles diſtance from it;
" and that of the Campagne of Rome from Ti-
" voli and Freſcati; from which two places you
" ſee every foot of that famous Campagne even " from the bottom of Tivoli and Freſcati to the " very foot of the mountain of Viterbo, without " any thing to intercept your ſight. But from " an hill which I paſſed in my late journey
" into Suſſex, I had a proſpect more extenſive
" than any of theſe, and which ſurpaſſed them
" at once in rural charms, in pomp, and in mag" nificence. The hill which I ſpeak of, is called " Leith-hill, and is about five miles ſouthward
" from Darking, about ſix from Box-hill, and " near twelve from Epſom. It juts itſelf out
" about two miles beyond that range of hills
" which terminate the north downs to the ſouth.
" When I ſaw from one of theſe hills, at about " two miles diſtance, that ſide of Leith-hill
" which faces the northern downs, it appeared
" the beautifulleſt proſpect I had ever ſeen: but
" after we had conquered the hill itſelf, I ſaw
" a ſight that would tranſport a ſtoic; a ſight
" that looked like enchantment and viſion.
" Beneath us lay open to our view all the wilds
" of Surry and Suſſex, and a great part of that
" of Kent, admirably diverſified in every part of " them with woods, and fields of corn and paſ-
" tures, every where adorned with ſtately rows of " trees.

" This beautiful vale is about thirty miles in " breadth, and about ſixty in length, and is ter-
" minated to the ſouth by the majeſtic range of " the ſouthern hills, and the ſea: and it is no
" eaſy matter to decide, whether theſe hills, which " appear at thirty, forty, fifty miles diſtance,
" with their tops in the ſky, ſeem more awful
" and venerable, or the delicious vale between " you and them more inviting. About noon, in " a ſerene day, you may at thirty miles diſtance,
" ſee the very water of the ſea through a chaſm
" of the mountains. And that which above all " makes it a noble and a wonderful proſpect, is,
" that at the ſame time that, at thirty miles
" diſtance you behold the very water of the ſea;
" at the ſame time that you behold to the ſouth,
" the moſt delicious rural proſpect in the world;
" at that very time, by a little turn of your head
" towards the north, you look full over Box-hill,
" and ſee the country beyond it, between that
" and London; and, over the very ſtomacher of
" it, ſee St. Paul's at twenty-five miles diſtance,
" and London beneath it, and Highgate and
" Hampſtead beyond it."

Not far from this is Box hill, ſo called from a great number of box trees planted on the ſouth ſide of it by the earl of Arundel, in the reign of king Charles I. but the north ſide is covered with yew. On the ſummit is a large warren, from whence there is a moſt delightful proſpect.

MIMS.

There are two villages of this name, viz. North Mims and South Mims. The former is ſituated in Hertfordſhire, on the eaſt ſide of Colney, about two miles from Hatfield. In this neighbourhood is the ſeat of the late Sir Joſeph Jekyll, maſter of the rolls, in right of his lady, who was heir to her brother the great lord Somers. The body of that nobleman lies interred in the chancel of the church, without any inſcription. This ſeat now belongs to the duke of Leeds who is lord of the manor.

South Mims is ſituated two miles from the former, in the moſt northern corner of Middleſex. Here is an almſhouſe built and endowed for ſix poor people, by James Hickſon, eſq; who died in 1689, when he gave by his will to fifteen poor people of this pariſh, two ſhifts, one pair of hoſe, and a pair of ſhoes annually. For the payment of theſe, and other benefactions, he left ſeveral eſtates in this pariſh to the Brewers company in London.

MOULSEY.

There are two towns of this name, viz. Eaſt Moulſey and Weſt Moulſey, both of which are thus denominated from the river Mole, which runs between them into the Thames.

Eaſt Moulſey is ſituated oppoſite to Hampton-court, and was granted by king Charles II. to Sir James Clarke, grandfather to the preſent lord of the manor, who had the ferry from thence to Hampton-court, in the room of which he erected a handſome bridge, where a very high toll is taken of all paſſengers, carriages, &c.

Weſt Moulſey is ſituated about a mile and a half weſt from Kingſton; and there is here a ferry to Hampton town, which likewiſe belongs to the ſame gentleman.

MUSWELL HILL.

This place which is ſituated in Middleſex, received its name from a ſpring or well on the hill, near a houſe built by alderman Roe, which afterwards came to the earl of Bath. Adjoining to this well, which was eſteemed holy, was a chapel with an image of our lady of Muſwell, to which great numbers went in pilgrimage. In the reign of queen Elizabeth both the manor and chapel were ſold to Mr. William Roe, in whoſe family they continued, till Sir Thomas Roe, the ambaſſador, ſold them in the laſt century. Some few years ago the manor-houſe was converted into a place of public entertainment.

NORTHALL.

This village is ſituated on the north ſide of Enfield Chace, three miles from Barnet, and is ſaid to be corruptly ſo called from Northaw, or the North Grove, here being a wood that belonged to the monaſtery of St. Albans.

A noble houſe was built here in the reign of queen Elizabeth by Henry Dudley earl of Warwick; after whoſe death it came to ſeveral poſſeſſors, and being ſold to William Laman, it deſcended to his grandſon, who gave the rent of the wells to the poor of the pariſh. King James I. alſo alſo gave 40l. per annum to the town in lieu of the ground he had taken out of the common to lay into his park at Theobalds.

PETERSHAM.

This village is ſituated a little to the ſouth of Richmond-hill, near the New Park, in Surry. Here once ſtood a delightful ſeat built by the earl of Rocheſter, lord high treaſurer in the reign of king James II. The building, which was extremely beautiful, was deſtroyed by fire in the year 1720, in ſo ſudden a manner, that the family who were then all at home, had ſcarcely time to ſave their lives. Nor was the houſe, though furniſhed in the moſt exquiſite manner, both within and without, the greateſt loſs ſuſtained: the noble furniture, the curious collection of paintings, and the ineſtimable library of the firſt earl of Clarendon, lord high chancellor of England, were entirely conſumed; and, among other valuable pieces, ſeveral manuſcripts relating to thoſe times, and to the tranſactions in which the king his maſter, and himſelf, was engaged both at home and abroad; beſides other curious collections made by that noble writer in various parts of the world.

After the demolition of this noble ſtructure the earl of Harrington erected another ſeat on the ſite thereof after a deſign of the earl of Burlington.

The front next the court is very plain, and the entrance to the houſe not very elegant; but the ſouth front next the garden is bold and regular, and the apartments on that ſide, chiefly deſigned for ſtate, are extremely handſome. The gardens which were before crowded with plantations, are now laid open in lawns of graſs. The kitchen garden, before ſituated on the eaſt ſide of the houſe, is removed out of ſight, and the ground converted to an open ſlope of graſs, leading up to a terrace of great length, from which is a proſpect of the river Thames, the town of Twickenham, and of all the fine ſeats in that part of the country. On the other ſide of the terrace is a plantation on a riſing ground; and on the ſummit of the hill a fine pleaſure houſe, which on every ſide commands a proſpect of the country for a very conſiderable diſtance.

Near this village is the New Park, which is eſteemed one of the beſt and moſt extenſive in England. It was made in the reign of king Charles I. and incloſed with a brick wall ſaid to be eleven miles in compaſs. In this part there is a little hill caſt up, called king Henry's mount, from which is a proſpect of ſix counties, with a diſtant view of the city of London, and of Windſor caſtle.

The new lodge in this park, built by the late Sir Robert Walpole, earl of Orford, is a very elegant edifice. It is built of ſtone in a ſquare form, with wings on each ſide of brick. It ſtands on a riſing ground, and commands a very good proſpect of the park, eſpecially of that fine piece of water which is in it, and which might be enlarged and brought acroſs the viſta that is in the front of the houſe through a wood.

This park is the largeſt of any within the environs of London, except that of Windſor, and by far the fineſt; for though it has little more than a wild variety of natural beauties to ſhew, yet theſe are ſuch as cannot fail to pleaſe thoſe who are as much delighted with views in their rudeſt appearance, as in all the elegance of art and deſign.

REYGATE.

This is a large market town in Surry, ſituated in the valley of Holmſdale, and ſurrounded on each ſide with hills. It is an ancient borough, and had a caſtle, built by the Saxons, on the eaſt ſide of the town, ſome ruins of which are ſtill to be ſeen, particularly a long vault with a room at the end, large enough to hold five hundred perſons, where the barons who took up arms againſt king John are ſaid to have had their private meetings. The market-houſe was once a chapel dedicated to Thomas Becket.

There is a large houſe on the ſouth ſide of the town, which was formerly a priory. It belongs to the late Mr. Parſons's family, and is beautified with plantations, and a large piece of water. It has two rooms, each fifty feet long, and of a proportionable breadth; but the ceilings are much too low. The houſe and gardens are on every ſide ſurrounded with hills, ſo as to render the proſpect extremely delightful.

The late celebrated lord Shaftſbury had a houſe in this town, to which he retired to exclude himſelf from company. It is now in the poſſeſſion of a private gentleman, who has laid out and planted a ſmall ſpot of ground, in ſo many parts, as to compriſe whatever can be ſuppoſed in the moſt noble ſeats. It may properly be called a model, and is ſtiled by the inhabitants of Reygate, "The "world in one acre."

RICKMANSWORTH.

This town is thus denominated from its ſituation on a neck of land, almoſt ſurrounded by a nameleſs river, which falls into the Colne, and forms, at its influx, a conſiderable pool of water. It ſtands low, in a black, mooriſh, cold ſoil, about twenty miles from London, in the county of Hertford.

This town is governed by two conſtables, and two headboroughs. It has a handſome church, and a charity ſchool for twenty boys and ten girls; alſo two almſhouſes, one for five widows and the other for four. There are ſeveral mills on the neighbouring ſtreams, where great quantities of wheat are ground.

Here is a weekly market on Saturday, and three annual fairs, viz. the twentieth of July, and the fourth of November, for horſes, black cattle, ſheep and hogs; and the Saturday before the third Monday in September, for hiring of ſervants.

In the neighbourhood of this town there is a warren hill which has an echo that repeats twelve times to a trumpet.

RUMFORD

RUMFORD.

This is a conſiderable market town, ſituated about twelve miles from London, in the county of Eſſex. It is a great thoroughfare between this city and Harwich, and moſt towns of note in Suffolk and Norfolk. It is governed by a bailiff and wardens, who, though not incorporated, are empowered by patent to hold a court every week, for the trial of civil and criminal cauſes.

Here is a charity ſchool for fifty boys and twenty girls; and a church, but it is only a chancel to Horn church, a neighbouring village. Here is a weekly market on Wedneſday, and an annual fair for horſes, black cattle and ſheep.

The lands of Horn church near Rumford, with ſome other revenues in the neighbourhood, being given to the great hoſpital de Monte Jovis, in Savoy, a cell for a prior or maſter, and poor brethren, ſubordinate to that foreign houſe, was ſettled here, and dedicated to St. Nicholas and St. Barnard. This houſe was, in the time of Richard II. by leave of the pope and king, bought by William of Wickham, biſhop of Wincheſter, for his new college at Oxford.

SEVENOAK.

This town is ſaid to have received its name from ſeven very large oaks, which grew near it when it was firſt built. It is a market town ſituated near the rivert Dart or Darent, in the road to Tunbridge, and is a corporation, governed by a warden and aſſiſtants.

Here is an hoſpital for maintaining poor old people, and a ſchool for educating poor children, built and endowed by Sir William Sevenoak, who was Lord-mayor of London in 1418; and ſaid to have been a foundling, brought up by ſome perſon of this town, whence he took his name. John Potkyn, who lived in the reign of Henry VIII. was a great benefactor to this ſchool, and the revenue being augmented by queen Elizabeth, it was thence called queen Elizabeth's free-ſchool. It was rebuilt in 1727; and the ſtile of the corporation is the wardens and aſſiſtants of the town and pariſh of Sevenoak, and of queen Elizabeth's free-ſchool there.

Beſides the above hoſpital, there is another ſtill more ancient, dedicated to St. John the Baptiſt, in the gift of the archbiſhop of Canterbury. Alſo a charity ſchool for fifteen boys.

It was in this pariſh that the rebel, Jack Cade, in the year 1450, defeated and killed Sir Humphrey Stafford, his brother William, and ſeveral other perſons of note, ſent againſt him by Henry VI.

There are ſeveral very handſome ſeats in this neighbourhood, particularly one called Knowl Place, the ſeat of the duke of Dorſet, ſituated in the middle of a moſt delightful park.

STAINS.

This is a very populous town, ſituated on the Thames, about nineteen miles from London, in the county of Middleſex. It received its name from the Saxon word Stana or Stone, becauſe there anciently ſtood a bounding ſtone in this place, to denote the extent of the city of London's juriſdiction upon the river.

It has a bridge over the Thames, and is governed by two conſtables, and four headboroughs appointed by his majeſty's ſteward, on account of its being a lordſhip belonging to the crown. The church ſtands alone, at almoſt half a mile diſtance from the town. Here is a market on Friday, and two annual fairs, viz. the 11th of May, and the 29th of September, for horſes, black cattle, and ſheep.

TILBURY.

This is a very ancient town in Eſſex, ſituated near the Thames by level unhealthy marſhes called the three hundreds. Here the four proconſular ways made by the Romans croſſed each other; and in the year 630 this was the ſee of a biſhop named Ceadda, who converted the eaſt Saxons. In the reigns of Edward I. Edward II. and Edward III. it was held of the crown by the family of the Tilburies, and from them probably received its name.

The principal part of the marſhes which ſurround the town, are rented by the farmers, ſale- and grazing butchers of London, who generally ſtock them with Lincolnſhire and Leiceſterſhire weathers, which they buy in Smithfield in September and October, when the graziers ſell off their ſtocks, and feed here till Chriſtmas or Candlemas; and though they are not made much fatter here than when bought in, yet very conſiderable advantage accrues by the difference of the price of mutton between Michaelmas, when cheapeſt, and Candlemas, when deareſt; and this is what the butchers call, by way of excellence, right marſh mutton.

Adjoining to the river Thames, and at the end of the marſhes, ſtands TILBURY FORT, which may be juſtly looked upon as the key of the city of London. It is a regular fortification. The deſign of it was a pentagon, but the water-baſtion, as it would have have been called, was never built.

The plan of this building was laid out by Sir Martin Beckman, chief engineer to king Charles II. who alſo deſigned the works at Sheerneſs. The eſplanade of the fort is very large, and the baſtions the largeſt of any in England. The foundation is laid upon piles driven down two an end of each other, ſo far, till they were aſſured they were below the channel of the river, and that the piles, which were pointed with iron, entered into the ſolid chalk rock, adjoining to the hills on the other ſide.

On the land ſide the works are compleat; and the baſtions are faced with brick. There is a double ditch or moat, the innermoſt of which is one hundred and eighty feet broad, with a good counterſcarpe, and a covered way marked out, with ravelins and tenailles. There are alſo two ſmall redoubts of brick; but the chief ſtrength on this ſide the fort conſiſts in being able able to lay the whole level under water, and by that means to make it impoſſible for an enemy to carry on approaches that way.

On the river ſide is a very ſtrong curtain, with a noble gate called the water-gate in the middle, and the ditch is paliſadoed. Before this curtain is a platform in the place of a counterſcarp, on which are planted one hundred and ſix cannon, carrying from twenty-four to forty-ſix pounds each, beſides ſmaller ones planted between them; and the baſtions and curtains are alſo planted with guns.

At the place where the water-baſtion was deſigned to be built, and which, by the plan, ſhould run wholly out into the river, ſo as to flank the two curtains on each ſide, ſtands an high tower, which, it was ſaid was built in queen Elizabeth's time, and was called the Blockhouſe.

UXBRIDGE.

This town is ſituated in the high road to Oxford, about eighteen miles from London, in the county of Middleſex. Notwithſtanding it is entirely independent, and is governed by two bailiffs, two conſtables and two headboroughs, yet it is only a hamlet to Great Hillington.

The river Colne runs through this town in two ſtreams, well ſupplied with trout, eels, and other fiſh; and over the main ſtream is a ſtone bridge that leads into Buckinghamſhire. The church, or rather chapel, was built in the reign of Henry VI.

This town has the honour of giving the title of earl to the noble family of Paget. It has many good inns, and is particularly diſtinguiſhed by the whiteneſs of the bread, eſpecially their rolls. There are many corn mills at a ſmall diſtance, and a conſiderable number of waggon loads of meal are brought from thence every week to London.

WALTON.

This village is ſituated on the banks of the Thames, oppoſite to Shepperton, in the county of Surry. It is ſaid that Middleſex once joined it till about three hundred years ago the old current of the Thames was changed by an innundation, and a church deſtroyed by the force of the water.

Here is a very curious bridge over the Thames, erected at the expence of Samuel Decker, eſq; who applying to parliament for that purpoſe, obtained in the year 1747, an act to empower him to build a bridge there, and the ſame was compleated in Auguſt 1750. It conſiſts of only four ſtone piers, between which are three large truſs arches of beams and joiſts of wood, ſtrongly bound together with mortiſes, iron pins, and cramps; under theſe three arches the water conſtantly runs; beſides which are five other arches of brick work on each ſide, to render the aſcent and deſcent the more eaſy. The center arch, when viewed by the river ſide, affords an agreeable proſpect of the country, beautifully diverſified with wood and water, which is ſeen through it to a conſiderable diſtance. The extenſive compaſs of this great arch to a perſon below occaſions a very uncommon ſenſation of awe and ſurprize; and he is ſtill farther aſtoniſhed when he proceeds to take notice that all the timbers are in a falling poſition, for there is not one upright piece to be diſcovered, and at the ſame time conſiders the very ſmall dimenſions of the piers by which the whole is ſupported.

When you have proceeded beyond the brick work, in paſſing over the bridge, the vacant interſtices between the timbers yield at every ſtep a variety of proſpects, which, at the center, are ſeen at ſtill greater advantage. But though each ſide is well ſecured by the timber and rails, to the height of eight feet, yet as it affords only a parapet of wide lattice work, and the apertures ſeem even to the eye large enough to admit the paſſage of any perſon to go through, yet thoſe not accuſtomed to ſuch views cannot approach the ſide without being ſenſibly alarmed. The openings indeed are purpoſely left to admit a free paſſage for the air, in order to keep the timbers the more ſound, and that the leaſt decay may be the more eaſily perceived and amended.

The nobility and gentry in this neighbourhood find a very agreeable benefit from this admirable bridge, eſpecially as the ferries are dilatory, dangerous, and at times impaſſable; and its being erected has cauſed the roads thereabouts, in both counties, eſpecially on the Surry ſide, to be greatly improved.

WALTHAM ABBEY.

This is a ſmall market town ſituated on the banks of the river Lea, which is here divided into divers channels, forming ſeveral ſmall iſlands, about thirteen miles from London, in the county of Eſſex.

In this town was a monaſtery founded about the year 1062, by Harold, earl of Kent, for a dean and eleven ſecular canons, who were by king Henry II. changed into an abbot and regulars of the order of St. Auguſtin, and their number increaſed to twenty-four. It was dedicated to the Holy Croſs, and its yearly revenue, at the general diſſolution amounted to nine hundred pounds four ſhillings and three pence.

Harold, the founder of the abbey, was killed in the great battle in Suſſex, fought with William the Conqueror; and his mother having begged the body of that prince, it was interred in this abbey. In the reign of queen Elizabeth, as ſome workmen were digging here, they found his coffin, covered with a flat grave ſtone, on which was only this ſhort inſcription, HAROLD INFELIX!

This antique building is now a gentleman's ſeat; and the gardens belonging to it were ſome years ago greatly admired; but ſince the taſte for incloſed gardens has been condemned, they have been but little frequented, except by curious perſons to ſee the tulip tree, which grows on a graſs plot near the houſe, and is one of the fineſt and moſt floriſhing of the ſpecies in England, producing annually, in the month of July, a prodigious quantity of flowers.

Beſides

Beſides a weekly market on Tueſday this town has three annual fairs, viz. the fourteenth of May, and the twenty-fifth and twenty-ſixth of September, for horſes, cows, and ſwine.

WALTHAM CROSS.

This is a market town ſituated on the weſt ſide of the river Lea, in the road to Ware, about twelve miles from London, in the county of Middleſex. It receives its diſtinguiſhing epithet from the croſs built there by Edward I. in honour of his beloved queen Eleanor, whoſe corps reſted here in its way from Lincolnſhire to London. Round the pillars are placed the effigies of that princeſs, with the arms of her conſort, and thoſe of her own, viz. England, Caſtile, Leon, and Poictou, which, though greatly defaced, are ſtill in part remaining.

WARE.

This is a conſiderable market town, ſituated in a valley on the eaſt ſide of the river Lea, in Hertfordſhire. It is ſaid to have derived its name from a ſort of dam, anciently made to ſtop the current of the ſtream, and called Wier, or Wear; a conjecture that ſeems to be confirmed; by the great abundance of water here, which has obliged the inhabitants to make wears and ſluices, to preſerve the town and adjacent meadows from innundations.

This town was founded in the year 914, by order of Edward I. and began to be of ſome note in the reign of king John, when the high road to the north, which before went through Hertford, was, by the intereſt of Sayer de Quincy, then lord of the manor, turned through this town. It conſiſts of one ſtreet, about a mile in length, with ſeveral back ſtreets and lanes, well inhabited. The church is large, built in the form of a croſs, and has a handſome gallery, erected by the governors of Chriſt's-hoſpital in London, who ſend many of the children of that hoſpital here for education. Beſides a charity ſchool here are ſeven almſhouſes well endowed.

The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, together with all the tythes belonging to it, and two carucates of land, were given, about the year 1081, by Hugo de Grentemaiſnil, lord of the manor of Ware, to the monks of St. Ebrulf, at Utica, in Normandy; whereupon it became a cell to that abbey, and in courſe of time, was ſo well endowed, that when Edward III. during his wars with France, ſeized the alien priories, this was farmed at two hundred pounds a year. After the ſuppreſſion of theſe foreign houſes, this was given, in the third year of Henry V. to the monks of Skene. Henry VI. annexed it for ſome time to the abbey of St. Mary, near Leiceſter; but it was afterwards reſtored to Skene, and at the diſſolution, given by Henry VIII. to Trinity college in Cambridge. In the north part of the town there was alſo a houſe of Grey, or Franciſcan friars; but how long it continued, is not known.

Here is a weekly market on Tueſday, remarkable for corn and malt, five thouſand quarters of the latter being frequently ſent in a week to London, by the barges, which generally go with coals, grocery, &c. Beſides which, there are two annual fairs, viz. the laſt Tueſday in April, and the Tueſday before St. Matthew's day, for horſes, black cattle, and ſheep.

At one of the inns in this town, there is a famous bed, formerly uſed by travellers from London, and other places: it is of a ſquare form, each ſide twelve feet in length, and is ſaid to contain forty perſons.

Not far from Ware, in a place called Lemon Field, three Roman wine veſſels were dug up in the year 1729. They were made of a pale reddiſh earth, and in the form of the Roman amphora, with two handles, and pointed at the bottom, for the purpoſe of fixing them in the ground. They were eighteen inches below the ſurface, and full of earth and chalk ſtones of the neighbouring ſoil. Many human bones have been dug up hereabouts; but though the ground around them was black, it did not appear that the bodies had been burnt; they ſeemed, by the ſhallowneſs of their burial, to have been the relicks of a battle.

WATFORD.

This town is ſituated on the ſpot where was formerly a ford over the river Colne, ſeventeen miles from London, in Hertfordſhire; and the pretorian or conſular highway, made by the Romans in this county, called Watling-ſtreet, croſſes the Colne near it, and paſſes on to Verulam, near St. Albans.

It conſiſts of one long ſtreet, which is extremely dirty in the winter, and the waters of the river, at the entrance of the town, are often ſo much ſwelled by floods, as to be impaſſable. Here is a charity ſchool for forty boys, who are both taught and cloathed; and a handſome free-ſchool, built in 1709, by Mrs. Elizabeth Fuller. Likewiſe ſeveral almſhouſes, and other funds for the poor.

Beſides a weekly market on Tueſday, here are alſo two annual fairs, viz. Trinity Monday and Tueſday, for horſes, black cattle, and ſheep.

WEYBRIDGE.

This is a very pleaſant village ſituated in Surry, about four miles from Hampton-Court, and owes its names to a bridge formely erected here over the river Weye.

In the neighbourhood of this village are ſeveral fine ſeats, particularly thoſe of the earls of Portmore and Lincoln. The latter is called OATLANDS, and is a very handſome building ſituate in the middle of a fine park. The other is known by the name of HAM FARM, is a very magnificent ſtructure, regularly built of brick, with a fine lawn before the garden front. The grounds with which it is encircled conſiſt of about five hundred acres, one hundred and thirty of which are laid out for pleaſure, beſides a paddock of about ſixty acres.

This

This delightful ſeat has the command of two navigable rivers; the Thames, which comes with a fine bending courſe by the ſide of the terrace, and the Weye, which runs directly through the grounds, and joins the Thames at the terrace. Over the Weye is a ſwing bridge, which may be turned aſide at pleaſure, to let boats and other veſſels paſs. The Weye is navigable to Guilford, and is now extended from thence to Godalmin. What is called the Virginia water runs from Windſor great park, and flows a little higher up through the grounds of the late Mr. Southcote. The terrace next the Thames is remarkably beautiful; and though it lies on a flat, there are ſome good views from it, as well as from ſome other parts of the garden.

WINDSOR.

This a pleaſant and well-inhabited town ſituate on the banks of the Thames, amidſt the moſt beautiful vallies, in the county of Berks. It is governed by a mayor and thirty brethren, thirteen of whom are ſtiled benchers, and ten of theſe brethren have the title of aldermen, out of whom the mayor is choſen annually.

The church is a ſpacious antient ſtructure, ſeated on the eaſt ſide of the High-ſtreet, and dedicated to St. John the Baptiſt. In the ſame ſtreet is likewiſe the town-houſe, or Guildhall, a neat regular edifice built in the year 1686, and adorned with columns and arches of Portland ſtone.

The hall, or the room in which the mayor and corporation meet for the diſpatch of the buſineſs of the borough, is ſpacious, and well adapted to the purpoſe; and is adorned with the portraits of Charles I. Charles II. James II. William III. and queen Mary, queen Anne, George, prince of Denmark, archbiſhop Laud, Theodore Randue, eſq; the earl of Nottingham, lord admiral in the year 1688, governor of Windſor Caſtle, and high ſteward of the borough, &c. The hall is at preſent under great improvements, at the expence of the nobility and gentry of the place, who make uſe of it during the ſummer for ſubſcription aſſemblies; and in the winter, for a weekly card aſſembly. In 1707, the corporation, from their regard to queen Anne, who conſtantly reſided at Windſor, during the ſummer ſeaſon, erected in a niche, at the north end of this ſtructure, the ſtatue of that princeſs, veſted in her royal robes, with the globe and ſceptre in her hands. And in a niche on the ſouth ſide is the ſtatue of her majeſty's royal conſort, prince George of Denmark, in a Roman military habit. In the area, under the hall, is kept a weekly market on Saturdays, which is plentifully ſupplied with all kinds of proviſions.

From the delightful ſituation of this town, many gentlemen of fortune and family conſtantly reſide there, and in its neighbourhood; but its greateſt boaſt is in its royal caſtle, which, for upwards of ſeven hundred years, has been the reſidence of the kings of England, and the ſeat of the moſt noble order of the garter.

It is ſituated upon a high hill, which riſes by a gentle aſcent, and enjoys a moſt delightful proſpect around it; in the front is a wide and extenſive vale, adorned with corn fields and meadows, with groves on either ſide, and the calm ſmooth water of the Thames running through it. On the declivity of the hill is a fine terrace faced with a rampart of free ſtone, 1870 feet in length. This may juſtly be ſaid to be one of the nobleſt walks in Europe, both with reſpect to the ſtrength and grandeur of the building, and the fine and extenſive proſpect over the Thames, of the adjacent country on every ſide, where, from the variety of villas ſcattered about, nature and art ſeem to vie with each other.

From this terrace you enter a beautiful park, which ſurrounds the building, and is called the little or houſe park, to diſtinguiſh it from another adjoining, which is of a much greater extent. This little park is four miles in circumference, and ſurrounded by a brick wall. The turf is of a moſt beautiful green, and it is adorned with many ſhady walks, eſpecially that called queen Elizabeth's, which, on the ſummer evenings, is frequented by the beſt company. It is well ſtocked with deer and other game, and the keepers lodge at the farther end is a delightful ſituation.

This beautiful palace was firſt built by William the Conqueror ſoon afer his being eſtabliſhed on the throne of this kingdom. It was afterwards greatly improved by king Henry I. who added many new buildings, and ſurrounded the whole with a ſtrong wall: and the ſucceeding princes, on account of its pleaſant ſituation, and its being a ſtrong fortreſs and place of defence, made it their conſtant reſidence.

In this caſtle Henry II. held a parliament in the year 1170; and here king John lodged during the conteſt between him and the barons. However, in diſputes between his ſon and ſucceſſor, king Henry III. and his barons, this caſtle was in 1263 delivered up by treaty. King Edward I. and II. reſided here, more on account of its delightful ſituation, than its ſtrength; and had many children born here; among whom was the heroic Edward III. who had an extraordinary affection for this his native place, and in the year 1360, cauſed the whole caſtle to be entirely taken down, except the three towers at the weſt end of the lower ward; and rebuilding the preſent ſtately caſtle, made it the ſeat of the moſt noble order of the garter.

The better to effect this work, ſeveral perſons were appointed to provide ſtone, lead, timber, iron, &c. and to impreſs carriages to convey them to Windſor. They were alſo to preſs hewers of ſtone, carpenters, and other artificers; to ſurvey the works and men; to encourage thoſe that did their duty; and to compel the idle and ſlothful. The whole had been carried on ſeveral years, when, in the thirty-third year of his reign, the office of ſurveyor of this caſtle was conferred on William of Wickham, afterwards biſhop of Winchеſter, with power to diſpoſe of all the workmen, to purchaſe materials, and to provide maſons, and other artificers; who when he had finiſhed this great work, cauſed to be cut on one of the towers this doubtful ſentence:

This made Wickham.

Which

Which was repreſented to the king, as if that biſhop had the preſumption to aſſume the honour of erecting this royal caſtle; but the prelate defeated the deſign of his enemies, by aſſuring his royal maſter, that he had not the leaſt intention to injure the honour of his ſovereign, but that this was only an acknowledgement, that the building had made him great in the favour of his prince, and was the cauſe of his advancement: an interpretation which ſatisfied that king, and prevented his falling under hisdiſpleaſure.

Other conſiderable additions were made to this noble palace in ſucceeding times. King Henry VII. added the ſtately fabric adjoining to the king's lodgings in the upper ward. Henry VIII. rebuilt the great gate in the lower ward leading to the town, king Edward IV. began, and queen Mary perfected, the bringing of water from Black-Moor-Park, in the pariſh of Wingfield, into a fountain of curious workmanſhip, in the middle of the upper court. Queen Elizabeth made the terrace walk on the north ſide of the caſtle; and king Charles I. built the gate at the eaſt end of the terrace leading into the park. King Charles II. entirely repaired it: the face of of the upper-court was changed, and brought into its preſent beauty; the windows were enlarged and made regular; and the royal apartments were completely furniſhed, and adorned with beautiful paintings. And laſtly, queen Anne made ſeveral additions to it, particularly the flight of ſteps on the eaſt ſide.

This ſtately and venerable caſtle is divided into two courts or wards, with a large round tower between them called the middle ward, it being formerly ſeparated from the lower ward by a ſtrong wall and draw-bridge. The whole contains about twelve acres of land, and has many towers and batteries for its defence.

In the upper ward is a ſpacious ſquare, bounded on the weſt ſide of the round tower; on the north by the royal apartments, St. George's hall, and the chapel royal; and on the eaſt and ſouth ſides by the apartments of the prince of Wales, the royal family, and the great officers of ſtate. In the center of this ſquare is an equeſtrian ſtatue in copper of king Charles II. in a roman habit, and placed on a marble pedeſtal, on the ſouth ſide of which are repreſented in baſſo relievo, a variety of figures expreſſive of navigation. On the eaſt ſide is the royal cypher, ſurrounded with the garter, and crowned with other ornaments. On the north ſide are variety of fruits; and on the weſt is a ſhield, in which is a latin inſcription to this effect. "Tobias Ruſtat humbly gave and dedi- "cated this effigy to his moſt gracious maſter "Charles II. the beſt of kings, in the year of "our Lord MDCLXXX."

The round tower, which forms the weſt ſide of this upper court, contains the governor's apartments. It is built in the form of an amphitheatre, on the higheſt part of the mount. The aſcent to the lodgings was formerly by the flight of an hundred ſteps of oak, ſo contrived, that a perſon on horſeback might aſcend or deſcend with pleaſure; but the preſent entrance is by a flight of an hundred and forty-ſeven ſteps of purbeck ſtone. Here you paſs through a handſome court, in the middle of which is a reſervoir of water, erected in the reign of Charles II. to receive the drains from the upper leads and out offices.

From this court you proceed to the guard-chamber, in which is a neat and well diſpoſed collection of arms, as matchlocks, the firſt ever made; whole, half, and quarter pikes, with bandaleers of various figures. Round the cornice are a number of breaſt-plates, with helmets over them, and ſeveral drums in proper order.

Over the chimney is carved in lime wood, an oval of the ſtar and garter, crowned and encompaſſed with daggers and piſtols. The pillars of the door leading to the dining room are compoſed of pikes, on the top of which are two coats of mail, probably thoſe of John king of France, and David king of Scotland, who were priſoners here, they being both inlaid with gold, the former with Fleur-de-liſſes, and the latter with thiſtles: there are beſides the horſe armour, gauntlets and other accoutrements belonging to theſe coats of mail. On the ſtair-caſe, leading to the dining-room, ſtands the figure of a yeoman of the guard, painted in his proper dreſs, as if in waiting. Here are four pillars of pikes ornamented with bandaleers, carbines, and matchlocks. In the centre is a beautiful engraved horſe ſhield, encompaſſed with daggers and piſtols; as alſo ſeveral of king James's and king William's pieces, ranged in beautiful order.

The great dining room is very neatly furniſhed, and the tapeſtry, which is diſpoſed in ſix compartments, repreſents the well known ſtory of Hero and Leander.

The dreſſing room is adorned with many curious prints and drawings, particularly.

Four views of his grace the duke of Mountagu, the preſent governor's ſeat at Blackheath.
A ſiege of the Romans, drawn with the pen.
The earl of Pembroke's family.
Rembrant's mother.
Lady Dorothy Boyle.
Cleopatra.
A Turk by candle light.

The bedchamber is very neatly furniſhed; and in it are ſix elbow chairs, curiouſly ſtudded with ivory, The bed is of chints complete, and the tapeſtry is richly wrought with gold and ſilver.

The other rooms in this part not having any thing very curious, we ſhall paſs them over.

The curtain contains ſeventeen partholes, in each of which is placed a piece of cannon, and on the leads of the tower is placed the royal ſtandard, which is fourteen yards long, and eight broad; and is hoiſted on all ſtate holidays. The union, which is nine yards by ſix, is always hoiſted when the governor is preſent. Againſt the wall is this inſcription:

"A liſt of the counties to be ſeen on the top "of this round tower. Middleſex, Eſſex, "Hertford, Bucks, Berks, Oxford, Wilts, "Hants, Surry, Suſſex, Kent, Bedford."

The lower court is larger than the upper, and divided into two parts by St. George's chapel, which ſtands in the middle. On the north or inner ſide are the houſes and apartments of the dean and canons, minor canons, clerks, and other officers; and on the ſouth and weſt ſides of the outer part, are the houſes of the poor knights of Windſor.

The apartment belonging to the dean is large and commodious; and in the great hall are hung up the arms of the ſovereign and knight's companions of the garter. In an apartment called the garter-room, the knights meet and robe on the morning of inſtallation, and proceed from thence to chapel. In this room is an ancient ſcreen, on which are properly blazoned the arms of king Edward III. and the ſeveral ſovereigns and knights companions from the foundation, to the preſent time.

The inner cloiſters contain the houſes of ſeveral prebends; and at the lower end is the library belonging to the college, the inſide of which is neat, though not elegant. It is well furniſhed with eccleſiaſtical writers, and books of polite literature, and ſome time ago received a conſiderable addition from the late earl of Ranelagh, who bequeathed his valuable library to the college.

The houſes of the minor cannons, which adjoin to theſe, are built in the form of a horſeſhoe, in alluſion to one of the badges of Henry VII. or his predeceſſor king Edward IV. and are commonly called the Horſe-ſhoe Cloyſters.

There are alſo in this court ſeveral towers belonging to the officers of the crown, and the order of the garter, namely to the biſhop of Wincheſter, prelate; the biſhop of Saliſbury, Chancellor, and Garter, king at arms. Here is alſo the ſtone tower, guard-chamber, and a court of record, held under the governor or conſtable.

The houſes of the poor knights conſiſt of thirteen on the ſouth ſide, called the royal foundation: the other five are on the weſt end of the court; and are called, Sir Peter la Mair's Foundation; thoſe who belong to it, have a ſalary or ſtipend to enable them to repair their houſes themſelves, which thoſe of the foundation have not. The charitable intention of king Edward III. the royal founder, was to provide only for ſuch as were weak in body, and in low circumſtances, having not enough to live in ſo genteel a manner as became a military profeſſion. Hence queen Elizabeth's ſtatutes obſerve, that in caſe there ſhould happen to fall to any of the alms knights, lands, rents, &c. to the yearly rent of twenty pounds, then ſuch knight ſhould be immediately removed from the college, and another alms knight put in his room. But of late years little regard has been paid to theſe regulations. Theſe eighteen poor knights have a penſion of eighteen pounds a year, and annually a gown or ſurcoat of ſcarlet cloth, and a mantle of blue or purple cloth, on the left ſleeve of which is embroidered the croſs of St. George in a plain eſcutcheon.

The chapel of St. George, as mentioned before, is ſituated in the middle of the lower court. It is a fine piece of Gothic architecture, and was firſt erected by king Edward III. in the year 1337, ſoon after the foundation of the college, for the order of the garter, and dedicated to St. George, the patron of England; but however noble the firſt deſign might be, king Edward IV. not finding it entirely completed, enlarged the ſtructure, and deſigned the preſent building, together with the houſes of the dean and cannons, ſituated on the ſides of the north and weſt ſides of the chapel: the work was afterwards carried on by Henry VII. who finiſhed the body of the chapel; and Sir Reginald Bray, knight of the garter, and the favourite of that king, aſſiſted in ornamenting the chapel and completing the roof.

The architecture of the inſide has always been eſteemed for its neatneſs and great beauty; and in particular, the ſtone roof is reckoned an excellent piece of workmanſhip. It is an ellipſis ſupported by Gothic pillars, whoſe ribs and groins ſuſtain the whole ceiling, every part of which has ſome different device well finiſhed, as the arms of Edward the Confeſſor, Edward III. Henry VI. Edward IV. Henry VII. and Henry VIII. alſo the arms of England and France quarterly, the croſs of St. George, the roſe, portcullis, lion rampant, unicorn, &c.

In a chapel in the ſouth iſle is repreſented in ancient painting, the hiſtory of John the Baptiſt; and in the ſame iſle are painted on large pannels of oak, neatly carved, and decorated with the ſeveral devices peculiar to each prince, the portraits at full length, of prince Edward, ſon to Henry VI. Edward IV. Edward V. and Henry VII.

In the north iſle is a chapal dedicated to St. Stephen, wherein the hiſtory of that ſaint is painted on the pannels, and well preſerved. In the firſt of theſe pannels St. Stephen is repreſented preaching to the people; in the ſecond, he is before Herod's tribunal; in the third, he is ſtoning; and in the fourth, he is repreſented dead. At the eaſt end of this iſle is the chapter-houſe of the college, in which is a portrait at full length, by a maſterly hand, of the victorious Edward III. in his robes of ſtate, holding in his right hand a ſword, and bearing the crowns of France and Scotland, in token of the many victories he gained over theſe nations.

On each ſide of the choir are the ſtalls of the ſovereign and knights companions of the moſt noble order of the garter, with the helmet, mantling, creſt, and ſword, of each knight ſet up over his ſtall on a canopy of ancient carving curiouſly wrought; and over the canopy is affixed the banner or arms of each knight properly blazon'd on ſilk; and on the back of the ſtalls are the titles of the knights, with their arms neatly engraved and blazoned on copper. The ſovereign's ſtall is on the right hand of the entrance into the choir, and is covered with purple velvet and cloth of gold, and has a canopy and compleat furniture of the ſame valuable materials; his banner is likewiſe of velvet, and his mantling of cloth of gold. The prince's ſtall is on the left, and has no diſtinction from thoſe of the reſt of the knight's companions, the whole ſociety, according to the ſtatutes of the inſtitution, being companions and colleagues equal in honour and power.

The

The altar-piece was, ſoon after the reſtoration, adorned with cloth of gold and purple damaſk by king Charles II. but on removing the wainſcot of one of the chapels in 1707, a fine painting of the Lord's Supper was found, which being approved of by Sir James Thornhill, Verrio, and other eminent maſters, it was repaired and placed on the altar-piece.

Near the altar is the Queen's gallery, for the accommodation of the ladies at an inſtallation.

In a vault under the marble pavement of this choir, are interred the bodies of Henry VIII. and Jane Seymour his queen, king Charles I. and a daughter of queen Anne. In the ſouth iſle, near the door of the choir, is buried Henry VI. and the arch near which he was interred was ſumptuouſly decorated by Henry VIII. with the royal enſigns and other devices, but they are now much defaced by time.

In this chapel is alſo a monument of Edward, earl of Lincoln, lord high admiral of England in the reign of queen Elizabeth, erected by his lady, who is alſo interred with him. The monument is of alabaſter, with pillars of porphyry.

Another, with a neat ſcreen of braſs work, is erected to the memory of Charles Somerſet, earl of Worceſter, and knight of the garter, who died in 1526, and his lady, daughter to William earl of Huntingdon.

A ſtately monument of white marble erected to the memory of Henry Somerſet, duke of Beaufort, and knight of the garter, who died in 1699. There are here alſo the tombs of Sir George Manners, lord Roos; that of the lord Haſtings, chamberlain to Edward IV. and ſeveral others.

This chapel was made uſe of by king James II. for the ſervice of popery; and maſs being publickly performed there, it has ever ſince been neglected, and ſuffered to go to ruin.

Having thus deſcribed the outer parts of this antique building, we ſhall now proceed to the royal apartments, which, as has been already obſerved, are ſituate on the north ſide of the upper court, and are called the Star Buildings, from their having the ſtar and garter in gold on the outſide next the terrace.

The entrance into theſe apartments is through a handſome veſtibule, ſupported by columns of Ionic order, with ſome antique buſts in ſeveral niches; and in a niche, at the foot of the ſtair-caſe, is a Roman ſlave picking a thorn out of his foot.

The ſtair-caſe conſiſts of three flights of ſtone ſteps, containing twelve in each flight, ſecured on the right-hand with twiſted iron baluſtrades. Here, within a dome, is repreſented the ſtory of Phæton petitioning Apollo to permit him to drive the chariot of the ſun. In the ceiling, under the dome, are the repreſentations of the four elements, one in each corner.

Fire is repreſented by a woman ſitting on a pile, with a flaming cenſor in her hand, and by her is a phœnix and a ſalamander.

Earth is crowned with a chaplet of corn, and holds in one hand a wheatſheaf, and in the other a cornucopia; by her are two little boys, with plumbs and cherries; and at her feet are ſtrewed melons, peaches, and other fruit, with cabbages, carrots, &c.

Air is repreſented by a woman, with her left hand on a peacock's back, whoſe tail is extended; a parokeet is by the peacock in a flying poſture, and on her right hand is perched a King's Fiſher; little zephyrs are playing over her head, with a variety of birds.

Water is repreſented by a Neriad holding a fiſh in her lap, with a dolphin, cod, eels, and other fiſh under her feet, and around her are little cupids, with their wings dropping wet, having each a little fiſh to play with.

In the different parts of the ceiling are the winds ſupporting the clouds; and in the front is Aurora with her nymphs in waiting, giving water to her horſes. On the cornice are two ſigns of the Zodiac ſupporting a golden urn of flowers. On the right hand of the above figure is Aries, or the ram, with one of the winds; and on the left Libra, or the Balance, with a blue band of ſtaars round his body, and ſcales in his hand.

Beneath the cornice are twelve azure columns, painted, of the Corinthian order; and on each hand, in large compartments, are the transformation of Phæton's ſiſters into Poplar trees, with this inſcription, MAGNIS TAMEN EXCIDIT AUSIS; alſo the transformation of Cycnus into a ſwan. Between each pillar is a niche, in which is repreſented Geography, Comedy, Tragedy, Epic Poetry, Sculpture, Painting, Muſic, and the Mathematics; all which are painted in umber, and heightened with gold; ſo that they appear to the eye like braſs ſtatues.

Over the door is a buſt of Venus in black marble; and on the front ſide of the ſtair-caſe, is an oval which gives a view to the back ſtair-caſe, which is adorned with the ſtory of Meleager killing the wild boar of Ætolia, and giving the head to his miſtreſs Attalanta.

The painting of the whole ſtair-caſe was deſigned and executed by Sir James Thornhill, in the reigns of queen Anne and king George I.

Having aſcended the ſtair-caſe the firſt room you enter is

The Queen's Guard-chamber.

This room is completely furniſhed with guns, piſtols, bayonets, pikes, ſwords, &c. beautifully ranged and diſpoſed into various forms, as the ſtar and garter, the royal cypher, a draſkello, and other ornaments.

The ceiling is adorned with Britannia in the perſon of queen Catharine of Portugal, conſort of Charles II. ſeated on a globe, bearing the arms of England and Portugal, the four quarters of the earth preſenting her their reſpective offerings.

Europe, as a lady richly dreſſed, ſits between two cornucopias, the one full of corn, and the other of grapes, holding a temple in her right hand, and with her left pointing to ſcepters and crowns placed among trophies of arms, with a horſe and a book, on which is perched an owl; by her lies ſeveral muſical inſtruments, and a painters pallet, with pencils.

Aſia is repreſented as a lady in a rich embroidered dreſs, wearing on her head a garland of fruit and flowers: ſeveral branches of pepper, caſſia and olives, are in her right hand, and in her left a ſmoaking cenſor; and on one ſide of her is a camel kneeling.

Africa is repreſented as a negro woman, with her hair frizled; ſhe is almoſt naked, and has an elephant's head for a creſt, with a necklace of coral, and pendants of the ſame; on one ſide of her is a lion, and on the other a viper and a large ſerpent.

America is repreſented by a woman of a tawny aſpect, who is almoſt naked: ſhe has a veil folded over her ſhoulders, and an artificial band of feathers round her body; in her hand ſhe holds a bow, and by her is a quiver, with a human head pierced through with an arrow; and on the ground is a lizard.

In different parts of the ceiling are Mars, Minerva, Venus, and other heathen deities; and on the outer part are the ſigns of the zodiac.

On the coving over the door is Minerva, on the eaſt ſide Achilles, on the ſouth Juno, with a peacock, and on the weſt, Venus with her doves.

Over the chimney is George prince of Denmark on horſeback, by Dahl, and a view of ſhipping by Vandevelde.

The Queen's Preſence-chamber.

The tapeſtry of this room repreſents the hiſtory of the beheading of St. Paul, and the perſecution of the primitive chriſtians. The ceiling is adorned with the figure of queen Catharine, attended by Religion, Prudence, Fortitude, and other virtues; ſhe is under a curtain ſpread by Time, and ſupported by Zephyrs, with Fame ſounding the happineſs of Britain. Below, Juſtice is driving away Sedition, Envy, and other evil genii.

The paintings in this room are,

Judith and Holofernes, by Guido Reni.
A Magdalen, by Sir Peter Lely.
A Prometheus, by young Palma.

The Queen's Audience-chamber.

The ceiling of this room is adorned with the repreſentation of Britannia in the perſon of queen Catharine, ſeated in a triumphal carr, drawn by ſwans, to the temple of Virtue, attended by Ceres, Pomona, Flora, &c. with other decorations heightened with gold. The canopy is of fine Engliſh velvet, ſet up by queen Anne; and the tapeſtry was made at Coblentz in Germany, and preſented to king Henry VIII. The pictures in this room are,

Judith and Holofernes, by Guido Reni.
St. Stephen ſtoned, by Rotterman.
A Magdalen expiring by moon-light, by Caracci.

The Ball-room.

On the ceiling of this room king Charles II. is repreſented giving freedom to Europe by the figures of Perſeus and Andromeda. On the ſhield of Perſeus is inſcribed Perſeus Britannicus, and over the head of Andromeda is wrote Europa Liberata, and Mars, attended by the celeſtial deities, offers the olive branch.

On the coving of this room is the ſtory of Perſeus and Andromeda, the four ſeaſons, and the ſigns of the Zodiac, the whole heightened with gold. The tapeſtry, which was made at Bruſſels, and ſet up by king Charles II. repreſents the ſeaſons of the year; and the room is adorned with the following pictures:

The Roman Charity, after Tintoret.
Duns Scotus, by Spagnoletto.
A Madona, by Titian.
Fame, by Palmegiani
The arts and Sciences, by the ſame.
Pan and Syrinx, by Stanick.

The Queen's Drawing Room.

The tapeſtry of this room repreſents the twelve months of the year; and the ceiling is painted with the aſſembly of the gods and goddeſſes, the whole intermixed with cupids, flowers, &c. and heightened with gold. The pictures are,

Lot and his two daughters, after Angelo.
Lady Digby, the wife of Sir Kenelm Digby, by Vandyke.
A Spaniſh family, copied from Titian.
A Dutch family, in the character of Mark Anthony and Cleopatra, by De Bray.
A ſleeping Venus, by Pouſſin.
A flower piece, by Verelſt.

The Queen's Bed-chamber.

The bed of ſtate is rich flowered velvet made in Spital-fields, by order of queen Anne; and the tapeſtry, which repreſents the harveſt ſeaſon, was alſo made at London, by Poyntz. The ceiling is painted with the ſtory of Diana and Endymion; and the room is adorned with the following pictures:

Judith and Holofernes, by Guido.
Herod's cruelty, by Giulio Romans.
The Holy Family, by Raphael.

The Room of Beauties.

This room is thus called from its containing a collection of portraits of the moſt celebrated beauties in the reign of king Charles II. They are fourteen in number, and are as follow.

The lady Offory—The dutcheſs of Somerſet—The dutcheſs of Cleveland—Lady Gramont—The counteſs of Northumberland—The dutcheſs of Richmond—Lady Byron—Mrs. Middleton—Lady Denham's ſiſter.—Lady Denham—Lady Rocheſter—Lady Sunderland—Mrs. Dawſon—Mrs. Knot.

Theſe are all original paintings drawn to great perfection by Sir Peter Lely.

The

The Queen's Dreſſing-room.

In this room are the following portraits:

Queen Henrietta Maria, wife to king Charles I.
Queen Mary when a child; and Queen Catharine, all by Vandyke.

The dutcheſs of York, mother to queen Mary, and queen Anne, by Sir Peter Lely.

There is a cloſet in this room, wherein are ſeveral paintings, and in particular a portrait of the counteſs of Deſmond, who is ſaid to have lived to within a few days of an hundred and fifty years of age; alſo a portrait of Eraſmus, and other learned men.

In this cloſet is likewiſe the banner of France annually delivered on the ſecond of Auguſt by the duke of Marlborough, by which he holds Blenheim-houſe, built at Woodſtock in Oxfordſhire in the reign of queen Anne, as a national reward to that great general for his many glorious victories over the French.

The Picture Gallery.

This gallery is richly ornamented with the following paintings:

King James I. and his queen, whole lengths, by Vanſomer.
Rome in flames, by Guilo Romano.
A Roman family, by Titian.
The Holy Family, after Raphael.
Judith and Holofernes, by Tintoret.
A night piece by Skalkin.
The pool of Betheſda, by Tintoret.
A portrait of Charles VI. emperor of Germany, by Sir Godfrey Kneller.
The wiſe men making offerings to Chriſt, by Paulo Veroneſe.
Two uſurers, an admired piece, by the famous blackſmith of Antwerp.
Perſeus and Andromeda, by Schiavon.
Aretina and Titian, by Titian.
The duke of Glouceſter, a whole length by Sir Godfrey Kneller.
Prince George of Denmark, a whole length by Dahl.
King Henry VIII. by Hans Holbein.

A rural piece in low life, by Baſſano.
A fowl piece, by Varelſt.
The battle of Spurs near Terevaen in France, in 1513, by Hans Holbein.
Two views of Windſor caſtle, by Woſterman.
Two Italian markets, by Michael Angelo.

In this room is a curious amber cabinet, preſented by the king of Pruſſia to queen Caroline. And here likewiſe is queen Caroline's china cloſet, filled with a great variety of curious china elegantly diſpoſed, and the whole room is finely gilt and ornamented. Over the chimney are the pictures of prince Arthur and his two ſiſters, the children of king Henry VII. by Holbein. In this cloſet is alſo a fine amber cabinet, preſented to queen Anne, by doctor Robinſon, biſhop of London, and plenipotentiary at the congreſs of Utrecht.

The King's Cloſet.

Among the curioſities in this room is a large frame of needlework, ſaid to be wrought by Mary queen of Scots, while a priſoner in Fotheringay caſtle. She herſelf is repreſented ſupplicating for juſtice before the Virgin Mary, with her ſon, afterwards king James I. ſtanding by her. In a ſcroll is worked, Sapientiam amavi et exquiſivi a Juventute mea, that is, I have loved and ſearched after wiſdom from my youth. Behind the queen are Wiſdom with a ſerpent, and Juſtice with a ſword. This piece lay a conſiderable time in the wardrobe, and was at length ordered to be put up by queen Anne.

The ceiling of this room is painted with the ſtory of Jupiter and Leda; and over the chimney are three marble buſts. The paintings are,

A Magdalen, by Carracci.
A ſleeping Cupid, by Correggio.
Contemplations, by Carracci.
Titian's daughter, by herſelf.
A German lady, by Raphael.

The King's Dreſſing-room.

The ceiling of this room is painted with the ſtory of Jupiter deſcending to Danae, in a ſhower of gold. The paintings are,

George Villars, duke of Buckingham.
King Charles II.
Two children of Henry VII.
A naked Venus aſleep, by Sir Peter Lely.
The birth of Jupiter, by Giulio Romano.

The King's Bed-chamber.

This room is hung with tapeſtry repreſenting the ſtory of Hero and Leander. The bed of ſtate, which was ſet up in the reign of king Charles II. is of fine blue cloth, richly embroidered with gold and ſilver. And on the ceiling that prince is repreſented in the robes of the garter, under a canopy ſupported by Time, Jupiter and Neptune, with a wreath of laurel over his head, and he is attended by Europe, Aſia, Africa and America paying their obedience to him. The paintings in this room are,

King Charles II. in armour, when a boy, by Vandyke.
St. Paul ſtoned at Lyſtra, by Paul Veroneſe.

The King's Drawing room.

The ceiling of this room is finely painted with an allegorical repreſentation of king Charles II. riding in a triumphal carr, drawn by the horſes of the ſun, attended by Fame, Peace, and the Polite Arts. Hercules is driving away Rebellion, Sedition and Ignorance. Britannia and Neptune, properly attended, are paying obedience to the monarch as he paſſes; the whole is a lively repreſentation of the reſtoration of that monarch, and the introduction of arts and ſciences in theſe kingdoms. In the other parts of the ceiling are painted the labours of Hercules, with feſtoons of fruit and flowers, the whole beautifully decorated in gold and ſtone colour. The paintings are,

A Venetian lady, by Titian.
A Magdalen, by Carlo Dolci.
Herodias's daughter, by the ſame.
The marquis of Hamilton, after Vandyke, by Hanneman.
A converted chineſe, the capital piece of Sir Godfrey Kneller.

The King's Public Dining-room.

The carving of this room is very beautiful, repreſenting a great variety of fowl, fiſh and fruit done to the greateſt perfection on lime wood, by Mr. Gibbons, a famous ſtatuary and carver in the reign of king Charles II. On the ceiling is painted the banquet of the gods, with a great variety of fiſh and fowl, on the ſeveral parts of the coving, finely heightened with gold. The pictures in this room are,

King George II. and queen Caroline.
Hercules and Omphale.
Cephalus and Procris.
The birth of Venus.
Venus and Adonis; the four laſt by Genaris.
A naval triumph of king Charles II. by Verrio.
The marriage of St. Catharine, by Dawkers.
Nymphs and Satyrs, by Rubens and Snyders.
Hunting the wild boar, by Snyders.
A picture of ſtill life, by Girardo.
The taking of the bears, by Snyders.
A night piece, being a family ſinging by candle light, by Quiſtin.
A Bohemian family, by de Brie.
Divine love, by an unknown hand.
Lacy, a famous commedian in the time of king Charles II. in three characters, by Wright.
Many of the paintings in this room are beſt ſeen at noon by the reflection of the ſun.

The King's audience Chamber.

This room is hung with tapeſtry repreſenting ſome religious ceremonies of the Jews. The canopy, which is ſaid to be the richeſt ever made, is of green velvet, embroidered with gold. On the ceiling is repreſented the eſtabliſhment of the church of England on the reſtoration of king Charles II. in the characters of England, Scotland and Ireland, attended by Faith, Hope and Charity. Religion triumphs over Superſtition and Hypocriſy, who are driven by Cupids from before the face of the church, all which are repreſented in their proper attitudes, and highly finiſhed. The pictures are,

Our Saviour before Pilate, by Michael Angelo.
The Apoſtles at the Sepulchre, by Schiavone.
Peter, James and John, by Michael Angelo.
The dutcheſs of Richmond, by Vandyke.

The King's Preſence chamber.

The tapeſtry of this room contains the hiſtory of queen Atheliah; and on the ceiling is painted Mercury with a portrait of king Charles II. which he ſhews with tranſport to the four quarters of the world, who are introduced by Neptune. Fame declares the glory of the prince, and Time drives away Sedition, Envy, and their companions. Over the canopy Juſtice is repreſented in ſtone colours ſhewing the arms of Britain to Thames and his river nymphs, with the ſtar of Venus, and this label, Sydus Carolinum. At the lower end of the chamber is Venus, in a marine carr, drawn by Tritons and Sea Nymphs; and the whole is beautifully finiſhed in ſtone colour and gold.

The room is likewiſe adorned with the following portraits.

Henry duke of Glouceſter, brother to king Charles II.
The counteſs of Dorſet, his governeſs, both by Vandyke.
Father Paul, by Tintoret.

The King's Guard-chamber.

This is a ſpacious and noble room, in which is a large magazine of arms, conſiſting of ſome thouſands of pikes, piſtols, guns, coats of mail, ſwords, halberts, bayonets, and drums, diſpoſed in a moſt curious manner in colonades, pillars, circles, ſhields, and other devices by Mr. Harris, formerly maſter gunner of this caſtle.—The perſon who invented this beautiful arrangement of arms, likewiſe placed thoſe in the great armoury in the Tower of London.

The ceiling is finely painted in water colours. In one circle is Mars and Minerva, and in the other Peace and Plenty. In the dome is alſo a repreſentation of Mars, and over the chimney-piece is a picture of Charles XI. king of Sweden, on horſeback, as big as the life, by Wyck.

At an inſtallation, the knights of the garter dine here in great ſtate in the abſence of the ſovereign.

St. George's Hall.

This hall is particularly ſet apart to the honour of the moſt illuſtrious order of the garter, and is perhaps one of the nobleſt rooms in Europe, both with regard to the building and the painting, which is here performed in the moſt grand taſte. In a large oval in the centre of the ceiling, king Charles II. is repreſented in the habit of the order, attended by England, Scotland, and Ireland; Religion and Plenty hold the crown of theſe kingdoms over his head; Mars and Mercury, with the emblems of war and peace, ſtand on each ſide. In the ſame oval regal government is repreſented, upheld by Religion and Eternity, with Juſtice attended by Fortitude, Temperance and Prudence, beating down Rebellion and Faction. Towards the throne is repreſented in an octagon, St. George's croſs incircled with the garter, within a ſtar or glory ſupported by Cupids, with the motto,

HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE:

and beſides other embelliſhments relating to the order, the Muſes are repreſented attending in full concert.

On the back of the ſtate, or ſovereign's throne, is a large drapery, on which is painted St. George encountering the dragon, as large as the life; and on the lower border of the drapery is inſcribed, in alluſion to king William III. who is painted in the habit of the order, ſitting under a royal canopy, by Sir Godfrey Kneller. To the throne is an aſcent by five ſteps of fine marble, to which the painter has added five more, which are done with ſuch perfection as to deceive the ſight, and induce the ſpectator to think them equally real.

VENIENDO RESTITUIT REM:

This noble room is an hundred and eight feet in length, and the whole north ſide is taken up with the triumph of Edward the Black Prince, after the manner of the Romans. At the upper part of the hall is Edward III. that prince's father, the conqueror of France and Scotland, and the founder of the order of the garter, ſeated on a throne, receiving the king's of France and Scotland priſoners: the Black Prince is ſeated in the middle of the proceſſion, crowned with laurel, and carried by ſlaves, preceded by captives, and attended by the emblems of Victory, Liberty, and other inſignia of the Romans, with the banners of France and Scotland diſplayed. The painter has given a looſe to his fancy, by cloſing the proceſſion with the fiction of the counteſs of Saliſbury, in the perſon of a fine lady, making garlands for the prince, and the repreſentation of the Merry Wives of Windſor.

At the lower end of the hall is a noble muſic gallery, ſupported by ſlaves, larger than the life, in proper attitudes, ſaid to repreſent a father and his three ſons taken priſoners by the Black Prince in his wars abroad. Over this gallery, on the lower compartment of the ceiling, is the collar of the order of the garter fully diſplayed. The painting of this room was done by Verro, and is highly finiſhed, and heightened with gold.

St. George's or the King's chapel.

On the ceiling of this chapel is finely repreſented Our Lord's aſcenſion: and the altar-piece is adorned with a noble painting of the Laſt Supper. The north ſide of the chapel is ornamented with the repreſentation of our Saviour's raiſing Lazarus from the dead, his curing the ſick of the palſy, and other miracles, beautifully painted by Verro; and in a group of ſpectators, the painter has introduced his own effigy, with thoſe of Sir Godfrey Kneller, and Mr. Cooper, who aſſiſted him in theſe paintings. The eaſt end of this chapel is taken up with the cloſet belonging to his majeſty and the royal family. The canopy, curtains, and furniture, are of crimſon velvet, fringed with gold; and the carved work of this chapel, which is well worthy the attention of the curious, is done by that famous artiſt Gibbons, in lime-tree, repreſenting a great variety of pelicans, doves, palms, and other alluſions to ſcripture hiſtory, with the ſtar and garter, and other ornaments finiſhed to great perfection.

From St. George's chapel you are conducted to the Queen's Guard-chamber, the firſt room you entered: for this is the laſt of the ſtate apartments at preſent ſhown to the public, the others being only open when the court reſides at Windſor. They conſiſt of many beautiful chambers, adorned with the paintings of the greateſt maſters.

In paſſing from hence, the ſtranger uſually looks into the inner or horn-court, ſo called from a pair of ſtag horns of a very extraordinary ſize, taken in the foreſt, and ſet up in that court, which is painted in bronze and ſtone colour. On one ſide is repreſented a Roman battle, and on the oppoſite ſide a ſea-fight, with the images of Jupiter, Neptune, Mercury and Pallas; and in the gallery is a repreſentation of king David playing before the ark.

From this court a flight of ſtone ſteps lead to the King's Guard-chamber; and in the cavity under theſe ſteps, and fronting this court, is a figure of Hercules alſo in ſtone colours. On a dome over the ſteps, is painted the battle of the Gods; and on the ſides of the ſtair-caſe is a repreſentation of the four ages of the world, and two battles of the Greeks and Romans in freſco.

Having thus deſcribed the caſtle both within and without, it may not be improper to give ſome account of the inſtallation of the knights of the garter, this being the ſeat of that moſt illuſtrious order.

The order of the garter was inſtituted by Edward III. in the year 1349, for the improvement of military honour, and the reward of virtue. It is called the order of St. George, the patron of England, under whoſe banner the Engliſh always went out to war, and St. George's croſs was made the enſign of the order. At the ſame time the garter was appointed to be worn by the knights on the left leg, as a principal mark of diſtinction, not from any regard to a lady's garter, but as a tye or band of aſſociation in honour and military virtue, to bind the knights companions ſtrictly to himſelf and each other, in friendſhip and true agreement, and as an enſign or badge of unity and combination, to promote the honour of God, and the glory and intereſt of their prince and ſovereign.

At that time king Edward being engaged in proſecuting by arms, his right to the crown of France, cauſed the French motto Honi ſoit qui mal y penſe, to be wrought in gold letters round the garter, declaring thereby the equity of his intention, and at the ſame time retorting ſhame and defiance upon him who ſhould dare to think ill of the juſt enterprize in which he had engaged for the ſupport of his right to the crown.

The inſtallation of a knight of this moſt noble order conſiſts of many ceremonies eſtabliſhed by the royal founder, and the ſucceeding ſovereigns of the order, the care of which is committed to

Garter

Garter king at arms, a principal officer, appointed to ſupport and maintain the dignity of this noble order of knighthood.

On the morning of the inſtallation the knights commiſſioners, whom the ſovereign has appointed to inſtall the perſons who are to be inveſted with this dignity, aſſemble in the great chamber, at the dean of Windſor's lodgings, robed in the full habit of the order, where Garter and the officers of the order likewiſe attend in their robes; but the knights elect appear there only in their under habits with their caps and feathers in their hands.

From hence the knights walk two and two in proceſſion to St. George's chapel, preceded by the poor knights, prebends, heralds, purſuivants, and other officers of the order, in their ſeveral habits; where, being arrived, the knights elect reſt themſelves in chairs behind the altar, and are reſpectively introduced into the chapter-houſe, where the knights commiſſioners (Garter and the other officers attending) inveſt them with the ſurcoat or upper habit of the order, whilſt the regiſter reads the following admonition: "Take "this robe of crimſon to the increaſe of your "honour, and in token or ſign of the moſt no-"ble order you have received, wherewith you "being defended, may be bold, not only ſtrong "to fight, but alſo to offer yourſelf to ſhed your "blood for Chriſt's faith, and the liberties of the "church, and the juſt and neceſſary defence of "them that are oppreſſed and needy." Then Garter preſents the crimſon velvet girdle to the commiſſioners, who buckle it on, and alſo girds on the ſword and hanger.

This being done the proceſſion of each knight elect ſeparately is made into the choir, attended by the lords commiſſioners, and other companions of the order, and preceded by the poor knights, prebends, &c. as before, Garter in the middle carrying on a crimſon velvet cuſhion the mantle, hood, garter, collar, and George, having the regiſter on his right hand, who carries the New Teſtament, and the oath fairly written on parchment, and the black rod on his left.

On entering the choir, after reverence made to the altar, and the ſovereign's ſtall, the knights are conducted to their ſeveral ſtalls, under their reſpective banners, and other enſigns of honour. One of the officers of the order then holding the New Teſtament open, the knight elect places his right hand upon it, and the regiſter reads the oath, which is expreſſed in theſe terms: "You being "choſen to be one of the honourable company "of this noble order of the Garter, ſhall pro-"miſe and ſwear by the Holy Evangeliſts by "you here touched, that wittingly you ſhall not "break any ſtatute of the ſaid order, or any ar-"ticles in them contained, the ſame being agree-"able, and not repugnant to the laws of Al-"mighty God, and the laws of this realm, as "far forth as to you belongeth and appertaineth: "ſo help you God, and his holy word."

After the oath is taken the commiſſioners inveſt the knight with the mantle of the order, during which the regiſter reads the admonition, "Receive this robe, &c." Garter then preſents to the commiſſioners the hood, and they put it over the knight's right ſhoulder, bringing the tippets acroſs his breaſt, and tucking them under the belt.

This being done, Garter preſents to them the Great Collar and George, which they hang over the mantle and hood, while the regiſter reads the following admonition: "Wear this collar about "thy neck, adorned with the image of the "Bleſſed Martyr and ſoldier of Chriſt, St. George; "by whoſe imitation provoked, thou mayeſt ſo "paſs over both proſperous and adverſe encoun-"ters, that having ſtoutly vanquiſhed thy ene-"mies, both of body and ſoul, thou mayeſt not "only receive the praiſes of this tranſient com-"bat, but be crowned with the palm of eternal "victory."

Garter then preſents the ſtatute book, which the commiſſioners deliver to the knight, after which they place his cap and feathers on his head, and ſeat him in his ſtall. This being done, the officers of the order retire, and ſtand before their ſeats; while the knight thus inſtalled riſes, and bows firſt towards the altar, and then to the ſovereign's ſtall.

Prayers now begin, and the obiit ſervice is read in remembrance of their pious predeceſſors; and when theſe words in the prayer are pronounced, Let your light ſo ſhine, &c. the poor knights come from their ſeats, make their reverences, and walk up near the altar, where they place themſelves as before, and are followed by the purſuivants and the officers of arms.

The ſolemnity of the inſtallation being thus over, and prayers ended, the grand proceſſion of the knights is made from the choir in their full habits of the order, with their caps frequently adorned with diamonds and plumes of feathers on their heads, round the body of the church; from whence they paſs out at the ſouth door, preceded by his majeſty's muſic in the following order:

The poor knights of Windſor.
The choir of St. George's chapel.
The canons or prebends of Windſor.
The heralds and purſuivants at arms.
The dean of Windſor, regiſter of the order, with Garter king at arms on his right hand, and on his left the black rod of the order.
The knights companions according to their ſtalls, their trains ſupported by the choriſters of St. George's chapel.

The proceſſion is thus continued in great ſtate through the courts of the caſtle into St. George's hall. The knights then reſt themſelves in the royal apartments, while a ſumptuous banquet, if the ſovereign be preſent, is ſerved up in this magnificent room, or, in the king's abſence, in the great guard-chamber next adjoining, into which the knights are introduced, and dine with great ſtate in the habits of the order, the officers and muſic attending.

At the ſecond courſe, Garter, with the officers at arms, proceeds from the lower end of the room to the place where the new inſtalled knights are ſeated, but inſtantly ſtand up uncovered while Garter proclaims the ſtile and title of each knight, either in Engliſh or French; and then all the officers ficers of arms crying Largeſſe, make their obeiſances, and retire.

The day is concluded with a ball for the ladies in the royal apartments.

Having thus deſcribed the town of Windſor, the little park and caſtle, and given ſome account of the order of the knights of the garter, we are naturally led to mention the great park, which is fourteen miles in circumference, and is well ſtocked with deer and other game. This park lies on the ſouth ſide of the town, and opens by a very noble road, the ſides of which are planted with trees to the ſummit of a delightful hill, at near three miles diſtance, leading to the Ranger's lodge, the reſidence of his late royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, who greatly improved the natural beauties of this delightful park, by large plantations of trees, extenſive lawns, and ſpacious canals, which has rendered this villa an habitation worthy of a prince.

The two firſt rooms of this lodge are neatly hung with plain paper, ornamented with prints, among which are views of the improvements made by his royal highneſs in the park.

Over the chimney-piece in the dining-room is his royal highneſſes collection of breeding mares; and there is here a curious table of petrified water.

In the paſſage is the croſſing of the Rhine, Marſhal Saxe, three curious fancy peices, by Hoare, a fine drawing of St. Paul's, Cleopatra, Rubens's family, &c.

In a room called the black hall is the genealogy of the Brunſwick family, a peice of feather-work flowers, four views of Gibraltar, Windſor caſtle in ſtraw-work, and his late majeſty in needle-work.

In the dreſſing-room are two pagodas under glaſſes, ſeveral curious pieces of his highneſſes turning, and ſix different views of Cranbourn lodge and park.

In the bed-chamber is the portrait of James, late earl of Waldegrave, four views of the lodge, and the battle of Culloden. The bed is of green damaſk and gold.

The Belvidere on Shrubs-hill, is a triangular building, that has a tower at each corner, one of which is a ſtair-caſe, the other a library, and the third a china cloſet. The middle room is richly gilt, and adorned with a beautiful chandelier of Chelſea porcelain. It is encompaſſed by a fine plantation of trees, that forms a moſt delightful rural ſcene. The noble piece of water in the valley underneath, was formed at a great expence, and from a ſmall ſtream or current, is rendered capable of carrying barges and boats of pleaſure. Over this water his late royal higneſs cauſed a bridge to be erected of moſt curious architecture, and on a bold and noble plan, it conſiſting of one ſingle arch, one hundred and ſixty-five feet wide in the clear, which is five feet wider than the boaſted Rialto at Venice.

Near this bridge is what is called the Chineſe Iſland, near Mill-gate, where there is another bridge of a curious conſtruction, it having arches three ways. The building is elegant and ſtriking. The middle room is of ſcarlet and green, richly ornamented with gold. The pannels of the doors are of looking-glaſs, which has a pretty effect, and the room is alſo adorned with a curious glaſs chandelier. The right hand room forms a kitchen, and the left is a ſmall room hung with white ſattin, painted, in which is a ſettee of the ſame. Here a curious bracket, which ſupports a table againſt the window, forms a ſpreading tree, with birds, beneath which ſit on a branch, a Chineſe man and woman; and over the chimney is a fine ſet of china. This piece of water is a great ornament to the park, it being ſo large, that with its ſeveral branches, it meaſures five miles round. It terminates in another ſmall bridge, and a large caſcade, at the head of which is a grotto.

In the neighbourhood of Windſor are many very elegant buildings belonging to the nobility and gentry; two of which being frequently viſited for their curious contents, we ſhall here deſcribe. The firſt of theſe is the agreeable ſeat and gardens of the honourable James Bateman, eſq; ſituate on the banks of the river.

In the hall, which is hung with a large collection of foreign prints, is a curious Chineſe lanthorn; and over the chimney are ſwords, daggers and lances, brought from China. Adjoining to the hall is a ſmall library in the Chineſe taſte, which, by means of glaſſes, gives a double reflection.

On the ſtair-caſe are the arms of the barons who ſigned Magna Charta. And the window is painted with ſeveral hiſtory pieces from the Old Teſtament, as the building of Noah's Ark, &c. with the effigies of all the prophets and apoſtles.

In the parlour is a large handſome jar, ſaid to have been brought from Rome, and that it boaſts an antiquity of three hundred years before the birth of Chriſt. Here is likewiſe a curious India bird cage and fireſcreen; and over the chimney is a repreſentation of two Egyptian mummies. The pictures in this room are, Louis le Grand—Louis Quinze—Beliſarius—Our Saviour and his diſciples at Emmaus—Cardinal Fleury, &c.

In the drawing-room is another jar of the ſame nature with the former, and brought from the ſame place. The glaſſes and cabinets are very curious; the chairs are flowers in needlework. Here are curious ſilver flowers under glaſſes, and a ſet of tea equipage in gold, compleat. The other remarkables in this room are, a cock curiouſly cut in paper—A large medal of Leda and the ſwan—Ditto of Clemens IX.—And ſeveral ſmaller medals—The Holy Virgin—Hendrick.

The dreſſing-room is very elegantly furniſhed, the windows are ſo contrived as to ſhew the company on their heads. In this room, among ſeveral foreign medals, carved in box, is a ſmall braſs figure, on a gilt pedeſtal; on the ſide of which is this inſcription: "Found at Bath, in a ſtone "coffin with bones, in digging a foundation." In the corner of this room is a Roman chapel in miniature, in which is the hiſtory of Our Saviour's life carved in ivory. Here is a curious ſhrine; a piece of the croſs; a bone of St. Patrick, &c. &c. The holy veſſels are all of pure gold, richly chaſed. Here are alſo ſeveral curious crucifixes both of ſilver and gold. The Holy Virgin in ſolid ſilver. All the figures, utenſils, &c. are richly ſet with precious ſtones; and the chapel itſelf beautifully carved and gilt.

In the monk rooms are two curious antique beds, and the rooms are hung with the pictures of ſeveral monks. In one room is a large antique metal baſon; in the other, a delft-diſh full of ſerpents, ſnakes, &c.

Over the chimney, in Mr. Bateman's bedchamber, are the twelve apoſtles (Judas excepted;) a ſet of Chineſe pictures, repreſenting the breeding of ſilk worms; a neat cabinet; two Dutch figures and a ſmall library. By the ſide of the bed is a ſmall ivory crucifix, of a different mark from any other in the houſe.

The beſt bedchamber is very handſomely furniſhed, and contains a beautiful inlaid pearl croſs, a fine ſhell urn, a curious cabinet, and a large gilt ſtatue of Saturn devouring a young child.

On a ſlab in the wrought room ſtands a large inlaid pearl croſs; and over the chimney are four very curious antique figures.

In the garden, under the piazzas, or cloiſters, hangs a large collection of paintings, from William the Conqueror, to king James—Carducamus, biſhop of Bangor—Several ſcripture pieces—A genealogical piece—The famous blackſmith of Antwerp's wife—Sir Thomas More—and ſeveral of our celebrated painters and poets.

The dining-room is ſituate in the garden, and is an octagon building. Here is a neat chandalier, and a curious ſtove grate and furniture. Over the door is the picture of lord Bateman; and on the outſide is carved Jacob's ladder, and the deſcent of Chriſt. Over the chimney are the pictures of Lady Harvey—Lord Ilcheſter—Lord Foley—Lord Holland.

In the china cloſet is a large and valuable collection of china, both ornamental and uſeful, in the Chineſe taſte. Likewiſe a curious china lanthorn.

Adjoining to this cloſet is an ancient tomb of Carducamus, biſhop of Bangor: over which is the following inſcription:

" Thys ys the true effygie of Carducamus by-
" ſhop of Bangor deſcended of an auntient bry-
" tyſh ſtocke. A prelate of ſyngular pietye and
" rare lernyng in all ſcyences eſpecyally in Theolo-
" gie who contemplating the vanyty of worldlye
" greetneſſe and the weight of the paſtoral care re-
" ſygn'd his byſhopryche by pyrmyſyon of pope
" Gregory IX. and became an humble monk in
" the abbey of Door dedycating hys whole ſub-
" ſtance to Godde and hymſelf to divine con-
" templatyons leaveing behynd hym a precyous
" work a buke of Homilys entytled a looking
" glaſs for Chryſtens he dyed at Door in the Ides
" of April.

" MCCXLI."

On an altar lies the book called the looking glaſs for chriſtians. Here is a fine human ſkull and bones in a glaſs caſe; a croſier, mitre, &c. And here is the pitcher in which it is ſaid Rachael gave water to Jacob.

Farther on in the garden is a building, called Brien's cave; in a niche in the back thereof, is an ancient caſt iron figure of Brien Boiroimbe; beneath, is this inſcription in gold characters:

" The moſt renowned Brien Boiroimbe, go" verned the iſle in peace: through his reign the " Iriſh were a brave wealthy people, and wars
" and diſcord ceaſed."

On the right is a painting, repreſenting Brien Boiroimbe mortally wounded in his tent, with Donough, his ſon, commander of the army. And on the left is a painting, repreſenting the biſhop of Inis Cathy, chaplain to Brien Boiroimbe, adminiſtering to him the laſt ſacraments.

Adjoining is a view of the abbey of Swords, with this inſcription:

" The great iriſh monarch, Brien Boiroimbe,
" commanded in twenty-nine battles againſt the " Danes, and in all of them was victorious. The " reputation he had acquired in the field of bat" tle was to be equalled by few in any age, to
" to be excelled by none. He commanded in " more battles than Julius Cæſar, and diſtinguiſh-
" ed himſelf in all of them with an amazing in" trepidity. It may be ſaid of him, that he was " a prodigy of goodneſs, underſtanding and
" greatneſs. To conſider his piety, it would ſeem
" that he had ſpent all his life in a cloiſter; to " examine the productions of his genius, thoſe
" that have read his works would be inclined to " believe, that his whole time had been occu-
" pied in learning and the ſciences; to view him
" as a general and monarch, he appears to have
" ſtudied nothing but the art of war and politics,
" the conqueſt of his enemies, and the eaſe and
" proſperity of his ſubjects."

Underneath is the funeral proceſſion to the abbey of Swords, with this inſcription:

" The moſt renowned Brien Boiroimbe was
" ſlain 1034 years after the birth of Chriſt."

Directly oppoſite to this is a painting, repreſenting the ruin of the chapel and great gate of Swords, on which are the following words:

" The inſtitutes of Brien Boiroimbe, ſo whole-
" ſome for the ſupport of virtue, were kept with
" ſo much reverence and regard, that a young la-
" dy of conſummate beauty, adorned with jewels
" and a ring of gold, travelled alone on foot,
" from north to ſouth, and no attempt was made
" upon her honour, or to diveſt her of the " cloaths ſhe wore."

Underneath is a painting of the battle of Cluantarf, with this inſcription:

" In the moſt dreadful battle of Cluantarf, was " ſlain the valiant monarch of the iſland, after a
" life of eighty-eight years."

Towards

Towards the end of the garden is the effigy of a favourite ſpaniel, lying on a cuſhion upon a pedeſtal; on the front of which are the following lines:

The female who within this tomb is laid,
Departed hence, nor widow, wife nor maid.
Titles ſhe boaſted not, nor gentle kin;
But ſenſe and beauty, and her name was Pinne.
Obſcure, ſhe liv'd an eaſy chearful life,
Refus'd no friendſhip, and provok'd no ſtrife
With thoſe ſhe lik'd not, now-and-then too loud,
And ev'n with thoſe ſhe did, too often proud.
No Chriſtian ſhe, Mahometan or Jew,
But to the god of Epicurus true;
For ſhe ne'er bore a pain ſhe could avoid;
And ev'ry pleaſure ſhe could ſeize enjoy'd.
By no law, rule, or principle e'er ſway'd,
But what her appetite or paſſions made.
She drank when thirſty, eat when hunger mov'd,
Reſted when weary, and when tender lov'd.
She to no tyrant, own'd herſelf a ſlave,
But to her friend her willing ſervice gave;
And tho' four legs this female had, 'tis true,
I know of few ſo good that have but two.

On the eaſt ſide of Windſor is the large and elegant ſeat of the duke of St. Alban's. The gardens extend to the park, and the paintings in the houſe are exceeding curious. The marble hall is adorned with fruit pieces, by Bogdeni, and ſeveral other capital painters.

In the breakfaſt room is a curious clock preſented to the duke of St. Albans by king Charles II. It is fixed on the head of an Ethiopian, who holds a bow in his hand, and by his ſide is a quiver of arrows. The face of the clock repreſents a landſcape, with a fountain; and in the ſky are placed three figures, to denote the quarters of the hour; and under, in a hole, is the hour figure. This was deſigned for a night clock. Over the doors of this room are the pictures of lady Mary Vere, and Quinſtin, the blackſmith of Antwerp, with his wife and child, by Rubens. The other paintings are, St. Evremond, by Sir Godfrey Kneller—Mr. Francis Villiers—A contemplation piece—Henrietta Maria, wife to Charles I. by Vandyke—Noah's ark, by Baſſan—Hortence Mancini, dutcheſs of Mazarine—Meſſalini—King Charles I.

The duke's dreſſing room is adorned with the following pictures: The entrance into Rome, and the caſtle of St. Angelo, both by Candeleto—Portrait of the dutcheſs of Mazarine, by Sir Godfrey Kneller—A curious piece of ſtill life by Candeleto—Several Dutch pieces and ſhipping.

Over the doors belonging to her grace's dreſſing room, are the pictures of Mary counteſs of Exeter, daughter to Milway dutcheſs of Northumberland, by Sir Peter Lely—Lady Diana—Lady Mary Vere—Mrs. Elinor Gwin.

The duke and dutcheſs's bedchamber is hung with tapeſtry made in Spital-fields by Chabanex, and repreſents the hay harveſt and a Dutch wake. The bed is of yellow damaſk, and the paintings are, four flower pieces, by young Baptiſt.

In the gallery is a head of Our Saviour, the Aſcenſion, the Wiſe Men's offering, and the Virgin Mary, on agate; Oliver Cromwell, lord Digby, &c. and three pieces of birds, by Bogdeni.

In the public dining room are three views of Venice, and a view of the inſide of the pantheon at Rome.

The great ſtair-caſe is painted with ſtories from Ovid.

The great drawing room is hung with tapeſtry, the ſubject of which is the hiſtory of king Nebuchadnezzar, and Joſeph interpreting Pharaoh's dreams. Over the chimney is the picture of king William, and over the doors are Mrs. Loſtus, with Muſtapha and Charles Wiſe, two Turkiſh children taken priſoners by the firſt duke of St. Albans, at the battle of Belgrade. When they arrived at years of diſcretion his grace gave them the choice of returning home or ſtaying there; on which Muſtapha returned, and the other, who was baptized by the name of Charles Wiſe, died a poor knight of Windſor.

In the dining room is a large collection of prints, and a curious clock, that goes a year without winding up, and ſhews the name of the month and the day of the week. On the face of the clock is this inſcription: "The long hand is "365 days in going round, and points to the "days of the month; the ſhort hand, with the "figure of the ſun, ſhews how many minutes "(computed from the cypher, under 69) a true "ſun-dial is faſter or ſlower than this clock, the "ſun daily varying from equal time."

In the bedchamber, the bed is of crimſon damaſk, and the room is adorned with curious India japan, with a cabinet inlaid with pearl.

In the flower-room is a curious India cabinet. Here are likewiſe eight flower pieces by Baptiſt, which coſt a hundred guineas each.

The chimney-piece in the dreſſing room is carved round by Gibbons; and over it is the duke of St. Albans in armour, by Sir Godfrey Kneller. Over the door are the pictures of James lord Beauclerk, and Diana Vere, dutcheſs of St. Albans, by Sir Godfrey Kneller.

The paintings in the waiting room are, Henry Frederick, prince of Wales, the eldeſt ſon to king James I.—George Fitzroy, duke of Northumberland—The queen of Lewis XIV. with his picture in her hand.

In the billiard-room, over the two doors, are the pictures of Henry Fitzroy, duke of Grafton—John Wilmot, earl of Rocheſter—James Scot, duke of Monmouth—John Sheffield, earl Mulgrave, afterwards duke of Buckingham—Thomas Butler, earl of Offory—Henry Jermin, earl of St. Albans—Charles Stewart, duke of Richmond and Lenox—Aubrey de Vere, earl of Oxford—George Villiers, duke of Buckingham—James Stewart, duke of York—Prince Rupert William Henry Naſſau, prince of Orange—The laſt eleven are in the full robes of the garter—Dr. Gregory Haſcard, dean of Windſor, in his mantle—Henrietta Churchill, dutcheſs of Marlborough, and wife to Francis, earl of Godolphin—Charles II. in his robes of the garter—Jane Shore and fair Roſamond.

Over

Over the two chimney pieces are the pictures of Charles I.—Charles prince of Wales—Henry Maria—James duke of York.

Adjoining to Windſor is the village of Taplow, where the fineneſs of the ſituation has cauſed many gentlemen of fortune to fix their reſidence. The manor-houſe on the ſummit of the hill is an ancient noble ſtructure that enjoys a delightful proſpect over the country and the river Thames, which runs underneath. This houſe lately belonged to the right honourable the earl of Inchiquin, who reſided here during the life of his late royal highneſs Frederick prince of Wales, his majeſty's father; but on the deceaſe of that prince, his lordſhip removed to Cliefdon in the neighbourhood.

Cliefdon-houſe was erected by George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, in the reign of Charles II. and came by marriage to the late earl of Orkney, who made ſeveral conſiderable improvements in the houſe and gardens, which were alſo improved and enlarged by the late prince of Wales; ſo that wherever the eye is turned, the ſight is ſtruck with agreeable avenues, porterras, and beautiful lawns, with an extenſive view of the Thames, and the fine well cultivated country on its banks.

The houſe is a ſtately edifice, and the rooms ſpacious and noble. On the front of the houſe is raiſed a noble terrace, ſaid to be higher even than that of Windſor caſtle; however, it is certain, that the proſpect from thence is no leſs beautiful and extenſive. The rooms are noble and ſpacious; and the grand chamber is adorned with tapeſtry hangings, repreſenting the battles of the great duke of Marlborough, finely expreſſed, by order of the late earl of Orkney.

WOKING.

This town is ſituate on the river Wey, twenty miles from London, in the county of Surry. A neat market houſe was built here in the year 1665, at the charge of James Zouch, eſq. Its firſt fair, which is but a ſmall one, was procured by Edmond, duke of Somerſet, from Henry VI. the other from king Charles II. by Mr. Zouch. 'Tis a private country town, out of any great road, ſo that it is little heard of; but there are the remains of the walls of a royal houſe, which was the reſidence of a branch of the family of Plantagenet, viz. the old counteſs of Richmond, mother to Henry VII. In the church-yard here it has been remarked, that ſo long as there is any thing left of a corpſe, beſides bones, a kind of plant grows from it, about the thickneſs of a bull ruſh, with a top like the head of aſparagus, which comes near the ſurface, but never above it. The outſide is black, but the inſide red, and, when the corpſe is quite conſumed, the plant dies away. But the ſame obſervation has been made in other church-yards where the ſoil is a light red ſand, as it is in this.

[Though the two following places are not within the compaſs of this chapter, yet as they are remarkable in themſelves, and contain many very ſuperb buildings, we preſume a deſcription of them in this place will not be either improper or unentertaining to the reader]

CAMBRIDGE.

The town of Cambridge is ſituated on the river Cam, which divides it into two parts that are again joined by a ſtone bridge. It is fifty-two miles diſtant from London, and though dirty and ill built, yet it has fourteen pariſh churches. There is a public conduit in the market-place which was built by Hobſon the carrier, who in the time of James I. acquired a very conſiderable eſtate. A new building, called the Shire-houſe, was lately erected contiguous to the old town-hall, at the expence of the county.

In this town there are two charity ſchools, in which three hundred children are taught and fifty cloathed. Theſe ſchools are ſupported by a ſubſcription of two hundred and thirty pounds per annum, an eſtate of thirty pounds a year, which was left them for ever by William Wartes, and by money at the ſacrament in ſome of the college chapels, which has been appropriated for that purpoſe.

This town is governed by a mayor, high ſteward, recorder, thirteen aldermen, a common-council of twenty-four, a town clerk and other officers.

The univerſity of Cambridge conſiſts of ſixteen colleges, four of which are diſtinguiſhed by the name of halls, though the privileges of both are in every reſpect the ſame. It is a corporation, conſiſting of about fifteen hundred perſons, and is governed by a chancellor, a high ſteward, two proctors, and two taxers; all of whom are choſen by the univerſity.

The chancellor is always a peer of the realm, and generally continues in his office for life, by the tacit conſent of the univerſity, though a new choice may be made every three years. As the chancellor is a perſon of ſuch high rank, it is not expected or intended that he ſhould execute the office; but he has not the power of appointing his ſubſtitute: a vice chancellor is choſen annually on the third of November, by the univerſity; he is always the head of ſome college, the heads of each college returning two of their body, of which the univerſity elects one. The high ſteward is choſen by the ſenate, and holds his place by patent from the univerſity. The proctors and taxers are alſo choſen every year, from the ſeveral colleges and halls by turns.

The public ſchools, of which there is one to every college, are in a building of brick and rough ſtone, erected on the four ſides of a quadrangular court. Every college has alſo its particular library, in which, except that of King's-college, the ſcholars are not obliged to ſtudy, as in the libraries at Oxford, but may borrow the books, and ſtudy in their chambers. Beſides the particular libraries of the ſeveral colleges, there is the univerſity library, which contains the collections of the archbiſhops, Parker, Grindal, and Pancroft; and of doctor Thomas Moore, biſhop of Ely; conſiſting of thirty thouſand volumes, lumes, which was purchaſed for ſeven thouſand pounds, and preſented to the univerſity by his late majeſty king George I.

Each college has alſo its particular chapel, where the maſters, fellows, and ſcholars, meet every morning and evening, for the public worſhip of God; though on Sundays and Holidays, when there is a ſermon, they attend at St. Mary's church.

The names of the colleges, with their reſpectivee deſcriptions, are as follow:

1. King's College. This was founded in the year 1451 by Henry VII. It was at firſt but ſmall, being built by that prince, for a rector, and twelve ſcholars only. Near it was a little hoſtel for grammarians, built by William Bingham, which was granted by the founder to king Henry, for the enlargement of his college: whereupon he united theſe two; and having enlarged them, by uniting the church of St. John Zachary, founded a college for a provoſt, ſeventy fellows and ſcholars, and three chaplains. The chapel belonging to this college is deſervedly eſteemed one of the fineſt buildings of its kind in the world: it is three hundred and four feet long, ſeventy-three broad, and ninety-four feet high on the outſide; yet it is ſupported wholly by the ſymmetry of its parts, having no pillar within to ſuſtain the roof, which, as well as the ſides, is of free-ſtone. It has twelve large windows on each ſide, finely painted; and the choir is adorned with excellent carving. It conſtitutes one ſide of a large ſquare; for the royal founder deſigned that the college ſhould be quadrangle, all of equal beauty; but the civil wars, in which he was ſo involved with the houſe of York, prevented his accompliſhing this noble deſign. What has been added to this college within theſe few years paſt, is a great ornament to it. This new building, which is of ſtone, runs from the weſt end of the chapel, a little detached from it, to the ſouthward; forms another ſide of the ſquare, and contains ſpacious chambers and apartments, being two hundred and thirty-ſix feet in length, and forty-ſix in breadth. The new ſenate-hall makes the angle parallel to the chapel. This college has a maſter, fifty fellows, and twenty ſcholars.

In digging the foundation of the new buildings of this college, the workmen found a great number of broad pieces of gold, of the coin of king Henry V. exceeding fair. As ſoon as it was known, the college obtained a conſiderable number of them, which they made preſents of to their particular factors, and divided among themſelves and the fellows of the college; but it was ſuppoſed that many of them was ſecreted by the labourers; for this coin which before was very ſcarce, could afterwards be obtained with the greateſt eaſe.

2. Queen's College. This was founded by queen Margaret of Anjou, wife to king Henry VI. in the year 1448; but the troubleſome times which followed prevented her compleating this fabric. The firſt maſter of it, Andrew Ducket, procured great ſums of money from different perſons towards finiſhing this work; and ſo far prevailed with queen Elizabeth, wife to Edward IV. that ſhe perfected the work her profeſſed enemy had begun. The reverend Mr. Ferdinando Smithes, ſenior fellow of Queen's College, who died in November 1725, gave fifteen hundred pounds to the ſame, to be appropriated to the uſe of three batchelors of art, till the time of their taking their maſter's degree. This is one of the pleaſanteſt colleges in the univerſity; it has the moſt convenient lodgings, delightful gardens, orchards, and walks; and was the reſidence of the celebrated Eraſmus of Rotterdam, who choſe this college for his laſt retreat. It maintains a maſter, nineteen fellows, and forty-four ſcholars.

3. Chriſt's College. This was founded by the Lady Margaret, counteſs of Richmond, mother to Henry VII. in the year 1506, upon the ſame ſpot of ground where God's houſe formerly ſtood. She ſettled there a maſter and twelve fellows, &c. which number, in the time of king Edward VI. being complained of, as favouring of ſuperſtition, by alluding to Our Saviour and his twelve diſciples; that prince added a thirteenth fellowſhip, and increaſed the number of Scholars. This college has been, within theſe few years paſt, adorned with an elegant new building; and now maintains a maſter, fifteen fellows, and fifty ſcholars.

4. St. John's College. This was alſo by the above counteſs, about the year 1560, upon the ſame ſpot where Nighel, or Neal, ſecond biſhop of Ely, in the year 1134, founded an hoſpital for canons regular, which, by Hugh de Balſham, was converted into a priory dedicated to St. John, and by the executors of the ſaid counteſs, into a college, under the name of the ſame ſaint; but ſhe dying before it was finiſhed, the work was retarded for ſome time: it was, however, carried on by her executors; and in the beginning of the reign of king James I. was greatly enlarged. The building at preſent conſiſts of three ſpacious courts: it has a noble library, which has, of late years, been greatly augmented by the acceſſion of that of doctor Gunning, late biſhop of Ely, who bequeathed the ſame to it. This college, which is pleaſantly ſituated by the river, is no leſs remarkable for its beautiful groves and gardens, than for the number of its ſtudents, and the ſtrict and regular diſcipline of them. There are at preſent a maſter, fifty four fellows and one hundred ſcholars.

5. Peter-Houſe. This is a large quadrangular building, well contrived, and adorned with porticos. It has a maſter, twenty-two fellows, and forty-two ſcholars; and was founded by Hugh Balſham, biſhop of Ely, anno 1257, when only prior of Ely. The ſcholars at firſt had no other conveniences than chambers, which exempted them from the high rates impoſed on them by the townſmen for lodgings. The endowment was ſettled by the ſame Hugh, when biſhop, anno 1248, for a maſter and fourteen fellows; which number might be increaſed or diminiſhed according to the improvement or diminution of their revenues.

6. Pembroke Hall. This was founded in the year 1347, by the lady Mary St. Paul, counteſs of Pembroke, third wife to Audomare de Valentia, earl of Pembroke, who having been unhappily ſlain at a tilting on his wedding day, ſhe entirely ſequeſtered herſelf from all worldly enjoyments, and, amongſt other pious acts, built this college, which has been ſince much augmented by the benefactions of others. It has a maſter, five fellows, and thirteen ſcholars.

7. Clare Hall was founded in the year 1340, by Richard Badow, chancellor of the univerſity, with the aſſiſtance of the lady Elizabeth Clare, counteſs of Ulſter. He had before built an houſe called Univerſity Hall, wherein the ſcholars lived, at their own expence, for ſixteen years, till it was accidentally deſtroyed by fire. The founder finding the charge of rebuilding would exceed his abilities, ſought the kind aſſiſtance of the aforeſaid lady, through whoſe liberality it was not only rebuilt, but endowed.

This hall has been lately new built, and is now one of the neateſt and moſt uniform ſtructures in the univerſity: it is a ſquare of building three ſtories high; the materials are free-ſtone, and the work is Doric: it reaches quite to the banks of the river Cam, which runs through the garden; and the court is entered by a lofty gate-houſe, adorned with two rows of pillars. There is another building contiguous to the college, the upper ſtory of which is the library, and the lower the chapel. To this college belongs a meadow on the other ſide of the river, which communicates with it by a bridge. It has a maſter, eighteen fellows, and ſixty-three ſcholars.

8. Jeſus College. This was founded in the year 1499, by John Alcocke, biſhop of Ely, out of an old nunnery dedicated to St. Radegund, given him by king Henry VII. and pope Julius II. on account of the ſcandalous incontinence of the nuns, in order to be by him converted to this uſe: and this prelate eſtabliſhed in it a maſter, ſix fellows, and ſix ſcholars; but their numbers have ſince been greatly increaſed by conſiderable benefactions. It maintains at preſent a maſter, ſixteen fellows, and thirty-one ſcholars.

9. Catharine Hall. This was founded in the year 1459, by Robert Woodlark, third provoſt of King's College; and the hall was built over-againſt the Carmelites houſe, for one maſter and three fellows. The numbers have been ſince greatly increaſed, as well as the revenues; for it at preſent maintains a maſter, ſix fellows, and thirty-ſix ſcholars. A great part of it has been lately new built, and may now be ſaid to be a beautiful and regular fabric.

10. Gonvil and Caius College. In the year 1348 Edmund Gonvil founded an hall, called after his name, upon the place where are now the orchard and tennis-court of Bennet College; but within five years after it was removed into the place where it now ſtands, by biſhop Bateman, founder of Trinity-hall. In the year 1607 John Caius, doctor of phyſic, improved this hall into a new college, ſince chiefly called by his name; and it has, of late years, received conſiderable embelliſhments. It has twenty-ſix fellows, and ſeventy-four ſcholars.

11. Trinity Hall. This was founded about the year 1353. by William Bateman, biſhop of Norwich. it was built upon a place which once belonged to the monks of Ely, and was a houſe for ſtudents before the time of biſhop Bateman, who, by exchange for the advowſon of certain rectories, got it into his own poſſeſſion. He was a great maſter of civil and canon law; whereupon the maſter, two fellows, and three ſcholars, the number appointed by him at the firſt foundation, were obliged to follow thoſe two ſtudies. It has been ſince much augmented by benefactors, and the number of its members are proportionably increaſed.

The building of this hall is but irregular, yet it has convenient lodgings for the maſter and fellows, and pleaſant gardens, incloſed by walls of brick; and maintains twelve fellows, and fourteen ſcholars.

12. Corpus Chriſti, or Benedict College. This was founded by the ſociety of friars in Corpus Chriſti, in the year 1346. This aroſe out of two guilds or fraternities, one of Corpus Chriſti, and the other of the Bleſſed Virgin; which, after a long emulation being united into one body, by a joint intereſt built this college, which took its name from the adjoining church of St. Benedict. Their greateſt modern benefactor was doctor Matthew Parker, once maſter of the college, and afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, who by his prudent management, recovered ſeveral rights of the college; and, beſides two fellowſhips, and five ſcholarſhips, gave a great number of excellent MSS. to their library, which were moſtly collected out of the remains of the old abbey libraries, colleges, and cathedrals, and chiefly relate to the hiſtory of England.

It is a long ſquare of buildings, containing two courts, and two rows of lodgings. It has a chapel and library under the ſame roof; and maintains a maſter twelve fellows, and forty ſcholars.

13. Emanuel College was founded in the year 1584, the 26th of Elizabeth, by Sir William Mildmay, who was chancellor and treaſurer of the exchequer to that princeſs; where there had been formerly a convent of dominicans, inſtituted in the year 1280, and the ſixth of Edward I. by Alice, then counteſs of Oxford. This college he dedicated to Emanuel, and placed in it a maſter, three fellows, and four ſcholars. Here is a very neat chapel, built chiefly by the bounty of doctor William Sancroft, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who left to the library, at his deceaſe, a very valuable collection of books. This college maintains a maſter, fourteen fellows, and ſixty ſcholars.

14. Trinity College. This was founded in the year 1546, by king Henry VIII. who converted three ancient halls, called St. Michael's, King's, and Phyſwick's halls, into this ſtately college, which he dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and endowed it for the maintenance of a provoſt, ſixty fellows, forty ſcholars, and ten almoner orators; reſerving to himſelf and his ſucceſſors the right of appointing the warden.

The college, or houſe of St. Michael the Archangel, was founded in 1324, by Henry or Hervy Stanton, canon of St. Peter's at York, and chancellor chancellor of the exchequer to king Edward II. This place was in all reſpects a college, and the fellows of it took their degrees in the public ſchools of this univerſity.

King's hall was completed and endowed by Edward III. in the year 1376, and the fiftieth year of his reign; and the fellows of this hall alſo took their degrees in the univerſity, as fellows of a college.

Phyſwick Hoſtel, or Hall was the dwelling-houſe of William Phyſwick, eſq; beadle of the univerſity, who, in the year 1393, gave it to Gonvil-hall, and converted it into a little college, to receive ſuch ſcholars belonging to Gonvil-hall, as that houſe could not conveniently contain.

The above halls being formed into a college, queen Mary preſented it with a revenue of three hundred and ſeventy-ſix pounds ten ſhillings; and in the reign of queen Elizabeth, Nevill, dean of Canterbury, the eighth maſter of this college expended three thouſand pounds in repairing, or rather rebuilding it, which he did with ſuch magnificence and ſplendor, that for ſpaciouſneſs, beauty, and uniformity, it is hardly to be equalled. It has lately been much improved by the addition of a library. This building is of free-ſtone, ſupported by two rows of pillars, and ſaid to be one of the moſt noble and elegant ſtructures of the kind in the world. This college is rendered famous on account of ſeveral great men it has educated; the moſt illuſtrious of which were, the lord Bacon, Sir Iſaac Newton, doctor Barrow, Mr. Ray, and doctor Bentley. In this college are maintained three royal profeſſors, ſixty fellows and ninety-one ſcholars.

15. Magdalen College was founded in the year 1542, by Thomas Audley, lord chancellor of England, who endowed it with lands belonging to the priory of the Holy Trinity of London, and called it the college of St. Mary Magdalen. It was at firſt only a hall, conſiſting of three houſes; but in the year 1519, the eleventh of Henry VIII. Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, purchaſed theſe houſes, in which the monks of ſeveral neighbouring abbies had been uſed to ſtudy; from whence it was formerly called Monks-hall; and converted them to the uſe of the univerſity, by the name of Buckingham hall. It has been remarked, that the founder's name is contained in the word M-audley-n, which is the orthography of Magdalen, according to the vulgar pronunciation. A fellowſhip of a conſiderable value has lately been founded at this college, which is appropriated to gentlemen of the county of Norfolk, and called the Travelling Norfolk Fellowſhip. To the library of this college were left a valuable collection of pamphlets, by——Pepys, eſq; and likewiſe a great number of papers relating to the navy and admiralty; and with them he bequeathed the preſſes, which are carefully preſerved to this day.

This college was conſiderably enlarged, and its revenue encreaſed by Sir Chriſtopher Wrey, who was ſome time afterwards lord chief juſtice of England. A new building was begun ſome years ago, to be added to this college, but was never finiſhed. It ſtands on the north weſt ſide of the river, ſeparated from all the reſt; and now maintains a maſter, thirteen fellows and thirteen ſcholars.

16. Sidney Suſſex College. This was founded in the year 1589, the thirty-firſt of Elizabeth, purſuant to the will of the lady Frances Sidney, counteſs of Suſſex, who bequathed five thouſand pounds for the building and endowing this college, for the maintenance of a maſter, ten fellows, and twenty ſcholars, to be called by the name it now bears.

In conſequence of this will, a college was ſoon after built by the counteſs's executors, upon the ſpot where a monaſtery of Franciſcans, commonly called Grey-friars, built by king Edward I. had formerly flouriſhed; but the generous gift of this lady was inſufficient to fulfil her good intentions: the deficiency, however, was ſo far ſupplied by the liberality of her executors, Henry Grey, earl of Kent, and John lord Harington, that it immediately received a maſter, eight fellows, and twenty ſcholars. Sir Francis Clerk was afterwards a great benefactor to this college; he not only made a conſiderable addition to the building, but likewiſe augmented the ſcholarſhips, by founding four fellowſhips, and eight ſcholarſhips more; and Sir John Brereton left it, by will, two thouſand pounds. It now maintains a maſter, twelve fellows, and twenty-eight ſcholars.

There are four hundred and ſix fellows, and ſix hundred and ſixty ſcholars, beſides which, there are two hundred and thirty-ſix inferior officers and ſervants of various kinds; theſe are all maintained upon the foundation. The whole number of ſtudents belonging to the univerſity, are not, however here included: there are two ſorts of ſtudents, called penſioners, the greater, and the leſs; the greater penſioners are in general the young nobility, and are called fellow commoners; becauſe, though they are ſcholars, they dine with the fellows: the leſs, called commoners, are dieted with the ſcholars, but both live at their own expence. There are alſo a conſiderable number of poor ſcholars, called Sizars, who wait upon the fellows, ſcholars, and penſioners of both ranks, by whom they are in a great degree maintained; but the number of theſe it is impoſſible to aſcertain, being in a ſtate of perpetual fluctuation.

By a ſpecial grant of Henry VI. the univerſity has the privilege of printing books of every kind at their own preſs.

Originally the ſchools of this univerſity were in private houſes, hired from ten years to ten years for that purpoſe, by the univerſity; in which time they might not be put to any other uſe. Afterwards public ſchools were built at the charge of the univerſity, in or near the place where they now ſtand; but the preſent fabric, as it is now built of brick and rough ſtone, was erected partly at the expence of the univerſity, and partly by the contributions of ſeveral benefactors.

The univerſity library was firſt built by Rotheram, archbiſhop of York, who, with Tonſtal biſhop of Durham, furniſhed it with choice books, few whereof are to be found at preſent: but it contained, nevertheleſs, about fourteen thouſand books, when his late majeſty king George

George I. was graciouſly pleaſed, in the beginning of his reign, to purchaſe the large and curious library of doctor John More, biſhop of Ely, who died on the thirtieth of July, 1714; and, as a mark of his royal favour, to beſtow it upon this univerſity.

Great additions and alterations have been lately made in the library, for the better diſpoſition of this valuable royal preſent, which conſiſted of upwards of thirty thouſand volumes, and coſt the king ſix thouſand guineas. And we cannot but obſerve, in this place, that the late lord viſcount Townſhend, having underſtood that the univerſity, to ſhew their gratitude, and do honour to the memory of his late majeſty king George I. intended to erect a ſtatue of that monarch, was pleaſed to offer to cauſe the ſame to be carved, and ſet up in the ſaid library at his own expence; which generous tender was received by the univerſity in the manner it deſerved, and with circumſtances equally to their own and his lordſhip's honour. And in the month of October 1739, in purſuance thereof, a fine marble ſtatue of this great prince was accordingly erected in the ſenate-hall of King's college: on which are the following inſcriptions, viz.

On the front:

GEORGIO
Optimo principi,
Magnæ Britanniæ regi,
Ob inſignia ejus in hanc academiam
Merita,
Senatus Cantabrigienſis
In perpetuum
Grati animi teſtimonium
Statuam
Mortuo ponendam
Decrevit.

That is,

"By the ſenate of Cambridge it was decreed, "that a ſtatue ſhould be erected to his late "moſt excellent majeſty George I. king of "Great Britain, as a perpetual monument of "their gratitude for his ſignal benefits to this "univerſity.

That is,

"Charles lord viſcount Townſhend, a principal "ornament both of the univerſity and the "ſtate, agreeably to his ſingular loyalty to- "wards his prince, and the particular affec- "tion wherewith he had favoured the univer- "ſity, engaged to have the ſtatue, which was "decreed by the ſenate of Cambridge, made "of marble at his own expence."

CAROLUS filius
Vicecomes TOWNSHEND,

"Charles the ſon, lord viſcount Townſhend, heir "alike to the virtues and dignities of his father, "cauſed this ſtatue, which his father, ſur- "priſed by ſudden death, had left imperfect, "to be completed, and erected in this moſt "honourable place of the univerſity."

His majeſty not contented with having given this noble inſtance of his royal bounty to the univerſity of Cambridge, in the year 1724, was graciouſly pleaſed to confer another mark of his favour upon them, and which extended to the univerſity of Oxford; in creating a new eſtabliſhment in a moſt uſeful branch of learning, which was much wanted, and for which, till that time, there had been no proviſion: this was to appoint two perſons, not under the degree of maſter of arts, or batchelor of laws, ſkilled in modern hiſtory, and in the knowledge of modern languages to be nominated King's Profeſſors of Modern Hiſtory, one for the univerſity of Cambridge, and the other for that of Oxford; who are obliged to read lectures in the public ſchools, at particular times; each of which profeſſors to have a ſtipend of four hundred pounds per annum, out of which each profeſſor is obliged to maintain, with ſufficient ſalaries, two perſons at leaſt, well qualified to teach and inſtruct in writing and ſpeaking the ſaid languages, gratis, twenty ſcholars of each univerſity, to be nominated by the king, each of which is obliged to learn two, at leaſt, of the ſaid languages.

The ſame beneficent king, was alſo pleaſed to appoint twelve perſons, choſen out of each of the univerſities, to be preachers in the royal chapel of Whitehall, at ſtated times, with handſome ſalaries; and declared, that he would cauſe a particular regard to be had to the members of the two univerſities, in the diſpoſitions of thoſe benefices which fell into the royal gift.

Within theſe few years paſt there have been ſeveral other benefactors to this univerſity, particularly the two following.

Doctor John Woodward, who died on the twenty-fifth of April 1728, left to the univerſity of Cambridge a ſum of money for erecting a profeſſorſhip for natural philoſophy, with a proviſion of one hundred and fifty pounds per annum for the ſupport and maintenance of the ſame for ever.

He

He likewiſe bequeathed to the ſaid univerſity his collection of foſſils, and other natural curioſities; and ſuch a part of his library, moreover, as was neceſſary to illuſtrate his ſaid collection.

On the death of Mrs. Addenbroke, (March 1720) widow of an eminent phyſician of that name, the ſum of about four thouſand pounds devolved to this univerſity; which, by the doctor's will, were to be applied to the building and furniſhing a phyſical hoſpital in Cambridge, in which poor diſeaſed people were to be admitted for cure, gratis. The maſter and fellows of Catharine-hall were appointed truſtees of this charity.

On the ſouth ſide of the ſenate-houſe, oppoſite to the ſtatue of George I. is another noble ſtatue of George II. erected by the late duke of Newcaſtle, then chancellor of the univerſity. On the front of the pedeſtal is the following inſcription:

GEORGIO SECUNDO
Patrono ſuo, optime merenti,
Semper venerando;
Quod volenti populo,
Inſtitiſſimé humaniſſime,
In pace, & in bello.
Feliciter imperavit;
Quod academiam Cantabrigienſem
Fovit, auxit, ornavit;
Hanc ſtatuam
Æturnum faxit Deus, monumentum,
Grati animi in regem,
Pietatis in patriam,
Amoris in academium,
Suis ſumptibus, poni curavit,
THOMAS HOLLES
Dux de Newcaſtle.
Academiæ Cancellarius,
A.D. M.DCC.LXVI.

Cambridge was a fortified town in the time of the Saxons; and being afterwards ſeized by the Danes, they kept a garriſon there till the year 921, when they were driven out by Edward the elder. Towards the end of the eleventh century, William the Conqueror built a caſtle here, which is ſaid to have been a large, ſtrong, and ſtately building; ſome traces of it are ſtill to be ſeen, and the gate, which remains entire, is now the county goal. In the ſucceeding reign of William Rufus, the town was burnt by Roger de Montgomery, to revenge a ſuppoſed injury he had received from the king; but Henry I. the ſucceſſor of Rufus, rebuilt it, and made it a corporation. During the civil contentions, called the Barons Wars, which happened in the twelfth century, it was often ravaged by outlaws, who took refuge in the iſle of Ely; but king Henry III. about the year 1219, ſecured it againſt theſe incurſions, by a deep trench, which in Camden's time was called the King's-ditch; but houſes having been ſince built on both ſides of it, the name was at length forgotten.

In the reign of Richard II. near the end of the fourteenth century, during the inſurrection of Wat Tyler and Jack Straw, a rebellious rabble entered this town, and burnt the records of the univerſity in the market-place. The round church in this town is thought to have been a ſynagogue of the Jews, who having been invited hither by the Conqueror and his ſucceſſors, ſettled here, and were very numerous for many generations, and inhabited all that part of the town which is now called the Jewry.

Cambridge ſends four members to parliament, two for the town, and two for the univerſity. It has two weekly markets, on Wedneſday and Saturday; and an annual fair on the twenty-fourth of June, for horſes, wood and earthen ware.

OXFORD.

The city of Oxford is finely ſituated at the conflux of the Thames and Cherwell, fifty-five miles from London. It ſtands on a riſing ground, the aſcent of which is ſo gradual, as hardly to be perceived, and in the midſt of a moſt beautiful extent of meadows to the ſouth, eaſt and weſt, and of corn fields to the north. The vales on the eaſt are watered by the river Cherwell, and thoſe of the weſt and ſouth by the main ſtream, and ſeveral branches of the Iſis. The landſcape is bounded on every ſide, the north excepted, by a range of hills covered with woods. The opening to the north admits a free current of freſh air, and entirely removes all the inconveniences which would otherwiſe ariſe from the noxious vapours of a watery ſituation. From ſome of the ſurrounding hills, the traveller is ſurprized with an unparallelled proſpect of plenty; of numerous ſpires, domes and turrets, with the combined charms verdure, water and trees. The ſoil is a fine gravel; and on the whole the ſituation is more agreeable than healthy.

The government of Oxford is veſted in a mayor, a high ſteward, a recorder, four aldermen, eight aſſiſtants, two bailiffs, a town clerk, two chamberlains, all that have ſerved the office of bailiff and chamberlain, and twenty-four common-council-men. The mayor for the time being officiates at the coronation of our kings, in the buttery, and receives a large gilt bowl and cover for his fee.

The magiſtracy of this city is ſubject to the chancellor or vice chancellor of the univerſity, in all affairs of moment, even thoſe relating to the city; and the vice-chancellor adminiſters annually an oath to the magiſtrates and ſheriffs, that they will maintain the privileges of the univerſity. The mayor, and ſixty-two of the chief citizens alſo pay each one penny every year on the tenth of February, at the church of St. Mary, in lieu of a heavy fine laid on the city in the reign of Edward III. when ſixty-two of the ſtudents were murdered by the inhabitants.

The private buildings of this city are neat, and the public ones ſumptuous. The ſtreets are ſpacious, clean and regular, and well ſupplied with water by an engine erected on the river Iſis.

Beſides the cathedral here are fourteen pariſh churches, viz. St. Clement's—St. John's—St. Thomas's—St. Giles's—Holiwell's—St. Peter's in the Eaſt—St. Mary Magdalen's—St. Michael's—St. Peter's in the Bailey—St. Ebb's—St. Aldate's date's, or St Old's—St. Martin's or Carfax—All Saints—St. Mary's. Only four of theſe churches are worthy of obſervation, viz. St. Mary's, All Saints, St. Peters, and St. John's.

The church of St. Mary, in which the public ſermons of the univerſity are preached on Sundays and holidays, is ſituated about the middle of the north ſide of the High-ſtreet. It was rebuilt in the reign of Henry VII. as it appears at preſent. It conſiſts of three iſles, with a ſpacious choir or chancel, which is ſeparated from the nave by an organ, with its gallery, originally made by Father Smith, and ſince improved by Mr. John Byfield. The pulpit is placed in the centre of the middle iſle. At the weſt end of the ſame iſle is ſituated the vice-chancellor's throne, at the foot of which are ſeated the two proctors. The ſeats which deſcend on either ſide, are appointed for the doctors and heads of houſes, and thoſe beneath for the young noblemen. The area conſiſts of benches for the maſters of arts. On the weſt end, with a return to the north and ſouth, are galleries for the under-graduates and batchelors of arts. The tower, with its ſpire, is a noble and beautiful fabric, one hundred and eighty feet in height, and richly ornamented with pinnacles, niches and ſtatues, which it is ſaid were added by King, the firſt biſhop of Oxford, in the reign of Henry VIII. It contains ſix remarkably large bells, by which the proper notice is given for ſcholaſtic exerciſes, convocations and congregations. On the ſouth ſide is a portal, of more modern ſtructure, erected by doctor Morgan, chaplain to archbiſhop Laud, in the year 1637.

The church of All Saints, which is likewiſe ſituated in the High ſtreet, is an elegant modern ſtructure, much in the ſtile of many of the new churches in London. It is beautified both within and without, with Corinthian pilaſters, and finiſhed with an attic ſtory and baluſtrade. There is one pillar in the church which is ſeventy-two feet long, forty-two wide, and fifty in height. The ceiling, altar, pulpit, &c. are finely executed; and the ſteeple is remarkable, in the modern taſte.

St. Peter in the Eaſt, which ſtands near the High-ſtreet, was partly built by St. Grymbald eight hundred years ago; and is ſaid to be the firſt church of ſtone that appeared in this part of England. The tower and eaſt end are curious pieces of antiquity. This was formerly the univerſity church; and even at preſent, in order to aſcertain their original claim, the univerſity attend their ſermons in it every Sunday in the afternoon during lent.

The church of St. John, which is alſo a chapel to Merton college, is an auguſt Gothic edifice, with a tower, in which are eight bells. Its choir, or inner chapel is the longeſt of any in the univerſity, that of New college excepted. It had once an organ, yet without any regular inſtitution for choir ſervice, before the preſent ſtalls and wainſcot were put up. The painted glaſs of the eaſt window is very elegant and of a modern hand. The anti-chapel is proportionally ſpacious, and was originally much larger; for if we examine the outſide of the church, towards the weſt, we may perceive the arches filled up, which once ſtood within, and made part of the nave. Near the altar are the monuments of Sir Thomas Bodly, and Sr Henry Saville. On the right hand of the choir door is that of the late warden, doctor Wintle, and his ſiſter, which is neatly executed; and not far from the north door of the anti-chapel, is a buſt and inſcription to the memory of Anthony Wood. This church, as we are informed by a manuſcript of Wood's, was built about the year 1424, but it does not appear by what benefactor.

In the centre of the city is a curious ſtructure, called Carfax conduit, erected by Otho Nicholſon in the reign of James I.

The town-hall, ſituated in Fiſh-ſtreet is a neat and commodious ſtructure, erected partly at the expence of the late Thomas Rowney, eſq; ſometime repreſentative and high ſteward of this city.

Here is a ſtone bridge over the Cherwell, called Magdanel-bridge, ſix hundred feet in length, and conſiſting of twenty arches. In the weſtern ſuburb is another bridge, called High-bridge, over a branch of the Thames; and near it is another very fine ſtone bridge now building over the ſame ſtream, for the convenience of a new road now making there. Beſides theſe, there is another bridge over the Thames, at the extremity of Fiſh-ſtreet, and called Folly-bridge. It is alſo of ſtone, and conſiſts of three principal arches. On the centre of this bridge is an ancient tower, called Friar Bacon's ſtudy, under which is the road to Abingdon.

Adjoining to the city is an hoſpital, elegantly built of hewn ſtone, upon the plan of the county hoſpital at Glouceſter. This edifice was erected by the truſtees of doctor Radcliffe's benefaction, out of the ſurplus money remaining after defraying the expence of his library. The ground was given by Thomas Rowney, eſq; abovementioned. The building was begun in May 1759, and proſecuted with remarkable expedition. It is now finiſhed, and calculated to hold ſeventy patients.

Among the various public buildings which claim our attention in this place (excluſive of the colleges and halls) is one called the New, or Radlivian library, from its founder doctor John Radcliffe, a phyſician of great eminence, who left forty thouſand pounds to build a library for the uſe of the univerſity, with a ſalary of one hundred and fifty pounds a year to a librarian, and the like ſum towards furniſhing the library with new books. In conſequence of this legacy, the firſt ſtone of the building was laid the ſeventeenth of May 1737, and the library was opened with great ſolemnity on the thirteenth of April, 1745, by the name of the New, or Radcliffivian library.

This beautiful building is ſituated in the centre of a large ſquare, formed by St. Mary's church, the public ſchools, and two colleges, one called Brazen Noſe, and the other All Souls. It is a very ſumptuous pile of building, erected upon arcades, which, circularly diſpoſed, encloſe a ſpacious doom in the centre. From hence we paſs by a well executed flight of ſpiral ſteps into the library itſelf. This room, which is a complete pattern of elegance and majeſty, riſes into a capacious cious dome, ornamented with fine compartments of ſtucco. The pavement is of two colours, and made of a peculiar ſpecies of ſtone brought from Hartz Foreſt in Germany. The room is encloſed by a circular ſeries of arches, beautified with feſtoons, and ſupported by pilaſters of the Ionic order. Behind theſe arches are formed two circular galleries, above and below, where the books are diſpoſed in elegant cabinets. The compartments of the ceiling, in the upper gallery, are finely ſtuccoed. Over the door, at the entrance, is a ſtatue of the founder, doctor Radcliff, by Ryſbrac, which is moſt advantageouſly viewed from the point oppoſite to it, in the laſt mentioned gallery. Over the entrance of one of the galleries is a good buſt of Gibbes, the architect. In a word, the finiſhing and decorations of this attic edifice are all in the moſt elegant taſte.

The ſchools form a magnificent quadrangle. The principal front on the outſide is about one hundred and ſeventy-five feet in length; in the centre of which is a noble tower, whoſe higheſt apartments are appointed for aſtronomical obſervations, and other philoſophical experiments. Three ſides of the upper ſtory of the quadrangle are one entire room, called the picture gallery, the north ſide of which is one hundred and twenty-nine feet ſix inches; the eaſt ſide one hundred and fifty-eight feet ſix inches; and the breadth twenty-four feet ſix inches. This is chiefly furniſhed with valuable portraits of founders and benefactors, and of other eminent men; alſo with cabinets of medals, and caſes of books. It was wainſcoted by the munificence of doctor Butler, the late preſident of Magdalen college, and the late duke of Beaufort.

Under the picture gallery are the ſchools of the ſeveral ſciences, in one of which are placed the Arundelian marbles, and in another that inеſtimable collection of ſtatues, &c. lately preſented to the univerſity by the counteſs of Pomfret. The firſt ſtone of the ſchools was laid the thirtieth of March 1613, and the building was carried on at the combined expence of many benefactors.

The Bodleian or pulic library is a part or member of the laſt-mentioned edifice. It conſiſts of three ſpacious and lofty rooms, diſpoſed in the form of the roman H. The middle room was erected by Humphrey, duke of Glouceſter, over the divinity ſchool, about the year 1440, and by him furniſhed with books, all which have been ſince loſt. The gallery on the weſt ſide was raiſed at the expence of the univerſity, under the chancellorſhip of archbiſhop Laud, together with the convocation houſe beneath. The veſtible, or firſt gallery, with the proſcholium under it, was built by Sir Thomas Bodley, who furniſhed the whole with a collection made with prodigious care and expence. He likewiſe aſſigned an eſtate for the maintenance of a librarian, &c. and the ſupport of a public fund for the library, adding a body of ſtatutes, for the regulation of his new inſtitution. By theſe ſervices he juſtly deſerved the name of the founder of the library.

The original ſtock has been greatly enriched by the acceſſion of many valuable collections of manuſcripts, particularly Greek and Oriental; beſides large additions of choice and uſeful books, from various donations. The principal benefactors have been the earl of Pembroke, archbiſhop Laud, Sir Thomas Roe, Sir Kenelm Digby, general Fairfax, doctor Marſhal, doctor Barlow, doctor Rawlinſon, Mr. St. Amand, &c.

The divinity ſchool ſtands under the ſame roof with the Bodleian library. It was begun at the expence of the univerſity in the year 1427, and afterwards completed, with its ſuperſtructure, by duke Humphrey. Its ceiling is a moſt finiſhed piece of Gothic maſonry, both in deſign and execution; and, on the whole, it is probably the moſt Gothic room in this kingdom. At the end of it is the convocation houſe, which is a ſpacious room, commodiouſly furniſhed, and handſomely decorated.

Directly oppoſite to the divinity ſchool is the theatre, a beautiful ſtructure erected from a deſign of Sir Chriſtopher Wren, in the year 1669, at the expence of archbiſhop Sheldon, at that time chancellor, who having beſtowed fifteen thouſand pounds in building it, endowed it with two thouſand pounds to purchaſe lands for its perpetual repair.

The front of this building is adorned with Corinthian pillars, and two ſtatues of archbiſhop Sheldon, and the duke of Ormond, with other decorations. At the entrance of the theatre the ſpectator is ſtrongly and ſuddenly ſtruck with the ideas of majeſty and beauty: but this room exhibits the moſt auguſt appearance when properly filled. It is equally diſpoſed to contain, and ſhew to advantage, a large and ſolemn aſſembly. The vice-chancellor, with the two proctors, are ſeated in the centre of the ſemi-circular part; on each hand are the young noblemen and doctors; the maſters of arts in the area: the reſt of the univerſity, and ſtrangers of both ſexes, are placed in the galleries. The roof is flat, and not being ſupported either by columns or arch-work, reſts on the ſide walls, which are at the diſtance of eighty feet one way, and ſeventy the other. The roof is covered with an allegorical painting, which conſiſts of a great number of figures. The firſt of theſe is Theology, with her book of ſeven ſeals imploring the aſſiſtance of Truth for the unfolding of it. On the left hand is the Moſaical law veiled, with the table of ſtone, to which ſhe points with her iron rod. On her right hand is the Goſpel, with the croſs in one hand, and a chalice in the other.

In the ſame diviſion, over the Moſaic law, is Hiſtory holding up her pen, as dedicating it to Truth, and an attending Genius, with ſeveral fragments of old writings, from which ſhe collects her hiſtory into her book. On the other ſide near the Goſpel, is Divine Poeſy, with her harp of David's faſhion.

In the triangle on the right hand of the Goſpel, is alſo Logic, in a poſture of arguing; and on the left hand of the Moſaic law is Muſic, with her antic lyre, having a pen in her hand, and a paper of muſic notes on her knee, with a Genius on her right hand playing on a flute, being the emblem of ancient muſic. On the left (but within the the partition for phyſic) Dramatic Poeſy, with a vizard, repreſenting Comedy, a bloody dagger for Tragedy, and the reed pipe for Paſtoral.

In the ſquare on the right ſide of the circle, is Law, with her ruling ſceptre, accompanied with records, patents and evidences, on the one ſide, and on the other with Rhetoric. By theſe is an attending Genius, with the ſcales of Juſtice, and a figure with a palm branch, the emblem of reward for virtuous actions; and the Roman Faſces, the marks of power and puniſhment.

Printing, with a caſe of letters in one hand, and a form ready ſet in the other, and by her ſeveral ſheets hanging as a drying.

On the left ſide the circle, oppoſite to Theology, in three ſquares, are the Mathematical Sciences, (depending on Demonſtration, as the other on Faith) in the firſt of which is Aſtronomy with the celeſtial globe, Geography with the terreſtrial, together with three attending Genii, having Arithmetic in the ſquare on one hand, with a paper of figures; Optics with the perſpective glaſs; Geometry with a pair of compaſſes in her left; and a table with geometrical figures in it, in her right hand. And in the ſquare on the other hand, Architecture embracing the capital of a column, with compaſſes, and the Norma or ſquare lying by her, and a workman holding another ſquare in one hand, and a plumb line in the other.

In the midſt of theſe ſquares and triangles (as deſcending from above) is the figure of Truth ſitting as on a cloud, in one hand holding a palm-branch(the emblem of victory) in the other the ſun, whoſe brightneſs enlightens the whole circle of figures, and is ſo bright, that it ſeems to hide the face of herſelf to the ſpectators below.

Over the entrance of the front of the Theatre, are three figures tumbling down; the firſt, Envy, with her ſnaky hairs, ſquint eyes, hag's breaſt, pale venemous complexion, ſtrong, but ugly limbs, and riveled ſkin, frighted from above by the ſight of the ſhield of Pallas, with the Gorgon's head in it, againſt which ſhe oppoſes her ſnaky treſſes, but her fall is ſo precipitous, that ſhe has no command of her arms.

Then Rapine, with her fiery eyes, grinning teeth, ſharp twangs, her hands imbrued with blood, holding a bloody dagger in one hand, in the other a burning flambeaux; with theſe inſtruments threatening the deſtruction of Learning, and all its habitations, but is prevented by an Herculian Genius, or Power.

Next that is repreſented brutiſh, ſcoffing Ignorance, endeavouring to vilify and contemn what ſhe underſtands not, which is charmed by a Mercurial Genius with his Caduceus.

The allegorical pictures on the ceiling, above explained, were done by Streater, ſerjeant painter to king Charles II. but the colours as well as the canvas, having been greatly injured by Time, the work was cleaned and repaired in 1762, by Mr. Kettle, an ingenious portrait painter of London; at which time the whole inſide was all decorated with new gilding, painting, and other ornaments, at the expence of one thouſand pounds; ſo that this is now univerſally allowed to be the moſt ſuperb and ſplendid room in Europe.

This room is alſo furniſhed with three admirable full length portraits of archbiſhop Sheldon, the duke of Ormond, and Sir Chriſtopher Wren.

To the weſt of the theatre ſtands the Aſhmolean Muſeum, ſo called from its founder, Elias Aſhmole, eſq; Windſor Herald in the reign of Charles II. This munificent patron of learning, in the year 1677, made an offer to beſtow upon the univerſity all the rarities he had purchaſed from the two Tradeſcants, ſucceſſively phyſic gardeners at Lambeth; together with his own collection of coins, manuſcripts, &c. on condition that they ſhould build a fabric for their reception. The building was accordingly erected, and finiſhed in the year 1682, under the conduct of Sir Chriſtopher Wren. It is not inferior to any modern edifice in point of ſymmetry and elegance. Its front towards the ſtreet is about ſixty feet in length. The eaſtern portico is remarkably well finiſhed in the Corinthian order, and adorned with variety of characteriſtical embelliſhments. This piece of architecture is deſervedly reckoned equal to any in the univerſity; though, like many others, it is ſo much crowded by the neighbouring buildings, that the ſpectator cannot view it to proper advantage.

Agreeable to his promiſe, Aſhmole preſented to the univerſity a large and valuable collection of natural bodies, together with his coins and manuſcripts; he alſo bequeathed at his death three gold chains, one of philigrain work, conſiſting of ſixty links, weighing twenty-two ounces, with a medal of the duke of Brandenburgh; the other a collar of S's, with a medal of the king of Denmark; and the third a chain of equal weight and value, with a medal of the emperor Joſeph; all which he had received as honorary preſents on occaſion of his book concerning the order of the garter.

Since the firſt foundation of this muſeum, it has been greatly enriched by ſeveral ample and valuable benefactions. The chief natural curioſities are, a large collection of bodies, horns, bones, &c. of animals, preſerved dry, or in ſpirits; numerous ſpecimens of minerals and metals; ſhells, eſpecially thoſe of doctor Martin Liſter, together with his ores, foſſils, &c.

It likewiſe contains a ſmall, but well choſen collection of exotic plants, ſent from the Eaſt Indies by James Pound, M. B. But it has been chiefly indebted to the care and munificence of its two firſt keepers, doctor Robert Plott, and Mr. Edward Lhwyd; the former of which gave all the natural bodies mentioned in hiſtories of the counties of Stafford and Oxon, and the latter the large collections he had made in his travels through the greateſt part of England, Wales, and Ireland. A catalogue of many of theſe was publiſhed by himſelf, elegantly adorned with copper-plates, in the year 1699, under the title of Lithophylacii Britannici Ichnographia. To theſe valuable treaſures a great addition has lately been made by the reverend William Borlaſe, who preſented to the univerſity all the ſpecimens of cryſtals, ſtals, mundicks, coppers, tins, &c. deſcribed in his Natural Hiſtory of Cornwall; which preſent he alſo accompanied with his manuſcript copy of the hiſtory, and the original drawings.

Amongſt the curioſities of nature muſt be reckoned the large magnet given to the Muſeum by the right honourable the counteſs of Weſtmoreland, the lady of our late chancellor. It is of an oval ſhape, its longer diameter eighteen inches, its ſhorter twelve, and ſupports a weight of one hundred and forty-five pounds. It is encloſed in an elegant caſe of mahogany, made at his lordſhip's expence, and may juſtly be deemed one of the greateſt ornaments, as well as rarities of this place.

Here is alſo a good collection of antiquities; ſuch as urns, ſtatues, ſacrifical veſſels and utenſils; likewiſe many Grecian, Roman, and Saxon coins, the gift of the founder, and Thomas Brathwaite, eſq.

Amongſt the works of art, a model of a ſhip given by doctor Clark, and a picture repreſenting our Saviour going to his crucifixion, made of feathers, deſerve particular notice; alſo a very ancient piece of St. Cuthbert, made by order of king Alfred, and worn, as is ſuppoſed, by that monarch.——This ſtructure is alſo decorated with a great number of very curious paintings, executed by the beſt hands.

Beſides the room in which the curioſities are depoſited, there are three ſmall libraries; the firſt called by the name of Aſhmole's ſtudy, containing his printed books and manuſcripts chiefly relating to matters of heraldry and antiquity; in which alſo are the manuſcripts of Sir William Dugdale, author of the Monaſticon, &c.

The ſecond is that of doctor Liſter, conſiſting of printed books in phyſic, and the beſt editions of the claſſics, in which alſo are preſerved the copper plates belonging to the Hiſtory of Shells, publiſhed by that author.

The laſt is that of Anthony Wood, containing the valuable manuſcript collections of that learned and laborious antiquarian.

In the room on the firſt floor, lectures are read in experimental philoſophy. Underneath is an elaboratory for courſes of chemiſtry and anatomy.

The care and direction of the Muſeum is veſted in ſix viſitors, viz. the vice-chancellor, the dean of Chriſt-church, the principal of Brazen Noſe, the king's profeſſor of phyſic, and the two proctors for the time being. Theſe have the nomination of the head keeper, and meet annually on Trinity Monday, to inſpect the ſtate of the collection, and to paſs the accounts. Aſhmole deſigned to have endowed his foundation with ample revenues, and has in his ſtatutes expreſſed the ſums appointed for this purpoſe, namely fifty pounds per annum for the head keeper, fifteen pounds to the librarian, and five pounds for an aſſiſtant; but this generous intention was never put into execution; ſo that the profits at preſent ariſe only from the gratuities given by ſtrangers for the exhibition of the curioſities, which fall greatly ſhort of the original deſign.

Nearly adjoining to the Theatre is the Clarendon Printing-houſe, a very handſome building, erected in the year 1711, by the profits that aroſe from the ſale of lord Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, the copy of which had been preſented to the univerſity by his ſons, the lords Clarendon and Rocheſter. It is a magnificent ſtructure, conſiſting of two ſtories, and is one hundred and fifteen feet in length. The ſtreet front has a noble Doric portico, whoſe columns equal the height of the firſt ſtory. The back front is adorned with three quarter columns of the ſame dimenſions, and a ſtatue of the earl of Clarendon. Over the top of the building are ſtatues of the nine Muſes. On the right hand are two rooms where bibles and books of common prayer are printed; and over theſe are large and elegant apartments, containing ſeveral excellent pictures, with a kitchen and other domeſtic accommodations, under the whole. The left ſide conſiſts of rooms for the univerſity preſs, together with one well executed apartment, adorned with an excellent portrait of queen Anne, by Kneller; appointed for the meetings of the heads of houſes, and delegates.

To the ſouth of Magdalen college is the phyſic garden, the grand entrance to which is of the Doric order, and ornamented with ruſtic work. It is moreover adorned with a buſt of the founder, lord Danby, a ſtatue of Charles I. and another of Charles II. On the face of the Corona and the frieze is the following inſcription: "Gloriæ "Dei optimi maximi honori Caroli I. regis in "uſum academiæ et reipulicæ Henricus comes "Danby, anno 1632." The ſame inſcription is on the garden front.

The garden, which is five acres in circumference, is ſurrounded by a noble wall, with other portraits in the ruſtic ſtyle, at proper diſtances. The ground is divided into four quarters. On the right and left, at our entrance, are two neat and convenient green-houſes, ſtocked with a valuable collection of exotics. The quarters are filled with a compleat ſeries of ſuch plants as grow naturally, diſpoſed in their reſpective claſſes. Without the walls on the eaſt, is an admirable hot houſe, where various plants, brought from the warmer climates, are raiſed. Of theſe the chief are, the pine-apple, the plantain, the coffee-ſhrub, the caper-tree, the cinnamon, the creeping Cereus, &c.

This garden was inſtituted by the earl of Danby, above-mentioned, in the year 1632; who having repleniſhed it with plants for the uſe of ſtudents in botany, ſetrled an annual revenue for its ſupport. It has been ſince much improved by doctor Sherrard, who erected the edifice which is ſeen on the left, at entering the garden, and furniſhed it with an uſeful collection of botannical books. He likewiſe aſſigned three thouſand pounds for the maintenance of a profeſſor of botany, for whoſe lodgings ſome apartments in the building juſt mentioned have been appointed.

Having thus deſcribed the principal public buildings in this city, we ſhall now proceed to the ſeveral colleges and halls, which conſtitute the univerſity of Oxford. The firſt of theſe is Univerſity College. This is allowed to be the moſt antient college in Oxford; and ſome writers aſſert that it was a manſion for ſcholars long before the time of king Alfred, (who is ſuppoſed to have founded it) and that St. John de Beverley, who died in 721, received his education here.

In the reign of king Edward, this college or hall was ſacked and burnt, together with the city, by the Danes; and they were ſcarcely rebuilt, when king Harold, who ſucceded to the crown in 1036, being much incenſed againſt this place, for the murder of ſome of his friends, in a tumult, baniſhed the ſcholars from their ſtudies. By an edict of Edward the Confeſſor, the ſcholars were however reſtored to their ancient penſions and habitations; but William the Conqueror being deſirous to aboliſh the Engliſh tongue, and therefore unwilling to have the doctrines of the church any longer preached in it, was vigorouſly oppoſed by the clergy and ſcholars of Oxford, upon which he retracted the ſtipends originally granted them, and the ſcholars were thus reduced to live on charitable contributions, till the college was a ſecond time endowed.

According to ſome writers, this college, at the time of the conqueſt, was let out to the ſcholars by the citizens, into whoſe poſſeſſion it is ſuppoſed to have come during the Daniſh wars; but this circumſtance is by no means probable, ſince the edict of Edward the Confeſſor reſtored the ſcholars to their ancient privileges. However, it is certain, that for ſome time before the reign of Henry III. the ſcholars rented the college of the citizens. By what means it became the property of the city, does not appear; but ſuch was the city's right to this college, that it had power to ſell it, and it was actually bought of the city by William, archdeacon of Durham, who died in 1249; and by his laſt will and teſtament, bequeathed it to the ſtudents, and endowed it with three hundred and ten marks, for the maintenance of ten or twelve ſcholars.

The front of this building is extended upwards of two hundred and ſixty feet along the ſouth ſide of the High-ſtreet. In it, at due diſtances, are two ſtately portals, with a tower over each. That on the weſt leads into the old court, which is a handſome Gothic quadrangle, of one hundred feet ſquare. Over the gate at the entrance, on the outſide, is a ſtatue of queen Anne, and within another of James II. Over the eaſtern entrance, on the outſide, is alſo an admirable ſtatue of queen Mary, wife of William III. On the ſouth of the weſtern quadrangle are the chapel and hall. The ſtatue of St. Cuthbert is over the gate of the chapel, and that of Alfred at the entrance of the hall. The altar window was given by doctor Radcliffe, as appears by its inſcription, in the year 1687. The roof of the chapel is a well-wrought frame of Norway oak. The hall has been lately fitted up in a very beautiful Gothic ſtyle, at the expence of many generous contributions, and is a moſt complete room of the kind.

From this court, through a narrow paſſage on the eaſt, you are led into another area of three ſides. It is opened to a garden on the ſouth. The eaſt, and part of the north ſide, is taken up by the lodgings of the maſter, which are commodious and extenſive. In a nich over the gate on the north, is a ſtatue of doctor Radcliffe.

A ſociety being thus eſtabliſhed, many other benefactors afterwards appeared, who improved the revenues and buildings. Of theſe the moſt conſiderable are, Walter Skirlow, biſhop of Durham, who founded three fellowſhips. Henry Piercy earl of Northumberland, in the year 1443, added the ſame number; and Sir Simon Bennet, in the reign of Charles I. eſtabliſhed four fellowſhips, and four ſcholarſhips.

The preſent magnificent building was begun to be erected in the year 1624, by the benefaction of Charles Greenwood, formerly fellow, and was ſoon carried on by Sir Simon Bennet, abovementioned. Nor were ſucceeding patrons wanting to continue ſo noble a work, till it was finally completed by doctor John Radcliffe, who erected the whole eaſtern quadrangle entirely at his own expence. He likewiſe ſettled on the college ſix hundred pounds a year for two travelling fellowſhips.

The preſent ſociety conſiſts of a maſter, twelve fellows ſeventeen ſcholars, with many other ſtudents, amounting in the whole to near ſeventy.

Baliol College. The foundation of this college was projected by Sir John Baliol of Bernard caſtle in Yorkſhire, knight, father of John Baliol, king of Scotland, who ſettled ſome yearly exhibitions upon certain poor ſcholars, till he could provide a houſe and other accommodations for them; but dying in 1269, his widow, Devorgilla, having been requeſted by him to complete his deſign, hired of the univerſity a houſe in a ſtreet, then called Horſe-manger-ſtreet, but now Canditch, in which ſhe placed her exhibitioners, conſiſting of a principal and ſixteen fellows, and preſcribed ſtatutes for their government in 1282. Afterwards in 1284, ſhe purchaſed another tenement, called St. Mary's-hall, which ſhe rebuilt, and to which the ſociety was removed by her charter, giving it the name of Baliol College.

This college has a handſome Gothic gateway, that leads into the firſt court, part of which is finiſhed in the ſtyle in which it is intended to rebuild the whole college. On the north is the chapel, which was erected about the reign of Henry VIII. It is adorned with ſome beautiful pieces of painted glaſs, particularly the eaſt window which repreſents the paſſion, reſurrection, and aſcenſion of Our Saviour; and for which Nicholas Wadham offered two hundred pounds.

This hall is handſomely wainſcotted. In the maſter's lodgings is a ſpacious old apartment, whoſe beautiful bow window projects on the weſt ſide of the court, and which was formerly the college chapel. In the library which was finiſhed about the year 1477, are many curious manuſcripts. Beſides this court, there is an area to the north weſt, conſiſting of irregular and detached lodgings. But an elegant front is now building by this court, a benefaction of three thouſand pounds having been lately received for that purpoſe.

John Warner, biſhop of Rocheſter, in the year year 1666, founded four exhibitions for natives of Scotland, whoſe benefaction was ſince enlarged by John Snell, eſq.

Here is one maſter, twelve fellows, and eighteen exhibitioners. The whole number of the ſociety amounts to about fifty.

Merton College. Walter de Merton, lord high chancellor of England in the reign of Henry III. and afterwards biſhop of Rocheſter, firſt founded and endowed a college of twenty poor ſcholars, and two or three chaplains, at Malden, near Kingſton in Surry, in the year 1261; but becauſe the liberal arts were taught only in the univerſities, and he was not willing that his ſtudents ſhould be ignorant in them, he tranſlated this ſociety to a building he erected for them in St. John's-ſtreet at Oxford in 1267, preſcribed a body of ſtatutes for them in 1274, and gave the college the name of "Domus Scholarium de "Merton."

This college is ſeparated from that of Corpus Chriſti, towards the weſt by a ſmall grove of elms. The moſt ſtriking object in the firſt court is the eaſt window of the chapel, the conſtruction of which is a fine piece of Gothic workmanſhip. From this court, by a flight of ſteps, you enter the hall, which is large and lofty, but has nothing particularly remarkable, except the wainſcot over the high table, which appears by a date engraved upon it, in figures of an antique form, to have been erected in the year 1554.

The new or ſecond quadrangle was erected in the year 1610, from whoſe apartments on the ſouth, there is a beautiful proſpect over the meadows. The terrace formed on the city wall, in the garden of this college, is no leſs finely ſituated for a delightful view; and the gardens in general have a pleaſing variety.

Among the various benefactors to this ſociety, the moſt remarkable are, Henry Sever and Richard Fitz James, formerly wardens; and doctor John Wyllyott, chancellor of the church of Exeter, who gave exhibitions for the maintenance of twelve Portioniſtæ, called Poſt-maſters, in the year 1380. Theſe were afterwards encreaſed to fourteen, by John Chambers, who directed that his two additional exhibitioners ſhould be elected from Eaton ſchool. Four ſcholarſhips have been likewiſe ſince founded by Mr. Henry Jackſon late of this houſe.

At preſent the ſociety conſiſts of a warden, twenty-four ſcholars, fourteen poſt-maſters, four ſcholars, two chaplains, and two clerks. The number of members of each ſort is upwards of ſeventy.

Exeter College. The ſociety belonging to this college was inſtituted by Walter Stapledon, biſhop of Exeter in the year 1314; but he not liking the then ſituation tranſlated the ſociety to this building, which was at firſt called Stapledon Inn, but afterwards the name it now bears.

This college is ſituated on the left ſide within the Turl from the north. In the center of the front, which is two hundred and twenty feet in length, is a beautiful gate of ruſtic work: over it is a tower adorned with Ionic pilaſters, ſupporting a ſemicircular pediment, in the area of which are the arms of the founder on a ſhield ſurrounded with feſtoons; and the whole is finiſhed by a light baluſtrade.

On the ſouth of the college is the hall, which is long and lofty, and adorned with portraits. It was entirely built from the ground by Sir John Ackland, knight, of Devonſhire in the year 1618. On the north is the chapel, which conſiſts of two iſles, and was erected by doctor Hakewell, formerly rector, in the year 1624.

The original entrance into this college was through the tower which appears on the north eaſt angle of the court, and for which a poſtern in the city wall was opened. Near or about this tower the old college ſeems to have ſtood, part of which ſtill remains adjoining to the tower on either ſide, that on the eaſt being the moſt ancient, erected in the year 1404, and that on the weſt, viz. the rectors lodgings, together with the tower itſelf, in the year 1432. Ancient, however, as theſe remains are, yet they are ſtill more modern than any part of the founder's original ſtructure, no remains of which are to be ſeen at preſent, except a part of the chapel, ſince converted into the library.

This college conſiſts at preſent of one rector, twenty-five fellows, and a bible clerk, with two exhibitioners. The number of the ſtudents is about fifty.

Oriel College. The original foundation of this college is aſcribed to king Edward II. in 1324; but it does not appear that he contributed any farther than granting a licence to Adam le Brome, his almoner, in that year, to build and endow a college here, by the name of St. Mary's-hall. To this ſociety king Edward III. in the firſt year of his reign, gave a large building in Oxford, called le Oriel, to which the fellows removing from St. Mary's-hall, this was called Oriel College.

It is ſituated ſouthward of St. Mary's church, on the north ſide of the front of Corpus Chriſti college, its great gate being almoſt oppoſite to the back gate of Chriſt-church. Its quadrangle, which was erected in the year 1640, is uniform and decent. The north ſide conſiſts of the provoſt's lodgings, and the library; the eaſt of the hall, buttery, and veſtibule of the chapel, which runs eaſtward from thence; and the ſouth and weſt ſides form the common apartment. The aſcent to the hall is by a large flight of ſteps, covered with a proportionable portico. It is handſomely wainſcotted in the Doric ſtyle, and decorated at the upper end with a portrait of Edward II. dreſſed in his regalia, by Hudſon; one of queen Anne, who annexed a prebend of Rocheſter to the provoſtſhip, by Dahl; and another of the late duke of Beaufort, who is repreſented erect, in his parliament robes, attended by a negro boy bearing a coronet, by Soldi. The chapel has that beauty belonging to it which is derived from a decent ſimplicity, and was finiſhed in the year 1642. The window over the altar has been lately painted with the Wiſe Men's Offering, by Mr. Pakett of York.

The library conſiſts of half the upper ſtory of the north ſide of this quadrangle, and is a neat, well furniſhed room. The garden-court which is entered by a paſſage in the ſame north ſide, receives ceives an agreeable air from an elegant little garden which is formed in the midſt of it, and fenced on this ſide with iron gates, and palliſades, ſupported by a dwarf wall and ſtone piers. The ſides are two wings, in a ſtyle correſpondent to that of the quadrangle. That on the right was erected by doctor Robinſon, biſhop of London; and that on the left, by doctor Carter, formerly provoſt.

The principal benefactor to this building was doctor John Tolſon, when provoſt, who, beſides other valuable donations, gave 1150l. for that purpoſe. Doctor Robinſon, biſhop of London, alſo gave 2500l. for augmenting the fellowſhips.

The members of this college conſiſt at preſent of one provoſt, eighteen fellows, and about fourteen exhibitioners. The ſtudents amount to near eighty.

Queen's College. This college received its name from queen Philippa, conſort of king Edward III. at whoſe inſtigation Robert Eglesfield, a batchelor of divinity in this univerſity, in the year 1340, purchaſed certain houſes in the pariſh of St. Peter in the Eaſt, in the city of Oxford, which he converted into a collegiate hall, by the name of "Aula Scholarium Reginæ de Oxon." and having obtained a royal charter of confirmation he endowed this hall for a provoſt, and twelve fellows. After his death king Edward III. in remembrance of his queen Philippa, gave two tenements to this college, and ſettled them on the ſociety by the name of Queen's college.

It is ſituated in the High-ſtreet, oppoſite Univerſity College. The front, which is formed in the ſtyle of the Luxemburgh palace, is at once magnificent and elegant. In the middle of it is a ſuperb cupola, under which is a ſtatue of the late queen Caroline. The firſt court is one hundred and forty feet in length, and one hundred and thirty in breadth; and, except the north ſide, is ſurrounded by a beautiful cloiſter. Over the weſtern cloiſter are the provoſt's lodgings, which are ſpacious and ſplendid. The north ſide is formed by the chapel and hall, and finely finiſhed in the Doric order. In the centre, over a portico leading to the north court, ſtands a handſome cupola ſupported by eight Ionic columns.

The north court is one hundred and thirty feet long, and ninety broad. On the weſt ſtands the library, which is of the Corinthian order. Under the eaſt ſide of this edifice runs a cloiſter; its weſt ſide is adorned with ſtatues of the founder, and benefactors, and other pieces of ſculpture. The room within is highly finiſhed. The book-caſes, which are of Norway oak, are decorated with well-wrought carving, and in the ceiling are ſome admirable compartments of ſtucco.

The chapel is ornamented in the Corinthian order, with a beautiful ceiling of fret-work. The windows are all of fine old painted glaſs, viz. 1518; that over the altar excepted, repreſenting our Lord's nativity, which was executed by Mr. Price, A. D. 1717. The moſt remarkable are two on the north ſide, of the Laſt Judgment, and two on the ſouth, of the Aſcenſion. Theſe, with the reſt, were removed hither from the old chapel.

The hall, which is fitted up in the Doric order, and has an admirable proportion, is ſixty feet long, and thirty broad, with an arched roof, of a correſpondent height. It is furniſhed with excellent portraits of the founder and benefactors. Over the ſcreen is a handſome gallery, intended for muſic, and as a veſtibule to the common room, to which it leads.

The area on which this beautiful college ſtands is an oblong ſquare three hundred feet in length, and two hundred and twenty in breadth, which being divided by the hall and chapel, is formed into the two courts above deſcribed.

This magnificent ſtructure was begun by Sir Joſeph Williamſon, knight, in the year 1672, and being continued by the liberality of ſeveral other benefactors, was at length completed by the noble legacy of Mr. Mitchell of Richmond, who likewiſe founded eight fellowſhips and four ſcholarſhips. The fellows and ſcholars have handſome apartments appropriated to them in the new buildings, beſides a ſtipend of fifty pounds per annum to each of the former, and thirty pounds per annum to each of the latter.

At preſent the college conſiſts of a provoſt, ſixteen fellows, two chaplains, eight taberdars, (ſo called from Taberdum, a ſhort gown which they formerly wore) ſixteen ſcholars, two clerks, and forty exhibitioners. The number of ſtudents is upwards of one hundred.

New College. This college is ſituated eaſtward of the ſchools, and is ſeparated from Queen's College by a narrow lane on the ſouth. It was founded by William of Wickham, biſhop of Wincheſter, in the year 1379, and has many cuſtoms and privileges peculiar to itſelf.

In the center of the firſt court, which is one hundred and ſixty-eight feet in length, and one hundred and twenty-nine in breadth, is a ſtatue of Minerva, given by Sir Henry Parker of Honington in Warwickſhire. The north ſide, which conſiſts of the chapel and hall, is a noble ſpecimen of Gothic magnificence. The two upper ſtories of the eaſt ſide form the library; and on the weſt are the lodgings of the warden, which are very commodious, and adorned with many valuable portraits.

The chapel belonging to this college exceeds all in the univerſity. The ante-chapel, which is ſupported by four pillars of fine proportion, runs at right angles to the choir, and is eighty feet long and thirty-ſix broad. The choir, which is entered by a gothic ſcreen of beautiful conſtruction, is one hundred feet long, thirty-five broad, and ſixty-five in height. The painting over the altar is exceeding curious, and conſiſts of a ſalutation piece, behind which the painter has artfully thrown the concave of a well ornamented dome, in which the chapel appears to terminate. The altar itſelf is approached by a noble flight of marble ſteps. It is encloſed by a well wrought rail of iron work, and covered with a rich pall of crimſon velvet. From this ſituation, the organ with the ſtall-work underneath has a very ſtriking effect. The windows on the ſouth ſide are moſt beautifully painted by Mr. Price of London; don; each window repreſenting eight figures of ſaints and martyrs, with their reſpective ſymbols and inſignia, large as the life.

In this chapel choir ſervice is performed every day at eleven and five, and is probably no where performed with more ſolemnity, or heard to better advantage. The organ is a moſt admirable inſtrument, erected by the famous Dolham, and ſince improved with the addition of the clarion-ſtop and ſwelling organ, by Mr. John Byfield.

Adjoining to the chapel, is a noble cloiſter, which conſtitutes a quadrangle, 146 feet in length on two ſides, and 105 the other two, with a garden in the area; contiguous to which on the north is a large and lofty tower with ten bells.

The hall, is of excellent proportion, being 78 feet in length, 35 in breadth, and 43 in height. Its wainſcot, which was erected about the reign of Henry VIII. is curious, and much in character. At the eaſt end are portraits of the munificent founder, William of Wickham; William of Wainfleet, founder of Magdalen college, and Henry Chichely, the founder of All Souls college.

The library conſiſts of two rooms which are furniſhed with a fine collection, and well known to the learned for its many valuable manuſcripts.

In the chapel is ſhewn the croſier of the founder, one of the nobleſt curioſities, and almoſt the only one of its kind now remaining in this kingdom. It is nearly ſeven feet in height, is of ſilver gilt, embelliſhed with variety of the richeſt Gothic workmanſhip, and charged with figures of angels, and the tutelar ſaints of the cathedral church of Wincheſter, executed with an elegance equal to that of a more modern age. It is finely preſerved, and from a length of almoſt four hundred years, has loſt but little of its original ſplendor.

The garden court has a beautiful area, which, by means of a ſucceſſion of retiring wings, diſplays itſelf gradually as we approach the garden, from which it is ſeparated by a ſumptuous iron palliſade, 130 feet in length. This court has a noble effect from the mount in the garden; and the proſpect is ſtill further improved by the appearance of the old Gothic ſpires and battlements, which overlook the new building from the founder's court. It began to be erected in the year 1682, at the expence of the college, aſſiſted by many liberal benefactors.

A very principal part of the garden, as likewiſe part of the college, is ſurrounded by the city wall; which, from this circumſtance of ſerving as a fence or boundary to the college precincts, is here, and here only, preſerved entire, with its battlements and baſtions, to a conſiderable diſtance. On the ſouth ſide is a pleaſant bowling green, ſhaded to the weſt by a row of elms, and on the eaſt by tall ſycamores, the branches of which being interwoven and incorporated with each other, from end to end, are juſtly admired as a natural curioſity.

This college, dedicated to St. Mary Winton, has been called New college from its firſt foundation, being at that time an object of public curioſity, and far ſuperior, in point of extent and grandeur, to any college that had then appeared. It was the firſt effort to magnificence ever exhibited in Oxford; and probably Merton was, before this, the moſt ſplendid college in the univerſity, though at that time by no means adorned with buildings as at preſent.

This college conſiſts of the following members, viz. one warden, ſeventy fellows, ten chaplains, three clerks, ſixteen choriſters, and one ſexton; together with many gentlemen commoners.

Lincoln College. The foundation of this college was begun by Richard Fleming, biſhop of Lincoln, in the year 1427; but he dying before his deſign was completed, Thomas Rotherham, biſhop of Lincoln, in the year 1475, finiſhed the building of the college, encreaſed its revenues, and gave it the name it now bears.

This college is ſituated between All-Saints church and Exeter-college, and conſiſts of two quadrangles. The firſt of theſe is formed excluſive of chambers, by the lodgings of the rector, ſtanding in the ſouth eaſt angle, and erected by Thomas Beckington, biſhop of Bath and Wells, in the year 1465; the library and common room on the north, and refectory on the eaſt.

The library is ſmall, but neatly decorated, and contains many curious manuſcripts, chiefly given by Thomas Gaſcoigne, in the year 1432. It was finiſhed, as it appears at preſent, by the liberality of Sir Nathaniel Lloyd, firſt a commoner of this, and afterwards fellow of All-Souls college. This room was originally the chapel, and was converted into a library at the expence of Nathaniel lord Crew, when fellow, in the year 1656.

The hall is forty feet in length, 25 in breadth, and proportionable in height. It was erected by John Williams, biſhop of Lincoln; and was handſomely wainſcotted by biſhop Crew, whoſe arms appear over the middle of the ſcreen; and thoſe of the reſt of the contributors are interſperſed about the mouldings.

From this court which forms a ſquare of eighty feet, we enter through the ſouth ſide, the ſecond, which is about ſeventy feet ſquare. On the ſouth ſide of this quadrangle is the chapel, which was built by biſhop Williams abovementioned, in the year 1631. The ſcreen is of cedar elegantly carved. The windows are of painted glaſs, complete, and well preſerved. Thoſe on the north repreſent twelve of the prophets, and thoſe on the ſouth the twelve apoſtles, large as life.

The eaſt window exhibits a view of the types relative to our Saviour, with their reſpective completions, viz.

1. From the left hand, the Nativity; and under it, the Hiſtory of the Creation its antetype.

2. Our Lord's baptiſm; and under it, the paſſing of the Iſraelites through the Red Sea.

3. The Jewiſh paſſover, and under it the inſtitution of the Lord's Supper.

4. The Brazen Serpent in the Wilderneſs; correſponding to——Chriſt on the croſs.

5. Jonas delivered from the whale's belly, expreſſive of—Chriſt's Reſurrection.

6. Elijah in the fiery chariot, with--Our Lord's Aſcenſion.

The roof conſiſts of compartments in cedar, embelliſhed with the arms of the different founders and benefactors, and interchangeably enriched with cherubims, palm-branches, and feſtoons, diverſified with painting and gilding. There is an admirable proportion and elegance of execution in the eight figures of cedar which are reſpectively placed at each end of the deſks, and repreſent Moſes, Aaron, the four Evangeliſts, St. Peter and St. Paul.

The principal benefactor to this college is Nathaniel lord Crew, biſhop of Durham, who, about the year 1717, added to the headſhip an annual allocation of twenty pounds; to the twelve fellowſhips ten pounds each; and to the ſeven ſcholarſhips and bible clerkſhip, five pounds each. He likewiſe improved the four college curacies; and moreover founded twelve exhibitioners, with ſalaries of twenty pounds per annum each.

At preſent the ſociety conſiſts of a rector, twelve fellows, twelve exhibitioners, and ſeven ſcholars, with a bible clerk; excluſive of members that are independent.

All Souls College. This college was founded by Henry Chichely, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the year 1437, for a warden, and forty fellows, the election of whom he directed ſhould be annually held on All Souls day. It is ſituated in the High-ſtreet, weſtward of Queen's-college; and has over the gateway the ſtatues of the founder and king Henry VI.

The firſt court is a handſome Gothic edifice 124 feet in length, and 72 in breadth. The chapel on the north ſide is a ſtately pile. The antechapel in which are ſome remarkable monuments, is 70 feet long, and 30 broad. The entrance to the inner chapel, which is of the ſame dimenſions, is by a grand flight of marble ſteps, through a ſcreen conſtructed by Sir Chriſtopher Wren. The ſpacious environ of the altar conſiſts of the richeſt red-vein marble. Above is a fine aſſumption piece of the founder, by Sir James Thornhill. On the right and left, at the approach of the altar, are two inimitable urns by the ſame hand, reſpectively repreſenting, in their baſs-reliefs, the inſtitution of the two ſacraments. Between the windows, on each ſide, are figures of ſaints in claro-obſcuro, bigger than the life. The ceiling is diſpoſed into compartments embelliſhed with carving and gilding; and the whole has an air of great ſplendor and dignity.

The hall is an elegant modern room. It is furniſhed with portraits of the munificent founder, colonel Codrington, and Sir Nathaniel Lloyd. At the high table is an hiſtorical piece by Sir James Thornhill, whoſe ſubject is the finding of the law. The figure of Joſiah, rending his robe, is animated and expreſſive. Over the chimney piece, which is handſomely executed, in dove-coloured marble, is a buſt of the founder: on one ſide is a buſt of Linacre, formerly fellow, a famous phyſician in the reign of Henry VIII. and on the other of John Leland, a celebrated antiquarian and polite ſcholar, about the ſame reign, ſuppoſed to have been a member of this houſe. The reſt of the room is adorned with an admirable ſeries of antique buſts.

The buttery, which was built with the hall, is a well proportioned room, of an oval form, having an arched roof of ſtone, ornamented with curious workmanſhip.

The ſecond court is a magnificent Gothic quadrangle, 172 feet in length, and 155 in breadth. On the ſouth are the chapel and hall; on the weſt a cloiſter, with a grand portico; on the north a library; and on the eaſt two ſuperb Gothic towers, in the centre of a ſeries of fine apartments.

The north ſide of this court is wholly taken up with the library, which is 200 feet in length, 30 in breadth, and 40 in height, and finiſhed in the moſt ſplendid and elegant manner. The room itſelf is furniſhed with two noble arangements of book caſes, one above the other, ſupported by Doric and Ionic pilaſters. The upper claſs is formed in a ſuperb gallery, which ſurrounds three ſides. On the north ſide, near the middle of the room, is a receſs equal to the breadth of the whole room; and in its area is placed the ſtatue of colonel Codrington, the founder of the library. The ceiling and ſpaces between the windows, are ornamented with the richeſt ſtucco; and over the gallery is a ſeries of bronzes interchangeably diſpoſed, conſiſting of vaſes, and the buſts of many eminent men.

This college conſiſts of one warden, forty fellows, two chaplains, three clerks and ſix choriſters.

Magdalen College. This college was founded by William Patten, biſhop of Wincheſter, in the year 1458. It is ſituated without the eaſt gate of the city on the borders of the river Cherwell. At the entrance of the weſt front of the college is a Doric portal, decorated with a ſtatue of the founder.

The gate under the weſt window of the chapel is adorned with five ſmall but elegant figures; that on the right repreſents the founder; the next is William of Wykeham, in whoſe college at Wincheſter the founder was ſchoolmaſter; the third is St. Mary Magdalen, to whom the college is dedicated; the fourth is Henry III. who founded the hoſpital ſince converted into this college; and the laſt of St. John the baptiſt, by whoſe name the ſaid hoſpital was called.

Nearly adjoining to the preſident's lodgings is a ſtately gateway, the original entrance into the college; but ſince diſuſed, formed in a tower, whoſe ſides are adorned with ſtatues of four of the perſons abovementioned. This leads us to a cloiſter, on the ſouth ſide of which are the chapel and hall.

The hall is a ſtately Gothic room, well proportioned, and handſomely finiſhed. It has four whole length portraits, viz. of the founder, doctor Butler, William Freeman, prince Rupert; and two half lengths, viz. biſhop Warner, and doctor Hammond.

The ante-chapel is a ſpacious building, ſupported with two ſtaff-moulded pillars, extremely light. In the weſt window are ſome fine remains of glaſs painted in claro obſcuro. The ſubject is the reſurrection. The deſign is after one invented and executed by Schwartz, for the wife of William duke of Bavaria, more than two hundred hundred years ſince, which was afterwards engraved by Sadeler. The choir is ſolemn, and handſomely decorated. The windows, each of which contains ſix figures, almoſt as large as life, of primitive fathers, ſaints, martyrs and apoſtles, are finely painted in the taſte, and about the time of that juſt deſcribed. Theſe windows formerly belonged to the ante-chapel, the two near the altar excepted, which were lately done, being all removed hither in the year 1741. In the confuſion of the civil wars, the original choir windows were taken down and concealed. They did not, however, eſcape the rage of fanaticiſm and ignorance: they were unluckily diſcovered by a party of Cromwell's troopers, who ſpreading them along the cloiſters, jumped through them in their jack-boots, with the utmoſt ſatisfaction, and entirely deſtroyed them. The altar-piece was performed by Iſaac Fuller, about ninety years ago, and repreſents the Reſurrection.

Under this piece is another admirable picture of our Lord bearing the croſs, ſuppoſed to be the work of Guido. It was taken at Vigo; and being brought into England by the late duke of Ormond, came into the poſſeſſion of William Freeman, eſq; of Hamels, in Hertfordſhire, who gave it to the ſociety. The altar is fitted up in the modern ſtile, with a well executed wainſcot, and columns of the Corinthian order, charged with other elegant embelliſhments. Choir ſervice is performed in this chapel at eleven and four every day; except Sundays and Holidays, when the morning ſervice is ſung at eight.

On the north ſide of this court is a narrow paſſage that leads to a beautiful opening, one ſide of which is bounded by a noble and elegant edifice in the modern taſte, conſiſting of three ſtories 300 feet in length. Through the center of this building we paſs into the grove or paddock, which is well ſtocked with deer, and formed into many delightful walks and lawns.

Beſides the abovementioned grove, there is a meadow within the college precincts, conſiſting of about thirteen acres, ſurrounded by a pleaſant walk, called the Water-walk. This walk is ſhaded with hedges and lofty trees, which in one part grow wild, and in the other are cut and diſpoſed regularly. The whole circuit of the walk is waſhed by branches of the Cherwell, and has many beautiful proſpects. The tower of this college, which contains a muſical peal of ten bells, was erected by cardinal Wolſey in the year 1492. The principal benefactors were, Henry VI. William Fitz Alan, earl of Arundell, Claymond, Morwent, &c.

The preſent members of this college are, a preſident, forty fellows, thirty demies, a divinity lecturer, a ſchoolmaſter, one uſher, four chaplains, an organiſt, eight clerks, and ſixteen choriſters. The number of ſtudents are about 120.

Brazen-Noſe College. This college was founded by William Smith, biſhop of Lincoln, and Richard Sutton, gent. in the year 1511. It received the ſingular epithet from a hall of the ſame name, diſtinguiſhed by a large braſs noſe upon the gate, on the ſite of which it was principally built.

This college has two courts. The firſt, which is the original one, conſiſts of the lodgings of the principal, and chambers of the fellows and ſtudents, and the refectory, which is elegantly fitted up, and adorned with portraits. Over its portico are two antique buſts, one of Alfred, who built Little Univerſity hall, or King's hall, on the ſite of which the preſent college is partly founded; and the other of John Erigena, a Scotchman, who firſt read lectures in the ſaid hall in the year 882. Over the door leading up to the Common room, which was originally the chapel, is a Latin inſcription, the Engliſh of which runs thus:

"In the name of God, the biſhop of Lincoln "and Sutton, laid this ſtone, at the command "of the king."

In the center of this court is a ſtatue of Cain and Abel.

From this court we are led through a paſſage on the left hand of the gate to the ſecond court, which is planned in a good taſte, and was probably the work of Sir Chriſtopher Wren. The cloiſter on the eaſt ſide ſupports the library; and on the ſouth ſtands the chapel, the roof of which is a frame of wood in imitation of Gothic ſtonework. The altar is beautifully decorated, and the whole chapel is at once neat and ſplendid.

The college conſiſts of one principal, twenty fellows, thirty ſcholars, and four exhibitioners; together with about forty or fifty ſtudents.

Corpus Chriſti College. This college was founded by Richard Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter in the year 1513. It is ſituated near the back gate of Chriſt church, on the ſouth ſide of Oriel college. A beautiful Gothic gateway leads us to the firſt court, in which there is a peculiar appearance of neatneſs. On the eaſt ſtands the hall, which is handſomely wainſcotted, and well proportioned. The rafters in the ceiling are well wrought in the Gothic ſtile.

In the center of this court is a curious column exhibiting a cylindrical dial, the conſtruction of which is eſteemed a valuable piece of old Gnomonics: It was made by Robert Hegge, a fellow, in the reign of queen Elizabeth. From hence we paſs into the cloiſters, which are in the modern taſte. South of theſe is an elegant pile of building, of the Ionic order, which fronts Chriſt church meadow, and was erected by Dr. Turner, formerly preſident. There is likewiſe another neat ſtructure, of the modern kind, near the hall, appropriated to the uſe of a certain number of gentlemen commoners.

The library, which is well furniſhed in general, is remarkable for a collection of pamphlets from the reformation to the revolution; an Engliſh bible, ſuppoſed to be of higher antiquity than that of Wickliffe; and a vellum roll, which exhibits the pedigree of the royal family, with the collateral branches, from Alfred to Edward I. richly decorated with their arms blazoned, and ſigned by the kings at arms. The moſt ſtriking curioſity is an ancient manuſcript hiſtory of the bible in French, illuminated with a ſeries of beautiful tiful paintings, illuſtrating the ſacred ſtory. It was given by general Oglethorp, formerly a member of this houſe. Here is ſhewn alſo the croſier of the founder, which, although a fine ſpecimen of antique workmanſhip, is by no means equal to that of Wickham at New College.

The chapel is ſeventy feet in length, and twenty-five in breadth, with a ſcreen and altar-piece of cedar.

At preſent the members of this college conſiſt of one preſident, twenty fellows, two chaplains, twenty ſcholars, two clerks, two choriſters, and ſix gentlemen commoners.

The ſtatutes ordain that the fellows ſhould be elected from the ſcholars, and the latter from the counties and dioceſes following, viz. one from Lancaſhire, one from Oxfordſhire, two from Kent, one from Bedfordſhire, one from Wiltſhire, or, in defect of a candidate, the dioceſe of Sarum, two from Glouceſterſhire, two from Lincolnſhire, two from Exeter, two from Bath and Wells, one from Durham, three from Hampſhire, and two from Surry.

Chriſt Church College. This college was originally founded by cardinal Wolſey in the year 1525; but he being impeached of high treaſon before the buildings were finiſhed, all the eſtates and poſſeſſions of this ſociety were forfeited to the king, which put a ſtop to the buildings for three years, at the end of which time the king iſſued out letters patent, ordering the building to be carried on, the original revenues to be ſettled on the ſociety, and the foundation to be called king Henry VIII's college; but being afterwards diſſatisfied with this appointment, he ſuppreſſed the inſtitution in 1545, and in the year following erected the church of this college into a cathedral, by the name of the cathedral church of Chriſt in Oxford, founded by king Henry VIII. and ſettled in it a biſhop, dean and eight canons, eight clerks, eight choriſters, a muſic maſter, an organiſt, and forty ſtudents, who were to be choſen yearly from Weſtminſter ſchool.

The front of this college is extended to the length of 382 feet, and terminated at either end by two correſponding turrets. In the center is the grand entrance, whoſe Gothic proportions and ornaments are remarkably magnificent. Over it is a beautiful tower, planned by Sir Chriſtopher Wren, and erected by biſhop Fell. It contains the great bell called Tom, on the ſound of which, every night at nine, the ſtudents of the whole univerſity are enjoined by ſtatute to repair to their reſpective ſocieties. The ſpectator cannot but obſerve with regret, that this front, perhaps the nobleſt in the kingdom of the Gothic ſtile, loſes much of its effect, on account of the declivity of the ground on which it ſtands, and the narrowneſs of the approach. It ſeems, however, probable, that a terrace walk was intended, by way of raiſing the ground to a level, the whole length of the college; for the rough foundation ſtones of the hoſpital on the oppoſite ſide, left unfiniſhed by Wolſey, ſtill remain bare, and the ſmooth ſtones are terminated by an horizental right line, to which height the ground would have been elevated.

The eaſt, north, and weſt ſides of the grand quadrangle, with part of the ſouth, conſiſt of the lodgings of the dean, the canons, and the ſtudents, &c. The greateſt part of the ſouth ſide is formed by the hall, which is conſiderably elevated above the reſt of the buildings, and, taken as a detached ſtructure, is a noble ſpecimen of ancient magnificence.—The ſouth, eaſt, and part of the weſt ſide, were erected by cardinal Wolſey, as was the kitchen to the ſouth of the hall, which is every way proportionable to the reſt of the college.

The north, and what remained of the weſt ſide of this court, was finiſhed in the year 1665. By the marks on the wall, ſome ſuppoſe this area was ſurrounded by a cloiſter. It is evident that a cloiſter was deſigned, but it does not appear ever to have been executed.

Round the area is a ſpacious terrace walk made in the year 1665; and in the center a baſon and fountain, with a ſtatue of Mercury. On the inſide over the grand entrance, is a ſtatue of queen Anne: over the arch, in the north eaſt angle, another of biſhop Fell; and oppoſite to that at the ſouth eaſt, a ſtatue of Cardinal Wolſey.

Beneath the laſt ſtatue is the hall, which contains eight windows on each ſide, and is 120 feet in length, 40 in breadth, and 80 feet high. It is entered by a ſpacious and ſtately ſtair-caſe of ſtone, covered by a beautiful roof built in the year 1630, which, though very broad, is ſupported by a ſmall ſingle pillar of fine proportion.

This hall is probably the largeſt, and certainly the moſt ſuperb of any in the kingdom. The roof is a noble frame of timber work, beautified with near three hundred coats of arms, properly blazoned, and enriched with other decorations of painting, carving and gilding, in the Gothic taſte. The room has been refitted at a large expence, and is adorned with the portraits of many eminent perſons who have been either educated at, or connected with the college.

The church belonging to this college is ſituated to the eaſt of the grand quadrangle. It is an ancient venerable ſtructure, and was originally the church of St. Frideſwide's monaſtery, on or near the ſite of which the college is erected. The roof of the choir is a beautiful piece of ſtone work, put up by Cardinal Wolſey, who likewiſe rebuilt or refitted the ſpire as it now ſtands. The iſle, on the north of the choir, was the dormitory of St. Frideſwide's, in which an ancient monument is ſhewn, ſaid to be the tomb of that ſaint who died in the year 739. Some of the windows are adorned with beautiful paintings, particularly the eaſt and weſt windows, the former of which repreſents the Epiphany; and the latter, St. Peter delivered out of priſon by the angel.

Choir ſervice is performed in this cathedral twice a day, viz. at ten o'clock in the morning, and four in the afternoon.

This college or church conſiſts of one dean, eight canons, eight chaplains, eight ſinging men, one organiſt, eight choriſters, and one hundred and one ſtudents.

Trinity College. This college was founded by Sir

Sir Thomas Pope, knight, in the year 1555. It is ſituate oppoſite to the Turl, and has a ſpacious avenue, fenced from the ſtreet by an handſome iron palliſade, with folding gates, adorned on the outſide with the arms of the donor, and the earl of Guilford. Over the gate which leads to the front of the college are the arms of the founder, ſurrounded with a wreath of laurel, and ſupported by the genii of Fame.

The chapel is extremely elegant. The ceiling is covered with a bold and beautiful ſtucco; and the carvings about the ſcreen, which is of cedar, are very maſterly. Under an alcove near the altar, is a fine Gothic tomb, on which are the effigies of the liberal founder and his lady in alabaſter.

The hall is ſpacious and well proportioned, in the Gothic ſtyle, and adorned with portraits of the founder and his lady.

The library contains a great number of books, among which is a valuable manuſcript of Euclid; being a tranſlation from the Arabic into Latin, before the diſcovery of the original Greek, by Adalardus Bathonienſis, in 1130.

This college conſiſts of one preſident, twelve fellows, and twelve ſcholars. Theſe, with the independent members amount to near ſeventy.

St. John Baptiſt's College. This college was founded by Sir Thomas White, alderman of London, in the year 1557. It ſtands in a retired ſituation, on the north of Baliol and Trinity colleges. Before its front is a handſome terrace, ſhaded with a row of lofty elms. It conſiſts of two courts, in the firſt of which are the chapel and hall on the north, and the preſident's lodgings on the eaſt.

The chapel is very elegantly furniſhed. The ſcreen and altar are finiſhed in the Corinthian order. Over the communion table is a beautiful piece of tapeſtry, repreſenting our Lord breaking bread with the two diſciples at Emmaus, from a famous original of Titian. On the north wall, eaſtward of the organ, is a marble urn, containing the heart of doctor Rawlinſon, incloſed in a ſilver veſſel, which was placed here according to the direction of his laſt will; and is thought to be a ſingular curioſity.

The hall is elegantly fitted up in the modern taſte. The ſcreen is of Portland ſtone, in the Ionic order; and the wainſcot, which is the ſame, is remarkably beautiful. Over the chimney piece, is a picture of St. John the Baptiſt, by Titian; and at the upper end is a whole length portrait of the founder, with archbiſhop Laud on the right, and archbiſhop Juxton on the left.

The ſecond court is the deſign of Inigo Jones, and was built in 1635. The eaſt and weſt ſides exhibit, each, a beautifiul Doric colonade, whoſe columns conſiſt of a remarkable ſpecies of ſtone, ſaid to be dug at Fifield, in Berks. In the center of each colonade are formed two porticos, charged with a profuſion of embelliſhments. Over theſe, on each ſide, are two good ſtatues in braſs; that on the eaſt of Charles I. and that on the weſt, of his queen.

The library is formed from the upper ſtories of the ſouth and eaſt ſides. The firſt diviſion conſiſts of printed books; the ſecond of manuſcripts, chiefly given by archbiſhop Laud, who, in this room, entertained Charles I. and his court with an elegant feaſt. In the archieves are many curioſities; particularly a drawing of king Charles I. which contains the book of pſalms written in the lines of the face and hair of the head. Likewiſe a picture of St. John the Baptiſt ſtained in marble.

This college conſiſts of one preſident, fifty fellows, two chaplains, one organiſt, five ſinging men, ſix choriſters, and two ſextons; excluſive of about ſeventy ſtudents.

Jeſus College was founded by Hugh Price, doctor of the canon laws, in the univerſity, in the year 1571.

In the firſt court is the hall, in which is a portrait of queen Elizabeth, with a ceiling of well executed ſtucco; the principal's lodgings, in which is a valuable picture of Charles I. at full length; and the chapel which is handſomely furniſhed and well proportioned.

The library, which is on the weſt ſide of the inner court, is a well furniſhed room, and adorned, among other portraits, with a curious picture of Doctor Hugh Price, founder of the college.

The preſent members of this college conſiſt of one principal, nineteen fellows, and eighteen ſcholars; beſides many exhibitioners and independent ſtudents.

Wadham College. The deſign of this building was projected by Nicholas Wadham, eſq; but he dying before the commencement of its execution, appointed Dorothy, his wife, to finiſh the ſame, which was accordingly done, and opened for the admittance of members on the twelfth of April 1613.

This college is ſituate in the northern ſuburb, called Holywell, the front being oppoſite to Trinity gardens. The hall is entered by a handſome portico decorated with the ſtatue of the founder, the foundreſs, James I. and other ornaments. It is a ſpacious and lofty room, furniſhed with ſome valuable portraits; particularly a moſt remarkable one of an old woman.

The chapel is ſpacious and venerable. The eaſt window is admirably painted by Van Ling, a Dutchman; it repreſents the paſſion of our Lord, and is ſaid to have coſt fifteen hundred pounds. Round the altar is a very ſingular piece of painting, the figures of which are finely drawn, and have a wonderful effect. The ſubject of the front is the Lord's ſupper; on the north, Abraham and Melchiſedeck; and on the ſouth, the children of Iſrael gathering manna.

The preſent members of this college are, one warden, fifteen fellows, and fifteen ſcholars; two chaplains, two clerks, and ſixteen exhibitioners.

Pembroke College. This college was founded by Thomas Tiſdale, of Glimpton, near Woodſtock, gent. in the year 1610. and is ſituate directly oppoſite the grand gate of Chriſt church. At the entrance, on the right hand, are the maſter's lodgings, which make a handſome appearance, and are large and convenient. From the firſt quadrangle, which, though ſmall, is neat and uniform, we are led, by the north weſt angle, into the hall, which is very handſome, and adorned with pictures of the founder and benefactors.

The chapel, which is ſituated on one ſide of an irregular area, is a modern edifice of the Ionic order. The altar is greatly admired for its neatneſs, and the whole is elegantly finiſhed, and properly adorned. It was built by contribution, and conſecrated in 1732.

To the weſt of the chapel is the garden, in which is a pleaſant common room, and an agreeable terrace walk, formed on the city wall.

To this college belong one maſter, fourteen fellows, and upwards of thirty ſcholars and exhibitioners.

Worceſter College. This college was endowed by Sir Thomas Cooke of Aſtley, near the city of Worceſter, in the year 1714. It is ſituated at the extremity of the weſtern ſuburb, on an eminence which deſcends to the river and meadows. The grand court, or area, conſiſts of three ſides, all of which are finiſhed in the modern taſte.

The library is a beautiful Ionic edifice, one hundred feet in length, ſupported by a ſpacious cloiſter. It is furniſhed with a fine collection of books given by doctor Clarke, formerly fellow of All Soul's College. The greateſt curioſity in this room is Inigo Jones's palliſadio, with his own manuſcript notes in Italian.

On entering the college we have on each ſide the chapel and hall, both of which are fifty feet in length, and twenty-nine in breadth. On the the whole, this houſe, when executed according to the plan, will be a well diſpoſed elegant ſtructure.

The ſociety at preſent conſiſts of one provoſt, twenty fellows, and ſeventeen ſcholars.

Hertford College. This college was originally called Hart-hall, but being endowed by the late doctor Richard Newton, for a principal, four ſenior fellows, or tutors, and junior fellows, or aſſiſtants, beſides a certain number of ſtudents, or ſcholars, was, upon the eighth of September, 1740, erected to a college, by the name of Hertford college.

It is ſituate oppoſite the grand gate of the ſchools, and conſiſts of one irregular court, which has been lately beautified from a fund raiſed for that purpoſe by the late principal. Part of this court conſiſts of a ſmall quantity of modern buildings, viz. the ſouth eaſt angle, and the chapel erected about thirty years ſince, in the ſtile of which the whole college is to be rebuilt.

Here are one principal, four ſenior fellows, or aſſiſtants, beſides a certain number of ſtudents or ſcholars. The number of members in the whole is about thirty.

Excluſive of the above colleges, there are in the univerſity of Oxford, five halls, viz.

1. Magdalen Hall This hall is almoſt contiguous to Magdalen college on the weſt. A principal part of it is the grammar ſchool for the choriſters of Magdalen college, erected by the founder, William of Wainfleet, for that purpoſe alone. In this hall lord Clarendon, the celebrated hiſtorian, received his education. It has a well furniſhed library, with a neat chapel and refectory.

Oppoſite to this hall Edmund earl of Cornwall founded a ſmall houſe and chapel for Trinitarian friars, of the redemption of captives, in 1291, in which, and in a chapel dedicated to the trinity, within Eaſt-gate, the brethren of this order, and ſeveral poor ſcholars who lived upon alms, continued till near the time of the general diſſolution.

2. New Inn Hall. This hall is ſituated near St. Peter's church in the Bailey towards the caſtle. It was conſigned to ſtudents by John Trillock, biſhop of Hereford, in the year 1345, and is eminent for the education of many learned civilians.

Nearly oppoſite to this hall ſtands part of the gateway of St. Mary's college, in which Eraſmus for ſometime reſided. It was founded in the year 1437 for novices of the Auguſtin order, and ſuppreſſed at the reformation.

Alban Hall. This hall joins to Merton college on the eaſt. It appears to have been a houſe of learning in the reign of Edward I. and received its name from Robert de St. Alban, a citizen of Oxford, who, in the reign of Henry III. conveyed this tenement to the nuns of Littlemore. The front is decent, and was erected by Benedict Barnham, alderman of London, in the year 1595. It has a ſmall refectory but no chapel.

4. St. Mary Hall. This hall is ſituate to the ſouth of St. Mary's church, in Oriel-lane. It conſiſts of an elegant little court, which encloſes a neat garden; and has a library, with a handſome, though ſmall chapel, and refectory.

5. St. Edmund's Hall. This hall is contiguous to the eaſt part of Queen's college. It was firſt eſtabliſhed about the reign of Edward II. and was conſigned to Queen's college in the year 1557. It has a library, refectory and chapel, which are all very neat and commodious.

Oxford ſends four members to parliament, viz. two for the city and two for the univerſity. It has two markets, one on Wedneſday, and the other on Saturday. Alſo three annual fairs, viz. the third of May, the firſt Monday in September, and the Thurſday before Michaelmas.

APPENDIX.

APPENDIX.

Being a continuation of our Hiſtory from September 1769, to the year 1770.

ON the twenty-ninth of September 1769, came on at Guildhall, the election of two perſons to be returned by the livery to the court of aldermen for their choice of one to ſerve the office of Lord-mayor of the city of London for the year enſuing. The perſons nominated were William Beckford, eſq; Barlow Trecothick, eſq; and Sir Henry Bankes.

Various diſputes aroſe between the livery and the city officers reſpecting the legality of Mr. Beckford's nomination. The town clerk and common ſerjeant warmly objected to it, and produced an obſolete by-law of the corporation made in the reign of Henry VI. which imported, "that it was agreed between the aldermen and "commonalty, that on account of the heavy "burden, the encreaſed expence, and particular "circumſtances of thoſe times, no perſon ſhould "be re-choſen to ſerve the office of Lord-mayor "within the term of ſeven years after his former "mayoralty." To this the livery replied, that there were precedents ſince that time to the contrary, and particularly that of Sir John Barnard, who having ſerved the office of Lord mayor in 1737, was re-elected to the ſame office in the year 1740. This precedent being undeniable, and no anſwer given to it, Mr. ſheriff Townſhend told the livery that he thought it his duty to take notice to them of the impoſition attempted to be put upon him and them by their ſervants, the town clerk and common ſerjeant; that as not ſuppoſing them capable of an action of that kind, he had before given his opinion to the livery on the objection their ſervants had raiſed to their wiſhes, ſo he now declared the objection entirely overthrown.

Mr. Sawbridge, the other ſheriff, with great humanity, endeavoured to appeaſe the minds of the livery, and to mitigate the fault of the common ſerjeant. The nomination then took place; and after Mr. Beckford and the ſeveral aldermen below the chair had been nominated, the ſheriffs declared the ſhew of hands to be for Meſſrs Beckford and Trecothick. A poll, however, being afterwards demanded for Sir Henry Bankes, the ſame commenced immediately, and was continued till the ſixth of October following, when, being finiſhed, the numbers appeared as follow:

For William Beckford, 1967.
Barlow Trecothick, 1911.
Sir Henry Bankes, 676.

In conſequence of this, the two former were preſented to the court of aldermen for their choice of one of them. And at another meeting held the next day it was determined to receive the ſheriffs return, and the aldermen proceeded to their choice; ſixteen of whom ſcratched for Mr. Beckford, and only ſix for Trecothick; whereupon the former was declared to be legally choſen.

On this declaration Mr. Beckford pleaded his age and infirmities, and wiſhed, as he had before intreated them, that they had choſen Mr. Trecothick, and at the ſame time declaring that he muſt decline it. This was received by the livery with every mark of diſcontent. They vehemently perſiſted in their refuſal to liſten to any excuſe whatever. And ſo determined were they to obtain their ends, that the next day, October, 13, a great number of them, together with the two ſheriffs, waited on Mr. Beckford, and in the ſtrongeſt terms of reſpect, ſollicited with much importunity, that he would, at that important criſis, ſerve the office of Lord-mayor for the year enſuing, to which dignity he had been a ſecond time elected. Mr. Beckford yielded to their earneſt requeſt, and warmeſt deſires and wiſhes; and told them, that notwithſtanding his advanced years, with all his attendant infirmities, and giving up his eaſe and repoſe, he would devote himſelf to the ſervice of the city of London, as well as the nation in general, by accepting the office.

In conſequence of this anſwer, on the 8th of November Mr. Beckford was ſworn into his office at Guildhall, in the preſence of the Lord-mayor, ſeveral aldermen, the two ſheriffs, &c. when the enſigns of mayoralty were ſurrendered to him in the uſual manner. The next day, the 9th of November his lordſhip, together with Samuel Turner, eſq; the late mayor, attended by ſix of the aldermen, and two ſheriffs, ſet out from Guildhall in a very grand proceſſion to the Three Cranes, from whence they proceeded in the city barge to the court of Exchequer at Weſtminſter, where his lordſhip was ſworn into his office with the accuſtomed formality. The dignity and ſplendor of the proceſſion was conſiderably heightened by the ſtate coach, which was magnificently adorned and drawn by a fine ſet of new foreign horſes, preceded by eight footmen in very rich liveries. The cover to the coach box was crimſon velvet curiouſly wrought; on the front, the ſides, and the back part were encloſed the city arms and thoſe of the ironmongers company, the cap of liberty, and various flowers of gold, with a fringe of gold round the edges. The whole proceſſion was exceeding brilliant, and the entertainment at Guildhall more ſplendid than had been known for many years on a like occaſion.

On the 10th of November came on in the court of common pleas, Weſtminſter, a trial between lord Halifax and John Wilkes, eſq; on an action brought by the latter againſt the former for illegally ſeizing his perſon and papers; when after after many learned arguments by the council on both ſides, a verdict was found for the plaintiff, with 4000l damages. The populace were ſo incenſed at this verdict (the damages having been laid at 20,000l.) that the jury were obliged to make their retreat the back way, with ſcarce time to take their fees, and without being invited to the accuſtomed refreſhment of dinner.

On the 6th of March, 1770 purſuant to a precept iſſued by the Lord-mayor, a common hall of the livery of London was held at Guildhall, in order to conſider of a remonſtrance to his majeſty, reſpecting the grievances complained of in a petition preſented the 5th of July laſt. His lordſhip opened the buſineſs of the meeting in a ſpirited manly addreſs to the livery. He told them that theſe cauſes of complaint were not to be attributed to the king; that we had the beſt of princes; that the enjoyment of our preſent liberties was owing to the illuſtrious houſe of Brunſwick; and that it was only under their influence and ſovereignty we could hope to preſerve them. He aſſerted, that it was to evil counſellors only that many of the preſent national calamities were to be attributed; and he concluded with exhorting every perſon preſent to maintain order, decorum and regularity.

After his lordſhip had done Mr. Lovell ſtepped forward and addreſſed the common-hall in a ſenſible elegant ſpeech, in which he informed them of the meaſures that himſelf and the reſt of the committee had taken, and pointed out the neceſſity of the preſent meeting.

He told them that the city not having been honoured by his majeſty with an anſwer, and the ſame ſort of bad men and bad meaſures ſtill prevailing and increaſing, it was neceſſary now to ſend up a remonſtrance. He then ſaid that the committee had prepared a remonſtrance, which, if it was their pleaſure, he would deliver to the Lord-mayor to be by him given to the proper officer to be read to them.

The livery teſtifying their approbation, Sir James Hodges, the town clerk, came forward, and read it, the purport of which was as follows:

" That the petitioners had in a former petition laid their grievances before his majeſty, " whom they conſidered as the father of his " people. That their complaints had been ſlighted, their grievances confirmed, and the only " judge who was removeable at the pleaſure of " the crown (meaning lord chancellor Camden) " had been diſmiſſed for his conduct in parliament.

" That the ſame ſecret and malign influence " had effected a meaſure which would prove " more ruinous than the tax of ſhip money levied by Charles I. or any of the arbitrary meaſures attempted by James II. That if the " parliament of James II. had been as compliant and ſubſervient to that prince, as a ſubſequent one was to the views of the miniſter, the " clamour of his minions for its meeting would " have been as loud as the outcries were for the " other's diſſolution. And concluded with praying his majeſty to diſſolve the parliament."

The remonſtrance was received by the livery with the greateſt acclamations of joy. And on the 14th the right honourable the Lord-mayor, attended by the two ſheriffs, the aldermen Trecothick and Stephenſon, the city officers, the committee of the livery, and about 120 common-councilmen, went in proceſſion from Guildhall to St. James's, to preſent the ſame to his majeſty, amidſt the acclamations of a vaſt multitude of ſpectators aſſembled on the occaſion.

At two o'clock they were intoduced to his majeſty, who received them ſeated on the throne. Sir James Hodges the town clerk, then read the remonſtrance to his majeſty very properly and diſtinctly, and with a ſuitable and judicious emphaſis. To which is majeſty was pleaſed to return the following anſwer:

" I ſhall always be ready to receive the requeſts, " and to liſten to the complaints of my ſubjects; " but it gives me great concern to find, that any " of them ſhould have been ſo far miſled as to " offer me an addreſs and remonſtrance, the contents of which I cannot but conſider as diſreſpectful to me, injurious to parliament, and " irreconcileable to the principles of the conſtitution.

" I have ever made the law of the land the " rule of my conduct, eſteeming it my chief " glory to reign over a free people. With this " view I have always been careful, as well to execute faithfully the truſt repoſed in me, as to " avoid even the appearance of invading any of " thoſe powers which the conſtitution has placed " in other hands. It is only by perſevering in " ſuch a conduct, that I can either diſcharge my " own duty, or ſecure to my ſubjects the free " enjoyment of thoſe rights which my family " were called to defend; and while I act upon " theſe principles, I ſhall have a right to expect, " and I am confident I ſhall continue to receive, " the ſteady and affectionate ſupport of my people."

Remonſtrances of the like nature have been preſented from the city of Weſtminſter and county of Middleſex; and others are in agitation at this time (April 1770) in almoſt all parts of the kingdom. What the event will be time only can diſcover.

FINIS.

ERRATUM.

In the deſcription of the French hoſpital, p. 606, inſtead of the ſecond paragraph, read thus:

" This hoſpital contains about two hundred and twenty poor helpleſs men and women, all of whom are upon " the foundation, and are plentifully ſupplied with the neceſſaries of life at the expence of the hoſpital. This " charity likewiſe extends to lunatics, for whoſe accommodation a large infirmary is provided."
